> Whether it will follow the Herald of Life and deny that there is any personal devil or no, we are not informed.

Who authorized you to say that the Herald of Life denies there being any personal devil? We deny your assumption, entirely; we fully believe, and have always maintained, there are multitudes of "personal devils" or satans, which is the same thing. They are nearly as numerous as the inhabitants of the earth; we find them everywhere, and in all places, among saints and sinners. The difference between us and our opponents' (satans) is this—Their satans are immaterial, fanciful, intangible, spirit-devils. Ours are material, real, tangible, bodily-devils. They fight their satans "as one that beateth the air." We take ours hand to hand in fair open conflict, striking home blows, sometimes killing them outright, by the help of the sword of the Spirit. Theirs never die, because they are intangible and can never be hit, strike as you will.

To speak without a figure—Whatever opposes God or his truth is a devil, or satan, of evil character. Whatever opposes wickedness and error is also a satan or devil; that is, it is an adversary; and thus engaged is an angel (messenger) of God, as in the case of Balaam, when "the angel of the Lord stood in the way for a satan against him"—Balaam-Numb. xxii., 22. Also verse 32, where "the angel of the Lord said" to Balaam, "I went out for a satan to thee:" that is, as the translators have truly rendered it, "to withstand thee."

Evil satans, or devils, are all around us, on every side, seeking whom "they may devour." We can only "resist" such by a "steadfast faith" in all that God has spoken, commanded, or promised.

No, no man can say "the Herald of Life denies there is any personal devil." We only deny the existence of a fancy devil, who is everywhere present, tempting everybody, at all times and in all places, and whom all classes of sinners are glad to have for an intangible scape-goat, on whom to lay the blame of all their sins; and whom many saints are exceeding glad to make the object of blame for all their misdeeds. Alas, for such, if there is no intangible spirit-devil! for then they have no cloak for their sins. They might almost say, "You have taken away my devil, and what have I left." See Judges xviii., 24.

Mr. Smith some time since addressed a letter to Mr. Barnes, wherein he endeavors to lead the latter to abandon his views of God and his government for those Mr. Smith has embraced. The occasion of this letter, if we understand it, was the expressions of Mr. Barnes, some years since made, in which he confessed the "facts in this world in regard to sin and misery, and to the punishment of the wicked in a future world" were such that he could not find any theory to dispel the darkness that hung over his mind on the subject; and his remarks concluded as follows:

> I confess, when I look on a world of sinners and sufferers; upon death-beds and grave-yards; upon the world of woe, filled with hosts to suffer forever; when I see my friends, my parents, my family, my people, my fellow-citizens—when I look upon the whole race, all involved in this sin and danger; and when I see the great mass of them wholly unconcerned, and when I feel that God only can save them, and yet he does not do it, I am struck dumb. It is all dark, dark to my soul and I cannot disguise it.

Such was and still is Mr. Barnes' condition, if we understand him; and his confession is an honest one; nor do we wonder at it while he holds to the doctrines of inherent immortality, and eternal sufferings to the lost.

Gerritt Smith undertook to relieve Mr. Barnes; but unfortunately Mr. Smith is deeply in the mire of the infidelity of the "Hartford Convention" of 1853, where Henry C. Wright, Joseph Barker, and others tried so hard to bring the Bible and its teachings into contempt. Mr. Smith's letter, so far as we can judge from the extracts contained in Mr. Barnes' replies, is of the same character as that presented at Hartford. Mr. Smith and Mr. Barnes seem perfectly to agree in one thing, viz., that God has made man "an intelligent and responsible agent, necessarily immortal." That is the language employed by Mr. Barnes in his last reply, and which he understands Mr. Smith to hold.

This is the secret of the "darkness" of both of these able men. They both deal with man as he is not; and thus neither of them have the "light" which shines in God's word on the matter of the government of God. Had the inherent immortality of the soul and eternal woe, or sufferings in a future life, not have been held by Mr. Barnes, his arguments would have had much greater power than they now have; and would, we think, have somewhat relieved his own mind, as well as have crushed Mr. Smith's strongest point.

Mr. Smith's views, however, are not calculated to induce any thinking Christian to abandon Mr. Barnes' position for that of his friend Smith. Mr. Barnes has written five letters, filling near four columns each of the Am. Presbyterian. These letters are interesting, and we have examined them all carefully. The following concluding remarks of Mr. Barnes will give our readers a general view of the position of both these gentlemen; and we think none of our readers will doubt but that Mr. B.'s position is far preferable to that of Mr. Smith; yet both must remain in impenetrable darkness on the government of God with their ideas of a future life for the wicked.

Mr. Barnes' Concluding Remarks.

I have now gone over the main points in your letter, and have finished what I intended to say. I have endeavored to be courteous, but, at the same time I have desired to write you such a letter that you would not be likely to write me another. You will, at least, I think, give me credit for not having given you occasion to do this by any designed misrepresentation of your views.

Thus we pass on—you and I, toward the end of our journey—an end to either of us not now far distant. You, if I have correctly understood your views, with a belief that man is so made that there can be no security that he will not sin while in this world, and in any future condition; that no power can be properly exerted to prevent his sinning without violating his freedom; that by his being so endowed as thus to sin, and thus to set his Maker at defiance, he shows his real greatness; that he can so sin that his Creator cannot recover him except by his own agency, or in other words, can do nothing to effect this without violating his freedom; and all this is essential to just views of moral agency, and must exist in the future world as well as in this, and consequently, that there can never be a state in which man can be secure from sin and therefore from suffering. Thus, too, you hold in regard to God that his power is limited by the human will' he having made man so "great" that he can-not control him; that he does all that he can to save him from ruining himself; but in vain; that he exhausts his power in this respect in the present life, and that man enters the eternal world with no hope of help from his Maker; and that God himself is so bound and controlled by the fixed and inexorable laws of the universe; that he cannot interpose, even by miracle, to aid and save man. Thus, too, in regard to Christ, you hold that we have no certain knowledge of what he said at any time; that even if we were assured that he had made an affirmation on any subject, his word would not establish its truth; and that it is impossible to prove that he ascended to heaven in a bodily form. What became of that Saviour, whose existence you do not deny, but assume, you do not say; what he did for man you have not informed us; what he taught we have no means of ascertaining. Thus, also, in regard to the Bible. You profess to consider it as the "best of books," but at the same time describe it as a book of no practical value; a book that reveals a God that cannot possibly be loved, honored, or adored; a book full of puerilities and trifles; a book not reliable as a history, and full of falsehoods; a book in relation to which we have no possible means of determining what is false and what is true; a book that has been the occasion of numberless crimes, wars, persecutions, and acts of tyranny and oppression in the world; a book, therefore, wholly worthless and valueless as a guide to another world.

I, on the other hand, cherish the belief that man, though free, may be restrained, converted from sin, and made secure in holiness consistently with his freedom; that God has the power to convert and save most hardened offenders, and to sanctify the vilest of the race; that he rules the universe with infinite wisdom and goodness, though we may not be able now to comprehend the reason of his doings; that there is an all-sufficient Saviour provided for man, and that, through him, salvation on easy and reasonable terms, is sincerely offered to all mankind; that God has given to man a revelation—not foolish, puerile, unreliable, contradictory, and absurd, but a safe and reliable guide in all that is necessary or desirable for man to know or believe in order to salvation; that a sinner may be saved, and that when saved, his salvation will be secure forever and ever.

In the main facts in regard to the introduction of sin and woe into our world, we do not—we cannot differ. The facts are before our eyes and we cannot deny them. In regard also to the existence of sin and woe beyond the grave we do not differ essentially, for you have expressly admitted that they will exist there. For myself, I confess that all this is dark. I do not understand it now; I do not hope to be able to understand it in this present life. But I entertain no doubt that it may be understood, and that it is consistent with the idea that God is just, and wise, and good; that he is worthy of universal confidence, adoration, affection, and praise: and such a God I believe presides over all. Your system seems to me not only to offer no explanation of these facts, but to involve the whole subject in deeper darkness and gloom—in worse than Egyptian darkness—a darkness which, if you will allow me to quote from a book which you say is full of "puerilities" and "absurdities," is "as the shadow of death; a land of darkness as darkness itself; and of the shadow of death without any order, and where the light is darkness." Job x., 21, 22.

It is not probable that at my time of life I shall materially change my views in regard to subjects the study of which has constituted my main employment for more than forty years; nor can I suppose that you will materially change yours. We shall probably both of us leave the world cherishing the opinions which we now hold on the most vital subjects which can occupy the attention of the human mind.

We shall leave to our friends and to the world, so far as the world may feel any interest in knowing what we believed, these two very different systems as the result of the studies, the reflections, the observations, of our somewhat protracted lives. For myself while living, and as a legacy to my friends when I am dead, I wish some better system than that which you have proposed, and which I have so freely examined; and I desire to leave to the world, so far as the world shall care anything about what I believed, when I shall pass away from among the living, my deep and unalterable conviction that every sinner under the divine government is in danger; that there is beyond the grave, a world of just and eternal retribution; that there will be a judgment of all mankind: but that there is a way of salvation from the wrath to come for all men; that Christ has died as the great atoning sacrifice for the sins of the whole world; that the benefits of that sacrifice are freely offered to every man, on terms simple, reasonable and easily complied with: and that God has given to mankind a Revelation, not puerile, trifling and absurd—not deepening the darkness of our condition—but full of light, a safe and sufficient guide to another and a better world. I am, with great respect, truly yours,

Albert Barnes.

This is an important question. How long? If dollars and cents were pending, all the tribes of the earth would say anxiously, How long? But on such a great subject as the coming of the Lord to raise all God's dear sleeping saints, change to immortality all God's living, waiting ones, set up his everlasting kingdom (Dan. ii., 44) under the whole heaven (Dan. vii., 27), cleanse the earth by fire as once by water (2 Pet. 3), and burn up all the proud and all that do wickedly (Mal. iv., 1–3), I am often told we must, or can know nothing, when God says in his Bible (Is. xlii., 9): "Behold, the former things are come to pass, and new things do I declare: before they spring forth I tell you of them." Also (Amos iii., 7): "Surely the Lord God will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret unto his servants the prophets." Says the Saviour: "Search the Scriptures."

But, says one, no one shall ever know the day or hour. Please stop and read the whole text (Mark xiii., 32): "But of that day and that hour knoweth no man, no not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father. Very well. The Father did, then, at that time know the day and hour, or language don't mean anything. This was in A. D. 33. But in A. D. 96 (Rev. iii., 3), sixty-three years after, we have words from the Father, that if they won't watch, they shall not know what hour he will come upon them. So the plain inference to me is, if they will watch, they shall know.

Then Paul says, "When they say peace and safety [which is now fulfilled], then sudden destruction cometh upon them [that say peace and safety], and they shall not escape. But ye, brethren, are not in darkness that that day should overtake you as a thief." But I believe all that love the world the best will be snared, every one. For, says the Saviour, "as a snare shall it come on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth." But God's children are not dwellers on the earth; they are looking "for a city that hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God."

Now to the question, How long? The third horn of the kingdom of the Vandals in Africa, was plucked up on the eve of St. Cyprian, A. D. 533. Says Gibbon: one awful hour reversed the fortunes of the contending parties. The eve of St. Cyprian in A. D. 533 fell on the tenth of the Jewish seventh month: so if to the tenth of the seventh month 533 we add the time at the end of which Daniel was to stand in his lot, or 1,335 days, or years as we believe them to be, it makes 1868, tenth day of the seventh month, which falls this year on the twenty-seventh of September. Amen. Still, How long? (Dan. xii., 12, 13.) Daniel is told, "Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the thousand three hundred and five and thirty days. Go thou thy way till the end be [or till the end of the days], for thou shalt rest [or sleep], and stand in thy lot at the end of the days." Not six months before the end of the days, nor six months after; but at the end of the days.

So, my dear brethren and sisters, this year, according to my faith, will bring the Lord from heaven. Let us then put forth our best energies in this glorious work. May every one of us try by persuasion, by the help and the grace of God, to get one at least, of our friends to come to Christ in this last year, as I firmly believe: and I pray God, my brethren, that nothing may deter you from this work. O blessed year! The captives, I believe, will be released. O glorious year! The trump of jubilee, I think, will be blown this year. The long-looked-for year of years, the best, it is come! I shall hope to meet you all through faith in God and the blood of the Lamb. Until then, farewell. And I pray God your whole body, soul, and spirit be preserved blameless unto the coming of Christ. Amen.

Ira Fancher.

Sandy Hill, N. Y., July 7, 1868.

Remarks by the Editor.

We give place to the foregoing by the earnest request of our excellent Br. Fancher. He has been a believer that the definite time of the second advent of Christ is revealed in the prophetic numbers, for twenty-five years past. We have had occasion to differ from him and others in that matter ever since 1844. We question not their sincerity or honesty; yet we can by no means accept their conclusions. We are always glad, however, to have them place their definite time near, so that we shall not have to wait too long to test the accuracy of their calculations. Br. Fancher has brought it beautifully near. Should he prove correct, no one will rejoice more than ourself: we long for the day of Christ's return, as "wicked men and seducers" are "waxing worse and worse," and we have no hope of a better state of things till Christ does return "from heaven."

We are not of those who think or say, "we can know nothing about" the time; but we are of the number, who, while they fully believe the "signs of the times," given us by our Lord and the Prophets, are to let us know when "it is near, even at the door," we cannot know the precise year, month, day, or hour of the actual advent: and that no prophetic number is given in the Bible with the design to give us that knowledge. If we are mistaken in this matter we are so from a careful study of the subject for more than twenty years past; nor have the efforts of those engaged in the attempt to find the exact time of advent tended in the least to move us from our position on the question. By Divine grace, we intend so to live that whenever our Lord shall return from heaven we may be accepted of Him. Till then, or till we "sleep in the dust of the earth," we shall "occupy" the "talent" our Lord has entrusted us with, in the manner we believe He has called us to do.

Letters and Extracts.

From R. E. Ladd.

Springfield, Mass., August, 1868.

Br. Storrs: I hand you with this five dollars on account of the "Documents," received in good order; and am starting them on their mission. I offer them to any person that will read them; and when this lot is exhausted I shall order more. How shall they hear without a preacher? and how shall they preach except they be sent? "As it is written, how beautiful," etc. If these do not "preach the gospel of peace and bring glad tidings of good things," then I am at loss to understand the meaning of terms "Life to the righteous dead by resurrection;" and to the living by a "change of the corruptible to incorruption. This is like our blessed Lord. No future wailing, weeping, gnashing of teeth beyond this life. It is sufficiently awful to lose life hopelessly, it seems to me, not to add the horrible idea of a revival to a mortal, corruptible, dying life again, with no purpose to be accomplished but to be made a spectacle that benefits no being in the universe.

Every correct moral sentiment is shocked at the idea, and instinctively revolts and turns from it with horror. No, no! the blessed Bible does not threaten sinful, erring humanity with another life of suffering, after this is wasted and lost.

It is now offered to all who will accept it as a free gift of God through Jesus Christ. How infinitely precious the gospel appears with this view. It is indeed "glad tidings of good things."

I did not intend to say anything more than to give you the money and then to inform you for the next Herald that we have made arrangement with the Railroad and Steamboat Company, from Springfield by way of New Haven to New York, for a reduction of the fare to $4 50 for round trip; good from August 20th to September 1st, inclusive. This is better than we have ever done before; I hope it will be largely improved by brethren in and beyond New York. The fares are reduced from all the principal stations, viz., New Haven, Meriden, Berlin, Middletown, Hartford, Windsor Locks, to two-thirds the usual fare. Let all who come ask for camp-meeting tickets to Springfield, and pay full fare; then keep their tickets and present them to Br. G. T. Adams, Sec'y, on the camp ground, to be endorsed by him to return. Those who live near way-stations, not named as ticket stations, should buy tickets to those stations, and then purchase "camp-meeting tickets" to Springfield. The loss of the ticket will necessitate the purchase of a return ticket, so that they should be well cared for. We are looking for a very large gathering, and praying that it may be very profitable.

We hope, sincerely, that you will spend a little more than one day with us. We shall secure a good spot for Br. Wolcott's tent. Br. J. C. Day, of Ashburnham, and myself will see to its proper location. He is to spend two weeks in assisting us to prepare the ground. We commence with 12 to 20 hands next week. We hope the New York brethren will come in large numbers, and bring much of the blessed spirit in their hearts. This overcomes prejudice faster and more effectually than any other thing. Give my love to all the dear saints, and to your family. I am happy to say my wife is improving, and we hope for complete recovery. May she still be remembered in prayer.

Br. Storrs: It has been about one year since I embraced the Life views. Since that time I have enjoyed myself well in reading my Bible. It shows me that God is love; not willing any should die, but that all should have life if they will but turn from the broad road that leads to destruction. Since I embraced the doctrine of Life only-in Christ, the church to which I belonged saw fit to cast my name out; also the names of some others; but we rejoice the more, feeling determined never to be entangled again in the yoke of bondage, but to be free in the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free. We also enjoy the privilege of meeting together from time to time to listen to the Gospel as it is explained by one of our brethren; and as we separate to go to our different homes we feel we have been fed with the bread of life, and how much better it is than the traditions of men, where they lose sight of the man and see nothing but an imaginary immortal soul, which must be imagined, as there is no such thing taught in the Bible. The Herald of Life comes to me regularly, and I prize its visits very much. It is verily a feast of fat things; and I pray that the lives of those who are connected with it may be spared; and may your labors be blessed. There is quite an interest manifested about here in the life views. Many are digging deep, and I doubt not will find many hidden treasures. May the God of love bless them, and enable them to understand his holy word. There is some opposition; but I am determined to go on. May the Lord help me in all good works.

Locust Point, Ohio, July, 1868.

Br. Storrs: I send $1 to pay for the pamphlets sent me Life from the Dead, and The Defence of the Bible. I am sorry I am not able to send more. My heart is with you in the cause of "Life only in Christ:" but money I have not got. I am getting old, and not able to labor much. It is all I can do to support myself and wife, and I possess nothing to sell to raise money. Hence I cannot do as I would like to for the good cause; but you all have my prayers. The pamphlets you sent me I have given away to those who will read. Some cannot read, and others will not, especially if it is anything in opposition to their preconceived notions. I have given them to ministers and some other Bible readers. They say, they can find no fault with them.

Soon as I can get time I intend to give you a history of the prospects of the doctrine of "No Life out of Christ" in this place. Then you will be more able to judge whether the all-wise God is to work by the spirit of truth in the hearts of his children. I would only say now, that since I have endeavored by the help of God to impress thought on the mind of my fellow-men, and after patiently enduring the scoffs and sneers of opposers of the doctrine, the place was finally left without a preacher. But the Lord has sent one among us that is able to preach the gospel of the Son of God. He is a member of the United Brethren; but was formerly a minister of the Reformed Lutherans. He finds access to the hearts of the people by presenting the truth. He holds that the dead will be raised incorruptible at the last day: does not believe that men go to heaven or hell when they die. He does not believe the soul is a part of God; nor does he preach that it is immortal, but holds up the resurrection from the dead at the last day, when Christ will take possession of His kingdom upon the earth and sit on the throne of his father David. I pray that the truth may spread, and the gospel of the Son of God be preached in its purity to the honor and glory of God. I am your brother in hope of eternal life.

Stephen Benton, Middlebury, Vt., writes: It is some time since I have remitted anything for our highly prized paper, the Herald of Life. I have been a reader of your periodicals ever since 1849. I took great interest in your Six Sermons when first published, and read them over and over, again and again, and lent them to my neighbors; few however would read them, and refused to entertain the doctrine. I am nearly alone in this region of country. The people seem like Ephraim of old, "joined to their idols." I still feel that the Herald of Life is the best preaching I get, and I wish to help sustain it, and the truths it promulgates. Pray for me, that I may have grace to live out the principles of the gospel in these days of peril; and pray for my children, that they may all have an interest in the blessed Life-giver and take delight in the great plan of redemption.

C. W. Potter, Granville, N. Y., writes: I send you $2 to have my paper continued. We have no Advent preaching at this place, and I prize your paper, believing that inspiration has settled the question as to the wicked dead—"the man that wandereth out of the way of understanding shall remain in the congregation of the dead"—he "shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him." Yours in Christ.

Note by the Editor.—This Br. had taken the Herald of Life only a few months: but seems not inclined to part with it.

Wm. H. Spence, ("64 years" old) Bristol, R. I., writes: I wish to continue my paper. The Herald of Life I love for the truths it contains, and the spirit it manifests. I wish you to send me some of the tracts on the "Judgment." I have some of the two other "Campaign Documents." The way I do, having but small means, is this—I carry the truth to those only who will read; and when they have read the works, I take them and carry them to others, and so keep them preaching. May the Lord bless and spare you, dear brother, and your family with all the household of faith. Yours in the blessed hope.

A. Logan, Milwaukee, Wis., writes: Although I have paid for the Herald to the end of the year, I suppose it is important you should know what to depend on for the coming volume. I feel it is very important that the Herald of Life should be sustained. You can put me down for $10. That your life and health may be preserved, and that the cause may prosper, is the prayer of your brother.

Clamor Franke, Cincinnati, Ohio, writes: I have learned to love the Herald of Life as I have Life itself. I trust the question of its permanency will be forever settled at the next ensuing gathering of our brethren. I am sorry I cannot be present. However, to assure you of my interest in the Herald, I will continue to take two copies at $10 each, so long as it shall be continued. I sincerely pray that God's choicest blessings may attend all your labors and those of our brethren during the anniversary conference.

Mrs. R. W. Pierce, Milwaukee, Wis., writes: Sister Bailey died the 27th of June, full in the faith that Christ would revive her again. She was a great sufferer, but was willing to live or die as God saw fit. Please send me one dozen each of the "Judgment" and of "Life from the Dead, or, the Righteous only will live again." I find a great many that are willing to read.

Peter Woods, Hudson City, N. J., writes: Allow me to say, though this is my first year as a subscriber to the Herald of Life, I for one will double my subscription, D. V., for the coming year. I want the Herald every week. I would say to its readers, stand by the Herald of Life and its Editor. Let every one try and get more new subscribers. It is doing a great work, and I am glad there is a spirit of inquiry among the people; and my prayer is, that in 1869 popery and paganism, purgatory and spiritualism, may all be shaken to their foundation.

Business Matters.

Two Dollars each from—Timothy Quimby, C. W. Potter, Stephen Benton (pays for next volume), John Curran, Henry J. Brunner.

CHRIST AND THE LITTLE ONES.

"The Master has come over Jordan,"
Said Hannah, the mother one day—
"He is healing the people who throng Him,
With a touch of his finger they say?

"And now, I shall carry the children,
Little Rachel, and Samuel, and John,
And the youngest—the baby Esther,
For the Lord to look upon."

The father looked at her kindly,
But he shook his head, and smiled,
"Now, who but a doating mother
Would think of a thing so wild?

"If the children were tortured by demons,
Or dying of fever, 'twere well—
Or had they the taint of the leper,
Like many in Israel."

"Now, do not hinder me, Nathan—
I feel such a burden of care;
If I carry it to the Master,
Perhaps I shall leave it there.

"If He lay His hand on the children,
My heart will be lighter, I know,
For a blessing forever and ever,
Will follow them as they go."

So, over the hills of Jordan,
Along by the vine-rows green,
With Esther asleep on her bosom,
And Rachel her brothers between.

'Mong the people who hung on his teaching,
Or waited His touch and His word,
Through the route of proud Pharisees listening,
She pressed to the feet of the Lord.

"Now, why should'st thou hinder the Master,"
Said Peter, "with children like these?
See'st not how, from morning till evening,
He teacheth, and healeth disease?"

Then Christ said—"Forbid not the children,
Permit them to come unto me!"
And Rachel He sat on His knee.

And the heavy heart of the mother
Was lifted all earth care above,
As He laid His hand on the brothers,
And blessed them with tenderest love.

FROM ELD. H. ROCKWELL, THE AGED.

New Britain, Conn., 1868.

Br. Storrs: I feel under obligation to give my testimony to a certain question found in the Bible, which seems to many to be of all and every other so-called heresy, the most objectionable; I find a number of very kind-hearted and honest Advent brethren who feel grieved that this disturbing element should be allowed to be once named in the churches. What is that element? It is that, which to my mind, is one of the top stones of the hope of the church; one inseparably connected with the coming of Christ; one that when the great Master-builder shall come to complete the sublime structure of the last temple, will be brought forth and assigned its appropriate place with the keystone of that royal arch, crying and shouting, "grace, grace unto it;" from the foundation unto the topstone; the shaft through which all believers in Christ receive, if at all, a future and eternal life. O, how sad it makes my heart to see those who profess to believe in God and his Christ utterly and persistently reject the plain truth of his word, and that after they have heard the truth as it is in Jesus, presented with so much beauty, backed with such a list of Bible testimony. I think if Christ was now on earth he would find quite a company to which he might consistently say, "Ye will not come to me that ye might have life." See 1 Cor. x. 15. "I speak as to wise men: Judge ye what I say." What did the apostle say? "Men, brethren, and fathers, hear ye my defence which I make unto you. I am verily a man which am a Jew; born in Tarsus, a city in Cilicia, yet brought up in this city at the feet of Gamaliel, and taught according to the perfect manner of the law of the fathers, and was zealous toward God, as ye are this day: and I persecuted this way unto the death, binding and delivering into prison both men and women; as also the high priest doth bare me witness, and all the estate of the elders: from whom also I received letters unto the brethren, and went unto Damascus to bring them which were there bound unto Jerusalem, for to be punished." Here he describes his conversion and his call to that great work.

We now turn to his beautiful discourse in 1 Cor. xv. Did he in this full and complete description of the manner of the resurrection, give any way in which wicked dead men could be raised to life without making them incorruptible and immortal? If he did, I have failed to see it. If all men will have a resurrection, what will be done with him "that wandereth out of the way of understanding?" Where will be found "the congregation of the dead" for him to remain in? and if those that believe not in the words of Christ shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him, who will remove the sting of that wrath from him? But the objecter may ask, What is the wrath of God that abideth on him? It is not as orthodoxy is inclined to believe, a state of endless torment or suffering, but it is just what the apostle says it is, and no more or no less: it is the wages of sin, which is death;" for the sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law. And as the sting of death hath not been removed from the impenitent, it holds him in its relentless grasp, ever depriving him from seeing or enjoying any of that beautiful world of eternal life. Let not the sinner be so presumptuous as to say, "Well, if that is all, it is no punishment." O heedless, unreflecting man, pause, I entreat you: do you consider it no punishment to be forever excluded from a home in the kingdom of God? No punishment to be forever deprived of society with that holy, happy company of the saved and glorified ones? to have no part in that glowing song of victorious triumph and eternal praise? O reflect but for a moment; and while you reflect allow me to ask, Were you arrested for a capital crime, and at your trial found guilty and sentenced to be hung, or to confinement where you should never see the least ray of light, or hear the sound of human voice, never look on the human face or once see the face of green earth, or see or hear anything but your own lonely voice, and the tomb-like tread of your own groping, wandering feet, would not that be a dreadful punishment? Do not be mistaken in this matter. It is not the suffering that is the punishment; it is the penalty of the law, and that is death.

If all the dead are raised to life by Jesus Christ, to my mind it is as clear as a sunbeam that all will be raised to an undying life; for Christ has no other life to give; for this mortal must put on immortality. If all are raised why should Paul both labor and suffer, if so be he might attain to that world and a resurrection from the dead? If all will be raised, then he could not miss of it. I believe that when we die, if we ever live again, we must get that life from Christ, our living head and only hope of future life. Let us consider 1 Cor. xv. 20, "But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first fruits of them that slept." What must we learn from this? I suppose that as the law presents to our minds a variety of types and shadows of things to come, so when the law becomes our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ, if it has accomplished the object for which it was given, it has introduced us to the great anti-type. Then if the wave sheaf of the first fruits was perfectly typical of the harvest, so is the order of the resurrection. If the first fruits were holy so must be the whole lump.

"For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead. For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. But every man in his own order: Christ the first fruits: afterward they that are Christ's at his coming." Let us now mark those expressions. Christ becomes the first fruits of all that great company who are sleeping in him; and if they are ever raised to life again it is because they are in him, and have fallen asleep with a hope full of immortality; and whoever shall be raised to life will be made like him and cannot die any more; death hath no more dominion over them. For as in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive. How are they made alive? In Christ; not out of him. Here we see every man in his own order: in Christ, an heir of life: out of Christ under the dominion of death. But every man in his own order: Christ the first fruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming. Mark this, they that are Christ's at his coming; not those who have lived in sin all their days, and would not come to Christ that they might have life; who did not believe his word. Of all such it is written, John iii., 36, "He that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him." Here we see that the unbeliever is held under the dominion of death, with no hope of escape; never more to see life. The sting of death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law. Now what gives sin its potency? the law. Let us turn to the law and we read, Rom. vi., 23, "For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." What can be more hopeless? The sinner gets his wages just as the laborer gets his pay for his work; and gets it when his term of service expires, or when he dies; and gets the whole of it at one time, principal and interest. He gets death with its sting remaining in him: he gets the strength of sin unforgiven, which holds him under the wrath of God and dominion of his own wages, which is death. O what a gloomy, hopeless condition! Better had we worked for no wages! "For, as in Adam all die." How do all die? We believe that Christ in our Adamic natures, took part and consequently died the same Adamic, or corruptible death. Do you inquire, how? Hebrews ii., 14, "Forasmuch, then, as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same; that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil; and deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage." Now the forgiven sinner may joyfully listen to that stirring appeal, "Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world," O how joyful; O how triumphant; O how glorious; how full, how complete. What a lost, a polluted sinner, all covered over with the contaminating influence of sin, can he now be delivered from the grasp of death? Yes, glory be to God. Jesus, the great Life-giver hath grappled with the monster. Yes, the promised seed of the woman, although in the mighty conflict his head was bruised for three days, yet he overcame, and in spite of the sealed stone and armor-clad Roman guard, he burst the bars of the tomb and rose, the world's Redeemer. O, what a hope is this: let him that heareth say come. Let him that is athirst come; and whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely. Rev. xxii., 17.

Come, kind friend, come one, come all, hear this triumphant acclaim, Rev. i., 18, "I am he that liveth, and was dead: and behold I am alive forevermore. Amen: and have the keys of hell and of death." Now if we die without the hope of future life, it is not for the sin of Adam, but for our personal transgressions. Let us ask a few questions. As Christ now holds the keys of hell (hades, grave) and death; and as he alone is the only one who can shut and none can open, and can open and no man can shut, can the unforgiven sinner ever live again?

Let us here make a solemn and long pause, while with humility and reverence, we bow our heads, and ask, if he lives again, for what purpose? O God, save us from presumption; help us to know the things of which we speak; and testify according to thy word. Should we suppose it is to magnify the law and make it honorable? Was the law not broad enough in its demands when it demanded the death of the transgressor? Did it need magnifying or making larger? Again, is it not made honorable when executed according to its own provision? If not, then it would seem that there was something dishonorable or unjust in the enactment of the law. Shall we for the sake of sustaining a cherished theory presume to accuse God of injustice? We think no one would be willing to take so fearful a responsibility.

Let me now address our Advent brethren in particular; for to them I would dedicate these imperfect remarks; for I know that many outside of the Advent ranks will not at first sight comprehend my views, and I may appear to them as a heathen, an infidel, or a barbarian, but all those who make any claim to a respectable understanding of our faith, will know that I am honestly trying to give them and all others to understand that I fully and firmly believe that if any one dies out of Christ, that the key of death and the grave will be so effectually withdrawn from the lock of death's door, that its massive bolts and sin-corroded bars will never move from their eternal fastenings: no, no, when once the Master has risen up, and shut to the door, neither men nor angels can open.

Now to a few questions direct. Do you believe the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah were destroyed with their cities, and all the plain, and the inhabitants of the cities, and that which grew upon the ground, as recorded in Gen. xix., 25? We presume you do. Do you believe that the company of Dathan and Abiram were burned up by the flame of that fire which was kindled in their midst, as recorded in Psalms cvi., 18, and in Num. xvi., 35? I must assume that you answer, yes. Do you believe that Malachi iv., 1, will be literally fulfilled? Perhaps you may not; but if you do not, I must only admit that I do not understand what the Adventists believe on that passage, or I must think you are not fully initiated into the faith. Here is the passage: "For behold the day cometh, that shall burn as an oven; and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble; and the day that cometh burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch." It has always been admitted by all Adventists as far as my knowledge extends, that this passage will be fulfilled when the Lord comes the second time. I know the faith of some Adventists differ one from the other in some points, yet I am happy to know that in this we all agree. Do we not, my brother? Let me now ask one other question, and see if we agree in that. I do not recollect to have heard the question either asked or answered by any one. I will give my own answer. But you ask, What is the question? You will find it in my answer, which is this: I believe the proud and wicked ones are those that will be living on the earth when the Lord comes. Do we agree in this? If so, then the judgment of God will be executed upon them in their utter destruction, and they will never be raised from their ashes; but will be ever under the soles of the saints' feet. Do you believe this? Why should I ask this question? I will answer by-and-by: but let me first ask one or two more. Do you believe that on the wicked he shall rain snares, fire and brimstone, and a horrible tempest; this shall be the portion of their cup? Psalms xi., 6.

I have heard so many remarkably smart men preach on these subjects, and insist that it is the final doom of the wicked, that my common or uncommon sense is wonderfully startled that they do not discover that in their theology, they exclude all the wicked of earth, that are living when the Lord comes, from being in the resurrection; or having any part of their symbolic second death. If you believe what I have written, I ask you again, in the fear and in the love of God, do you believe it will render any glory to God or any benefit to man to have the ashes of the Sodomites and of those burned up in the camp of Israel, raised up and burned over again? I leave you to answer, simply saying, I do not: but one thing I believe, that without holiness no one will see God; so, then, if wicked dead men are raised to life, they must be forever blind.

FROM CATHARINE C. WILLIAMS.

Br. Storrs: Feeling it more a privilege than duty, I enclose one dollar, for which I should like to have you send me, what it will pay for, including postage, the work entitled "Life from the Dead; or, The Righteous only will live again," to circulate among the representatives of the different sects, which are each trying to set up here in our young town of Butler, as elsewhere. The Presbyterians have taken the lead in erecting an edifice, I believe, but the others design to do so, when, if they could only be one, as Christ is one, one house would hold them, if it was large enough. From private letters received from readers of the Herald, I have reason to think an occasional communication over the signature C. C. W. would not be unacceptable. I can assure such that it would give me pleasure to gratify them much more frequently than I do, if I could, but I feel too overtaxed with unavoidable, and, as I deem, indispensable cares, to be able to do so, and as duty cannot call diverse ways at the same time, I have to try to be content to do what I can. Some have manifested much interest in former letters wherein I mentioned something about our region, its prospects and advantages. Such, no doubt, would like to hear about the present season. Up to within two or three weeks one could scarcely conceive of a more flattering prospect for corn, wheat and oats being then matured, and a fair crop, so considered. Showers had been frequent enough to push forward the corn rapidly without interfering with business, till July, when it became dry and hot, though breezy, till vegetation seemed to come to a standstill. Till within two or three days we have been mercifully remembered, and showers have much revived the farmers' prospects. Grass is not near as abundant as it was last season; but according to present prospects there will be enough, not only of grass, but corn, and some to spare the still frequent comers. Just now expectation and hope seem to be on tip-toe by the advent of a corps of railroad surveyors in our midst, looking out a track for the "horse" all are anxious to see speeding over our beautiful slight hills and dales; as we have not forgotten in our short, though by no means painful isolation, all it brings in its train.

I will add, I hope the appeal in the June 17th issue for means to circulate the "Three Campaign Documents" will be generally responded to, and not as tardily as in my own case. One dollar is truly a small sum, but put enough of them together and the sum asked for will be complete. When we give the subject thought we know it is a glorious cause. But it is one thing to know it, and quite another thing to allow it to influence us so as to feel glad to have a chance to do something to help it on. It needs effort; and we must try not to lose sight of the glorious things in store for those who love above everything else the Lord of Life and glory, by allowing ourselves to become too deeply engrossed in the things that will soon pass from view. I am glad to see so much done; but may the light increase many fold.

FROM G. L. HART.

New Britain, Conn., July 30, 1868.

Br. Storrs: We are often times reminded of the tendency of the doctrine of no future life to the wicked to lead to Universalism; But I would like to ask such to consider the words of truth as spoken by our Lord and his Apostle, when they make such assertions as, "Christ's mission is as large as Adam's:" meaning that the plan of salvation to life covers all: that all die by Adam and all are made alive by Christ. Some boldly assert that the gift purchased by Christ, and given of God, included the impenitent wicked: little thinking that the blood of Christ was the purchase money; and they are at the same time great sticklers for the vicarious atonement. We do not wonder some dare say that, "Justice demands that the wicked should live again." As the law could not even hold the blood life, if Christ has thus bought them; truly it would be unjust that they die at all, if the death and sufferings of Christ deliver from the Adamic penalty, as they are pleased to term it. It must be that the law with such penalty has unjustly held them. But God is just and the justifier of him that believes in Jesus. None others are in the gift. "Of all, said Jesus, which He hath given me I should lose nothing: but should raise it up again at the last day." Yea more: "All that the Father giveth me shall come to me." Again, John xvii., "that He should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given Him." Who are in danger of Universalism here? Such as believe that faith alone justifies are not. The gift of Jesus to our race was, that one alive from the dead might appear for the dead who were without strength. Thus he died for our sins: and if that were all, we are yet in our sins. So Paul reasoned! 1 Cor. xv. But He rose for our justification. In yonder Holy Place in the presence of the just God, against whom we have sinned, his blood appears a gift, in the secret place of the Most High, for all that come to Him in faith. It is this faith, by the blood of Jesus, that makes it a living way. Heb. x., 20.

The wise man understood it, Prov. xxi., 14, "A gift in secret pacifieth anger; and a reward in the bosom strong wrath. It is joy to the just to do judgment, but destruction shall be to the workers of iniquity. The man that wandereth out of the way of understanding shall remain in the congregation of the dead." He that is in the bosom of the just Father receives our acknowledgments. He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High abideth under the shadow of the Almighty. Wrath abideth no more upon such as are come to him; anger is pacified in vindicated justice pledged through Jesus. Thus when the morn of resurrection dawns, as mortality was given as pledged by Jesus, He in turn, as pledged, gives everlasting life. To whom, "the just by faith shall live." Paul. Who are just? Rom. v., 9. Such as are made so by the blood of Jesus; the only way to be made so; and if there are unjust it is because the blood of Christ has not affected them. This is offered free to all; faith makes the application; and we live by Christ, by whom we have died. Thus we are planted into his death and in his resurrection share. Sown for the season of the dead, that in the world to come we might develop the Godly seed of earth's subduer and replenisher.

But I am not a Universalist. I believe Isa. xl., 23, 24, "He maketh the judges of the earth as vanity. Yea, they shall not be planted. Yea, they shall not be sown. Yea, they shall not take root." And when we are classed with the torment theorists, we believe that Job was right when he said, "In plenty of justice He will not afflict." Death to the ungodly: Life from the dead to the righteous, is the justice of Jehovah, the covenant God of Israel. "O give me understanding, and I shall live." Make me righteous and I shall not die eternally. "In the way of righteousness is life, and in the pathway thereof there is no death."

THE LORD LEADETH.

The Christian, in his early experience, when he first begins to serve the Lord, is all joy and peace in believing. He looks upon the lovely character of the Master and desires to be like him. He once saw, or thought he saw, the depths of sin in himself. He resolved to forsake it and lead a new life, and so went to the Saviour of sinners in true contrition of spirit; was accepted and found a resting-place in him. Now all is peace and joy in believing. He dreams of nothing but smooth sailing. He thinks he can easily be conformed to the image of the Master; and thus he goes on from day to day. His constant prayer is, Lord make me like thyself. Help me to be perfect as thou art perfect. Help me to learn of him who is meek and lowly in heart. Put me in the furnace if it is necessary. Do as thou seest best; only make me like thyself. Thus the Christian prays, little thinking how much dross there is about him, and how thoroughly that dross is imbedded in his whole being. But the Lord begins to answer his prayer. The Master was made perfect through suffering; the servant is not above him. So he enters the furnace. It is not very hot at first, for he could not endure it. Still it begins to burn. It touches the tenderest part, and he can hardly endure it. He asks the reason why? and the answer is, What thou knowest not now thou shalt know afterward. The willing disciple says, It is enough, Lord. Thy will be done. Then he has a respite for a while, and thinks it is all over; but again the furnace burns and is much hotter than before. Again the child goes to the Father and inquires, but only to find out that all this is necessary. He goes away feeling tender before the Lord, and saying, it is good for me to be afflicted that I might draw near to God. Thus the process goes on from year to year; for whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son; and the poor creature is so unlike "His Son" when he is first chosen that it takes a great deal of moulding and turning before he can be conformed. Lookers on exclaim, "Who hath sinned, this man or his parents?" little thinking that the great God is sitting as a refiner and purifier of silver.

But is the subject of purification an unwilling tool? No. He still keeps his eye on the author and finisher of his faith, and still desires to be like him, for in the morning he hopes to be like him, and so purifies himself as he is pure. The work is a double one. God works in, and the Christian works out his own salvation with fear and trembling.

DEATH OUT "OF CHRIST."

Br. Storrs: In this pleasant city, a short time since, there was held a "Sunday School Institute," conducted by the Rev. Edward Eggleston, of Chicago; and during all his teaching I did not understand that he committed himself to the "eternal torment" theory; but think if he teaches as much "Bible truth" in other places as he did here, that he for his labor will be rewarded both in this age and the age to come. He gave a practical lesson from Luke xv., 1–7. After reading the lesson, the first thing was to find out who are the Publicans, Sinners, Scribes and Pharisees. Having done this, he asked the class, "What is a parable?" Some one of his little girls answered, It is a story, which he accepted. After going through with the lesson, he wanting to impress it upon their memory and hearts, asked them, What they could remember the best? when one of the little girls said, "a picture;" from which, he drew out their imaginations to picture number one, the hundred sheep. Next the shepherd; and next the lost one of the hundred. The lost sheep being the largest in interest and imagination, connected as it was with another character.

Now, said he, What is it to disobey? Sin being the answer, they must have a character to represent sin. Now, again, what is it that is always ready to catch the sheep on the prairies or in the wilderness? "Wolf," says a bright girl. Now, said he, we will paint the wolf ready to pounce upon the lamb, should it advance another step. But listen; the good shepherd calls; but the lamb has been gone so long that it is weak; but the good shepherd, Jesus Christ, bears it up, takes it on his shoulder, takes it home, and calls his friends together to rejoice. Then he applied the lesson and made a good impression.

But, my dear reader, do you not see standing out in unmistakable characters "Life only in Christ?" Oh, advocates of "eternal torments," read the story of the lost sheep, Luke xv., 1–7, and stop trying to enforce your ungodlike theory. Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and you "shall not perish," but have eternal life. Oh yes, it will be eternal life "according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead." Life only in Christ! Oh reader, if the wolf had got the sheep what would have been the result: stay away and die: come to Christ and live.

Agapee.

New Albany, Ind., July 30.

P. S. When I heard the lesson given I could hardly keep silent; but I thank God that the lesson was given here, in this city. I have asked many of my eternal torment friends, What if the wolf gets the sheep? The answer must come, "He would kill it." And as the wolf is sin, God will finally destroy him; then we will have no more death nor any more wolf.

BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail, the postage has to be pre-paid.

Six Sermons on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, The Righteous only will live again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post. D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

This work has been out of print for some months, but is now re-printed.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the true teachings of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage, 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.

No. 1. Earth, not heaven, is to be the inheritance of the saints. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 4. The Soul Saved or Lost. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 5. Moral Depravity; by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 7. Doom of the Ungodly: or, The Wicked Dead remain eternally under Death's dominion. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 8. The Wages of Sin: by a Presbyterian Clergyman. Price, 5 cents.

No. 10. Letters to a Clergyman; or, Life only through Christ, not a heresy; by Dr. J. K. Finley, Pittsburg, Pa. Price, 5 cents.

The foregoing tracts are the Bible Examiner size i. e., octavo; and are 16 pages each. Price, 5 cents single. Four of either can be sent for 2 cents postage; where that number is called for, we will send them at our own expense. They will be sold at $3 per 100; but in that case, sent at the expense of the purchaser. One dozen of the foregoing will be sent for 50 cents, and we will pay the postage.

OFFICERS OF THE LIFE AND ADVENT UNION.

JACOB GRIM, Philadelphia, Pa., President.
WM. H. THORNE, New York, Vice President.
RUFUS WENDELL, Salem, Mass., Secretary.
LEONARD C. THORNE, New York, Treasurer.

DIRECTORS.

GEO. K. CARROLL, New York.
JOHN KEMP, New York. | RICHARD MARTIN, New York.
A. W. MACDONALD, New York. | WM. ROWORTH, New York.

THE OBJECT of this paper is to promulgate the truth of "LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST:" or, a future life and a resurrection from the dead, are both conditional; and only bestowed at the second Advent of Christ, "at the last day."—See our motto.

TERMS OF THE HERALD OF LIFE.

Two Dollars a Year; or, 48 numbers; One Dollar for six months; or, 24 numbers; invariably in advance. When served by Carrier in New York City, 48 cents additional.

The Postage on the HERALD OF LIFE, prepaid quarterly or yearly at the office where it is received, is 20 cents a year to any part of the United States. The postage to Canada and the British Provinces is also 20 cents a year, and must be prepaid in New York: for such papers, therefore, the price will be $2 20 a year or $1 10 for six months.

We can not undertake to prepay postage upon newspapers, except where the law obliges us to do so; that is, anywhere out of the United States.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ALL LETTERS relating to the HERALD OF LIFE, whether on business or other matter, must invariably be addressed:

GEO. STORRS, Box 4,658,
NEW YORK

ALL NAMES of persons, sent us, should be written plain, so that we shall not have to guess them out. Also in ordering, the name of the POST OFFICE, COUNTY, AND STATE must be given, and written plainly; and if a CHANGE is called for, state the Office to which the paper has previously been sent. Unless attention is paid to all these matters confusion and delay are inevitable.

THE PRINCE OF STILLNESS.

BY REV. H. W. CARPENTER.

WE are all of us conscious that there are causes which disturb our peace that are altogether within ourselves. There is a stillness which is perfectly horrible to a guilty soul. Men want Christ and they do not know it. They will find him in this word, stillness. If a man does not now want Christ, he wants something, and that something is Christ. A very natural want is stillness, and Christ is the Prince of stillness.

Dear reader, did you ever say to your heart, "Be still," and to your thoughts "Keep back?" Something disquieted you. Is God ever disquieted? No. Holiness is never disquieted. Infinite holiness is stillness infinitely profound. It is guilt that disturbs. There is a world of meaning in that title given to Christ, the Prince of Peace. He is the Prince of Stillness because he holds the sceptre of God. He leadeth beside the still waters.

There are good cool watering places for tired spirit as well as tired body. The twenty-third Psalm is such a place. It is a beautiful picture of repose, of peace and quiet joy. Such a scene is very refreshing in the dust and heat of life's battle. The Spirit of Holiness drew this golden landscape. How quiet the good Shepherd has made the ofttimes troubled monarch. He is reclining on the soft bank of a gently flowing stream. It sweeps off in meandering courses through the green pasture grounds. It is very, very still. Just the place to muse. Just as you have done, perhaps, some summer day. Very likely the flowing waters bear his thoughts outward and onward to the sea. This suggests the onward flow of life, outward into the Great Sea—of the shadows of death. It is an hour of delightful contemplation. The royal man and royal poet rests sweetly in the quietness and assurance of faith. Its stillness brings with it the peace of God. "I shall not want," is the one great thought of the hour. It is the perpetual refrain of this most refreshing song, and flows out over the "still waters" in sweet agreement with their peaceful melody.

Contemplation is still. It loves the still hour. God was not in the whirlwind which swept before the face of the fiery Elijah. God was not in the earthquake which shook the mountains. God was not in the fire, but he was in the "still, small voice." The prophet needed something to soothe his excited spirit, because God would speak with him. A thoughtful, meditative spirit loves Nature in repose. God is best heard when all is still. Christ always withdrew to the seashore and the mountains, "And, at evening time he was alone." Whether Israel's sweet singer recalls the past or looks forward to the future, he is quite satisfied. "I shall not want." There comes up before him the profound darkness of the death shade, yet "I will fear no evil, for thou art with me."

Let us look at another sweet singer in repose—the gifted Byron. His "quiet sail" over the still waters of Lake Leman is suggestive of better things

> Clear, placid Leman! thy contrasted lake,
> With the wild world I dwelt in, is a thing
> Which warns with its stillness to forsake
> Earth's troubled waters for a purer spring.
> This quiet sail is as a noiseless wing
> To waft me from distraction; once I loved
> Torn ocean's roar, but thy soft murmuring
> Sounds sweet, as if a sister's voice reproved,
> That I with stern delights should e'er have been so moved.

"Warns me with its stillness." God is best heard when all is still. The situation of the two poets is not unlike. Both are soothed in spirit by the repose of nature. To both the still waters are images of peace. Both yield to the contemplative spirit of the hour. Both have eminence.

But the mind of the one reverts to him who made the voice of nature so beautiful—who spread out the green pastures and set flowing the still waters. He thinks of his goodness; and in the gratitude of his heart, and in the confidence which faith gives, sings, "I shall not want. The still hour brings with it no want; no self-reproach; no warning voices to disturb his peace. Yea, even more; the dark valley which leads out into the "undiscovered country," has in it the majestic presence of the Prince of Peace. No sooner does the "quiet sail of the other glide over the placid waters, than he wants. The "quiet sail" and the "placid Leman" are images of the peace he wants. Oh, if his heart could be as still! But that stillness warns him of neglect of duty—"to forsake earth's troubled water for a purer spring." The quiet sail which glasses itself in the wave below, is as noiseless as the motion of an angel's wing, to waft him from distraction.

Through all the journey of human life, whatever may be our calling, there are hours—so pure are they, and more transparent than other hours—which "warn us with their stillness." And how many things are like the quiet sail upon Leman, as a noiseless wing to waft us from distraction. How many incidents of life are monitors! How many sounds are voices of reproof!

True religion is that "pure spring"—that "contrasted lake" with the wild world within and without, which warns us with stillness to forsake earth's troubled waters. The Good Shepherd loves to still the troubled heart. It cannot be still without his peace, for he is the Prince of Peace. It wants and will want. It wants the stillness which peace brings. Genius itself cannot reap the harvest fields of glory without the peace of God. Peace is the fruit of holiness, "without which no man can see the Lord."—The Advance.

WHAT TO DO WITH CHRIST?

BY REV. WM. WINDSOR.

THE heart is mightier than the intellect. This truth is seen to be such, looked at on two sides. On the one, when the heart is in bondage to sin; on the other, when filled with the impulse of the new, holy affection. To the heart the gospel makes it great appeals. Its great power is felt there. To millions, it has commended its Christ as the joy, the solace of earth; more than all other joys.

So does the gospel commend Jesus to men to-day, as the most to be desired, and multitudes accept him as such. And so will it ever be while hearts are hearts; till man shall find in chemistry or geology, or in some of the sciences, or in philosophy, or art, something to which sorrowing ones can cling more sweetly and confidently than to the Christ of the gospels. And this will never be; for the heart needs a heart to cling to. It cannot entwine itself about a law, a principle, or a nice adjustment in nature. Such things may be beautiful, but they are cold. They have no more fitness for the affections, than light to the ear, or sound to the eye. Have you seen that great work of Harriet Hosmer—Zenobia in Chains? The captive queen stands before you in all the majesty of wounded queenly pride, and of conscious royalty. You admire and pity; and the more you look, the more you do so, till you reach a point, as you do at length, when the feeling comes that this sentiment after all is not reciprocated. It is only a marble queen you look at. It is a cold, pulseless, unresponding creature of art. Not to admire is impossible. To love, is equally impossible. It is not natural to love the abstract. There is art in one of its noblest conceptions, and we cannot love it.

This thought holds in all the wide realm of science. We cannot love its deductions, however brilliant they may be. We do not love our children because, or by the help of our minute knowledge of their physiological structure. Love spurns such trammellings. The heart wearies with bare science. Affection leaps over all such things as hindrances and incongruities, and attaches itself directly to the heart. It is personality we crave; some heart to love back, and give us to know it. And here is the divine secret of the power of the Christ of the gospels. There are yearnings in us for something beyond human friendship, even the dearest. There are exigencies in life when this want is keenly felt. We need some one to tell all the heart to, in its weakness, infirmity and guilt, and all of our secret burdens. Some person, who commends himself to us as patient, tender, responsive, faithful and beyond all our sense of farthest possible need, able still to help—able, clear up to Almightiness!

Now, to suppose that Christ has been such a friend as this, so believed in, and loved by human hearts these eighteen hundred years, at least explains why he is to-day the object of love in his church, and to his people, and why he may be to the end of time. It answers the conditions of the problem, why Christ is to his Church what he is to-day. To deem him an impostor, a mythological being, a mere fanatic and enthusiast, does not. To think of him as a man only, however pure and perfect, does not solve the phenomena which appear in the history of the church. In solving these we must be able to account not only for those of the feebler, but for those also of the strongest and intensest character. We find these in the manifestations of love to, and confidence in Christ as a Divine Redeemer, which appear through all these eighteen centuries.

These are the highest phenomena. They go beyond all mere historical recognition of Christ as a man who lived in the days of Augustus and Tiberias—beyond all, even the profoundest esteem of his excellencies as a mere human character. They raise him into the height of the supernatural, for they assume him as filling the place of the supernatural; as everywhere to his trusting children in all climes, in all abodes of poverty, and haunts of temptation; by the dying bed to sustain each departing spirit, and comfort each stricken household at once; knowing no hindrance of space, no delay by time, no perplexity in numbers.

Now, our answer to the question, "Who is Christ?" must solve such phenomena as these.

That many and able men count him a good, holy, and perfect man is easy enough to solve, for he was manifestly such. But this does not explain these higher phenomena to which we have referred—does not solve Stephen's words, "Lord Jesus receive my spirit;" or Paul's, "That in me first, Jesus Christ might show forth all long suffering;" nor of the dying Hindoo woman who being asked if she were happy, said, "Happy! Happy! I have Christ here," laying her hand on the Bengalee Bible, "and Christ here," laying her hand on her heart, "and Christ there," pointing toward heaven. How impossible it would be to substitute Mahomet, or Paul, or Moses, or any mere man or creature as the basis of such experience.

Men may speculate about this, and say, "Such experience is a delusion, pleasant perhaps, but a delusion from which strong heads are delivered," they may turn it over with the prongs of philosophical criticism, but they cannot shake the dying Christian's faith in his Christ. It is mightier than all philosophy so-called; it lies deeper than any art of criticism can reach. It is the most potent thing in this world, because it can overcome all other things. It is a personal faith in an almighty, divine Christ, come down to save sinners. So the believer can quietly leave the speculating crowd to wrangle over the mysteries of it; he is satisfied, and filled with the fact. While the speculating world is tossing the inevitable question, "What shall I do then with Jesus which is called Christ," the humble, joyful heart is living, rejoicing, dying when it comes to it, in the sweet consciousness of his divine power to save.—The Advance.

A WORLD WITHOUT A MIRACLE.

A WORLD under the government of merely natural law is the ideal, the Cosmos of a large and influential class of scientific men in our day. In a few words, such as laws, forces, monads, development, they profess to give you the keys of the universe. Of course, to admit a miracle is to yield their whole ground. They deny and mock at such a thing. They resolve the gospel account into myths. No weight of evidence can convince them of the fact that the laws which they consider a part of the very framework of nature, have ever been violated or suspended. And it is believed by some and feared by many, that the vastly developed scientific spirit of the age has diminished almost to a nullity, the faith which was once so readily accorded to miracles. It is claimed that this is a rationalistic age, and that as science has dissipated the credit formerly given to the absurdities of witchcraft, astrology and alchemy, its cold, clear light has reached the very penetralia of the Christian faith, and that miracles, too, must share the fate of those superstitions, which once were as devoutly cherished in Christian countries as the miracles themselves. It is said that high authorities in the church itself have ceased to lay such great stress as formerly upon miracles, as proofs of the divinity of the Christian revelation; and that everything points to the final abandonment of the belief in miracles by all but the uncultivated and the superstitious.

Can we get along without a miracle, as philosophers, as scientific men, as moralists? to say nothing of Christian believers? No! For a world without a miracle would be (1.) a world that never was made. We can readily conceive of the world being carried on without a miracle, by the operation of natural laws and forces; but no natural laws or forces will account for the beginning of nature, that is, for their own beginning. Nature—the world can only begin to be by something above nature, by miracle. The world's very commencement, therefore, is the greatest of miracles. The transition from nothing to existence is infinite. The idea of an infinite God is necessarily involved in it. Philosophy cannot comprehend it, and can give us no formula or rational statement of the transcendent reality. It is an absolute exercise of the divine will, before law, without law, making law. And the only way in which men can get rid of the miracle of creation, is to deny creation itself, and boldly to claim that the world is eternal and self-existent. There is no resting place for philosophy, that denies all miracles, this side of rank atheism.

2. A world without a miracle is a world very different from that which natural science itself reveals. We refer especially to geology. According to the teachings of that science, there have been, not one, but many beginnings to the orders of beings inhabiting the earth. Geology and Scripture agree in teaching that there was a time when man did not, and could not, exist on the earth, and that, therefore, this chief of races must have had a specific beginning. Not only just before man appeared, but many times previously, was the earth tohu wa-vohu, without form and void, in a state of convulsion and chaos, destructive of animal life. "The earth's progress," says Dana, "has involved the occurrence, at intervals, of revolutions or devastations. Some of these devastations appear to have been nearly or quite universal over the globe, while others have been only partial. But whether universal or not, they have often cut off short, not only species, but genera, families, and tribes; and yet the same genera, families and tribes have had new species afterward. Life has been introduced where it had been exterminated, as if the system were not at the mercy of temporary catastrophies, but owed its restoration and continued progress to a power that was independent of all causes of desolation, and could even use desolation as a means of progress." In other words, this distinguished geologist finds, in the very teachings of his science, proofs of the frequent interposition of miraculous agency.

And even if the testimony for these vast destructive revolutions should be ruled out as insufficient, or likely to be amended by future discoveries, as Lyell and a whole school of naturalists would demand, still there remains the unquestioned introduction, from time to time, of entirely new and independent races, coincident with entirely different geological epochs, the only rational explanation of which is, the renewed miracle of creation. As to the unnatural theory of Darwin, that all races, by an unbroken and almost infinitely prolonged process of development, have been produced from extremely simple germs, its acceptance by scientific men opposed to Christianity is one of the most striking proofs ever given of the excessive credulity of unbelievers, and of the absurd and monstrous conclusions to which a denial of the miracles of Scripture will lead. If the theory of great and nearly universal catastrophes in the geological history of the globe be open to amendment, and therefore to be accepted with reserve, the theory of Darwin is absolutely waiting for its first tangible supports in that history. The whole weight of evidence, thus far, is for a miraculous recommencement of each epoch of animal life and geological transformation, and if the alternative of a miracle is Darwinism, that is so much stronger reason for believing in the miracle.

3. A world without a miracle is a world without free will. Whether we call a miracle a violation or a suspension of the law of nature, or the interposition of a law superior to those in common operation, it is of the very essence of free will, if such a thing exists at all, to do these very things. All the acts of the free will upon the natural world are to produce results different from those which would follow from the regular operation of the laws of nature. By the action of the will we overcome the inertia which is natural to our physical system, and give to limbs, members, and the whole body, motions which natural laws would never produce. By the universal law of gravitation falling bodies seek the lowest attainable spot. I interpose to catch the falling body, and the operation of one of the greatest natural laws is arrested. I raise the stone from its bed and send it whirling through the air. Natural laws regulate its flight, but they are all against its starting. All these interferences of the free will with nature are, in a sense, miraculous. What we call miracles differ from them rather in the exalted degree of interference, in the vast measure of power exercised, than in the kind. Miracle is God's free will exercised in arresting the ordinary course of nature in ways far above the ability or comprehension of men. His raising the dead, stilling the storm, multiplying the food, and so on, are outflowings from that transcendent source of power, the free, intelligent will, from which the original creation and subsequent re-creations of the world and its inhabitants proceeded, and of which a veritable portion is committed to his creatures. It is only by denying, as consistent infidel philosophers are doing, the very idea of freedom in man and in God, and by consigning the whole world to the sway of a senseless, unrelenting, universal fatalism; it is only when one makes the convenient, scientific fiction of Blind Law a world-wide and exclusive fact, that one gets rid of the possibility of a miracle.

A world without a beginning, a world without providential interposition at its great geological catastrophes, and a world without free will in man or God, is a world without miracle.—Selected.

A MASONIC BIBLICAL LEGEND.

THE following is said to be the explanation of the text: "The stone which the builders refused, the same is become the head stone of the corner." It is said when Solomon's Temple was building, all the stones were brought from the quarry, ready cut and fashioned, and there were marked on all the blocks the places where they were to be put. Among the stones was a curious one; it seemed of no desirable shape, it appeared unfit for any portion of the building. They tried it at this wall, but it would not fit; they tried it in another, but it could not be accommodated; so, vexed and angry, they threw it away. The Temple was so many years building that the stone became covered with moss, and grass grew around it. Everybody passing by laughed at the stone; they said Solomon was wise, and doubtless all the other stones were right, but as for that block, they might as well send it back to the quarry, for they were quite sure it was meant for nothing. Year after year rolled on, and the poor stone was still despised; the builders constantly refused it. The eventful day came when the temple was to be finished and opened, and the multitude was assembled to see the grand sight. The builders said, "Where is the top stone? Where is the pinnacle?" They little thought where the crowning marble was, until some one said, "Perhaps that stone which the builders refused is meant to be the top stone." They then took it, and hoisted it to the top of the house; and as it reached the summit they found it well adapted to the place. Loud hosannahs made the welkin ring, as the stone which the builders refused thus became the headstone of the corner.

FROM ELD. S. W. BISHOP.

RAHWAY, N. J.

WE pitched our tent in this place Saturday, Aug. 1st. Br. Wolcott was obliged to leave and go home Friday, and did not return until Tuesday, P. M. We having labored entirely beyond our strength in the hot sun during the day were entirely unfitted for preaching in the evening. But Br. W. H. Hanford kindly came to our relief, and interested the few that came out in a discourse on the condition of man in death, and the redemption of the righteous only from death at the last day through Jesus the only constituted LIFE-GIVER of the church.

Sunday. Aug. 2d, Br. H. addressed the people again, from Luke xxiii., 43, and pursued the usual manner in showing that this portion of the New Testament writings entirely fails to prove the doctrine of the conscious existence of departed souls or spirits after the death of the body. P. M. A discourse was preached by the writer from Acts xxvi., 8 showing first that the doctrine of man's inherent immortality makes the idea of the resurrection from the dead an incredible thing, on the principle that God will do nothing unnecessary; and if men get their reward at death there is no need of a resurrection. It was proved that man is all mortal, and therefore is wholly dependent upon a resurrection from death for a future life—that the resurrection from the dead is the Christian's only hope. In the evening Br. Hanford gave us a lengthy discourse from Prov. In this discourse he gave a general synopsis of our faith, viz., that all men, both good and bad, receive their reward in this earth. The righteous get an endless life, to be enjoyed in the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ, while the unbeliever is doomed to a perpetual banishment out of life. The discourse was listened to with interest to the end, and we trust a good impression was made. On Monday evening our hearts were gladdened in seeing Brethren Carrol, Martin, and Hough, who came all the way from New York to attend the meeting. We hardly think they felt paid for the effort. Our congregation was smaller, and we went to the stand with a severe headache, and consequently could hardly do justice to our subject. Our discourse was from 1 Cor. xv., 35. Those who have read from our pen in the HERALD OF LIFE are acquainted with the view we take of that portion of Paul's writings. On Tuesday Br. Wolcott returned, and preached in the evening from Luke xxi. He was abundantly successful in disproving the notion generally gathered from the reading of this and kindred texts, viz., that the coming our Lord is to overtake the church at an unexpected hour. He farther showed, conclusively, that while, in his opinion, the church would never know the precise day or hour of Christ's coming, still, they would know when it is near, even at the door; and that he had believed for eight years that the true church would know the year in which redemption would come to all the waiting ones. He also labored to impress on the minds of all present that unless they were in that frame of mind that would cause them to love the appearing of Christ, they must lose an endless life. Some remarks followed, and the meeting closed for the evening under the calm, heavenly influence of the Spirit of God. There is a strong rowdy element in this place, and up to Tuesday it manifested itself in the use of outrageous language, both vulgar and profane. While a majority of these creatures were Irish Catholics, still the company was spiced with others who claim to hold a respectable position in society.

RAHWAY TENT MEETING.

BR. STORRS: On my way to New York last Saturday I stopped at this place to attend the tent meetings being held by Brn. Bishop and Wolcott. On arriving, I was much disappointed to learn that Br. B. had gone home the day before, on account of sickness.

I was taken to the hospitable home of Br. Littell, and have found it to be, indeed, an oasis in the desert. I want to say a few words about this family.

Br. Littell has held our views for twenty years, which has been a great source of trouble to his dear wife. They have been members of the Baptist church for twenty-seven years, and have tried to walk worthy of the vocation wherewith they were called. For twenty years Sr. L. has wept and grieved at what she considered her husband's strange views. One or two years ago, Br. Philo Richardson moved near neighbor to them, and the first time he called, Sr. L., whose mind was ill at ease, expressed to him her great desire to obtain a true knowledge of God. He tried to show her the true light of the plan of salvation, and gave her "LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST" to read. She had read only a very little when the full light of Life broke upon her hitherto darkened mind; and since then she is rejoicing with joy unspeakable, and full of glory. The joy of the quiet, consistent husband may better be imagined than told. His countenance bespeaks joy and peace in believing. They have a family of three sons, young men, who are all with them in their precious faith. Happy family.

Our Br. Hanford has been with them frequently, and has expounded to them the way of truth. It is truly good to be here. It is one family, with the precious Jesus for our elder brother. O, "what will it be to be there." The "Little flock" come out of great tribulation. O, how I long for the dawning.

Now about the meeting. This morning, a report of the meetings up till Wednesday, written by Br. Bishop, has been handed me, with the request that I should report the latter part, Br. B. having left.

A statement of the intervening meetings has also been given me, which I shall put in.

Wednesday evening the attendance was small. Br. Wolcott spoke briefly from Psa. ciii., 14, "For He knoweth our frame, He remembereth that we are dust." Thursday, Br. Roworth, of N. Y., spoke from Phil. i, 23, "For I am in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart and to be with Christ, which far better."

Friday evening Br. Bishop deemed it best to return home because of ill health. This was a heaviness to all the friends of truth here. Friday evening Br. Wolcott spoke on Matt. xxv., 31, and onward, which scripture had been handed in to prove the reliving of all men for a judgment, and also the endless duration of conscious punishment.

Saturday afternoon we were gladdened by the arrival of Brn. Matthias and Hanford.

It was truly excellent, and, we think, appreciated.

Sunday A. M. Br. Wolcott spoke from 1 Thes., iv., 13, to the end. Few were present, yet the word was with power. O, how refreshing to hear of the resurrection and the return of our Lord to claim his waiting, sighing bride. At the close of the meeting, Br. Brown, a worthy Br. here, asked for our exposition of John v., 28, 29, for his own and the meeting's benefit. When Br. Wolcott got through with his explanation, we thought it seemed the clearest we had ever seen. In the afternoon, Br. Matthias spoke from Jer. xxiii., 21, 22, and Isa. lv., 10, 11. In the evening, Br. Hanford spoke from Phil. iii., 10, 11, dwelling particularly on the resurrection. There was marked attention, and we all felt that the word was fitly spoken.

During the day there was considerable discussion and interchange of ideas, and we feel assured that a spirit of inquiry has been awakened. The people lingered around the door as if unwilling to depart; and we leave with the prayer that the word may not return void.

Br. Martin, from New York, and family, were with us on Sunday; also, Br. Johnson, from Newark, N. J. The Sunday before Br. Johnson walked all the way from Newark, twelve miles.

We leave this place feeling it has been good for us to be here, and with an increased desire to be faithful unto the death, so that we may gain the crown of life. Sin is abounding; the love of many is waxing cold; but he that endures to the end shall be saved.

Last evening, just before leaving the tent, the Brn. discovered that six or seven of the ropes of the tent had been cut by some malicious person or persons. We all felt to thank the Lord for his preserving care, for our lives were in great danger. Had the tent fallen together, and the lamps exploded, much loss of life might have been the result. Thank the Lord for his care.

"THREE CAMPAIGN DOCUMENTS."

One Thousand Dollars Wanted.

FOR WHAT?

To put into circulation within the next three months Ten Thousand each of the following works:

A DEFENCE OF THE BIBLE.

THE JUDGMENT:

TIME AND MANNER OF IT.

AND

LIFE FROM THE DEAD:

Or, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN.

These three documents are for the campaign before us, which is not to be ended till our King is crowned and has the kingdoms of this world subjected to his reign on David's throne. Three thousand each of the above two first-named documents have been printed, and four thousand of the last, and a great portion of them are already in circulation; but there is a wish to increase it to ten thousand each by the next anniversary of the LIFE AND ADVENT UNION. We believe it can be done. It is true, a few have generally had such work to do; but "many hands make light work." If each of our subscribers could pay, or collect one dollar for this object, the full amount and several hundred dollars over would be had to carry on the work.

Who says, I WILL DO IT? You can have all your money back again in the documents, if you wish it.

The three works can be had for 14 cents, including the postage; or, 100 of each for $12, including postage, or for $10 when sent by express or taken at our office.

THE "GENEROUS OFFER" REVIVED.

It will be remembered that the Hon. O. S. HALSTED, last winter made the offer to send his work, "THE THEOLOGY OF THE BIBLE," to any subscriber of the HERALD OF LIFE for $2, and himself prepay the postage. The retail price of the work is $3. By accepting the judge's offer, you, in fact, get this invaluable work for a little more than half price; as the author gets but $1.68 after paying postage. The book is one to stdy; and with it your Bible will be more perfectly understood. The offer is a most generous one, and we hope many more will avail themselves of it. It is not restricted to your taking one copy at this rate. You can have any number you choose to send the money for. Send $2 for each copy; writing your own name and Post Office address plain, and the work will come to you free of any other expense.

Direct your communication to Hon. O. S. HALSTED, 417 Broad St., NEWARK, N. J.

FROM WM. H. WHITMAN.

CAMERON, ILL., August, 1868.

THE new Christian Hymn Book was handed us a few days ago, to examine. We found a hymn headed, "And dying is but going home," on page 471, No. 806. The third verse reads:

"Shall aught beguile us on the road,
While we are walking back to God?
For strangers into life we come,
And dying is but going home."

The above is very good poetry, but miserable theology. How came man to die? Sin entered into the world, and death by sin, says Paul. If "dying is but going home," the devil (enemy) takes us there, according to the above poetry. Again, the fourth verse reads:

"Welcome, sweet hour of full discharge,
That sets our longing souls at large,
Unbinds our chains, breaks up our cell,
And gives us with our God to dwell."

Your see, our longing souls are now confined in their "cells," and this is God's work. But death, which was brought into the world by the devil—or enemy—comes along and breaks up our "cell, and gives us with our God to dwell." Curious logic! But we are taught that there is to be a resurrection of the dead. Now, according to the above theology, what would a resurrection be? Christ will come and build up our "cells," and take us from our God to dwell. For let it be remembered that, whatever death is, a resurrection is a reversal of it. Now, in the above hymn, death is exalted, which is the work of the devil, for death takes us home to God. And if there is to be a resurrection through Jesus Christ, of course he will reverse the work of the enemy.

We will have to leave God and go back into our "cells" again. There are other hymns we intend to notice as soon as we get time.

AN exchange says that self-made men, like other made men, are sometimes very badly made.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, AUGUST 19, 1868.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

STRONG FAITH IN THE DEVIL.

"I believe in a devil and I believe in hell. I have no more doubt of the existence of Satan than I have of the existence of Christ."

SUCH is the language of "A Pedestrian Missionary" in the Advent Herald of August 11. We call that strong faith in the devil. It is so, or else the author has a weak faith in Christ; for if the evidence of the existence of the Lord Jesus Christ is no more full than the evidence of a spirit-devil, he must either have a weak faith in Christ's existence or is in possession of evidence of the existence of a spirit-devil unknown to common people.

Christ came in the flesh and dwelt among men. Has the devil done so? Christ conversed with men face to face. Has the devil, also? Christ eat and drank with men and women. Has the devil done this? Christ taught the people audibly. Has the devil? If so, when and where? Christ suffered and died. Has the devil given such evidence of his existence? Christ rose from the dead and was seen of his apostles, who felt and handled him, after his resurrection, and then "was seen of above five hundred brethren at once." Where are the apostles of the devil, who have seen and handled him? Is this "Pedestrian Missionary" one of them? May be so. We do not know: he seems to speak by authority. If he is one of those "witnesses" of the devil's existence, let him show his credentials. Where are his "five hundred" fellow witnesses who have seen his spirit-devil all at once? Come, now, show your faith by your works? Your devil never has shown himself as Jesus did, and yet you do not doubt his existence any more than you do that of Christ! But perhaps your devil is modest, and does not like to be seen! O, here is a thought that may help our devil believer: a thought of his own. He says,

"He [the devil] loves to be despised, for he well knows that those who despise him most will fear him least."

He does not show himself to anybody for fear they will honor him! "he loves to be despised!" But then this devil believer has one little difficulty to overcome. His Satan is supposed to have offered all the kingdoms of the world to Jesus, if he could have one act of homage from him: "If thou wilt fall down and worship me," said the devil. That don't look as if "he loves to be despised." But Jesus, it seems, did despise him. How is that, friend "Pedestrian?" did he give your devil what "he loves?" So it seems. But our friend says the devil is

So he can't be seen, and never was seen, and yet our "Pedestrian" friend "has no more doubt of his existence than he has of the existence of Christ." He has not one witness that ever saw his devil or heard him speak with an audible voice since man was upon earth. Now if he thinks the existence of Christ stands upon no better evidence than that of his devil, alas for his faith in Christianity! We fear he will make shipwreck of faith in Jesus.

No wonder men are made infidels by such "Pedestrian Missionaries." Such staking the truth of Christ's existence on the existence of a personal spirit-devil is a hazardous undertaking.

As to the existence of a devil, yea, many of them, we have no doubt. On that point we expressed our view last week. But when we are asked to believe in the theological devil, an everywhere present spirit-devil, tempting everybody, injecting evil thoughts into their minds, and managing absolutely nine-tenths of the inhabitants of the whole earth, keeping them in gross sins, and besides taking supervision of all professors of religion, so that, for the most part, they show quite as much of the devil spirit as the spirit of Christ,—we say, when we are asked to believe in such a devil, we must have some better evidence of his existence than the ipse dixit of any "Pedestrian Missionary," whether he belongs to Romanism or Protestantism. Rome has her devil, and well had it been for Protestantism if it had let Rome keep him, along with the rest of her "Dunghill decretals," as Luther called her decree "that the soul is immortal," with other of her monstrosities. It is borrowing the Roman "dunghill decretal" of inherent immortality that has spawned a spirit-devil into the lap of Protestantism, and made men more afraid of this imaginary devil than they are of God: and at the same time, it has corrupted the truth as to the character and government of God, till multitudes of thinking men see but little difference between the characters of the spirit-devil and the theological God; the latter making subjects for the theological devil to work up, and turning this evil spirit loose to tempt, behind the curtain, or unseen, the ignorant multitudes, and then delivering them over to his satanic majesty to torture them endlessly, because he succeeded so well in fixing them in rebellion against the theological God!

It is about time this blasphemy should cease; and we trust the God of the Bible will, ere long, cause such reproach upon his character and government to go into the lake of fire; that is, to perish utterly from off the face of the earth.

The devils we believe in "go about like roaring lions, seeking whom they devour," and they hate "to be despised." They "seek the highest seats in the synagogues, and the chief rooms at feasts" and picnics; and often, "for a pretence, make long prayers." That is one class of devils of whose "existence we have no doubt." Another class are fawning politicans, who become all things to all men from whom they hope not to be despised, but to get their votes and to make of them victims, "seeking whom they may devour." Let Christian men look out for these "roaring lion" devils, if they do not mean to be devoured. Let New York City be a warning. This city is so full of this sort of satans that it is in a fair way to be totally devoured; and they are thick all over the nation just now. Let us heed the injunction to "resist these devils"—"these roaring lions." Professed Christians who cannot see the devil multiplied into "legions" of real, tangible, wide-mouthed offsprings, ought not to talk about a modest spirit-devil who "loves to be despised." Such persons manifest more fear of a shadow than of the substance. Let them open their eyes to the awful fact that Bible devils are seen every day, and on all sides—in the church, in the State, and in all gatherings, whether of the nominal churches or that of mere worldlings. Resist these devils by a holy life and humble walk with God, and they will flee from you. Draw nigh to God and he will keep thee safe from these devouring lions.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD.

THE question of the re-living of the wicked dead first began to be seriously agitated in the Bible Examiner in 1855. Some articles had previously appeared, but an attempt to settle the question, definitely, was not entered upon till the year above named. The principal writers, at first, appeared over the signatures of MACKNIGHT (Jacob Grim), and VERITAS (Eld. Henry Grew). In the month of August of that year (1855), we came out with an article as follows:

WILL THE WICKED DEAD LIVE AGAIN?

This question has been partially discussed by "MACKNIGHT" and "VERITAS," in the Examiner; but it was not as thoroughly investigated as is desirable; at least, some are anxious to see it further discussed, and we are perfectly willing it should be. The ordinary exposition of the process of the day of judgment and final destiny of wicked men is, that all dead men will be made alive from the dead by a general resurrection; that then a longer or shorter period will elapse in which the judgment will go on and terminate; that at its conclusion all the wicked that have ever lived from Adam to the last sinner will be sent to eternal torments, or else to temporary torments, ending in actual death.

Let this subject be investigated in the light of the Scriptures, that our faith may be founded on that testimony, and not on the traditions of men, or any vulgar prejudices of men. To simplify the question we put it in the following form: Do the Scriptures teach that the wicked dead will be made alive?

This question will naturally bring out the discussion of the following items; yet it is desirable that each one be taken up separately, and in the order numbered.

1. Is there positive testimony that the wicked dead will be made alive?

2. Is there testimony as to the means or power by which they are to receive life?

3. If alive, by what means is that life sustained during the judgment, or any period allotted to torment after?

4. Do the Scriptures distinctly teach that any, who are made alive by the resurrection at the last day are mortal?

5. Do the Scriptures not distinctly affirm deathlessness, or incorruptibility, to all who are made alive by that resurrection?

If life is the gift of God, does he give it at all to those who have died in their sins? If Christ is the LIFE-GIVER, does he give life to dead sinners who have gone down to death without union with him, and without the indwelling of God's Holy Spirit?

Some may think these questions ought not to be agitated, and there are some questions which have been discussed till argument is exhausted, and further discussion is useless; but that cannot be said in this case, for there has been but little discussion on it. We once thought it was a settled fact that all the wicked dead would be made alive at the judgment, and the text, John v., 28, 29, "All that are in their graves shall hear his voice and come forth," etc., answered all objections, without further examination. Just so do the advocates of immortal souls and consciousness in death think one or two texts, that are at their tongue's end, settle the question on their side. After all, it is not one or two texts that settle any theological question; it is, what is the general tenor of the Scripture testimony? That point settled, there must be a way to harmonize texts that seem to contradict the general Scripture view.

We are not settled on the question now proposed for discussion, though we have given it much thought; we confess a doubt as to the Scriptures teaching the wicked dead will be made alive again. We are desirous to see the subject fairly and candidly discussed, and hope it may be done without party feeling. What is the truth on the question? If Mack night and Veritas will renew their friendly controversy on the topic we shall be glad. If they do not choose to, we are willing to take part in it with any candid and intelligent friend who will take it up for the truth's sake, and not for mastery, or with a determination to adhere to an old theory or to bring out a new one, whether it appears in general harmony with Scripture or not. Let truth be our earnest pursuit.

From that time the discussion was entered upon in earnest by Eld. GREW in the Affirmative, and the EDITOR as Respondent. That was first opened in October, 1855, and continued till the March following, after which various other writers took part in the question, running through the year 1856. By that time we were so thoroughly convinced that the righteous only would be made alive from the dead, that not a doubt of the truth of this position has come over our mind from that day to this. The result was, we issued our pamphlet in 1857, "LIFE FROM THE DEAD, or, The Righteous only will live again." That Pamphlet is one of our "Campaign Documents."

DIFFICULTIES.

I READ, "God hath appointed a day in which He will judge the world in righteousness by Jesus Christ his Son." If the day is appointed it has not arrived yet. Now, if the wicked dead never come up, who will be at the day appointed to be judged? S. B.

The term judge is not restricted to the one sense of trying and determining cases. It often in the Bible has the sense of ruling, governing. The "Book of Judges" is an example of this, in which all who ruled Israel were termed Judges. The Psalmist says, "O let the nations be glad and sing for joy: for Thou shalt judge the people righteously, and govern the nations upon earth." Psa. lxvii., 4.

A striking resemblance is seen between this language and that quoted by "S. B." They both appear to refer to the same time and event, and correspond to the language of prophecy, "Behold the days come, saith the LORD, that I will raise unto David a righteous Branch, and a King shall reign and prosper and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth." Jer. xxiii., 5.

We might multiply texts, to any extent, showing that the expression in the text quoted by "S. B." refers not to a judicial judgment of individuals, but to ruling or governing "the world" in righteousness. The world hitherto has seen no perfectly righteous government. Iniquity and corruption have found place in the best forms of government that have ever yet been seen in the world; but "God has appointed a day," or period, yet future, "in the which he will judge," or rule, "the world in righteousness," as the prophets have said, "by that man," whom God raised up to David, according to His promise, "whom He hath ordained; He hath given assurance unto all," of his being the "righteous Branch and King," "in that He hath raised him from the dead."

The "righteous Branch" could not have been King upon earth if he had not been raised from the dead; but God has demonstrated to all men that this man, who was put to death, is His appointed King, to rule the nations upon the earth and to do it in righteousness.

Paul had "preached unto the" people of Athens, "Jesus and the resurrection. He had set before them the folly of worshipping idols; but tells them God overlooked these things, done in their ignorance; but now commandeth all men, everywhere to repent of such superstition and folly; and that, because He had determined to establish a righteous rule, or government in the world; in, or under which rule none could have part who did not repent; that is, "turn from idols to serve the true and living God, and wait for his Son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead, even Jesus, which delivered us from the wrath to come;" i. e., from "death, the wages of sin;" without which deliverance we can have no part in the kingdom of God, or in the government of the saints, which is to be "under the whole heaven," and "shall stand forever," and "shall not be left to other people." Dan. vii., 14, 27; ii. 44.

Then will Paul's language, quoted by "S. B." have its perfect accomplishment.

ANOTHER DIFFICULTY.

I CAN'T see how the wicked are ever made to see the righteousness of God, or the world to see it, if they and the righteous go down alike into the grave. S. B.

The wicked and the righteous do not go down alike into the grave. "The wicked is driven away in his wickedness: but the righteous hath hope in his death." Prov. xiv., 32.

"Like sheep they [the wicked] are laid in the grave: death shall feed on them . . . . . the grave being a habitation to every one of them;" [margin]. "But God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave." Psa. xlix., 14, 15. "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life, and I will raise him up at the last day." "He that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him." John iii., 36, and vi., 40. These various texts sufficiently indicate the wide difference between the going down into the grave of the righteous and the wicked.

We see no necessity that the wicked dead should be made to see the righteousness of God. It could be no advantage to them, nor satisfaction to holy beings to have them see it, if it could be of no service to them. What profit was it to the antediluvians to see the righteousness of God? They probably did not even think it was a righteous matter thus to destroy them; but Noah and his family did; and so will all the saved see the righteousness of God in cutting off the incorrigibly wicked living from the earth, and in condemning the wicked dead not to see life, but to "be holden with the cords of their sins," and to "remain in the congregation of the dead."

"But will there not be a day that Malachi speaks of, 'Then shall ye discern between the righteous and the wicked, between him that serveth God and him that serveth him not.'" S. B.

Undoubtedly there will be. But who will discern it? Surely nothing is said or intimated that it is the wicked dead. The righteous of all ages will discern it when "God makes up his jewels," and the living wicked will discern it "when the Lord Jesus is revealed from heaven in flaming fire," and "punishes with everlasting destruction" the corrupters of the earth, civil and ecclesiastic: they will discern their folly and madness, and perish without hope.

THE LIFE AND ADVENT UNION.

THE fifth anniversary of the UNION will be held in "The Life and Advent Mission Tent," on the Camp-ground in Springfield, Mass., Thursday the 27th inst, at two o'clock P. M. A preliminary meeting, in the same place, in the A. M., at ten o'clock. Let not any fail to be there who can be. If this cannot be, let us know what you will do to sustain the HERALD OF LIFE another year.

Br. E. Wolcott, the owner of the above tent, is expected to pitch it on Saturday, the 22d inst; and all special meetings to promote the object for which the UNION was formed will be held in it. Conference and prayer meetings will be held there, and more or less preaching during the continuance of the camp-meeting.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

IT is evident that less concern is manifested this year by the supporters of our paper respecting any possibility that it may not be continued, than has been evinced on former occasions. This is owing, of course, to the well recognized fact that as its influence becomes more widely felt, and its lines of conformity to truth more distinctly seen, the obviousness of the necessity for its existence thus becoming more palpable, the question of its continuance grows to be regarded as already settled in the affirmative by the eternal possessor and controller of all things. The feeling of confidence is proper, eminently so, if we keep in memory that our reliance upon God in this, as in other matters, must, to be effective, be accompanied by stern loyalty to perceptions of duty. And who does not clearly perceive that, as God works by means, it becomes, in an especial manner, the duty of all engaged in this branch of his service to acquit ourselves as faithful stewards. It cannot but be that we all see too plainly the great necessity for this to need any word of counsel. If we humbly seek to know just what God's will concerning us is, and are earnestly desirous to do it, we will come up more manfully and determinedly than ever to the work, and secure the blissful assurance that He who dispenses rich things richly looks with pleasure upon us.

More extensive arrangements have been made this year than ever before for the anniversary meeting, and for other meetings on the camp-ground. It is hoped that all who can will be there to cheer and strengthen each other with their presence, and with kindly words of comfort. May there be a full attendance, a deep interest felt, and, by the blessing of God, much good be accomplished.

"FIGHT THE GOOD FIGHT."

RULERS and people have in different ages fought for kingdoms and empires; and within the last few years thousands have contended, even unto death, for the existence of our own nation. The Christian is properly termed a soldier; his Christian experience is one of warfare. The soldier should have confidence in the ability, wisdom, and integrity of his captain: and genuine confidence can only be acquired by evidence. The Christian should avail himself of all the means within his reach that he may become thoroughly acquainted with the Captain of his salvation; he should study his character, life, precepts, and example in all things. Like the soldier he should learn to be vigilant and obedient. The judicious captain will see that all orders are couched in language understood by the common soldier; that the trumpet gives no uncertain sound; consequently, ignorance of the commandments will not be received as an excuse for non-obedience. Weapons for offensive and defensive operations are furnished. To be skilful and successful in their use, daily practice is necessary. Patience, fidelity, courage, and uncompromising tenacity are indispensable. Justice, truth and righteousness should be thrown to the breeze; and beneath the folds of this banner the true soldier will, if it is necessary, be willing to lay down his life. The acts of the common soldier may not always come to the knowledge of his captain, but not so with the soldier of the cross. The vigilant eye of the great Captain takes cognizance of every sacrifice, of every act. Not a sparrow falls without his notice. Every act shall receive its reward. Earth's greatest captains have failed and fallen, but the God of battles has sworn that the Captain of our salvation shall conquer. In the early part of the engagement, pierced with the enemies' darts, he fell, but he who is far above all battles raised him up and placed him beyond the reach of corruption. Henceforth with him the conquest is unequal. We still are exposed; the results to us, individually, are uncertain. If we falter or compromise with the enemy, we die. But if faithful to our trust and to our Captain, we shall share in the victory and the glory that is to follow; and far the encouragement of the noble and true, who fall contending for the right, a proclamation has gone forth, "Because I live, ye shall live also."

A. G. HUDSON.

LAKE CITY, MINN., Aug., 1868.

GLORIOUS NEWS!

THE long dark night is over: the morning has come at last. The King of glory has returned; the dead are raised; the living changed; death swallowed up; the devil destroyed; hell cast into the lake of fire; a nation has been born in a day; the kingdoms of this world have become the kingdom of our Lord and his Christ.

The will of God is now done on earth as it is in heaven; the law goes forth from Jerusalem; David's throne is occupied by his Son Jesus; sorrow, pain and death are things that were; no longer feared, no longer felt; man is immortal; the summer is over, the harvest is past, and we are all saved.

With all thy joys and pain!
Immortal joys burst on our view,
A long and glorious reign.

But, says one, you are crazy or mad. I am not mad; this is reality. I can substantiate every word by two witnesses.

The Rev. Mr. Bartlett says of the Rev. L. E. Matson, who lately died, that "after twenty-nine years' struggle, the mortal has put on immortality." And Paul says when this mortal shall put on immortality, there shall be brought to pass the saying that is written: Death is swallowed up in victory. In short, we learn from him it is then all these things are accomplished. If either of these parties is mistaken, none of these things are so.

A. G. HUDSON.

LAKE CITY, MINN.

The foregoing remarks were occasioned by reading in the Chicago Tribune an account of the funeral services of the late Rev. L. E. Matson, at the Plymouth Church in that city, conducted by Rev. Wm. Alvin Bartlett, of Brooklyn, N. Y. The following is an extract. Mr. Bartlett said:

A mortal, after a struggle of twenty-nine years, has put on immortality. Such is the mute assertion of this draped edifice; of your shadowed hearts; and of this mourning Church of God. It is the central miracle of life that a mortal can put on immortality. Angels are clad with it as with a robe. God is it. Christ brought it to life. But that mortal must put on immortality is the miracle which succeeded the plain murder on Calvary; is the significance of the vacant sepulchre and the angel who stood by the folded napkin. This painful, beautiful experiment has transpired in your midst. You have been watchers of the effort until the achievement. . . . .

Mr. Bartlett concluded his discourse with these words:

Flooded with peace did his spirit float,
And with silent rapture glow,
Till where earth did end, and heaven begun,
His soul did scarcely know.

To live nobly, we must be noble; and we become noble by resolutely banishing every unwortny thought and feeling.

Letters and Extracts.

FROM A. G. HUDSON.

LAKE CITY, MINN., Aug. 7, 1868.

BR. STORRS: The hour has come for Lake City to signify her wishes in regard to the HERALD OF LIFE. We wish long life and prosperity to the weekly. We love the paper; the truths it advocates; the writers; in short, all who love our Lord Jesus Christ and his appearing; and we think it our duty to sustain the HERALD as the most effective means at present employed to scatter the good news to a dying world.

J. M. Willis has already informed you of what he can do for the coming year. I am authorized to promise the following:

Dr. John Kelly	$10
Jacob Libby	$10
H. H. Arnold	$10
A. G. Hudson	$10

We also promise in addition to the above to get as many subscribers as we can. I did hope that we should be able to do more this year; but is not exactly the case with us in Minnesota, where our improvements are to be made, houses to be built, lands to be broken and fenced. We find that it takes quite a number of Uncle Samuel's Greenbacks to cover our real wants, and the imaginary ones will come around, occasionally, presenting their claims in spite of us: yet we would remember that we are accountable for the manner in which we spend our time and our money. The people are being fed upon chaff; while the bread of Life is withheld. If the HERALD OF LIFE advocates the truth, there is but very little truth advocated. Orthodoxy, so called, today carried to its logical conclusions is spiritualism. Brethren, by our united efforts let us place the HERALD at least beyond the reach of financial death.

"Man wants but little here below,

FROM LUCRETIA B. LAMB.

ST. PAUL, MINN., August 9, 1868.

DEAR FRIENDS of the Life and Advent Union: Your anniversary draws nigh. In the questions to come before you, for discussion and decision, I feel a deep interest. Gladly would I be with you. That cannot be, yet I do and will remember you; for I have perfect confidence in the powers and wisdom of the Infinite One, with whom I have daily fellowship, that He will guide you to wise and righteous conclusions, and do for you and the cause of truth infinitely more than I can ask, or even think.

The request that all who could not be present at the annual meeting should make known their wishes with regard to the HERALD, I for one cannot think of sparing it, my only wholesome nutriment aside from my Bible. Neither can I consent that its Life-giving light should leave and the many that would be enlightened by it be left in the darkness of heathen mythology and platonic delusions. Modesty might suggest silence for one with so little ability to help forward the enterprise. I am, however, encouraged in referring to the building of the Tabernacle, a type of the true, for which we would labor, that is soon in its glory to meet our enraptured vision. I find that the people wrought willingly, and they that could do no greater work, made the pins. This I think I can do; and it gives me great joy that I may do something. I, who have received so much—such a Life-giving light, the light of truth, would love much, and do much. The object of our love, how worthy our undivided efforts. Can we for a moment contemplate Him without enthusiasm? or his soon coming but with rapture? If this truth possesses our hearts as it should, would we esteem any sacrifice too great, that the true light in its simplicity, symmetry and purity, might lighten our country and the world as the beams of the Son of righteousness will, when He arises and his people grow as calves for the stall?

The Lord willing, I will pay for three copies of the HERALD the coming year. May the blessings of Him who manifested his glory in the bush be with you, Dear Brethren and Sisters, to inspire with love divine and cause your meeting to be one of deep interest and power for good.

It was my privilege to be with you at Wilbraham when this Union had its birth; a time ever to be remembered, as I there became established in the belief that the righteous only will live again, I had long studied the subject. Br. Storrs' sermon on the stand, Friday eve, settled the question for me. Would that I could hear, or see it again. Every point was clinched with scripture proof.

May he live to labor till Jesus comes, evincing His spirit, humble and contrite, teachable and holy with peace as a river, and righteousness as the waves of the sea. May this be the character and condition of you all, dearly beloved in the Lord Jesus Christ. Your Sister, waiting for the kingdom of God.

FROM JABEZ ADAMS.

KANWAKA, KANSAS, Aug. 2, 1868.

BR. STORRS: I have not deserted the noble cause, neither have I ever entertained such a thought. I had not seen any later number of the HERALD than one printed last November, until last week, when I had the pleasure of visiting Br. Baker in Lawrence.

What caused my paper to stop, I cannot tell. I wrote to you, asking a change from Clinton, Kansas, to Fairfield, Mo: the paper did not come.

I feared our publications had stopped. But learned while at Br. B.'s that the precious forerunner still lives; and that its veteran editor is still with us, faithfully spreading the gospel light.

Brothers and Sisters, the longevity of our editor is certainly a great blessing from God.

Friends let us endeavor to be faithful; let us resolve to prepare for the reward promised—everlasting life. And when we have made this resolution, may God give us power to overcome evil. Great is the work before us if we would "attain unto the resurrection;" and many impediments arise; but if our whole heart is for good we will succeed.

The important work is accomplished, friends, when we banish all selfishness from our hearts and let in a love-fountain, which will drive out the evil and establish therein a brotherly feeling which tells us to do all we can to make others happy. When we feel that we have no desire to live except to do good in the world, we then have the right feeling. O, may God ever direct us to fulfil our duty by causing the love-fountain to flow.

I hope our efforts may be successful in convincing the world that a future life for the righteous, alone, is the testimony of Christ.

Alas! we have many convinced already, who will not acknowledge their convictions. Many ministers who are thoroughly convinced of the non-resurrection of the wicked, will still preach eternal torments; and thereby drive thousands into skepticism and infidelity. O, how can intelligent people receive such an awful doctrine?

When we look at the progress of wisdom in the world, and think of the few who proclaim "Life only in Christ," it is astonishing.

May many be led to Christ's true teachings and be bold in proclaiming it to the world. Let us live to do good.

NOTE BY EDITOR. Your paper has been misdirected from some cause. Where shall we now send it?

FROM DAVID J. ELLSWORTH.

WINDSOR, CONN., August 12, 1868.

BR. STORRS: Feeling myself firmly grounded in the glorious doctrine of a future life only to the righteous, I would unfurl my banner before the world, with our motto of "Life only in Christ" inscribed upon it, ready at all times to defend and proclaim it.

It is a glorious doctrine; all honoring to our God, who has proclaimed Himself a God of Love and Mercy, "not willing that any should perish, but that all might come unto him and live."

Why is it we are so slow in getting hold of Bible truth? Why cannot we believe "all that the prophets have spoken?" Is it because we are unwilling to candidly investigate the subject, with an earnest desire to know what is the truth, being ready to give up an error when we see it to be such? I held up my hands in holy horror when the doctrine of the non-resurrection of the wicked was first presented, but I was searching for truth, with my mind open to conviction. The Lord is leading me into truth, and when I get it, I will stand in it, let the consequences be what they may. I feel like using great boldness of speech in regard to this crowning doctrine of the Bible. It is high time that all who have it should give it a certain sound, not holding it in a doubting and faint-hearted way. Let the shout go up from Springfield camp ground; let it shine as a beacon light to guide many who may hear it for the first time, into the understanding and love of it.

How plain the scripture. From the lips of our LIFE-GIVER we have it. "The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God; and they that hear shall live." What will become of those that don't hear? Again, "They that are accounted worthy to obtain, . . . a resurrection from the dead cannot die any more." What will become of those that are not worthy? Paul was willing to suffer "If by any means he might attain unto a resurrection from the dead." What would become of him if he did not attain?

"If a man die, will he live again?" Why was this question asked? But I will not quote further; the Bible is full of it. We have the word of God, which is the sword of the Spirit, which, if we take, error must fall before it. To my Brethren and Sisters I would say, stand firm in the faith; hold fast, that no man take thy crown. The programme of this world's history yet to be fulfilled, seems somewhat lengthy yet. I firmly believe that a tide of evil is setting in upon the world that will eclipse all that has preceded it. Let us heed the words of Jesus, with all that the prophets have spoken, so that when human calculations fail, we may not be disappointed.

I send two dollars to aid in printing the tracts. I prize the HERALD OF LIFE next to my Bible. It must be well sustained. I believe it will be.

FROM J. S. POTTER.

EAST BOSTON, MASS, Aug. 17, 1868.

BR. STORRS: I hope all the lovers of the great crowning truth of the gospel will rally around the standard at the Springfield camp-meeting, and that the HERALD OF LIFE may be sustained, is my prayer. For my part, I love the doctrine of no future life out of Christ, because I believe the law and the prophets teach it, and Christ and the apostles confirm it; so that it is all reduced down to one focal point—"He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life." I do not believe, after our Saviour told Peter "On this rock I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it," that he then turned right round on the negative, and said the gates of hell shall not prevail against the wicked, also.

I like Br. Stetson's article in reference to Br. S. G. Mathewson's sermon, for I was there and heard the same, and it did me good, as well as others. One thing Br. Mathewson said, was, "Christ did not do his work on the halves; he would not raise part mortal and part immortal, for the dead are raised incorruptible; and I say, Amen.

I have given away 140 of LIFE FROM THE DEAD, and 200 tracts, and I hope to do more the next year, if my life is spared. I wish to have the HERALD OF LIFE continued, and I expect to see you at the camp-meeting. May the good Lord bless and sustain you in preaching the gospel of Christ.

I would say to all lovers of truth, that I would not circulate anything that has got two deaths for the wages of sin in it; nor a mortal resurrection, let them call it what they will—"Adventism," or anything else. Hear the apostle Paul. "For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead. But some man will say, "How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?" Two questions. Paul's answer: 1st, "The dead shall be raised incorruptible." 2. "It is raised a spiritual body." "For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

FROM ELD. W. S. CAMPBELL.

BEAVER FALLS, PA., August 14, 1868.

BR. STORRS: My first letter was written under the hopeful influence of the first effort put forth in this place. I do not mean by this remark that we are discouraged, or that the prospect is positively discouraging; but, we have not realized all that interest and seen all the excitement resulting from our labors that might have been at first expected.

The hearing on Sabbath has been good. We have held meetings in the large brick school house, as well as in the grove, and shall continue in each place next Sabbath.

There is some inquiry. We have scattered among the people many publications, and find a disposition to read. It is to be hoped that the seed sown may bear fruit.

This place, as to its present aspects for business and settlement, is very new, yet increasing fast, and hence we find some considerable difficulty in obtaining the ear, except on Sundays; for almost all are building. I have been in Western places before where the people were so devoted to this particular branch of improvement that there was hardly time for doing anything else.

The subjects that we have dwelt upon have been mainly the Coming of Christ and the great question of Immortality at his appearing, involving the sublime idea of Life from the dead only through him.

We call this the most sublime position secured to us by the light of the gospel—faith in Christ to give life unto those who are found in him.

Let us see. A man who met me in the street to-day, called my attention to the fact that nowhere in the Old Testament did God threaten any punishment to the sinner after death. "Yes, he does," said I, "threaten that his punishment shall be a state of death; i. e., they shall be punished after dying by continuing in the state of death." I then quoted David, who said, "Like sheep they are laid in the grave. Death shall feed on them." "They shall go to the generation of their fathers, and never see light." "What, then, is the state of the righteous, for they die?" Hear him again: "Thou wilt redeem my soul from the power of the grave." Was not that a sublime hope of David; who had a prospect of awaking in the likeness of Christ; who saw that there was redemption from the grave—redemption for his soul, too? The sublime and exalting character of this position is only increased by the fact that the Lord Jesus himself enjoyed this redemption. He who was the first fruits—who became the first-born among the brethren (many of them)—had life, a soul which was not left in hades. Nor did the Holy One see corruption. Not at all! David staid in the grave till after his Son and Lord ascended. I have no doubt but he stays there yet; but he said from this fact of Christ's living again, his "flesh should rest in hope."

Blessed, exalted, sublime position! Does it belong to Christ as the Son of God and Son of man? Does it belong to him as the first begotten from the dead? Does it belong to him as the second Adam—the heavenly? Then it belongs to those who are his brethren. Then it belongs to those who partake of the divine nature. It belongs to those who have by him been led forth from captivity. It belongs, then, to those who are like the heavenly; for they that are like the heavenly, become heavenly. They will have life like unto Christ's life. Is it not a sublime point from which to view the holy inheritance? One uniform, one grand line of purpose to be seen in all the exhibitions of the plan of the Infinite.

Christ, the "LIFE-GIVER," at all points. Looking forward, the patriarch saw nothing else. They only would stand on the earth by standing with him. Only as they stood on the earth would they stand at all. "Thy dead should live." Only as they were the body of Christ should they arise and have the "dew of youth from the womb of the morning." Only in the consummation, only in the waking, should they have his likeness; hence they must all have felt the importance of Christ's coming to the earth. How emphatic the language of the risen Son of God, who walked incognito with the two sad-hearted brethren who trod their sorry way to Emmaus. "Ought not Christ to have suffered, and to enter into his glory?"

How could men enter glory else? Standing in the infinite centre, shining with the eternal radiance of truth, Jesus confirms the hope of the patriarchal and the prophetical vision. He teaches the Life of God—the only power of being for the future—in himself. The impartation of the divine force that could and would raise man to the embrace of the divine. He not only puts the resurrection in himself, the dying and risen—living Son of God—but declares that he is the resurrection; and declares, moreover, that those who are accepted of him shall be raised up at the last day. If he is the resurrection, the resurrection to life from the dead is a sublime position, because it is divine; and it is divine because it is in Christ. To enjoy a faith, then, of living, is to enjoy a faith of a possession in the divine nature. It will be a divine right. Is it not sublime? This belief, that there is life in the future only in the Son of God?

Here is the great life plan and purpose of God in Christ: to give him in the future those who come; that none should be lost; but that they should be raised up at the last day. If men, therefore, are not in Christ, how will they be brought to enjoy a divine position? The resurrection is a divine position; it is necessary to the future life of the righteous. All who believe in the sleep of the dead, say so. What have the wicked to do with a divine state—with Christ at last—if they would not have him here? They must (how sad the fact!) remain one side of him—out of him—remain in death.

FROM JAMES H. JACOBS.

FREETOWN, N. Y., August 14, 1868.

BR. STORRS: A few words to you and the readers of the HERALD OF LIFE. Life future and eternal, how good it sounds to a mortal man's ear while battling with the sorrows and disappointments of this life. But this life is a gift, a favor; and I thank God for it. But see the goodness of God in offering us a better one; an eternal life on the condition of obedience; for, God so loved the world that he gave his only Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have a life which we do not by nature possess, but may have by obedience to God; viz., by believing on his Son, and he will give us eternal life. O could men but see the folly of supposing they have an endless life by nature, when God has told us plainly that it is in his Son. God gave eternal life to his Son, and raised him out from among the dead: raised him immortal. Now he is the first fruits: that is, he is the sample of all who will be raised by or through him. They must be judged worthy previous to being raised; and we must be judged worthy before we can be changed. May the Lord help us all, who love his word, to endure to the end; so that when He shall appear, we may be like him. May the dear HERALD live to spread the light of life to all who sit in darkness and in the shadow of death.

Our dear Br. A. Guthrie is very sick with hemorrhage of the lungs, and I think nigh unto death. We were intending to hold meetings together this fall; but we are to be disappointed, unless God in mercy adds to his days. My prayer is, that he may yet live to proclaim life and immortality to a dying world. If it is not out of harmony with God's revealed will, in this age, to add to our days, we will ask God to add to our brother's days a few years.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We regret to hear of the sickness of our very dear Br. Guthrie. He is a noble specimen of a sincere Christian. May "the Lord have mercy on him, and on us also, lest we have sorrow upon sorrow," by his decease. Phil. iii. 27. May the blessing of God be on him.

J. W. MCCAGG, Warsaw, N. Y., writes: God bless you in your efforts to show No life out of Christ. I was enlightened into the Advent faith by Elder Grant's preaching the word, but I cannot accept his resurrection to life of the wicked dead.

Dear Brother, I consider your paper one of the leading ones in showing God's plan of dealing with mankind. How much comfort I take in reading those blessed promises God has left on record for those that love the appearing of His only Son Jesus. My daily prayer is, Come blessed Jesus, and come quickly. I know it may be as by fire that I am saved; but I have no other hope except through a resurrection from the dead by His Spirit that raised Jesus from the dead. God bless you in your labors for sinners. Your Brother, watching for Jesus.

ELD. LIBERTY WETHERBEE, Bangor, Me., writes: I desire to be at your anniversary, and shall be if I can; if not, put me down five dollars for the HERALD OF LIFE, and I shall do more if possible. The Life theme is gaining ground in these parts. Though our blessed Lord has not yet come, he is to come, and his coming is not far distant. Men may arrange, set time and preach time, and be disappointed, but our God has his time and it will not go beyond or come short of His appointment. I have learned that our God works all things after the counsel of his own will. Our HERALD OF LIFE, one of the best papers printed, is destined to live until old time is no more; that is my judgment. How I would love to see all the dear saints. One and all remember me, poor unworthy me "away down east." Yours in love and truth.

W. N. HOUGHTALING, Seymour, Conn., writes: The annual meeting of the Life and Advent Union is close at hand. As to the question, Shall the HERALD OF LIFE live? I can let you know my mind. I have read the paper ever since it came into being; and as it holds the ground it took and is steadily gaining more, I say with all my heart, Let this "Child of Providence" live. The great work for which it was started would be checked exceedingly if it were stopped, or suspended for a monthly. I am satisfied with it and its management, and purpose to renew my last pledge, $10, to support the paper I love.

THOMAS M. REDHEAD, Brooklyn, N. Y., writes: The HERALD OF LIFE is more precious to me than ever, therefore to help make it live I cheerfully subscribe fifty dollars for two copies for the next volume.

MRS. R. W. PIERCE, Milwaukee, Wis., writes: As it will soon be the 27th, I write to you what I can do the coming year for our paper. You may say for me twenty-five dollars. I pray the good Lord may be with you and preside over your deliberations as you meet to talk over what is of so much interest to us all—the maintainance of the HERALD OF LIFE. I do feel that it is of the Lord, and the Lord will see that it is sustained; for the silver and gold are his.

CHARLES HOPE, West Berkshire, Vt., sends $1 50 for Campaign Documents, and writes: I have scattered those previously sent me. If these works will not enlighten the minds of formal professors, I know of nothing that will. Strange as it may appear, some Adventists will not read Life through Christ alone, because they wish to see the wicked dead made alive to get their punishment! such is their traditionary prejudice. The truth we advocate we trust will prevail. May God help to fight till we shall reign. Dear Brethren, I thought to come to your anniversary meeting; but the expense would be so much I fear I could not do so much for the HERALD OF LIFE, and it must live, for it has been and will be the cause of many living forever. I hope the good Lord, and our Elder Brother will continue to bless you all in the LIFE AND ADVENT UNION. Myself and Caspar B. Miner, will give $5 each for our papers next volume.

POLLY G. PITTS, Fredericksburg, Iowa, writes: I have thought for three years past, that the HERALD OF LIFE would never die. I have believed it was God's messenger to carry, in these last days, the glorious gospel of Life only in Christ, and of opening, in one sense, the books of God to the dying children of men. I believe still the HERALD OF LIFE will live under God's care, "and not die." Never has there been a time since the tract on ATONEMENT was in circulation, but what I have had it running on its errand of mercy. I have given it to Ministers, Lawyers, and others. The Campaign Documents I have scattered, and wish I had the means to do more; but I am poor in this world's goods, and aged, almost 79; but I bless God that he has held me up thus far, and given me understanding in his word.

May God bless your meeting together on the glorious anniversary of the Life and Advent Union. I will do all I can to sustain the HERALD OF LIFE, and pray that God will say concerning it, "Live and not die." My prayer shall be that God will give all its conductors wisdom from above, and a full determination to possess the land; for, we are able. May you have a blessed sitting together in a heavenly place in Christ Jesus, and be dismissed with God's benediction, "Well done good and faithful servants." So may it be.

ELD. J. LEWIS, writes from Beck's Creek, Ill., August 4: I have been down in Fayette Co., since I last wrote you, about nine miles from Ramsey, where I preached last winter, and to our joy we find the seed sown has taken root, and a goodly number have come out boldly for the truth of Life only in Christ. Praise the Lord. We feel like going forward in the work with strong faith and renewed vigor. Our labor is hard, but my health was never better. I send fifty cents for tracts, and hope soon to send more and some subscribers. We hope the brethren will stand up for the dear HERALD OF LIFE. We want nothing more or less, in perodicals, as the times are now. To you and all the brethren and sisters we would say, Be united: be strong: stand fast; for the cause is a glorious one. Let the HERALD live till the Lord shall come.

DANIEL'S REWARD.

WHEN Belshazzar, the sacrilegious idolator, was alarmed at the mysterious writing upon the wall of his banqueting-room, he promised Daniel that if he would make known the interpretation of those words which the miraculous hand had inscribed, he should be clothed with scarlet, and have a chain of gold about his neck, and be proclaimed the third ruler in the kingdom. Daniel performed the task and received the reward. But here the question arises, Why was the third rank promised to him? Why not the second, which he seemed to have enjoyed under Nebuchadnezzar, as Joseph had done under Pharaoh, and Mordecai under Ahasuerus? To this question there has for a long time been no satisfactory answer. But in the year 1854, Sir Henry Rawlinson made the important discovery from documents obtained from the ancient site of "Ur of the Chaldees," that Nobonadius, the son-in-law and successor of Nebuchadnezzar, associated with him in the government during the latter years of his reign, his son Belshazzar, and allowed him his royal title. There were therefore, two kings at that time; Belshazzar himself occupied the second place of honor, and hence the highest position to which any subject could be elevated was that of the third personage in the empire.

SPOILS OF WAR.

THE presents from the army in Abyssinia to Queen Victoria have reached their final destination. They consist of three crowns or head-pieces, a robe of State, a goblet, seal, trappings, etc. One of the crowns seems made entirely of solid gold—quite plain, in the shape of a Papal tiara; its base surrounded at intervals by three bars of embossed gold. The second, also gold, with a velvet cap, looks much like an English coronet, a little the worse for wear. The third is a kind of martial head-piece, with a metal top, and loose metal bars hanging down at intervals all round it as far as the neck. The robe is a magnificent affair, looking as if fresh from the loom, woven apparently of rich gold thread, with large patterns of flowers about it woven of silk in appropriate colors. This was the robe which Theodore threw off just before he put an end to his life. The goblet is also of gold, but less capacious than its owner's powers of imbibing would have led one to expect. The seal of gold bears a lion passant, and the handle is made of three large pieces of agate, each of a different color. The other articles were rich or curious in their way.

HYDROPHOBIA—Seasonable Remedies.—The following remedies for hydrophobia may be worth bearing in mind at the present time:

One remedy is as follows—Horse radish grated and mixed with a little vinegar and sweet oil to form a paste. Eat of this all that can be swallowed and kept on the stomach. Apply a poultice of the same to the wound. Repeat the eating and renew the poultice as often as necessary to keep up the stimulating effect of the horse radish until the spasms are relieved and the patient cured.

Another—Take immediately warm vinegar or tepid water, wash the wounded therewith, then dry it; then pour upon the wound a few drops of hydrochloric acid, because mineral acids destroy the poison of the saliva, by which means the latter is neutralized.

Another recipe is—Mix one pound of common salt in a quart of water, then bathe with and squeeze the wound with the same one hour, then bind a little more salt on the wound for twelve hours. The author of this recipe "was bitten six times by mad dogs, and always cured himself by the above mixture, and offers to suffer himself to be bitten by any mad dog in order to convince mankind that what he offered was a real truth, which numbers could testify."

WE should never go in the way of temptation for the purpose of trying the strength of our virtues. If Achan handles the golden wedge, his next work will be to steal it.

"THE WAR BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES."

WE have received a copy of the new book by ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, being "A Constitutional View of the late War between the States; its causes, character, conduct, and results. Presented in a series of colloquies at Liberty Hall." This book in reality forms Mr. Stephens' justification of himself for the part he saw fit to take in the war after having warmly fought secession at the start, and sets forth the South side view of the Constitution. It is not a detailed history of the events of the war, but a consideration of its causes, mode of conducting it, and its political results. Of course no man could more ably present the South side view of this question than Mr. Stephens, and hence the value of this book. It is written in the colloquial style, Mr. Stephens answering at length the interrogations of supposed and fictitious questioners and objectors. Published by "The National Publishing Company, Philadelphia, Pa." Sold only by subscription. Agents wanted.

Poetry.

"He Leadeth me Beside the Still Waters."

By the still waters lead me, for I thirst,
And my o'erheated brow I fain would lave;
And O permit me, Holy Shepherd, first
To see thy face reflected from the wave
Beside mine own, that so my soul may know
These are the sources whence all healings flow.

By the still waters lead me! I am faint
With my long journeying t rough the desert way,
And my white robes have caught an earthly taint
I fain would hide from the revealing day;
But thou, O Saviour! can these stains efface
In those pure waters where no taint hath place!

By the still waters lead me! I have trod
A way both dark and rough, with sorrows strewn;
And to my spirit's depth have felt the rod,
Nor failed to bless the hand no more unknown;
But now I faint and tire, and long to be
By the still waters, and at rest with thee.

By the still waters! But God's will be done!
I would not cast the burden He has laid
On heart and flesh, lest ere my race be run
I might forget whereon my hope is stayed.
Dear Saviour, guide, control me till I stand
By those still waters in thine own bright land.

The Little Sea Masons.

"And God said, Let the waters bring forth abundantly." Gen. i., 2.

Who can compute the myriad tons of earthly matter which the dews and rains and rivers are continually washing down from the face of the earth, and rolling onward into the sea? With the process of evaporation also continually going on, it requires some counteracting influence to prevent the waters from becoming, in time, as completely saturated with salt as those of the Dead Sea. The agent God has seen fit to employ is a very humble one, like most of the servants he commissions to do his mightiest works. It is not the great leviathans of the deep he has made the "conservators of the ocean," but the tiny worm, which scarcely possesses initself the power of locomotion. Yet to these most helpless of his creatures he has given the power and the instinct to absorb the mineral substances washed down from the earth, and to convert them into habitations for themselves. There is a peculiar force in that word "abundantly," as it is used in the Mosaic account of the creation. The waters of the sea so teem with little living things that they rear up bulwarks of stone, more massive than any workman's chisel ever fashioned. What are the foundations of a temple, or a ponderous pyramid, compared with the foundation of an island or a continent?

Another class of these little masons, down below, take up these salts with their tiny absorbents, and fashion them over into a form of rare beauty, or a lustrous gem, fitted up to grace the fairest brow in kingly courts.

There is still another set, so small that only the microscope can reveal them, which pervade each drop and bubble of foam on the crested wave. They, too, catch up the mineral atoms, and mould them into thin, tiny shields, living their little lives in their great cradle, which never ceases its swinging, and sinking down at last into the vast cemetery below, to help form, perhaps, new marl beds and white chalk hills for future ages. The deep sea soundings bring up these little shells, a thousand shoals of which seem only like an atom of clay. How wonderful the power that can look after such a company, noticing each tiny animalcule, and providing for it food and shelter until its momentary life is over! Oh, the height and depth of his greatness and his loving kindness! "Will he not much more care for you, O ye of little faith?"—Sunday School Times.

Self Government in Children.

A modern writer says:

"I know nothing more touching than the efforts of self-government of which little children are capable, when the best parts of their nature are grown vigorously under the light and warmth of parental love. How beautiful is the self control of the little creature who stifles his sobs of pain because his mother's pitying eye is upon him in tender sorrow! or that of the babe who abstains from play and sits quietly on the floor because somebody is ill. I have known a very young child slip over to the cold side of the bed on a winter's night that a grown sister might have a warm one. I have known a little girl submit spontaneously to hours of irksome restraint and disagreeable employment, merely because it was right. Such wills as these—so strong and yet so humble, so patient, and so dignified—were never impaired by fear, but flourished thus under the influence of love, with its sweet excitements and holy supports."

Slaughter in the Sea.

The life of all fishes is one of perpetual warfare, and the only law that pervades the great world of waters is that of the strongest, the swiftest, and most voracious. The carnage of the sea immeasurably exceeds even that which is permitted to perplex our reason on earth. We know, however, that without it the population of the sea would soon become so immense that, vast as it is, it would not suffice for its multitudinous inhabitants. Few fishes, probably, die of natural death, and some seem to have been created solely to devour others. There is probably none which does not feed on some other species or on its own.

Many of the monsters that roam the watery plains are provided with maws capable of engulfing thousands of their kind a day. A hogshead of herring have been taken out of the belly of a whale. A shark probably destroys tens of thousands in a year. Fifteen full-sized herrings have been found in the stomach of a cod.

Sea-birds are scarcely less destructive to fish than fish are to each other. The solan-goose can swallow and digest at least six full-sized herrings per day. It has been calculated that the Island of St. Kilda, assuming it to be inhabited by two hundred thousand of these birds, feeding for seven months in the year, and with an allowance of five herrings each per day, the number of fish for the summer subsistence of a single species of bird cannot be under two hundred and fourteen million. Compared with the enormous consumption of fish by birds, and each other, the draughts made upon the population of the sea by man, with all his ingenious fishing devices, seem to dwindle into absolute insignificance.—Edinburgh Review.

Springfield Camp Meeting.

This is a National gathering, coming as they do from the east, west, north, and some from the south. There are various shades of opinion among those who gather at the camp; but almost all agree in one important particular, viz.: the speedy personal revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ. This people having been gathered out of all denominations, some, also, from the various shades of infidelity to which they were driven by the God-dishonoring torment theory. When we remember this fact, we shall not be surprised to find them differing on minor points; but in view of the immediate revelation of the Judge of all the earth, we should expect them to differ in love. But, alas! such has not been the history of this people.

In 1842–'43, when the cry went forth, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him," as was to be expected, the most pious and devoted members of the churches were moved with this cry. Those who wished the church to remain on good terms with the world, and to prevent division, advised the suppression of the truth (meat in due season), and in its place, "give us your experience," "tell us how you feel." But the Lord had put this truth in his people; it was shut up like fire in their bones. Cry they must, and cry they did. The result was, they were driven out, and the churches closed against them.

Time, as usual, passed on, and our time past. The leaders of this people had worked themselves into comfortable positions, had established a mouthpiece, the Advent Herald, and began to organize after the example of Rome and her daughters, having made up their minds that the Lord might come when he got ready.

At this point there arose another cry—that of the non-immortality of man, and his unconsciousness in death. The old cry was raised again, "Let us alone; why do you bring that terrible doctrine among us to divide and break up our meeting?"—"tell us how you feel," forgetting that the churches had treated them in like manner; forgetting, also, that God's word was to shine more and more unto the perfect day; not thinking that the Advent net had drawn to shore of every kind, and now they must be sifted, "made white and tried." O, my God, what a trial has been going on for the last twenty-five years! The car of truth moved on; the sifting process also went on. Very many, because of persecution, turned back to the weak and beggarly elements of the world. The most pious and devoted embraced the doctrine of the mortality of man. And although they had abused and condemned the man who, under God, was the most instrumental in bringing out that blessed truth, yet now come forward and say, "God bless you, Br. Storrs; we are with you; we believe just what you preach." The would-be leaders and lords over God's heritage saw how the wind blew, so they went with the current and endeavored to control the people. And inasmuch as those who controlled the Advent Herald refused to go forward, it was found necessary to have another paper. Hence, the World's Crisis.

Things go on charmingly for a while, the leaders all find their level, work into comfortable situations, drive down their stakes, and organize the people around them. It was generally supposed that we had got all the light that was to be had, except, perhaps, the knowledge of definite time. But, no; the people were not sufficiently sifted; they could not all "lap water." Hence another trial—the third in the series, but the hardest of all. The young Christian may be tried with his inward fears—to-day on the mountain top, to-morrow in the slough of despond. But the old soldier of the cross, who is rooted and grounded in the truth, cannot be tried thus; he must be tried and sanctified through the truth. In this war, as in all others, there must be pioneers, sappers and miners, skirmishers thrown out to feel the enemy and clear the way for the advance of the grand army.

The third forward movement, or trial, was the doctrine of "No life out of Christ; or, the righteous only will live again." This has been a terrible trial to many of God's dear children; they have kicked at it, and abused those who advocated it. But, one after another, they (not the most excitable, but the most Godly) have embraced it, until one of the "wise men of the East," who had gone out West on a preaching tour, declared that "the people had become so tinctured with non-resurrection, they did not know who to trust." Just so, brother leaders; you would not take part in the second movement (that of the entire mortality of man) until the hard work had been accomplished by those whom you abused, and the doctrine had become popular among Adventists; then you could see it, and with great protestations of holiness and love for the truth, you assumed control of this movement, and went about to put a yoke upon this people which neither we nor our fathers could bear. You have organized them into churches, causing them to "become" (according to the light of J. V. H., in 1843–'44) "the youngest daughter of the Mother of harlots." In the early part of this third movement, or trial, we well remember the contempt with which you treated this doctrine (of life only in Christ), as well as those who advocated it. The World's Crisis acted the part of the Advent Herald in the previous movement, viz.: "the dog in the manger." If we entered a meeting and spoke of this glorious truth, the leaders would cry out, "Death in the pot," "Why bring that doctrine in here to disturb our harmony?" "Tell us how you feel"—as if the Apostles could have turned the world and church upside down by simply telling how they felt. But times have changed. Coming events cast their shadows before. We should not be surprised to see some of those men "outherod Herod," and attempt to control this movement also. What the next great truth (it will shine more and more) will be that you will be found fighting against, and attempting to crucify, God only knows.

Affliction—Comfort.

One after another the weeks go by, and my pen lies untouched. Not by any means for the reason that I am ignorant or indifferent to the fact that it is a time when the friends of truth should be awake, active and earnest in their endeavors to encourage one another, and by every means available to impart to others a knowledge of those great and glorious truths which, if rightly believed, will prove the salvation of those who receive them. But a great sorrow, with its dark, heavy wings, is brooding over us. It is an hour of deep affliction. Our brightest earthly hopes have been blighted, and one on whom we leaned, perhaps too much, has been taken from us, and only those who have tasted of the same cup know how bitter it is.

Death, our common foe, and ever insatiate, has chosen for his victim our only and beloved daughter, and to-day she, who so long has been our comfort and blessing, and the companion of our later years, in whom we could repose our every thought, and on whose sympathy and help we could ever rely, is sleeping in his cold embrace. She, who has made the music and sunshine of our home, is gone. On every hand, whichever way we turn, there is something to remind us of the loved one, but she is not here. In vain we search for her, and call her name; she comes no more. In vain we listen for the familiar step and voice; they are heard no more. There is no one to fill her place.

What wonder, that after long months of care and anxiety, the poor, frail, over-taxed system should give way, and both body and mind become unfitted for any duty or effort. Surely I can say, "unless the Lord had been my help, my soul had almost dwelt in silence." But, verily, the Lord hath heard my supplication in the hour of my distress, and hath remembered his promise, and I have not been left comfortless. How glad I am that ere this great affliction came upon our family, we saw the light on the plan of redemption through our precious Life-giver, and have such a blessed hope to sustain us in our sorrow. Believing "that Jesus died and rose again," we are fully persuaded that those who "sleep in Jesus, will God bring with Him." Our hearts are comforted with this expectation.

Notwithstanding there is so much of sadness connected with the thought of one's being cut down in the morning of life, all their bright hopes of happiness withered, the giving up of friends and loved ones, and closing their eyes upon every earthly scene for ever, yet in the case of our loved child there is very much to console us.

During all her long trial of suffering, she was ever patient, cheerful and hopeful, sustained by the strong arm on which she leaned for support, and which never failed her. She naturally clung to life with much tenacity, and she had much to live for and to make life desirable, yet she was enabled to say, "all these disappointments and trials and suffering have been needful and have worked for my good." There is very much that is pleasant to reflect upon connected with the last months of her life. Precious interviews and seasons of communion and prayer, free interchange of thought (and how much I miss them now) so many manifestations of the divine presence to her, enabling her to rejoice in the strong hope and assurance of her acceptance with God and final salvation, when He, who is the life of the believer, shall appear to wake the sleeping ones, and change the living, crowning them with eternal life and rest in his kingdom. For these we are thankful and feel to praise the Lord.

It is also a source of comfort to those who remain, to know that all the means that human wisdom and love could devise, were used for her recovery and benefit, but they could not save. As all earthly helpers failed, the dear child turned more fully to Him who hath said, "I will never leave or forsake thee;" and when the last struggle came, and it came suddenly, after all, yet she—who had so shrunk from death, and who, from the fear of it, had been all her lifetime in bondage—could look the grim enemy in the face calmly and without a fear, saying, "if my Father will only hold me in his arms all will be well;" and He did not forsake. When she saw that the hand of death was really upon her, she gave us her last messages of love, thanking us for our care, assuring us that the Saviour was with her, that her trust was alone in Him, then gave herself into His hands.

But the conflict was long and hard. That night of trial can never be forgotten. All through its long hours loved ones waited and watched around her dying bed, but none could help or save. Alone she must meet the foe; and, O, how like an enemy in all his hatefulness did death appear. It was an unequal contest, and the weaker fell. As the day began to dawn—on the morning of the Lord's day, May 31st—the poor weary child breathed her last and was at rest.

Most wonderfully were we sustained and comforted through the days that followed, so that to the many who came to look upon the face of the pale sleeper, we could not refrain from testifying to the power of God's love and grace manifested to our child and to ourselves, and recommending the same precious hope that sustained us to others who needed its comfort.

On Tuesday afternoon the funeral services were held in the Baptist church, which was kindly opened for us, and was filled with interested listeners. At our daughter's request, Br. Rufus Wendell preached from 1 Thess. iv., 13–18. The Lord helped, and never did the truth shine with brighter lustre, or our hope look more blessed. Very many heard for the first time, and some, probably, who could never have been induced, on any occasion, to have listened to the like. May the truth by this means reach some hearts, and thus God be glorified in the death of our child. Br. W. S. Campbell assisted on the occasion, and the Baptist minister also took part. We laid away our daughter to rest for a little while in our pleasant cemetery, and not far from our dwelling, and we think of her there as in safe keeping, with naught to disturb or break her calm repose. But when the morning dawns, her waking will be a glorious one, and her hour of triumph will have come. Over death—the conquered—will a shout go up, "O, death, where is thy sting, O, grave, where is thy victory! Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ." May that bright day speedily dawn, ever prayeth my longing heart.

Praise the Good Lord.

I feel salvation sweetly flows to my unworthy heart in Jesus' worthy name. Dear pilgrims: Cheer; the land is nearing. We soon shall reach the harbor and the shore. Nothing can harm us while the love of Christ rules within. O thank the good Lord forever and evermore for the power of an endless life, which keeps us from the evils of the present age, and it looks this vain world out of sight, and we long to go and be at home with Jesus and angels, my kindred so dear. O glorious home, and what heavenly society we shall share in our new home, paradise. O thank the good Lord for the foretaste and earnest of the Spirit which cheers, comforts, and leads into all truth, and shows us things to come. Thus we foresee the evil coming and hide ourselves by faith in Jesus' worthy name. Truly he is the way, the truth, and the life; and our only Saviour and deliverer, who mediates for us daily in every sorrow, trial, and conflict; and presents our songs, and our complaints; and we are reconciled to God, with the Spirit and word of reconciliation committed to us, through Christ our only righteousness and life. It is truly life; and life more abundantly; even life eternal in glory, with fulness of joy and pleasures forevermore. O thank the good Lord for such a hope, which is truly a blessed hope, big with immortality and eternal life; just like an anchor to the soul, sure and steadfast: like an anchor, which holds us secure and calm amid the raging billows. With Christ in the vessel we'll smile at the storm. Peace be with you all in the Lord, in Jesus' worthy name. A sister in the gospel hope and love. L. W. Bragg.

Northport, Me., July, 1868.

P. S. The following is a private letter; but the deep truths it contains I would like to have go before the readers of the Herald of Life. L. W. B.

Dear Sister Bragg: Through the infinite goodness of God the Father, and Jesus the Anointed, I am still alive, hoping that I shall ere long learn the whole story of the Cross of Christ. O, dear sister, I have no good story of myself to tell you, and if I thought I had you would not wish to hear it; for you have learned that "all flesh is as grass, and the glory of man as the flower of the grass; the grass withereth, and the flower thereof falleth away." There is no good thing that can be said of it, that is, when compared with its opposite, the Word of God, or Jesus, the second Adam; the real production and offspring of God, the extract or essence of his own being: the Holy Spirit sent down with power.

Flesh, or human nature, in its best condition, has its glory; but 'tis as the flower of grass; it is good (of its kind), for God made it and pronounced it so; but it is of the earth earthy; too weak to withstand evil, and, therefore, Esau must be supplanted by Jacob. Ishmael cannot be heir with the Son of promise; for in Isaac shall thy seed be called. Yet God blessed Ishmael; for of him were nations to be born; but his glory was but the glory of the terrestrial—what the flesh could obtain unto. Esau also was blessed of Isaac; but his blessing only pertained to this life, the glory of which is unenduring.

We (I speak of the flesh, or human nature, the earthy man), by being born or produced first, had or possessed the birthright; but, unassisted by God, our weakness is such we could not, neither can we now, withstand evil; therefore, we sold our birthright—it is gone. Shall I say gone forever, gone eternally? Yes; I can come to no other conclusion. Did Esau get his birthright back again? Paul says he did not, though he sought it carefully with tears. Did Jesus buy back the right for poor, weak human nature to live again? No, he did not. So, dear sister, I conclude that, in order that we live again, we must be made new creatures in Christ Jesus. The old man must die on the cross. O this story of the cross is real; it takes off every member, sinew, and nerve of the old man. O I am glad I see this light; it is so good. I see plainly that all we are by nature is to pass away, because of its unfitness to live. Yet it goes self-convicted. O the wisdom and justice of the Author of all created things. I do feel reconciled to the death of human nature; yes, even if Life and immortality had not been brought to light through the Gospel; because I do see the justice and wisdom of God in the trial and condemnation.

Thus far, dear sister, I feel that God has shown me; and I do feel blessed; I do thank Him. But, dear Sister Bragg, I want to feel the power of His resurrection; I want to feel the power of an endless Life (His Life). I am satisfied that there is a power in the Spirit of God that, experimentally, I am not acquainted with. I am satisfied of this from the Word of God and by slight quickenings that I have experienced. I am satisfied the church of God—the Bride—will stand in that power when Jesus comes: all else is Laodicea. I think, also, that the Church is already coming up; here and there one being fitted up for translation.

Dear sister, no doubt you pray for me. Well, do pray that the love of my life may be taken out of me, and that I may never seek to save it; for if any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him. How plainly I see this; it is either the one thing or the other. The heart cannot be set on two opposites at the same time. God grant we may seek the Lord with all the heart.

Newport Centre, Vt., August, 1868.

Br. Storrs: In answer to the question, Shall the Herald of Life live? Yes, it must live. How can we do without it? It is all the preaching many of us have, and its weekly visit is looked for with joy; for it always comes freighted with the good things from the Master's store-house, the Bible. O, how many times I have found the very thing needed; the explanation of some passage particularly needed at that time. Yes, and it is increasing in interest, and it shall have all the support I can give it. I have two new subscribers for Vol. 6 pledged, and hope to get many more. I shall do all I can to sustain the paper, for I do not want to part with it.

O how I love to talk and think of the blessed Jesus; yet some say I do not believe the Bible because I do not believe that Christ was God. I tell them Christ died. They say, They say, Christ's body died. So their Christ did not die: their Christ was not buried, and he is not raised from the dead; so according to Paul's teaching they are yet in their sins. 1 Cor. xv., 17.

I hold to one baptism, that of the Holy Spirit. By the one Spirit. "For, by one Spirit, are we all baptized into one body." 1 Cor. xii., 13. "Now, the Lord is that Spirit." 2 Cor. iii., 17. Now, if we have been baptized by the one Spirit, and the Lord is that Spirit, are we not in Christ? "for as many as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ;" hence they are in Christ: but if going into the water is putting on Christ, coming out is putting him off; hence, they are not in him. For "if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection." Rom. vi., 5. Did Christ die in the water? No. Then why go there to plant? What likeness has it to his death?

Christ died upon the cross, a death of suffering. Paul said he was crucified with him: I die daily; I suffer the loss of all things. This looks more like dying with him, or being planted with him; for if we have been made partakers of his sufferings, we shall be also of his resurrection. But I must not intrude too far in your columns. I am glad I have found the difference between being in Christ (which makes us free), and being in the traditions of men; for we are complete in him. I glory in the Lord, and want no more. To him be all the glory. Your brother in Christ.

Decorah, Iowa, July, 1868.

Br. Storrs: As I have obtained another subscriber for the Herald, I will write a few lines for the benefit of all. Life only in Christ, and forgiveness of sins through His precious blood alone, is on the increase in this section of the country. But there is much opposition to these glorious truths; and the bitterest is among those professing to be Adventists. Persecution and contumely from such are like the cuts of Cæsar from his friends, the unkindest cuts of all. But we glory in tribulation, knowing that all things work together for good to them that love God. There was a sermon preached here last Sunday to prove that the wicked dead would all be raised to life to suffer a second death; and there was no way to get into Christ only through water baptism. He worked hard to make out his case. One of the brethren said, it put him in mind of the story of the man that set the hen on a hundred eggs. Said he, you ought to see her spread herself.

The love of pleasure betrays us into pain; and many a man, through love of fame becomes infamous.

BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail, the postage has to be pre-paid.

Six Sermons on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent Immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, The Righteous only will live again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post. D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

This work has been out of print for some months, but is now re-printed.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the true teachings of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage, 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.

No. 1. Earth, not heaven, is to be the inheritance of the saints. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 4. The Soul Saved or Lost. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

THE ESSENTIAL LIFE.

BY THOMAS C. UPHAM, D. D.

ON THE POWER OF THE LIFE.

1. MANY are the passages in the Bible which speak of power. Christ on a certain occasion, addressing those who were around him, asserted that some of them should not taste of death till they had seen the "kingdom of God come with power." Mark, ix., 1. It is said of the martyr Stephen, that "full of faith and power, he did great wonders and miracles among the people." Christ was "declared to be the Son of God with power." Rom. i., 4. The scriptures speak expressly of those who have "the form of godliness, but deny the power" of it. It was affirmed under circumstances which made the affirmation applicable to the early Christians generally, "God hath not given us the spirit of fear, but of power and of love, and of a sound mind." 2 Tim. i., 7. A certain philosopher of modern times, who is known also as a popular historian, has taken the gronnd that there is no such thing as power; and that the idea of power is an illusion. But the scriptures evidently take a different view. They recognize the reality of power, and make much account of it. And hoping to be allowed a remark here, which, on account of its source, may not seem to be of much consequence, I wish to say I have read many books of philosophy, having relation to man's interior nature, but have never found in any one of them, or in all of them put together, so much profound and deep philosophical insight as I have found in the Bible.

2. Power is not an illusion, whatever human philosophy may say about it, either in the theory itself or in the idea which mentally represents it; but is a great reality. And yet it must be admitted that neither in the one nor the other, neither in the thing nor in the intuitional conception of it, is it susceptible of verbal analysis and definition. But while admitting our inability to analyze and define a reality so interior in its nature, and in many respects so mysterious, we can yet so approach it in its manifestations and attributes as to say something which will aid us in whatever we have further to remark. There are two things, at least, which may be said of power in its highest and primal manifestations, because they can be said of the principle of life to which it attaches. First, like the life, it is universal, being excluded from no object and no place; and second, in its appropriate sphere it is supreme, being paramount to all other forces. The power which attaches to the life is not only without beginning and end, but transcends any limitations which might attempt to bind it to particular times and places. It is not the same with the life, and is not to be confounded with it; and yet is inseparable from it. Where the life goes, power goes; where the life lives, power lives. If the principle of life is universal, the presence of a real and substantive power is universal also. And it is supreme as well as universal, inasmuch as it admits, in its appropriate sphere, no arm of strength which is above itself. The statement carries its evidence in itself. There is, and must be, somewhere, a form of power which is paramount to every other; a power which, in the conflict of forces, must ultimately decide. Without this there would be universal discordancy—conflicts without end. A view the more entitled to acceptance, when we remember that love and life are identical; and whatever may be thought or said to the contrary in the utterances of worldly wisdom, the power of love, if there is truth in the divine philosophy of Jesus, will sooner or later show its supremacy over every other manifestation of power. To think otherwise would be to accept the unsatisfactory position that good is the servant of evil, and that Satan is stronger than Christ.

3. But our principal object now is the consideration of the power of the life, not in its philosophy, but in its practical results; not in its highest and primal manifestations, which in some degree transcend human insight, but in its subordinate manifestations, and particularly as it is incarnated and manifested in men. And one remark which we wish to make here is, that the methods in which it manifests itself are very various. A single illustration here. In the case of the Christian orator, for instance, it will sometimes, under the inspiration of essential life, speak in terms of rich and glowing eloquence, matching, and more than matching, the standards of the world's great masters; but not less frequently its words are few and simple; perhaps an apothegm or a parable, but coming from the well-spring of the life, they touch the hearts of the people and open the fountains of living salvation. And what is remarkable, it is sometimes the case that the absolute silence of the man of God will have more effect than the noisy declamation of the man who is without God. Power goes out of him as it went out of Jesus. If it speaks in the mighty words of Paul and Apollos, it speaks also in the silence of the loving John, when he leans his head on a brother's bosom. What more effective and touching eloquence than that of the Son of Man, when, in the midst of a stormy and cruel tribunal, he "uttered not a word;" and the Roman governor, struck with this sublime disregard of the precedents of a worldly life, "marvelled greatly." And there are some specific modifications of the great variety of its forms which are worthy of notice. One of the most remarkable things pertaining to the power of the life is, that it manifests itself often, not by the antagonism of the same forces, as when we meet evil with evil and return blow for blow, as when sword clashes with sword and cannon rebounds to cannon; but conquers the violence that attacks it by the resistance and antagonism of what is found in the opposite. The stormy cloud is melted by the sunbeam; the lion is tamed and led captive by the lamb; and the little child plays, with its life and beauty unharmed, on the cockatrice's den. In all this there is a deep philosophy, which transcends the conceptions of a heart that knows no higher school than that of a self-hood which excludes the living God.

4. And now we will say further, coming more within the practical sphere of the subject, that the power of the life, that form of power which pierces and breaks the stony hearts of men, and is blessed of God in the great matter of renovating and purifying their perverted natures, is not found greatly, if at all, in mere intellectualism. Many facts are a confirmation of this. There are preachers who have eminently the gifts of perception and reasoning, but have but little influence with the masses. Even if at certain times their reasonings harmonize with the truth, they produce, and can produce, but little effect, so long as the soul, from which they come, is felt by the hearers to contradict in experience what their reasonings affirm and try to prove as a principle. Again, the element of vitalizing power is not found in every form of mere emotionality; we refer particularly to what may be called æsthetic emotionality. There are preachers, and other professedly religious teachers, who add to intellectual powers a cultivated taste, and adorn their reasoning with the arts of rhetoric. Their sermons, considered as the exercises of intellect or the imagination, enlist the curiosity of men and please their fancy, but have but little living power. There was a German preacher of the fourteenth century—we refer to the justly-celebrated John Tauler, of Cologne—who stood unmatched in learning and in intellectual and æsthetic eloquence, but he had but little power and influence, at least in a way which satisfied his conviction of what ought to be the result, until he was led into the way of truth and life by a poor, uncultured man of the people, whom, as one of the weak and despised things of the world, God had chosen and made the instrument of this mighty influence. Men, as a general thing, attend places of worship with the view and in the hope to hear words which, coming from a source of life, shall be found to possess and impart life, in order that their own souls may live. And if they are disappointed in these reasonable expectations, they soon leave their teachers; and thus it happens that many places which were once filled with devout worshippers, are now empty.

5. A distinguished American preacher, lately returned from Europe, has given an account of what he saw and heard. He gives us to understand in his work, entitled "Impressions of Europe," that the science and philosophy, the intelligence and the political tendencies, of the people of Germany, are all leaning against evangelicism, as maintained in the Protestant Church. He makes the painful statement that the universities, as a rule, are favoring the secular and non-religious view and feeling, and after referring to a report that one of the most venerable and popular of the professors had openly boasted of his atheism, and that few scholarly men, not tied to official necessities, have the courage to treat miracles with the least respect, and some other things looking in the same direction, he inquires: "Is it possible for Christianity as an institution or a religion to survive the prevalence of opinions so radically destructive as this?" This is a question so serious in its import that it is worthy of a thoughtful and serious answer. The contest undoubtedly is great, and the aspect of the sky is stormy. Nevertheless, we cannot hesitate in taking our position with those who think that the long strife of the ages can possibly have but one issue; and that the resources of victory are to be found in the power which is lodged in the principle of life. Conceding that the efforts of unsanctified intellectualism can do nothing against these arrayed and united hostilities, there still remain the reserved and mighty forces of the Holy Ghost. The few unlearned men who went forth from Jerusalem in the beginning of the Christian era, were not allowed to go until they were endued with power from on high. They were commanded by Christ "that they should not depart from Jerusalem, but wait for the promise of the Father," which was understood in its fulfilment to be the baptism of the Holy Spirit. And then it was added: "Ye shall receive power after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you." Endowed with this great gift, this small band of early laborers and martyrs, without the prestige of position or scholarship, went forth to the mighty work which was appointed them, and though the strife was long, and in many cases crowned with great suffering and death, they were found more than a match for the proud philosophies, the arts, and the institutions of that trying time. Let it not be said here that circumstances are different, and that the power of Christianity is diminished. That power is the same now that it was then; that divine power is now as it always has been—the reserved force and inspiration of the world's progress and salvation; but it lies hidden in the life. The life is God in the soul, and the power of God always goes with it. And, though there are other forms and manifestations of power, such as spring from selfish interests and inordinate passion, and such as are the breath of life in satanic inspirations, they are all under condemnation; and, notwithstanding their arts of cunning and their sometimes temporary ascendancy, they have no destiny and no future before them but to be swept away, like the chaff of the summer threshing floor, before the power of the living God.—The Advance.

GOD'S REMEMBRANCE.

THE sorest times of trial to faith are those in which God seems to forget. And they are not unfrequent times, nor are they always brief. From the days of Cain to the days of Noah, while man utterly corrupted his way on earth, while more than a thousand years of lust and violence rolled by, the just God seemed to forget. A hundred years passed on, unchanged, after definite warning of his purpose to punish. And when at last the deluge rolled over a guilty world, and a solitary ark floated upon the boundless waters, it must have seemed to the desolate inmates, after their five months' experience of the elemental commotion, during which they probably had no sensible manifestation of Deity, as if they, too, were forgotten. How great a suspense was that, when the existence of the race, the history of the Church and of Redemption, and the Covenant faithfulness of God, hung upon the fate of that ark, swayed to and fro with its tossings on those restless tides! How full of meaning is the sacred declaration: And God remembered Noah! How memorable that act of deliverance of which the bow in the cloud is the appropriate sign!

Truly did God seem to forget his promise to Abraham and his seed, of possession of the land of Canaan, while the great progenitor and three generations of his children were only pilgrims and strangers in the land, and while their descendants groaned, for centuries, under the taskmasters' whip of the Pharoahs, until all vestige of hope and of nationality seemed obliterated from their crushed natures. So God seemed to have forgotten his servant David, while the heir of the throne of Israel wandered a fugitive in the limestone caves of the wilderness of Engedi, in danger of falling every day into the hands of Saul. "Why standest thou afar off, O God?" he cries, in almost hopeless agony of spirit.

But what were all these instances of seeming forgetfulness compared with that when he seemed to have forsaken his only-begotten Son; when he suffered him, amid convulsions of nature, and outcries of anguish and amazement, to sink in the embrace of death, to be sealed up in a tomb? What gloom was that which for three days wrapped our world! No wonder the Apostles were confounded and demoralized. A world with a DEAD CHRIST—is not that a forsaken world? Might not God with reason be supposed to have forgotten it? Carrying such a burden on its bosom, it might well be supposed to have sunk altogether out of the line of God's beneficent purposes, and even out of his providential regard. But, as we well know, there was no forgetting, as there never is, on the part of God. In due season, the proof of remembrance came. The Dead Christ was raised. Hope returned to the hearts of the Apostles. The Church was filled with life, with miraculous energy, with the Holy Spirit. The world is a redeemed, not a forgotten world.

God has remembered his true Church when nearly crushed by persecutors. He brought it out of the Catacombs, where it seemed to be forgotten, and placed it on the throne of the Cæsars. He brought it from the cloisters and hidden places of the middle ages to the open day of the Reformation and the leadership of modern civilization; from its refuges in "Alpine Mountains Cold," to be the teacher and Evangelizer of the descendants of her bitterest and bloodiest persecutors, the Reformer of the territories of the Pope himself.

With our own eyes, in our own land, we have seen one of the most signal instances of God's remembrance in human history. In our day, the centuries of his strange seeming forgetfulness of the enslaved African race in our country came to a sudden, surprising end. When he seemed most completely to have forgotten; when the oppressor seemed about to widen vastly the arena, and to lengthen and strengthen the lease, of his power; when morality, Christianity, and free government itself seemed about to combine, perversely and corruptly to vindicate and sustain the outrage; then God remembered. And all the delayed judgment of centuries was summed up in that quadrennium of remembrance.

Have faith in God, though he seems to forget. Let the story of the past throw light upon the present and the future. History, both sacred and profane, is written to show us that God remembers. Let us bear up hopefully, under contrary appearances. We and our whole generation may die, while God seems still to be forgetting. Thousands of soldiers of the good cause fall, while the issue of the conflict is uncertain. We may be shut up in a dark and tempest-tossed ark; the storm may rage without abatement, the waters may swell and rise, until every vestige of our past hopes and dependences is swept away. Let us believe in the God who remembered Noah at last. When our hearts fail us, let us turn to the bow of promise, set in the cloud, upon the skirts of the retreating storm, token of God's covenant of mercy with man and the earth for perpetual generations. "As it lights up the dark ground that just before was discharging itself in flashes of lightning, it gives us an idea of the victory of God's love over the black and fiery wrath, originating as it does from the effects of the sun upon the sable vault, it represents to the senses the readiness of the heavenly light to penetrate the earthly obscurity; spanned between heaven and earth, it announces peace between God and man; arching the horizon, it proclaims the all-embracing universality of the covenant of grace."

THE POPE'S LAST DELIVERANCE.

THE problem of the Roman Church in its relation to American institutions is considerably complicated by its relations to the institutions of the Old World. The problem of becoming "all things to all men" is not so simple to the Pope as it was to the Apostle, mainly because the two policies are not founded in a like clearness of sincerity and honesty of purpose.

Father Hecker, of New York, has been informing our Western people that Romanism is the only religion consistent with our free institutions; that our system of government presupposes a natural goodness and wisdom in men, which the Protestant doctrine of Total Depravity denies. Pius IX., poor man, is too much involved with the political concerns of Europe to pay due heed to the necessities of the work in America, and so mercilessly contradicts Father Hecker. The Eldest Son of the Church—the Austrian Hapsburg—has found that he cannot continue to be both a foremost European monarch and an obedient Son of the Church. He has given his imperial assent to a series of laws which approximate Austrian institutions in some degree to those of America. Liberty is there, as with us, granted to hold and teach any religious opinion, and to establish colleges and schools and periodicals for its propagation. Civil marriage is to be valid; the national cemeteries are to be open to heretics as well as Catholics; the children of mixed marriages are to be brought up—the girls in the faith of their mother and the boys in that of their father; the control of public education is to be taken out of the hands of the priests and conducted under the supervision of the State.

These Americanizing laws, the Pope has the candor to tell us, in a recent allocution, are "odious" and "abominable"—"in flagrant contradiction of the doctrines of the Catholic religion" and "of natural right itself." Had his Holiness stopped here it might have been thought a mere matter of difference of religious opinion, with which the political world had nothing to do. But no; this petty civil ruler, who, since the battle of Mentana, has been the pupil and the vassal of Napoleon III., proceeds to "declare those decrees null and powerless in their effect, both as regards the present and the future," and exhorts their authors "not to forget the censures and spiritual punishments" which may fall on them if contumacious. To which Baron von Beust, the Protestant Premier of Austria, responds that his Holiness is an officious meddler and a busybody in other men's matters.

If we needed any evidence that Rome had not changed in her fundamental principles, and that the liberalizing talk of American Romanists like Hecker is utter falsehood, this document furnishes that evidence. Our national laws differ from those of Austria simply in that they are more "odious" and "abominable;" our marriages are, in the view of his Holiness, mere concubinages; our school system an offence to God and man; our toleration of all opinions a wicked disregard of, and indifference to, the truth. It is true that Rome has not had the candor to make the application to ourselves; but place and distance can make no difference as to truth and principle. Rome has told us what we are to expect if the Roman Catholic Church should ever obtain such a preponderance as to control the legislation of America.

The revolt of Austria completes the work of the German Reformation as such, and divides Europe into three great religious territories, corresponding to the three great waves of immigration by which that continent was settled millenniums ago. The Church of Rome is the Church of the Latin race, which has inherited the language, the centralizing policy, and the ecclesiastical traditionalism of the Roman empire. The Protestant Church is the Church of the Teutonic race, of the champions of individual liberty, the family life, and Bible truth. The Greek Church is that of the half-civilized Slavonic race, whose achievements and influence in the world's history are among the possibilities of the future. No one of these, it is manifest, can claim to be geographically the Catholic Church, which is received semper, ubique et ab omnibus.—Am. Presbyterian.

THE VOICE OF THE CHURCH ON ANTICHRIST.

The Apocalypse and St. Paul's prophecy of the Man of sin—by Prebendary Armstrong, is the title of a work recently published in Dublin, Ireland. The book itself we have not seen, but in a literary notice of it which appears in The Rock it is spoken of as "a learned and carefully written treatise." The reviewer says, "Our author's method of dealing with and interpreting the Greek text is especially good and scholarly, and cannot fail to recommend itself to the readers of the original Greek." The following extract is not only indicative of his position respecting the man of sin, but shows what has been the prevalent view for centuries: [Ad. Her.]

For nearly nine hundred years eminent men in every century have openly maintained that the Pope is Antichrist. Arnulph (Milner, Hist. of the Church of Christ, 468, cent. x., and Ussher, De Successione), the President of the Council of Rheims, asserted that the Pope is Antichrist. "What think you, reverend fathers, of this man, the Pope, placed on a lofty throne shining in purple and gold? Whom do you account him? If destitute of love, and puffed up with the pride of knowledge only, he is Antichrist, sitting in the temple of God." Berenger, a man of principal note in the eleventh century, went so far as to call the Church of Rome the seat of Satan; which (says Hurd, Sermon 7, "on Prophecy," p. 166) is but another Apocalyptic name of Antichrist. Many publicly and privately called Gregory VII. Antichrist, and said that Antichrist sits in Babylon.

Fluentius, bishop of Florence, taught publicly (A. D. 1105) that Antichrist was born and come into the world (Milner, Hist. of the Church of Christ, 528). St. Bernard says that the beast of the Apocalypse, who has a mouth speaking great blasphemies, and makes war with the saints, is in the chair of Peter. "Bestia illa de Apocalypsi, cui datum est os loquens blasphemias, et bellum gerere cum sanctis, PETRI CATHEDRAM OCCUPAT, tanquam leo paratus ad prædam," Ep. c., 25: "which was in other words to call the Pope Antichrist." (Hurd). Bernard, of Clugny, plainly referring to the Apocalypse, c. 17, calls the Pope, rex Babylonis, King of Babylon. In the Noble Lesson of the Waldenses, the Pope is Antichrist. Antichrist, it says, "has some decent qualities, such as an external profession of Christianity, tradition, and catalogues of episcopal succession, lying wonders, external sanctity" (Milner p. 546). The Albigenses also maintained that the Pope was Antichrist (Ussher, De Successione.) Amalric, professor of logic and theology, at the end of the twelfth century . . . put forth the idea that the Pope is Antichrist. (Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, vol. 3, 71.) The Abbot Joachim (A. D. 1200), is remarkable . . . . for the scarcely-disguised identification of Babylon with Papal Rome, and Antichrist with some universal pontiff (Ib. Art. Rev.) All the great English schoolmen (Coleridge, Table Talk), Scotus, Erigena, Duns Scotus, Ockham, and others, those morning stars of the Reformation, were heart and soul opposed to Rome, and maintained the papacy to be Antichrist. Grostete, Bishop of Lincoln, as M. Paris informs (1253), maintained that the Pope is Antichrist. Dante and Petrarch understood the Apocalyptic Babylon as the beast of Papal Rome. Wickliffe thought the Pope Antichrist. Lord Cobham was committed to the flames for nothing so much as for asserting "that the Pope was Antichrist." (B. Hurd, Sermon 7., "on Prophecy"). That the Pope was Antichrist (B. Newton on the Prophecies, p. 427), was, indeed, the general doctrine of the first Reformers everywhere; and was learnedly established by that great and able champion of the Reformation, Bishop Jewel. The authority of the fathers is urged, inconsiderately, and without a shadow of reason, to prove that the man of sin is a single individual; for their opinions were various and conflicting, and often absurd. Some said he would be Nero restored to life; some that he would be a Jew of the tribe of Dan; some that he would be a multitude. And Priamasius thought he would be the Church. "Quod ipse sit Ecclesia." (Bib. Patrum, v. x.)

THE EDGE OF THE CATARACT.

MANY years since a steamboat was accustomed to make daily trips between Buffalo and Niagara Falls. The nearest point at which she could approach the mighty cataract was Chippewa Creek, about ten miles distant on the Canada side. One day there was a pleasure excursion, and several hundred men, women and children went down from Buffalo.

After spending the day in all sorts of amusements, in looking upon the Falls, admiring the rainbow, passing under table rock and behind the falling water, they gathered themselves on board the boat toward night, to return to their homes. By some miscalculation of the engineer, sufficient steam had not been generated, and when, after passing out of the Creek, the boat met the strong rapid current of the river, instead of going forward, she was slowly borne backward toward the dreadful cataract.

The people on board, as may well be imagined, became instantly alarmed. The color fled from their cheeks; they stood in speechless horror; the roar of the cataract sounded fearfully distinct in their ears, as slowly, slowly they were still borne back toward it.

At length the engineer bethought him of the oil with which he lubricated the machinery. He threw it into the furnace—the flames blazed up intensely—steam was generated more rapidly—the wheel moved around with increased velocity—there was a pause as the Titan forces were contending for the mastery. A moment more, and there was an upward movement.

Now slowly, slowly the boat made way against the current. In a short time the point of the danger was passed; and a long, heavy sigh of relief broke from the bosom of every one on board.

A venerable, gray haired man was there among them. He lifted his hat and said, in a voice trembling with emotion:

"The Lord hath delivered us. Great is the name of the Lord. Let us pray."

And down upon the deck kneeled the multitude, while the heartfelt offering of thanksgiving went up to God, who had wrought for them so great a salvation. But it did not end here. The feeling that had been awakened by the near approach of death did not, with all, pass away when the danger was over, as is very often the case. Even there on the brink of that awful precipice, many found their Saviour. A revival followed in the church to which many of them belonged (it was a Sunday school excursion, and many found peace in believing. One, a man of great wealth dedicated much of it to God in the building of a church, as a memorial of his gratitude for being snatched from destruction, both in this life and the life to come.

It is thus that the gate of an endless life seems hard by the gate of a hopeless death. God shows the heedless sinner how awfully near he is to utter and hopeless ruin: he trembles at the thought, and is made alive to his perilous condition; a season of dread prevails in his mind; he is led to call on God for help; he discovers Christ as the only Pilot who can save him from the awful cataract of destruction that lies before him. He cries out, like a sinking Peter, "Lord save or I perish." He is led to see the value of the LIFE-GIVER. Christ undertakes his case, and the trembling soul finds safety and peace; a song of praise arises to his deliverer. He is very likely to labor to induce others to seek the same strong arm to snatch them from the roaring cataract of death.

SORROW SOURED OR SWEETENED.

WHEN the hour of sorrow comes, if there is not already in the heart something of a holy drawing toward God, then awakens defiance instead of humility, blasphemy in the place of prayer. "If thou wilt not as I will," cries the perverse man, "then I will not as thou wilt," and gives God the go-by in his soul. Only where the love of God dwells in the soul, even without a clear consciousness of it, can sorrow lead to God. Have you seen the flowers that, in a close cellar, turn their heads toward the side where the sun appears? So the heart of man is in the night of sorrow when there is a trace of God living within. Through all the night of bitterness it seeks for the crevice through which the eternal light shall fall into the darkness, and seeks and drinks, and grows even more thirsty. Only in such hearts, in the silent night of sorrow, does prayer begin to tone forth; only in such hearts is that prayer reached which pours itself out, as the apostle says, in groanings that cannot be uttered.—Thorluck.

The Two Positions.

One is that man by natural generation is dual, composed of body and soul, and this soul or spirit, as it is termed, is immortal, and and will exist as long as God. And a great portion of the Protestant world claim that this soul or spirit is a part of God; and it is the thinking and intelligent part of man, and is what enjoys or suffers. Now if this so, and future torment is true, then God must punish a part of himself throughout all eternity.

Another class believing the same position, claim that the soul or spirit will be punished according to the deeds done in the body, and then be restored. This class claim that the Bible must be interpreted in accordance with the first set premises. They say, that when any punishment is inflicted, it must be for the good of the offender, and as a general thing all punishment is temporal. Now there is no use in the world of having any controversy with either one of the above classes, on any question in the Bible unless we first settle the premises. For if their position is true, then the Bible must be interpreted in accordance with their position. But if false, then they are arguing from a false premise; therefore, all their conclusions and reasonings (if done logically) are as a general thing false. The other position is, that man is a unit, and is of the earth, earthy, and has no immortality or endless life in him by natural generation; but must be regenerated by the Spirit of God—live in obedience to the law of Christ, having his spirit dwelling in him richly, in all wisdom; such will be saved in the world to come. So if man is not regenerated by the Spirit, he has no promise of any future inheritance.

From the Mother of harlots down to her youngest daughter all are drunk with the doctrine that man is dual. Therefore they have a dictionary corresponding with the first set premises. When the Bible says, "The wages of sin is death," they say it means the wages of sin is endless life in misery. When the Bible says, "all the proud, yea, all that do wickedly shall be stubble; and be burnt up root and branch," they say it only means a destruction of the body; for according to their premises, the soul cannot be destroyed; positively contradicting Jesus, who commands us to fear him (God) who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell. When the wicked are compared to a dry tree, to chaff, to tares, to the burnings of lime, to stubble, to the fat of lambs, etc., they cannot believe it; for it comes in contact with their premises. But take the view that man is a unit, then all the Bible must be interpreted accordingly. It is our business to first show to our fellow mortals these points. And if we fail in this, there is no use use of raising a controversy on other points, for they have one way of interpreting Bible language and we another. So the first thing to be done is to settle the premises. Read carefully the piece written by the Editor of the Herald under the heading "Meaning of Words and Phrases," in the Herald of July 22d.

We were the cause of the Editor of the Echo offering to exchange papers. And our heart's desire and prayer to God is, that the Echo readers may become enlightened on the nature of man, the resurrection of the dead, the kingdom of God, and kindred subjects. Oh! how it would do our heart good for Br. Reynolds, the Editor of the Echo, to open his paper for the free investigation of the above subjects, and let some able Br. write in the Echo on these points, ever remembering the following lines:

Be not swift to take offence; Let it pass! Let it pass!
Anger is a foe to sense; Let it pass!
Brood not darkly o'er a wrong
Which will disappear ere long;
Rather sing this cheery song—Let it pass! Let it pass!

Strife corrodes the purest mind; Let it pass! Let it pass!
As the unregarded wind, Let it pass!
Any vulgar souls that live
May condemn without reprieve;
'Tis the noble who forgive, Let it pass! Let it pass!

Echo not an angry word; Let it pass! Let it pass!
Think how often you have erred; Let it pass!
Since our joys must pass away
Like the dew-drops on the spray,
Wherefore should our sorrows stay? Let them pass! Let them pass!

Oh, be kind and gentle still; Let it pass! Let it
Time at last makes all things straight;
Let us not resent, but wait,
And our trumph shall be great; Let it pass! Let pass!

Bid your anger to depart, Let it pass! Let it pass!
Lay these homely words to heart, Let it pass!
Follow not the giddy throng;
Better to be wronged, than wrong;
Therefore sing this cheery song—Let it pass! Let it pass!

☞ By repeating the last line of each verse, as we have written the last line in the song, you can sing it to the tune "Deliverance" on page 194 of the "Christian Lyre." We have enjoyed ourselves a great many times in the last five years singing our favorite little song.

Wm. Chapin, Orrington, Me., writes; I can say with all my heart, I like the Herald of Life, and want it continued and sent to me as long as I can pay for it. Adventists on the Penobscot are mostly believers in "No Life out of Christ." I want the paper to live to bless and comfort the hearts of God's dear, waiting, tried people, and to give light and truth till our Redeemer comes to give them their reward. The Resurrection: Second Advent.

Br. Storrs: The articles of Dr. Field, on the resurrection of the wicked, and your replies thereto are very interesting to your readers: particularly so are the different expositions of Dan. xii., 2, and John v., 28, 29. These passages have given me great trouble, and I am yet somewhat unsettled as to their construction. Before reading your able paraphrase of the former I had partially settled its application in my own mind.

May I modestly lay before you the results of my study, and ask your better opinion thereon?

When I read, "And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt," I carelessly concluded that there would be only a partial resurrection of the wicked dead at the end of the world.

But by reference to the preceding verse, I found that Gabriel was making revelation to Daniel of events that were to occur at a certain and definite time. It was to be "a time of trouble such as never was;" a time when those of his people written in the book, should be delivered. Was this time future to us as well as Daniel? was an inquiry which naturally suggested itself. Turning to chap. x., 14, I was impressed with the words, "Now I am come to make thee understand what shall befall thy people in the latter days." It would seem that what follows is not a discipline of the events which will occur, as we say, at the end of the world, but at the close of the Jewish dispensation.

The time of trouble I referred in my own mind to the destruction of Jerusalem. The delivery of Daniel's people, to the resurrection of all believers who had lived in the Jewish dispensation. The only question which arose on such a supposition was, If the first resurrection could have taken place immediately after the calamities which befell the holy city, is it possible that a resurrection of some unbelievers took place at the same time?

The thought, that a partial resurrection might have taken place was to me startling, I confess. I turned to John v., with some anxiety, and when I then read from Jesus' lips, "The hour is coming and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God;" my heart palpitated. The Saviour seemed to intimate that the time was near, very near. I referred immediately to Matt. xxiv., where Jesus quotes the language of Daniel, "For then shall be great tribulation such as was not since the beginning of the world," in which he evidently refers to the approaching overthrow of Jerusalem.

"Immediately after the tribulation of those days," he adds a few verses further on, "shall the sun be darkened . . . . and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven; and he shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other."

Do you think it possible that the advent of Jesus to deliver his people could have then taken place? The words look like it, but it seems so novel and singular to look at these events as already past! If we could admit it as a mere hypothesis the two passages in dispute might have had a literal fulfilment. It would also harmonize and explain much Scripture. Jesus threatens those who oppose him and offend his little ones, with great punishment. The churches hang their doctrine of the judgment day and the resurrection of the wicked on these threats. If we suppose the Second Advent took place immediately after the destruction of Jerusalem, and that Jesus then "took vengeance on his adversaries" as well as redeemed his people, we can see a necessity for a partial resurrection of the wicked. Many were dead that had persecuted him and his followers. They must have been raised in order to experience a "destruction from the presence of the Lord and the glory of his power."

There may be many and insuperable objections to the supposition I have been led to make. Will you, at some leisure moment state them in the Herald, and disabuse my mind of any wrong interpretation or application of Scripture I may have made in settling for myself the difficult passages in discussion. What may have misled me most, is the constant cropping out, both in the language of Jesus and that of his apostles, that the time of their deliverance was near, that many would live to see it; that but few events would intervene; that the apostles should not even have gone over the cities of Judah before the Son of man would make his appearance.

I am aware of the tendency which besets solitary students of Scripture, of running into hastily conceived theories, and therefore the more earnestly ask from your riper knowledge an opinion upon this question.

Reader.

Paterson, N. J.

Response to "Reader."

The time when "many of them who sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake" is what has been the difficulty in the mind of our friend, it would seem: and the main question to be settled is, Is that time at the close of the Mosaic age, or at the close of the Christian age? The first verse of Dan. xii., 1, reads, "At that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people" . . . . "at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book."

The previous chapter had given us a chain of prophetic events extending through "many days," chap. x., 14. Near the end of that chain of events a power was to be in existence who should exalt himself above all, not regarding "the God of his fathers nor any god," but should "magnify himself above all." At this power the king of the south would strike; and the king of the north should come against him like a whirlwind, and enter into the glorious land, and should subject Egypt to his sway, etc., but tidings out of the east and out of the north should trouble him; and he would go forth with great fury, etc., and should plant the tabernacle of his palaces in the glorious holy mountain; yet he shall come to his end, and none shall help him. See Dan. xi., 31 to the end. "And at that time" [when this destroying power shall come to his end] "shall Michael stand up," etc.

We see no possible way to make this prophecy match with the end of the Mosaic age; for at that time the Roman imperial power was in its glory, and did not "come to his end" for centuries after. Thus we are effectually debarred from applying the standing up of Michael and the awaking of many of them who slept in the dust of the earth at the end of the Mosaic age; or, as "Reader" calls it, "The close of the Jewish dispensation." No such events as the prophecy describes occurred at that time; and besides Daniel's people (if the Jews were meant by the expression "thy people") were not "delivered;" but on the contrary they were slain by the sword and led away captive into all nations, and their city trodden down by the Gentiles, and to continue so "till the times of the Gentiles shall be fulfilled." It does not appear that that time is yet fulfilled: consequently, Michael has not yet stood up to deliver Daniel's people; and hence "many of them who sleep in the dust of the earth" have not yet awaked; and as we know "at the last trump," "the dead in Christ shall be raised incorruptible," we conclude that the awaking, spoken of in Dan. xii.. 2, is yet future, and "at the last day," as Jesus has said that is the time when he will raise up those who believe in him.

The time of trouble spoken of must correspond with the foregoing facts; and although there was a great tribulation on the Jewish people at the overthrow of their nationality, it cannot be the time of trouble of which the prophecy speaks, because the other facts cannot be made to agree with it as to time. That time of trouble is yet future, and coming on the nations and governments of earth for their wickedness and disregard of the authority of God. These governments are to be overthrown. God has said, "Yet once more I shake not the earth only, but also heaven. . . . This signifieth the removing of those things that are shaken . . . . that those things which cannot be shaken may remain. Wherefore we receiving a kingdom which cannot be moved," etc. Heb. xii., 26–29.

This immovable kingdom of God is to succeed the four previous universal kingdoms, and "shall break in pieces all these kingdoms and shall stand forever." This is the kingdom which the saints made immortal are to receive; and in which they shall shine forth as the sun forever and ever. At its setting up the "Lord Jesus will be revealed from heaven, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them who know not God, and who obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ." 2 Thess. i., 7, 8. That time of trouble among the nations, especially among the corrupters of the earth—whether civil or ecclesiastical—will be so great as to be found the antitype of the trouble which came on the Jews, when God entered into judgment with them as a nation and overthrew their government.

Though there are a few texts that are obscure, and from which it might be conjectured that a resurrection might have taken place and Christ have come the second time; yet such conjecture is so out of harmony with the general tenor of the teaching of Christ and his apostles, it is impossible to adopt it without making a large portion of the declarations concerning the second advent unmeaning and deceptive. That coming is represented as "The glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ." Titus ii., 13.

Also, "Whom [Jesus Christ] the heaven must receive until the times of restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." Acts iii., 21.

These two texts are only samples of numerous others, all going to show that no such secret coming is known to the inspired writers as the one which infers that Christ came the second time eighteen hundred years ago.

One of the things spoken by the mouth of God's holy prophets is, that God shall give unto him (Jesus) the throne of his father David. The heavens must retain him till that time comes for this restitution of David's throne. God's promise and oath cannot be made void; and when He raised Jesus from the dead and set him at his own right hand, he said, Sit thou at my right hand till I make thine enemies thy footstool. Psa. cx.

Because a few texts may puzzle us, we must not lose sight of the great landmarks of God's plan in sending his Son the second time to effect the restitution of all things of which he has spoken. That the times of the restitution have not yet arrived is a self-evident truth. If that were so the Papacy must have been embraced in it. Strange restitution that would be! Also all the wars and bloodshed of the last 1,800 years must be embraced in it. But Christ is to reign as the Prince of Peace, and men "shall beat their swords into ploughshares and their spears into pruning hooks and learn war no more." Micah iv. 3. Yea, this "righteous Branch" of David—this King on David's throne—"shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth: and in his days Judah shall be saved and Israel shall dwell safely," etc. Jer. xxiii. 5, 6.

Can "Reader" need any argument to convince him that none of these things have yet taken place; hence the second advent of Christ, the King, has not yet transpired. When he does come there will be left no doubters on the earth for any great length of time; "for, the nation and kingdom that will not serve Him shall perish; yea, those nations shall be utterly wasted." Isa. lx., 12. Yea, "He shall break them with a rod of iron; and dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel." Therefore they are called upon in the present dispensation to "Be wise, O ye kings: be instructed, ye judges of the earth" . . . . "kiss [submit to] the Son, lest he be angry, and ye perish from the way when his wrath is kindled but a little." God will set his King upon the holy hill of Zion, and all nations must submit to his government or be dashed in pieces. See Psa. ii.

Are these sublime and glorious prophecies all to go for nothing, and be unmeaning, that a few texts which are obscure in their meaning may be construed as teaching that Christ came the second time some 1,800 years ago, in some mystical or secret manner, while there is no restitution, but evil men and seducers are waxing worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived? We cannot for a moment believe any such thing. No: "This same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." Acts i., 11. No secret coming in the matter. It was a personal, visible, bodily going away in the presence of living witnesses, and in like manner will he return, "In his own glory and the glory of the Father, with the holy angels." Men will cease to say, "Where is the promise of his coming?" The dead saints who sleep in the dust of the earth, shall awake; and the living ones be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, and all be caught up to meet the Lord in the air. 1 Thess. iv.; 1 Cor. xv.; Dan. xii., 2, etc.

Such is to be the grand and glorious scene of our Lord's return from heaven, or his second advent, when he comes, not to be mocked, but to reign on the throne of his father David.

A Question.

Was Adam created mortal or immortal?

This may be considered as touching a non-essential point. Be that as it may, while there is a lack of proof to sustain either, it nevertheless is a question worthy of thought, for it leads us to reflect upon the work of God and the condition in which man came from his hand; and to suppose that an all-wise and almighty Being should create and give life to an imperfect being of the capacity of man, and require of him worship and obedience, looks like an impeachment of and derogatory to his character. God pronounced man not only good but superlatively so; very good; and I cannot question but what he was perfect, but not infinite. Yet all his parts were in harmony with the condition in which he was placed to live; and having life, there was no conflict, but perfect harmony in his physical condition with the life principle or element. He was a living soul: not a dying soul, until he sinned. "Sin entered the world, and death by sin."

On the one hand, had he been created immortal he could not have died: on the other, had he been created mortal, then the dying, imperfect, inimical principle was there, and death must have ensued even if he had not sinned, except there was a miraculous change to immortality, necessitated by the imperfection of good work, or else forever live in a wasting, dying, evil state.

But what was his condition? Did God pronounce him mortal or immortal? Verily, neither, but a living soul. Not a mere nondescript; not a mortal dying, but living soul; and had he lived in obedience, I have no evidence that he would not have lived unto this day, and perhaps long ere this have passed that state of trial, and beyond the reach of temptation. But being made with powers of volition, a subject of law, dying and death being the penalty or wages of sin, when he sinned he entered that dying state, and not before; else that dying is no part of the penalty or wages of sin, although it resulted in death. But we read, "Sin entered the world, and death by sin;" and so I think there was no mortal, dying element or principle in man until he sinned; when the harmony that previously existed between man's physical condition and the life was broken, and a conflict ensues; dying triumphs, man succumbs, and turns to dust, has lost life, or ceased to live, and all who die lose the same life and die the same death, which is the loss of life; and all who live by a resurrection I expect will live by the same life principle that Adam lost, although it will be diffused through the system by another than the blood agency.

I look upon the physical condition as being that which places man beyond the possibility of dying, when he is "raised incorruptible," or changed to immortality, and enters into life. It is then there is perfect harmony: he has "life more abundantly;" and as sin will no more break that harmony, man lives on to all eternity through Jesus, the resurrection and the life, an heir of God and joint heir with Jesus. Amen. Jesus is the resurrector and Life-giver; hence the resurrection and the life in the Scripture sense. Your Br. in hope of eternal life through Jesus.

The idea that God's work of creation must be as perfect as an all-wise and almighty being could make it, before he could with propriety call it "very good," lies at the foundation of our brother's difficulty. Such an idea forbids all progression, and leaves man with no motive to action, either in the improvement of himself or anything around him. In other words, every created thing being as perfect as infinite wisdom and power could produce, there could be no such thing as disorder or sin: the whole work is an absolute, perfect machine, and could not by any means become deranged or run out of order, unless the Creator lacked in wisdom or power in his creative work.

But God did not thus create the things of earth. The first command given to man shows that the earth itself was not as perfect as it could be made; so he commanded man to "multiply and replenish the earth, and subdue it." Gen. i., 28. Yet the earth was one of the "every things that God had made" that he pronounced "very good."

Thus we have a basis on which to build the conclusion that while all things were very good, and perfect for the purpose for which the Creator designed them, yet none of the things placed under the supervision of man were so perfect as not to be made more so by the use of means the Creator had placed in the reach of man. Had it been otherwise, as we have before said, man could have had no motive to action, and would have been a mere machine, acting only as he was acted on, and sin would have been impossible.

The fact that man was liable to sin shows that he was in a condition below what he might be; and hence was not as perfect as he could be. His Creator chose that a higher state of perfection should result from man's own will and action, aided by his Creator's counsel and direction. Such a condition was "very good" compared with a mere machine—an involuntary agent acting without will or power of resistance.

Man, therefore, being a responsible agent, must have been created liable to death, and yet had an endless life set before him, which he could secure by active submission to his Maker's will in the use of the "very good" powers and faculties bestowed on him.

Now to the question—"Was Adam created mortal or immortal?" It is perfectly clear he was not created *im*mortal. If there is an intermediate state between that and mortal we have no knowledge of it. But being mortal in his constitution, by creation, it does not follow that he must necessarily die. Enoch did not die. Elijah did not die; and Adam would not have died if he had not first been disobedient. True, immortality was not in his nature, but God had provided the means to secure him against death, and to give him everlasting life—viz., "the tree of life," of which, if he eat, he would "live forever." Such is his Creator's testimony. Eternal life was not in himself, nor yet in his possession. He must show himself obedient, preferring his Maker's will to his own, if he would have access to that tree which would cause him to "live forever."

The testimony of God to Adam, "thou shalt surely die" if disobedient, shows that he plainly told Adam he was liable to die; and hence was not placed, by creation, above any other of the inferior "living souls" with which he was surrounded. They were all "living soul" as well as man; but man had set before him the tree of life, a life that was everlasting, if obedient. Exclusion from it did not change man's nature, but it left him without the means of arresting its tendency back to dust—left to his natural state, dying he dies.

Two Deaths.

The advocates of two deaths for the wicked, for the want of any plain text in the Old Testament to support their theory, resort to Ezk. xviii., 16. "When a righteous man turneth away from his righteousness, and committeth iniquities and dieth in them; for his iniquity that he hath done shall he die." They contend this text proves the re-living of the wicked dead; for, say they,

As he first dies in his iniquity and then for his iniquity, he must have been made alive from the dead to die a second time.

Now this may look plausible to a superficial reader or reasoner, but when examined in the light of Scripture, as a theory, it will be found most fallacious. They infer that the man spoken of first dies in his iniquity and after that dies for it. Their simple statement is, this man has to be deprived of life twice. That is, a dead man, after he is dead, dies again. We wonder how persons holding such view can find fault with those who hold a man is dead and alive at the same time. We think they would show more wisdom to agree with the advocates of a conscious surviving soul in death, then they would have the advantage of saying, much more plausibly, "This wicked man's body dies in his iniquity, and after that his soul dies for his iniquity." Then there might appear some reason in their argument; but no; they believe the whole man dies in his sins, and then has to be made alive from the dead to die for his sins. Thus they would have us believe they prove the re-living of the wicked dead: but, alas, for such reasoners, they have not one text in the Bible that saith, the wicked dead shall live again; no, not one. We say not but they may infer it, as in the text under consideration; but as for a plain text, such as is found for an opposite view, as follows: "They are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise" (Isa. xxvi., 14), they have not a solitary testimony in all the Book of God.

Ezekiel in the text above was speaking of those under the law, and were to be "judged by the law." Now where in the law is it stated that any man is to die twice? Where is the statute? Where is the law that saith any man shall die a second time, however vile he may have been? Without such law what right have our opposers to assume that any man is first to die in his sins, then be made alive and die again for his sins? We repudiate such assumptions. By such a process the Bible is converted into a toy, to be whirled about to suit any class of speculators.

The plain and obvious sense of Ezk. xviii., 16 is, not that of dying twice, but, that dying in his sins he cuts off all possibility of his revival into life; for his iniquities he dies a death from which there is no recovery; or, for his sins he dies eternally—his death is eternal; he "is holden with the cords of his sins" (Prov. v., 22), so that no life power can extricate him from the death state. "The wages of sin is death;" in that death he is holden for his iniquity. Such we regard as the true exposition of the language of God by Ezekiel; and to add penalties to God's law, under which he placed Israel, which God himself never uttered, is taking a responsibility on one's self in which we shall not consent to share, lest we might die for the iniquity.

Life from the dead is only through Christ, who is "the resurrection and the life." Let it be proved, if it can be, that he has promised or threatened to give life from the dead, at the last day, to any only such as are in him. Such as live from the dead at that time "are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." Luke xx. All others "remain in the congregation of the dead," or, in the death state, for their own sins, and because they, having heard of Christ, would not come unto him that they might have life. John v., 40.

1 Cor. xv., 18, 20, and 22.

Some years since Prof. Hodge, D. D., of the Theological Seminary, Princeton, N. J., published an Exposition 1 Cor. On chap. xv. are some things of much interest to us. After noticing the "consequences of denying the resurrection of Christ," as indicated in the apostle's argument, he speaks as follows:

Verse 18. "Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished."

"This is the fourth disastrous consequence of the denial of the doctrine in question. All the dead in Christ are lost. To fall asleep in Christ is to die in faith, or in communion with Christ for salvation. See 1 Thess. iv., 14. Rev. xiv., 13. Are perished; rather, they perished. 'They perished when they died.'"

Verse 20. "But now is Christ risen from the dead (and) become the first-fruits of them that slept."

"Christ has not only risen but he has risen in a representative character. His resurrection is the pledge of the resurrection of his people.

He rose as the first fruits of them that slept, and not of them only, but as the first fruits of all who are ever to sleep in Jesus." . . . "As he rose, so all his people must; as certainly and as gloriously, Phil. iii., 21."

Verse 22. "For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive."

"This is the reason why Adam was the cause of death, and why Christ is the cause of life. We die by means of Adam, because we were in Adam; and we live by means of Christ because we are in Christ. Union with Adam is the cause of death; union with Christ is the cause of life. The nature of this union and its consequences are more fully explained in Rom. v., 12–21. In both cases it is a representative and vital union. We are in Adam because he is our head and representative, and because we partake of his nature. And we are in Christ because he is our head and representative, and because we partake of his nature through the indwelling of his Spirit." . . . "That the word all in the latter part of this verse is to be restricted to all believers (or rather, to all the people of Christ, as infants are included) is plain, 1. Because the word in both clauses is limited. It is all who are in Adam that die; and it is the all who are in Christ who are made alive. As union with Christ is made the ground of the communication of life here spoken of, it can be extended only to those who are in him. But according to the constant representation of the Scripture, none are in him but his own people. 'If any man be in Christ he is a new creature,' 2 Cor. v., 17. 2. Because the verb (zoopoieo) here found is never used of the wicked. Whenever employed in reference to the work of Christ it always means to communicate to them that life of which he is the source, John v., 21. vi., 63. Rom. viii., 11. 1 Cor. xv., 45. Gal. iii., 21. The real meaning therefore, is, 'As in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made partakers of a glorious and everlasting life.' Unless, therefore, the Bible teaches that all men are in Christ, and that all through him partake of eternal life, the passage must be restricted to his own people."

The Louisville Journal, some years since, gave the following account of a transaction which occurred ten miles from that city. The lad spoken of was thirteen years old. His name was Henry Merriman. The Journal says:

This is one of the most mysterious as well as one of the most extraordinary cases of suicide ever committed in this country. Henry was a devout Christian. He had lost a little sister who belonged to the church. This sister had given him a prayer-book on her death-bed, and desired him to use it. He had become so interested in the book, and on the subject of meeting with a dear sister, that it was a subject of daily conversation and prayer with him. He appeared desirous to be with her. His mother had told him that he would meet his sister in heaven after death. He prayed nightly and daily to see her, and in his fit of religious insanity, he, upon his knees, cut his throat from ear to ear, severing both jugular veins. This was truly a sorry sight to look upon—a heart-broken mother, afflicted father, and distressed relatives—this was a scene to dissolve a heart of stone. Every one present was in tears; every man became as it were a child. The verdict of the jury was, that the child came to his death from the influence of the above facts, causing religious insanity.

The child was, no doubt, "insane;" but his desire to be with his sister in heaven—where his "mother told him he would meet her after death"—was perfectly natural from the love he had to her; and no wonder, with such instruction as he had from the common theology, he should be anxious to go to her loved society; and as "insanity" can be pled for the suicidal act, why stands his mother there "heart-broken," and his father "afflicted?" Had not Henry and his sister met in that glorious heaven where his mother had told him they would meet after death? Why, then, is she heart-broken? Tell us, ye philosophers, ye divines! Summon all the priests of natural immortality, and of going to heaven at death, and before the resurrection at the last day, and see if you can all solve the mystery that a mother, full in your views, stands heart-broken that her two loved and loving ones were now enjoying their happy meeting in heaven!

Seriously—Had such a case of suicide occurred, which could as distinctly have been traced to the influence of the doctrine of no eternal life except through Jesus Christ, and by a resurrection at the last day, would not our theological opponents have shouted—"Behold the fruit of your doctrine!—that's just what might have been expected!" However, we judge not the tendency of the common theory by an isolated case like that before us. We believe the notion of going to heaven at death is clearly subversive of the whole gospel scheme of redemption, is a practical denial of the resurrection of the dead, and the return of the Son of God "from heaven;" and is just as truly a fable as the Roman purgatory, and quite as pernicious in its effects. Saith Paul—"Ye turned to God from idols, to serve the living and true God; and to wait for his Son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead," etc. 1 Thess. i., 9, 10. The true Christian is here characterized, not as waiting to "go to heaven," but waiting for Christ to come from heaven, when the "Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, and with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God;" then "the dead in Christ shall rise." See 1 Thess. iv., 16, 17.

The Bible hope—the gospel hope—is entirely a different matter from the fancy hope so pathetically urged upon our attention by the advocates of "going to heaven at death." Let these things be pondered well; and let us all see that our hope has for its foundation the words of God and not the words of man.

A Movable Position.

Those who make strong professions of their belief that the precise time of the second advent of Christ is revealed by prophetic periods in the Bible, often give sad evidence of the imperfection of both their faith and knowledge. They fix on the time with a confidence that seems to indicate no doubt of the accuracy of their calculations. But, as they approach the set time, their faith seems to waver, and they begin to cast about for some other period in the future to which they can slide if the one fails on which they have built their theory of time. We confess it is a heavy tax on charity to believe in the honesty of persons who treat such a solemn and tremendously important subject in such a trifling manner; and we cannot help thinking of the Apostolic injunction, "Be no more children, tossed to and fro, and carried about by every wind of doctrine, by the sleight of men," etc.

The advent is a settled fact, and its nearness is also apparent; why, then, must the minds of believers be kept in a perpetual excitement as to the exact time of the event; when even the hunters after definite time are compelled—unwillingly it may be—to acknowledge they have to keep up a sliding scale to save appearances after so many and repeated failures? At times they are positive; then, as their time nears, they are looking for a new move, so as to keep up the excitement or their own credit for wisdom. This game we trust is nearly played out. Here is the last specimen of it, from the Voice of the West:

OUR POSITION ON TIME.

As we near the Autumn type season, many are asking my views on time. Without pausing to argue the point, I will make a frank statement of my real position. I have looked the ground over from various standpoints, and my conclusion is:

1. There is a strong probability that Christ may come this fall; but this is not knowledge; nor am I arranging matters to end my work then if it passes, but rather to work on till the event comes, be it sooner or later; for, while this fall looks like a probable point, there are other points that look plausible at least.

2. I have reasons for thinking next spring has a plausible claim on our attention if the fall point should pass.

3. While the points already named are susceptible of strong support, I do not KNOW that they are the true epoch; a strong probability is all that we affirm. Get ready, all.

But if fall and spring should pass, it is possible that we may have to wait till 1873. Possibly this may prove to be the true epoch; but let us not overlook the earlier events, nor be over-positive or dogmatical. I plan to labor on if Jesus does not come at the earliest point, and let no blind zealot say that such a plan denies my faith. I don't plan to give up the ship till the great Captain comes on board. Work to the last: work all.

Wm. Sheldon.

Now, what kind of harmony is there between such a sliding scale and the oft-repeated declaration, "Time is in the Bible;" meaning, of course, the prophetic periods in the prophecies give the exact time of the second advent? Our Lord told us to know when it was nigh; but He never told us that we should know the exact time; and hence it is manifest the definite time of the event is not a subject of prophecy nor a subject of knowledge; and those waste their time and perplex such as credit their calculations by attempting to find out the definite time.

All Christians are bound so to live as to be always "waiting for God's Son from heaven," and in that state of obedience and love that would enable them to rejoice at His appearing at any moment. Not so to live, proves them to be mere eye-servants. Let us have our loins girt about with truth; not with human speculations. Let us put on and keep on the whole armor of God; and work while the day lasts, that we may be found of our Lord in peace when he comes.

Another Question.

Is the act of dying the penalty, or is it being dead? S. B.

"The wages of sin is death." Rom. vi., 23. We cannot give a more comprehensive answer than this, in Romans, by Paul. Death is a state. In that state "There is no work, nor device, nor knowledge." Eccl. ix., 10. "For in death there is no remembrance of Thee." Psa. vi., 5. It is clear that dying, nor the pains of dying, nor any of the attending circumstances of dying can be the penalty proper; but that state in which all sense and knowledge has ceased forever, is the true penalty for sin.

Absence: The Anniversary.

This evening we expect to go to Springfield, Mass., to attend the anniversary of the Life and Advent Union. Earnestly have we desired and sought the blessing and direction of the Lord for the occasion. If He directs and controls in all we have to do, as a Union, all will be well. May our covenant God guide us in all things, so that whatever the result may be His name shall be honored. If it is his will to relieve us, personally, from the responsibilities and labor of an Editor of a weekly paper, we trust to be resigned and to occupy only such place as His Providence shall assign us. Our past five years' experience has taught us that the position of an editor of a weekly religious paper is one that no Christian man need covet. Certain it is he cannot please all. Some will think they and their communications are neglected, and seem to suppose everything they send for the paper should be inserted without delay or abridgment, no matter what reasons the Editor may have for thinking otherwise; even if he withholds it out of good will to the correspondent, satisfied that he would be injured by the insertion of what is written.

We trust the Union will be harmonious in whatever course they may see fit to pursue in all matters relating to the objects of its formation, and that the cause of Life only in Christ may be furthered by its assembling to-morrow.

In consequence of this meeting, no paper will be issued till week after next, or September 9th. Do not forget this.

A Quiet Spirit—Its Power.

The Friends have taught us a lesson which it would be well for us to teach ourselves, and that is quietness. Not only is great strength wasted by excitement, but an appearance of weakness given in its place. To look grave is a great wisdom as well as a great art. A bundle of fire-crackers contains much more powder than a loaded pistol, but it operates very differently. The one starts a series of ineffectual but noisy little emissions a short distance in all directions, the other shoots far and deep in one. And the reason of the difference is one worth study. In the one case the barrel is of paper, in the other of steel. The energy of the one is scattered by its shell, that of the other concentrated. We should recollect this in matters religious as well as secular. We discredit as well as dissipate our religious character by a discomposed and restless manner. And self-compression and self-chastisement are nearly allied to humility. The man that waits at all, soon learns to wait upon the Lord. And indeed there is something exquisitely attractive as well as comforting in composure. It is a great deal to sit in peace while the world is rocking about, for it proves to us that we are steadied by a power above the world. To the Christian there is peculiar value in this. It is the only quality by which we can disarm the world, for while the world can meet him with wit, and strength, and sometimes argument, it cannot meet him with peace. In the Christian's humility and peacefulness, also, is his aggressive power. In families this is greatly the case, for the meek manner has wrought all the conversions which the little family senate knows—the eloquent tongue none. A meek and quiet spirit, let my prayer be, give me, O God!—Episcopal Recorder.

The Gentleness of Christ.

The prophet Isaiah, in speaking of Christ, as a conqueror, says: "He shall not cry, nor lift up, nor cause his voice to be heard in the street. A bruised reed shall he not break, and the smoking flax shall he not quench; he shall bring forth judgment unto truth. He shall not fail nor be discouraged till he have set judgment in the earth: and the isles shall wait for his law." In accordance with this beautiful conception of Christ, does the Apostle speak in the beginning of the 10th chapter of his second epistle to the Corinthians; "I Paul myself beseech you by the meekness and gentleness of Christ."—And all this harmonizes with what Christ himself says: "Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart, and ye shall find rest unto your souls."

The vision of Elijah in Horeb furnishes a striking illustration of divine power so exerted. First a great wind rent the mountain and the rocks; next an earthquake shook the ground; then a devouring fire raged before the eyes of the prophet; but the Lord was not in any of these. With all their power and terror they appear not to have affected the heart of the prophet; but after they had all passed, and nature was hushed in silence, a still, small voice fell upon his ear, thrilled his heart, and caused him to cover his face with his mantle. This was God, and we may say was symbolic of the gentle but subduing power characteristic of Christ. So Christ always acted. When he stilled the tempest he did not strive, nor cry, nor lift up his voice. Weary with his journey, he had lain down to take rest in sleep. Though the little vessel that bore him and his disciples was tossed by the waves and in apparent danger of destruction, he slept on securely. To those who knew him not he must have appeared all unfit to struggle with the difficulties and dangers of that terrible hour. But when call is made—"Master! carest thou not that we perish?"—he, rising in his majesty, calmly contemplates the fury of the elements around him, and in tones of gentleness spoke to the raging winds and boisterous sea—"Peace, be still." Instantly there was "a great calm." Calmly as he spoke, there was in his words an awful power, and so they who heard him felt, for "they feared exceedingly, and said one to another, What manner of man is this, that even the wind and sea obey him." They felt as Elijah did when he heard the "still, small voice."

So does Christ act in his dealings with his people. So does he enter their hearts, and influence their lives. He feeds his flock like a shepherd; gathers the lambs with his arms, and carries them in his bosom, and gently leads those that are with young. His whole life, as recorded by the Evangelists, is an exemplification of this; and the experience of all who give themselves up to his care and control, is a realization of this. Oh, that his people had more of his gentleness! Then would we have more peace, more purity, more progress in the church. Then should we flow together, and our hearts be enlarged; and then would Zion put forth her power and appear in her beautiful garments.

The world, which is regardless of wind, earthquake and fire, stands awed and subdued at "the still, small voice,"—the same gentle voice that spoke to the tempest, that Elijah heard on Horeb, and that Mary heard when she sat at the feet of Jesus. And when the church learns better the language of the Master, and manifests more of his spirit, then may we look for those happy days of grace and power, when Christ "shall set judgment in the earth, and the isles shall wait for his law. —Selected.

Christ's All Sufficiency.

A delight in the Lord's all-sufficiency; to be satisfied in him as our present and eternal portion. This, in the sense in which I understand it, is not the effect of a present warm frame, but of a deeply-rooted and abiding principle; the habitual exercise of which is to be estimated by the comparative indifference with which other things are regarded. The soul thus principled is not at leisure to take or to seek satisfaction in any thing but what has a known subserviency to this leading taste. Either the Lord is present, and then he is to be rejoiced in; or else he is absent, and then he is to be sought and waited for. They are to be pitied, who, if they are sometimes happy in the Lord, can at other times be happy without him, and rejoice in broken cisterns, when their spirits are at a distance from the fountain of living waters. I do not plead for an absolute indifference to temporal blessings; he gives us all things richly to enjoy; and a capacity of relishing them is his gift likewise; but then the consideration of his love in bestowing should exceedingly enhance the value, and a regard to his will should regulate their use. Nor can they all supply the want of that which we can only receive immediately from himself. This principle likewise moderates that inordinate fear and sorrow to which we are liable upon the prospect or the occurrence of great trials, for which there is a sure support and resource provided in the all-sufficiency of infinite goodness and grace. What a privilege is this, to possess God in all things while we have them, and all things in God when they are taken from us!—John Newton.

Dogmatic Interpretations of Symbolical Predictions.—Nothing can be much more precise than the line which forms the boundary between a legitimate and an enthusiastic feeling, on the subject of prophecy. Is a prediction couched in symbol? Is it entangled among perplexing anachronisms? Is it studied with points of special reference? We then recognize the hand of heaven in the art of its construction; and we know that it is so moulded as to admit and invite the manifold diversities of ingenious explication, and that, therefore, even the true explication must, until the day of solution, stand undistinguished in a crowd of plausible errors. But for a man to proclaim himself a champion of a particular hypothesis, and to employ it as he might an explicit prediction, is to affront the spirit of prophecy by contemning the chosen style of his announcements. And what shall be said of the audacity of him, who, with no other commission in his hand than such as any man may please to frame for himself, usurps the awful style of seer, pronounces the doom of nations, hurls thunders at thrones, and, worse than this, puts the credit of Christianity at pawn in the hand of infidelity, to be lost beyond recovery if not redeemed on a day specified by the fanatic, for the verification of his word.—Natural History of Enthusiasm.

From Freeman Gladding.

Albany, N. Y., Aug. 20, 1868.

Br. Storrs: You wish to know what the friends of the Herald of Life will do to sustain it another year, and the question has been asked in the paper, "Shall it live?" I answer, "Yes; let it live though all other papers or pamphlets, having the same truths to promulgate, started since the Herald, die." I was showing the piece headed, "Preachers Preaching," to a noisy Methodist, and he noticed the question. "Shall the Herald of Life live?" and said "I can answer that question; it will die." My answer was, "Don't you believe that." As to the question, What I will do to sustain it? I will do the same as last year if that is sufficient, if not, I will double the amount. I should like to be with you at your anniversary meeting, but cannot. Br. Wendell has sent me No. 1 of Bible Repository, but I have no money to divert from the office of Life and Advent Union. Wish I could do more to scatter your publications, but see no way at present. May our heavenly Father support and sustain you under all your labors and trials, and bring you and yours into his heavenly kingdom. Yours, waiting.

J. G. Benton, Jackson, Mich, writes: I intend to help you to say no discontinuance, as I do not wish you to discontinue the weekly visitor and preacher that I now love, though I formerly believed in the doctrine that it opposes. I have been a reader of yours for several years, though not a subscriber, and am now only such by its being a gift, and it has been a gift highly prized, for I now see the inconsistency of what I formerly believed. I will have the money ready for the next volume, and pledge you $2 more for its support, and if I had the money would rather pay $10 than be without it. Yours, looking to see Jesus come in like manner as the Galileans saw him go up.

Benjamin Mellor, Rockdale, Pa., writes: I send $1 for tracts on the Judgment. I want to sow the seed of the kingdom. Otherwise how can I expect it to spring up; and if our Heavenly Father gives us the seed, it is but reasonable and our duty to sow it, and then we may with confidence look up to Him and ask for his sun and rain to cause it to take root, spring up and bear fruit to His praise and glory. I would like much to be with you at your annual meeting, but I am too far away. I feel sure that He who said, Lo, I am with you always, will be in your midst. For the next volume of the dear Herald I renew my pledge for $20. Who among us can afford to be without it? I cannot. With unabated love, and prayers for all the Brethren and Sisters who hope for eternal life through our Lord Jesus Christ.

S. Morgan, New Rutland, Ill., writes: I have seen the call for help to sustain the Herald, and for the Campaign Documents. I have long been desiring to help. I do not know how many subscribers you have, but I hope they will all stick to the Herald of Life closer than a brother. Want of means has prevented my responding to your calls for help. I now send $1 to help publish the Campaign Documents. My prayer is, that subscribers to the Herald will continue to increase. I wish to get the truth. John says, We know we have passed from death unto life because we love the brethren: he that loveth not his brother abideth in death; he does not enter into life. Yours, in hope of eternal life through Christ our Lord and Saviour.

A. W. Bradford, Springfield, Mass., writes: I send you a new subscriber, who is now rejoicing in the truth of Life only in Christ. A short time since she was held in the chains of error, but thanks be to the Lord she now stands free in the full liberty of the gospel. I am thankful that the Lord has caused his truth to be spoken with boldness in this fable-loving age. May the blessing of the Lord attend you forever.

La Fayette Norris, Campton, Iowa, writes: I will pay four dollars for the Herald of Life next volume, and more rather than it should fail. I am really sorry to see another periodical started, and hope the author will will see his error. We can't all be editors.

Higher Life.

A few days ago, in the country, I stood beneath a tall cedar, a student of its nature, and an admirer of its glory. I observed that the lower branches showed the only signs of decay, and that they seemed to be appointed to removal, in order that the sap of the tree might pass uninterruptedly upward to develop the higher boughs, and to hold the top in full evergreen. The trunk of the cedar is made the more grand and substantial by the disappearance of the lower branches, year by year: and the avenues to communicate life and beauty upward are thus the more direct and effectual.

And so does the Christian grow. The habits of his childhood, his embryo notions and opinions, as he rises into manhood are lost; and like the cedar, as he grows, his lower affections and attachments, love of the world, of fame, of position, one by one die and disappear, and his higher nature is all the more comely and complete. Any man may thus die unto sin, and live unto God, loose his attachments from the things of time and sense, and fix them upon those things which are eternal and divine.—Clark's "Gospel in the Trees."

"Argumentum ad Hominem."

A sceptical young collegian confronted an old Quaker with the statement that he did not believe in the Bible. Said the Quaker.

"Does thee believe in France?"

"Yes; for though I have not seen it, I have seen others that have; besides there is plenty of corroborative proof that such a country does exist."

"Then thee wilt not believe anything, thee or others has not seen?"

"No; to be sure I won't."

"Did thee ever see thy own brains?"

"No."

"Ever see anybody that did?

"No."

"Does thee believe thee has any?"

God Unchangeable.

God can as well cease to exist as cease to be true. Here is a safe anchorage: "He will not alter the thing that is gone out of his lips." The public faith of heaven is engaged to believers. Can we have better security? The whole earth hangs upon the word of God's power, and shall not our faith hang upon the word of God's truth? There is nothing else we can believe in but God's unchanging truth. This is a golden pillar, on which faith can rest. God will not deny himself.—Old Author.

"THREE CAMPAIGN DOCUMENTS."

One Thousand Dollars Wanted.

FOR WHAT?

To put into circulation within the next three months Ten Thousand each of the following works:

A DEFENCE OF THE BIBLE:

THE JUDGMENT:

TIME AND MANNER OF IT:

AND

LIFE FROM THE DEAD:

Or, The Righteous only will Live Again:

These three documents are for the campaign before us, which is not to be ended till our King is crowned and has the kingdoms of this world subjected to his reign on David's throne. Three thousand each of the above two first-named documents have been printed, and four thousand of the last, and a great portion of them are already in circulation; but there is a wish to increase it to ten thousand each by the next anniversary of the Life and Advent Union. We believe it can be done. It is true, a few have generally had such work to do; but "many hands make light work." If each of our subscribers could pay, or collect one dollar for this object, the full amount and several hundred dollars over would be had to carry on the work.

Who says, I will do it? You can have all your money back again in the documents, if you wish it.

The three works can be had for 14 cents, including the postage; or, 100 of each for $12, including postage, or for $10 when sent by express or taken at our office.

The "Generous Offer" Revived.

It will be remembered that the Hon. O. S. Halsted, last winter made the offer to send his work, "The Theology of the Bible," to any subscriber of the Herald of Life for $2, and himself prepay the postage. The retail price of the work is $3. By accepting the judge's offer, you, in fact, get this invaluable work for a little more than half price; as the author gets but $1.08 after paying postage. The book is one to stdy; and with it your Bible will be more perfectly understood. The offer is a most generous one, and we hope many more will avail themselves of it. It is not restricted to your taking one copy at this rate. You can have any number you choose to send the money for. Send $2 for each copy; writing your own name and Post Office address plain, and the work will come to you free of any other expense.

Direct your communication to Hon. O. S Halsted, 417 Broad St., Newark, N. J.

Poetry.

Less and More.

Two prayers, dear Lord, in one—
Give me both less and more;
Less of th' impatient world and more of thee;
Less of myself, and all that heretofore
Made me slip where ready feet do run,
And help me back from where I fain would be—
Kept me, my Lord, from thee!

All things which most I need
Are thine: thou wilt bestow
Both strength and shield, and be my willing Guest;
Yet my weak heart takes up a broken reed,
Thy rod and staff doth steadily forego,
And I, who might be rich, am poor, distressed,
And seek, but have not rest.

How long, O Lord, how long?
So have I cried of late,
As though I knew not what I well do know;
Come thou, Great Master Builder, and create
Anew that which is thine; undo my wrong—
Breathe on this waste, and life and health bestow;
Come, Lord, let it be so!

Let it be so, and then—
What then? My soul shall wait,
And ever pray—all prayers, dear Lord, in one—
Thy will o'er mine in all this mortal state
Hold regal sway. To thy commands, Amen!
Break from my waiting lips till work is done,
And crown and glory won?

Children's Department.

Bread—A True Story.

BY GRACE GREENWOOD.

There is a sort of sacredness about bread which does not belong to any other form of food. It is as though we, like children, took the prayer of our Lord, "Give us this day our daily bread," in a particular and limited sense. It is as though we remembered always that He blessed and brake bread—that He was Himself called the "Bread of Life." No wastefulness shocks us like the waste of "the staff of life." In Germany, Sweden and Denmark this sentiment has grown to a popular superstition. Hans Christian Andersen has a story of a proud girl who trod upon bread, and thereby came to grief; and the German peasants always prophesy terrible misfortunes to the man, woman, or child who mocks at, or flings away this good gift of Heaven, even in form of the stalest and coarsest of their "black loaves," which, indeed, are of too heavy and substantial a character to be made light of. The great Thirty Years' War, with its famines and dire distresses, probably gave rise to this superstition. It has the strongest hold on the minds of the peasantry, the descendants of the people who suffered most bitterly in that dreadful period, but all classes entertain it, to a degree—few are so reckless or profane as to see without fear, or displeasure, a slight put upon bread; and that brings me to my little story.

When Napoleon's great army was on the march toward Russia, in the summer of the year 1812, a portion of it passed through Saxony—a proud, exultant, insolent set of fighters and spoilers, making free with all that came in their way, and often insulting the unoffending people. Among other quiet towns, that of Oschatz was visited with this mighty swarm of imperial locusts, and the inhabitants were called upon to pay tribute in the way of food and comfortable quarters. It happened that a company of infantry halted before the house of a Protestant minister, and there demanded food, and the minister's son, a handsome little lad, with great, dark eyes, deep, and grave, and thoughtful, ran in to his mother for some bread. The good woman gave him a large brown loaf, such as they themselves had just been eating. It was indeed their "daily bread." This the lad took out and courteously offered, with a knife, to a gallant looking young officer, who, to his astonishment and horror, flung it contemptuously on the ground, saying, "How dare you offer us miserable black bread, fit only for swinish German peasants? Bring us white bread, you young rascal!"

The soldiers hungry as they were, in the spirit of their officer, kicked the offending brown loaf about, like a foot-ball, until they quite demolished it, and then shouted for white bread. But little Constantine who was rightly named, replied bravely: "We have no white bread,—we gave you the best we had, and you are very wicked to treat that good brown loaf so. My mother made it, and God punishes people who fling bread on the ground."

The rude French soldiers might have made him suffer for his plain speaking, had not the officer, looking a little ashamed, marched them on to other houses, in search of white bread, better suited to their dainty appetites.

The incident had been witnessed by a crowd of people, who, shocked and indignant, all prophesied humiliation and misfortune to the discourteous strangers. After a few hours, the French troops marched off, and the old town whose inhabitants they had bullied and robbed, returned to its quiet, steady-going ways. They marched on with splendid visions and magnificent plans of conquest, glory, dominion, spoils and revels—to disaster, defeat—to unutterable horrors of tempest, cold and death. The dread elements, the awful forces of nature were arrayed against them—the blind avenging furies of Frost and Fire and Flood. In the cold bosom of a strange land, unseen graves, like icy pitfalls, awaited them; and in the clouds of an alien sky were even then being prepared for them, slowly and silently, from the soft exhalations of the summer earth, vast winding-sheets of snow. Many a green valley, in which they gaily bivouacked, on the daisied turf, with murmurous leaves and sweet bird-chirpings over head, was but a few months latter, to receive them in white silence—to invite them to beds of treacherous softness and fatal repose, overhung by leafless branches, sheathed in ice,—a spot seemingly abandoned by Nature, forsaken of Life, a ghostly valley of the Shadow of Death.

When the people of Oschatz heard of the fearful reverses of that grand army, they said: "It is little wonder, if they all flung good good bread on the ground, and kicked it about, after the manner of those Heaven-defying soldiers who marched through our town."

At last, the remnants of that proud invading host came straggling back through Germany. A miserable set of men were they—sickly, ragged, maimed, frost-bitten,—humiliated and amazed to find the world slipping from the grasp of their deity, the great Emperor—that laws of Nature did not come under the "Code of Napoleon"—that in his magnificent plans of conquest, he had left out the mighty disturbing elemental forces, had left out chances, accidents, providences, God.

So it happened that the town of Oschatz was again visited by the French, and strangely enough it happened that to that very town came the sad remains of that very company that had called down upon their heads the bread curse. Again they halted before the minister's house, and again little Constantine ran to his mother for bread. This time there was white bread, and he took out a large loaf and offered it to that very young officer he remembered well, though now he saw him pale and emaciated, his brave uniform soiled and dilapidated, and one sleeve of his braided coat hanging empty. To the lad's surprise the officer recognized him at once; to his greater surprise he burst into tears, and refused to take that tempting white loaf, saying: "No, my good little friend, I cannot take this, though I am very hungry, as are my men. Bring us black bread, such as we trampled under foot in the summer—that is better than we deserve. God has indeed punished us for our arrogance." Then little Constantine went into the house and got a brown loaf from his mother, and all the charitable neighbors contributed from their stores, far more willingly than they once had done, feeding the poor, crest-fallen fellows, and refreshing them with good beer, without addressing to them one reproachful or taunting word—without as much as saying to them: "We told you so—you profane frog-eaters and bread-despisers!" This was the way in which the good people of Oschatz obeyed the command of their Lord, "If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink."

One honest farmer who had actually come to town that day to purchase a farm-wagon and horses, to replace those of which these same French soldiers had robbed him, now filled the new vehicle with sick and wounded men, and so conveyed them several miles on their homeward way, walking most of the distance himself, to make room for a poor straggler. That unlettered "German boor" had probably never heard of a triumphal chariot, yet his rude wagon was one—only that the conqueror walked, while the captives rode. He had all unconsciously achieved a Christian victory.

As for little Constantine H——, he grew up to be a profound scholar and a great physician, and what is better still, a good, brave, true-hearted man, and what is best of all, he is living yet—and though keeping pace with the century, year for year, and day for day, he does not seem old, for his heart is steeped in the dews of immortal youth—beneficent charities and generous humanities, the enthusiasm of the scholar, the serenity of the philosopher, the faith of the Christian.

Instinct of Prayer.

"Prayer is the soul's sincere desire, untutered or expressed." It is the natural act of a dependent creature. It is the voice of nature in its deep-toned breathings speaking to God. There is something nearly akin to prayer observable, even in inarticulate nature; "The whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain." The earth, unnerved and torn by throbbing earthquakes and belching volcanoes, seems as if struggling to give utterance to some terrible sense of woe.

The vast deep, ever restless and wailing, seems as if an indistinct sentiment of terror was sweeping over its rough-billowed bosom. The utterance of the brutes may be interpreted as the dim consciousness of want and dependence. But it is in man that this divine instinct becomes audible. Man alone is conscious of his helplessness, and in this consciousness can alone turn to a superior power. His whole life, from his cradle years of infancy to hoary age, teaches but one lesson—that of ignorance, of infirmity, and of dependence upon the God who made him. There are no wise, but feel their ignorance and need of divine light and guidance; and this feeling he breaks forth with the dying Goethe: "Light, Lord—more light!" The strongest feels his weakness. His pulse beats faintly—and he realizes that his existence is a frail and fragile thing, and in order to strength and sustenance, he must of necessity join himself to the centre of all life. He is unhappy and wretched, and he would quaff the waters that gush from the fountains of life and glory. He is miserable—guilty, and he would flee where mercy can be obtained.

The natural expression of his consciousness is to pray. Prayer is but the voice of man crying to God out of the depths of despair and guilt into which he has fallen. Left to his own guidance he plunges but the deeper into misery, and from deep mountain gorges he looks on high, and cries to him who sits enthroned on the everlasting hills, to bring him up from the gates of death and hell. Burdened with such terrible uncertainty and dread, there are but few who do not at times give loud utterance to a bitter, realizing sense of their weakness, and cry to God for help.

It is perfectly natural for man to pray. Pride may deter; shame may bend low its head to conceal its secret sorrow; but the soul feeling the divine breathing of the upper world sweeping o'er it, yearns to open itself to God as morning flowers open themselves to the genial warmth and light of the sun. There is not a warm, pure, ennobling, gushing, emotion of our nature, but naturally breathes out in prayer. In such times all feel that God is the best friend—our natural protector—and hence we look to him alone.—The Evangel.

The Bright Side.

The following is from the advance sheets of a book of incidents in the war, about to be published under direction of the Christian Commission. It is from the pen of Rev. E. P. Smith, whose health gave way under the climate, while laboring among the soldiers at the siege of Vicksburg.—Morning Star.

I had been in the army but a few days when I was taken sick with the malaria fever, and carried to a division hospital. It was my first experience of sickness in camp. I said to myself, when they had carried me into the tent and left me alone, without even a sick comrade,

"Now you will have an opportunity to try the efficacy of the counsels you have so often given to soldiers in like circumstances"—for many a time, by the cot of a sick soldier, longing for home, I had said,

"Only trust in Jesus and he will take care of you here just as well as if you were at home."

But I found it far easier to preach than to practise. I knew that God does all things right and well, but I could not help the feeling that a change in my present prospects would be an improvement.

I passed a sleepless night—alone, and without a light. The more I tried to settle into the conviction that God would provide and make it good for me, the more I was longing for a change. My theology said, "It is right and well for me to be sick among strangers, if God wills," and my heart always added, "Yes, but it would be better to be sick at home." While I thus lay thinking and tossing on my blanket, just at the gray of the dawn in the morning, the fold of my tent parted, and a black face peered through. It was "Old Nannie," a colored woman who had taken my washing the day before. I could hear no one else moving about the hospital; what had sent her there at that hour? Looking tenderly at me, she said,

"No, Nanny," said I, "it isn't so bright as I wish it was."

"You do," said I, "maybe you haven't had much trouble."

"Maybe not," she said; and then went on to tell me, in her simple, broken way, of her life in Virginia, of the selling of her children one by one, of the auction sale of her husband, and then of herself. She was alone now in the camp, without having heard from one of her kindred for years:

"But, Nanny," said I "have you seen the bright side all the time."

"Well, how did you do it?"

"Dis is de way, massa. When I see de great brack cloud comin' over"—and she waved her dark hand inside the tent, as though one might be settling down there; "an' 'pears like comin' crushin' down on me, den I jist whips aroun' on de oder side, an' I find de Lord Jesus dar; an' den it's all bright an' cl'ar. De bright side's allus where Jesus is, massa."

"Well, Nanny," said I, "if you can do that, I think I ought to."

She went away. I turned myself on my blanket and said in my heart, "'The Lord is my Shepherd.' It is all right and well. Now come fever or health, come death or life, come burial on the Yazoo Bluff or in a churchyard at home—'the Lord is my Shepherd.'"

With this sweet peace of rest, God's care and love became very precious to me. I fell asleep. When I awoke I was in a perspiration; my fever was broken. "Old Nanny's" faith had made me whole.

Romans x., 10.

A visitor was one morning going the round of a military hospital in India. One of the patients had shortly before been brought in with an injured or diseased leg. He was young and of a repulsive appearance, sullen and impudent in expression. On the visitor's coming up to his bed, he exclaimed that he wanted no preaching, for he was not going to die; and further, to deter any Christian effort, swore and spoke violently. God's messengers, however, dare not be easily affrighted from their allotted ministry; the value of each soul is too highly appreciated by them to admit of personal considerations hindering efforts after it. This one, therefore, sitting down by the sufferer, talked to him of his secular concerns his friends and circumstances, in order to pave the way for higher and holier themes by gaining his confidence. An hour or more had passed, during which the soldier had unbended and chatted away, when the visitor rose, saying other engagements were then pressing; but would he not allow her, after such a long talk according to his fancy, to say the few words she wished. With reluctance, he consented; on which she said that she had no worthy words of her own, and therefore chose for the time to read some of God's words; but that, if he liked, he might chose which particular portion of them he would prefer hearing. After thinking a minute he replied, "Some part of Proverbs that has only moral sayings in it—no heart-work." The visitor, as she turned the pages of her Bible, very fervently prayed to know what passage she should choose, and was guided to the first chapter, which she read through. Truly was this word then proved faithful: "The word of God is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart."

The look of contemptuous derision and indifference changed, after the tenth verse, to one of interest; after the twenty-second, to one of awe and excitement; and before the close of the chapter the soldier was crying and trembling, exclaiming that he was one of the refusers and despisers at whom God would laugh, and that it was too late for him to be saved, he having mocked and spurned the truth too much and too long for pardon ever to be given to him! The Spirit led him to Jesus, and the scorner became a loving disciple, giving evidence of the sincerity of the professed change. The "book of morals" was evermore a specially dear portion of the Bible to him, as that which had brought him to know the Lord and himself. The sinner turned at the reproof, and the reprover forgave him the debt.

Ernest Renan having said in his "Life of Jesus," that the proper way of proving the reality of a miracle is to show one. A pamphleteer "shows" him one in a letter "Upon the Establishment of the Christian Religion," which we here translate:

Sir: Permit me to-day to draw your attention again to the establishment of the Christian religion, a fact upon which we naturally differ in opinion. I, like you, when I have striven to identify its cause with the mere forces of man, have failed in my endeavor. The supernatural, then, has been the only conducting thread which has helped me to escape from the labyrinth, where I see you continually seeking to rectify yourself, without ever doing it, and condemned to escape therefrom only when you shall have proved that there is nothing miraculous in the establishment of Christianity. Pardon this little digression; I go straight to the work. There is a religion called the Christian, whose founder was Jesus named Christ. This religion, which has lasted eighteen centuries, and which calls itself the natural development of that Judaism which ascends near to the cradle of the world, had the apostles for its first propagators. When these men wished to establish it they had for adversaries:

The national pride of the Jews;
The implacable hatred of the Sanhedrim;
The brutal despotism of the Roman emperors;
The railleries and attacks of the philosophers;
The libertinism and caste-spirit of the pagan priests;
The savage and cruel ignorance of the masses.
They had an enemy in Every miser;
Every debauched man;
Every drunkard;
Every thief;
Every murderer;
Every liar;

Not one of the vices, in fact, which abuse our humanity which did not constitute itself their adversary.

To combat so many enemies, and surmount so many obstacles, they had only

Their poverty;
Their obscurity;
Their weakness;
Their fewness;
The Cross.

If you had been their cotemporary at the moment when they began their work, and Peter had said to you, "Join with us, for we are going to the conquest of the world; before our word pagan temples shall crumble, and their idols shall fall upon their faces; the philosophers shall be convicted of folly; from the throne of Cæsar we shall hurl the Roman eagle, in its place we shall plant the cross; we shall be the teachers of the world; the ignorant and the learned will declare themselves our disciples!" hearing him speak thus, you would have said, "Be silent, imbecile!" And as you are tolerant from nature and principle, you would have defended him before the Sanhedrim and have counselled it to shut up the fisherman of Bethsaida and his companions in a madhouse. And yet, sir, what you have thought a notable mad-ness, is to-day a startling reality, with which I leave you face to face.

The Omniscient Eye.

There was significance in the remark of the little boy who was taken by his father into a neighbor's field to steal sheep. After looking around in every direction with careful scrutiny, to see if any one observed them, and being satisfied that there was no one near, the father was about to take the sheep, when the boy exclaimed, "Father, you haven't looked up yet!"

It is said of Gen. O. M. Mitchel, the Christian astronomer, that on one accasion, while a guest at the house of a friend, the host took him upon the house-top to show him the surrounding country. The General, placing a small telescope in position, asked his friend to look through it. At a distance of eight miles, through the woods and underbrush, he observed a man with his dog and gun and he saw him distinctly elevate his piece and shoot down a beautiful bird. The man was not aware that he was seen, yet he seemed to be but a few rods from the General and his friend.

What a spectacle does the world present to the scrutinizing gaze of angels! And were we well assured that every step we take, every line we pen, and every act we perform, were listened to and gazed upon by those higher orders of intelligent beings, would we not all look more carefully at the course we are about to pursue? And did we ever keep before the mind that there is an eye that never slumbers, which beholdeth even the imagination of the thoughts, how often would we hesitate in our way.

The Word of God's Testimony.

Let me entreat you to look to the word of God's testimony, and think not that anything else than a simple reception of these words, "that the blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin," is necessary for the purpose of your being cleansed from your sin. It is the idea that something more is necessary which obstructs this reception. It is the imagination of a great personal work to which you must set yourself, and in which you have hitherto sat down in listlessness and despair, that keeps you at a distance from God. He approaches you with overtures; and what you have to do is to close with them. He approaches you with tidings; and what you have to do is to give credit to them. This is doing the work of God, that you believe on him whom he hath sent; and could this transition be accomplished, then would you be translated into a habit of cheerful and progressive obedience, which, in way of legalism, or in the attempt to establish a righteousness of your own you never can attain.—Dr. Chalmers.

What Will You Say Then?

While Hopu, a young Sandwich Islander, was in America, he spent an evening in a company where an infidel lawyer tried to puzzle him with difficult questions. At length the native said:

"I am a poor heathen boy. It is not strange that my blunders in English should amuse you. But soon there will be a larger meeting than this. We shall all be there. They will ask us all one question, namely: 'Do you love the Lord Jesus Christ?' Now, sir, I think I can say, yes. What will you say, sir?"

When he had stopped, all present were silent. At length the lawyer said that, as the evening was far gone they had better conclude it with prayer, and proposed that the native should pray. He did so; and as he poured out his heart to God, the lawyer could not conceal his feelings. Tears started from his eyes, and he sobbed aloud. All present wept, too; and when they separated, the words, "What will you say, sir?" followed the lawyer home, and did not leave him till he was brought to our Saviour.

Dean Stanley having advocated the endowment of the Roman Church in Ireland, the London Watchman exclaims: "And is it really come to this, that a system which tampers with the integrity of the inspired canon; which immolates the second commandment; which dishonors the mighty sacrifice of the cross by a priestly farce; which denounces the doctrine of justification by faith as a damnable heresy; which recognizes as its temporal and spiritual head, a foreign potentate; and which elevates a creature into a god—is this the system to be paid for out of the same fund, and patronized by the same crown, as the system for which our fathers struggled and our martyrs died, and under the wing of which Great Britain has attained her strength and her glory!"

Though we die, our prayers do not die with us: they outlive us, and those we leave behind us in the world may reap the benefit of them when we are turned to dust.

Constitution of "The Life and Advent Union."

Article I. The object of this Union is to use all available means to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

II. Any person believing in Life through Christ alone, and sustaining a Christian character, may become a member of this Union by subscribing to the Constitution.

III. The officers of this Union shall be a President, Vice-President, Secretary, Treasurer, and five Directors, who together shall constitute the Managing Board, and who are to be elected annually.

IV. The Managers shall be authorized to collect funds for the Union, which funds shall be transmitted to the Business Agent, who shall keep account of the same and transfer them to the Treasurer.

V. The Annual meeting and such other meetings as may be deemed necessary by the Board of Managers, shall be called by giving three weeks' notice.

VI. The Secretary shall keep a record of the names and post-office addresses of the members.

VII. This Constitution may be amended by a two-thirds vote at any Annual meeting.

BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail, the postage has to be pre-paid.

Six Sermons on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, The Righteous only will live again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

This work has been out of print for some months, but is now re-printed.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the true teachings of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage, 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.

No. 1. Earth, not heaven, is to be the inheritance of the saints. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 4. The Soul Saved or Lost. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 5. Moral Depravity; by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 7. Doom of the Ungodly: or, The Wicked Dead remain eternally under death's dominion. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 8. The Wages of Sin: by a Presbyterian Clergyman. Price, 5 cents.

No. 10. Letters to a Clergyman; or, Life only through Christ, not a heresy; by Dr. J. K. Finley, Pittsburg, Pa. Price, 5 cents.

The foregoing tracts are the Bible Examiner size i. e., octavo; and are 16 pages each. Price, 5 cents single. Four of either can be sent for 2 cents postage; where that number is called for, we will send them at our own expense. They will be sold at $3 per 100; but in that case, sent at the expense of the purchaser. One dozen of the foregoing will be sent for 50 cents, and we will pay the postage.

No. 9. The Essential Baptism; by the Editor of the Bible Examiner, 32 pages. Price, 7 cents.

Man's Nature and Destiny; or, the Animal man and the Spiritual man. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price, 5 cents.

The Atonement, by Geo. Storrs, and The Gospel Hope, by the same; both works now printed in one Tract. Price, 5 cents.

All letters in relation to any of these works must be addressed,

THE LIVING SOUL.

[The following article appeared in the first volume of HERALD OF LIFE; but its value induces us to insert it at this time again. Let it be read and pondered well.—EDITOR.]

WHAT is the living soul? is a question which underlies the whole doctrine of Christianity. If man possesses a conscious, immortal nature, attribute or principle, religion is one thing; if he does not, religion is another thing altogether different. And since this life is but a short one, it becomes the utmost desire to know if there is any existence beyond it.

This leads us to inquire—What is life? To this question we have no definite answer. Man, with all his boasted endowments, natural and acquired, has never been able to comprehend so much as one first principle. He has no means of obtaining a knowledge of anything but by and through some created medium: hence all his mighty wisdom is nothing more than what he has found out by experience: and according to the proverb he must be a fool; for a fool learns only in the dear school of experience. Humiliating as it is, man knows no more of the nature of a first principle than the inferior animals. Ask him, for instance, what is gold? and he will immediately begin to tell you of its color, weight, ductility, malleability, value, uses, etc.; and may give you a long lecture on it, or write you a volume, but still the mystery remains as profound as ever; for all he knows of its properties or qualities come through the thing called gold; and the question comes home with redoubled force, what is gold, independent of these qualities, or attributes? And so we ask, what is life? and immediately volumes are poured out, describing its qualities and attributes, and the various media through which its existence is recognized; but these are only the various form of matter that exhibit life; and the question comes home with accelerated force, what is life, independent of all form of matter? This is a secret that angels have not revealed, and one that man is as ignorant of as the marble that marks his resting-place. So of all first principles: if we rub smartly a glass rod with a dry silk, it attracts light bits of straw or paper, and if we ask the reason, we are told that by this process the glass has become electrically excited; but this is only an unmeaning term to express what experience has first taught. It is but a miserable fig-leafed apron to clothe the young child that the experiment brought forth.

So all we know of any final and untangible principle is through the medium and process by which it is manifested. In like manner all we know of life is through the various forms of matter in which it is manifested; and to say that life and consciousness in man exist independent of matter, is as preposterous and as presumptuous as to say the properties, uses, and value of gold exist independent of the material thing called gold. Through matter alone comes all the knowledge we have of the thing called gravitation; and he would not be considered a sane man who would say that gravitation existed independent of matter. And since common sense must admit that nothing weighs nothing—that is, nothing does not possess weight—it ought also to admit that nothing does not possess life. Wherever there is weight there must be something to preponderate; so where there is life there must be something to live.

So long as the soul lives it must be a material something; for an immateriality (which is a nothing), cannot live any more than a nothing can preponderate.

When we say a certain body weighs so much, we make the body one thing, and its weight another; the weight, being one of its properties, cannot exist without the body: so when we say the soul lives; we make the soul one thing, and its life another; the life, being one of its properties, cannot exist without the soul.

So the general question runs thus—What is electricity, life, gravitation, light, thought, sense, the soul, motion, caloric, chemical affinity, cohesive attraction, etc., etc., independent of matter? NOTHING.

But all these things, or rather attributes or qualities of things, do exist, and we gain a knowledge of them only through some of the varied forms of matter; and to talk of a man, or an ox, independent of matter, or an immaterial soul or spirit, in the sense of an inner man, is as great an inverse paragon as an immaterial horse.

But what shall we call these things, primal, uncreated properties? The term may be objectionable, but it is difficult to find one that is not. Such properties must exist forever, while organized bodies and forms of matter are continually changing, or being destroyed; and if their attributes are primal and uncreated, they are eternal. And if eternal, forms were made through which to exhibit them; but if forms were made, they were made of other forms, and some form of matter must have been eternal. But as properties cannot exist independent of matter, so matter cannot exist independent of properties.

It follows, then, that both matter and properties are primal, uncreated. But one God made all the things that are made; for he is the one Maker of all forms, while the qualities of all attributes depend on their respective forms for their existence. And since these forms are continually being destroyed, their attributes are continually ceasing; or since forms are continually changing, all attributes of matter are continually changing.

So God only hath immortality, for he only is unchangeable. Yet when any form is destroyed, no primal attribute is annihilated, but changed, because the matter composing the form is not annihilated, but changed. For instance, a ton of anthracite has anthracitic properties, but when it is burned up it is not anthracite; nor has it anthracitic properties; but it still exists in other forms of matter, and still has the attributes of other forms.

So a living man possesses living attributes, soul, or spirit, and consciousness, but when he is burned up, his soul, or spirit, and consciousness, do not exist because the living man does not. But we are told that his soul, spirit, and consciousness do not burn up. Very true; neither do the anthracitic properties of the coal burn up when the coal burns, but these properties do not exist after the coal is burned. If matter, in any of its forms, possesses any property that cannot be destroyed, it is gravitation. The elementary principles which compose a ton of coal, still exist and weigh a ton after the coal is burned. Gravitation does not depend on the combination and arrangement of parts, but on the quantity of matter. Not so with life and consciousness; these do not depend on a definite amount of matter, therefore gravitation comes nearer to the thing that "never dies" than the soul. But we must not understand that when a man dies, life as a principle, is extinct. Other men still live; but the dead man lives not; his life only is extinct; and this is the very thing which is called death; the extinction of life in the form or being possessing it.

As we have no means of detecting a principle except through some form of matter, we have no means of knowing that a man lives without a material body. As well might we say a severe pain existed where there is no material form through which it is manifested, as to say that consciousness exists where there is no material form to manifest it. He who can tell me the dead are conscious, can tell me what they are conscious of, and what they are thinking about, and through what medium he gained the knowledge.

The same mode of reasoning applies to light. It is a principle which existed from eternity, for "God is light." And here we may be asked, if he possesses a body to manifest it through? It is only through material bodies that he has ever manifested himself to us; and none can show us a man without a body that he has manifested himself unto; and as to his having a body—

"Know, then, thyself; presume not God to scan:

We are investigating men and material things and their attributes for the benefit of those who are too wise to be taught by the word of God. Hence we reason only from what we know. The sun is the luminary of the physical world, and a lamp is a miniature representation of it; but light as a principle is not destroyed when the lamp is extinguished, but the light of the lamp is no more. But he who can tell what becomes of the life, soul, or spirit of a man when he dies can also tell what becomes of the light of a lamp when it is extinguished.

Life is an uncreated attribute: "God is life." It can never cease because God is eternal. But if he imparts a portion of his own divine life to man then man is part divine and part human, and his divine part will not only live forever, but it cannot sin or be punished, neither could it suffer while in a clay tenement. What, then, is human life, independent of a human body?

To those who seek wisdom through the tree of knowledge, we answer. An alkali possesses certain properties, the result of a union of elementary things. For instance, potash is composed of potassium (a metal) and oxygen. These, in combination, possess alkaline properties: but separate them, and their alkaline properties are destroyed; for neither the metal nor the oxygen alone possesses them. But reunite them and the alkaline property is restored. In their separate state they are not potash; in their united state they are, and this is the sum of the matter. The why and the wherefore we know not. The operation is called analysis and synthesis; the former decomposes and destroys the alkali, and the latter recomposes and restores the same.

This has a close resemblance to death and resurrection. There is one great Chemist who can analyze a man and reduce him to dust as he was, and destroy his thoughts and consciousness, then synthesize his dust, and he becomes again a living man, with thoughts and consciousness restored.

When the potash is decomposed, a chemist would betray an ignorance of his art if he should say the alkali still existed; and so does the theologian who says the soul exists when the man is decomposed.

But says one, potash and men are very different things. True, and yet they are, in common with other things, just alike. They both owe their properties to their combination of parts. So when a man dies, his consciousness ceases until the dead man lives again. This must be admitted until it is demonstrated that the consciousness of a man lives without a body or parts. If man has such an existence, that existence can only be demonstrated through some tangible medium, and that medium must be his body and parts. So dead men must be dead until the resurrection; and if there be no resurrection, we may "eat and drink, for to-morrow we die."

But we are told that life does not depend on an organization, for that is often complete, and yet without life.

True, but all organizations are more or less accompanied with circumstances to manifest results. Water will not turn a mill unless it tumbles down a precipice or rolls down an inclined plain. The existence of life requires not only an organization, but heat, and motion of a fluid, as in animal and vegetable life, and undoubtedly the play of an electrical fluid.

Yet what life is, independent of matter, we know not, but the great fountain of it is God, the highest order and its only full embodiment.

The first order of beings below him endowed with it, that we have any account of, are angels: next the Son of Man "a little lower than the angels;" then man, beast, bird, fish, and insect. But it stops not with the animal kingdom; it slides into the vegetable so imperceptibly that we cannot tell where one begins and the other leaves off.

The zoophites are part animal and part vegetable, the connecting link between the two; a sure indication that both possess life. The vegetable kingdom unites again with the mineral in a second connecting link, by which life is poured into minerals.

So as far as life is concerned, man is on a level with the animal, vegetable, and mineral kingdoms.

Nor has he, by nature, more remarkable endowments than many other forms. He has little or no inherent knowledge, and knows nothing but by experience, while the brute knows all by intuition and without experience.

The first swarm of bees, by instinct, formed more perfect hexagons and a better form of government than man has been able to do after going to school six thousand years. The uneducated brute is the better physician. Man spends long years at his books to qualify himself to combat disease and then kills ten patients as often as he cures one. But the brute goes into the fields, nature's apothecary shop; deals out the potion; takes, or administers it, and never fails to cure. But when on the point to die takes no medicine at all; while the learned doctor gives his nostrums, alike to the living and dying. The beast, too, is the better navigator: he will traverse the dense forest, the desert or the trackless ocean without chart or compass, and put his helm to port, be it foggy or fair, with unerring certainty.

Even the spider excels him in the art of spinning and drawing mathematical lines, and all by intuition. The beaver and musk-rat have outstripped even the Herschels in the science of Astronomy by their wonderful foreknowledge of tides and tempests; and other animals, by their prescience of the length and severity of an approaching winter. The brute has indeed seized on the end of all useful science, without going over the ground of acquirement. His instinct is a higher grade of knowledge than the acquired wisdom of man. His life, therefore, has a higher claim to immortality. He is less liable to err: his instinctive mind grasps its object with a greater degree of certainty. His mind is nature, while the mind of man is education.

But man boasts his superiority over the brute in consequence of his superior reasoning faculty. But this faculty is the creature of erring education, and is not a gift of nature, like instinct; if it was, children could reason as well as adults. Also if it was a gift of nature, it would, like instinct, be unerring. But man, being nearly deprived of animal instinct, is left to seek a compensation in the miserable substitute, called reason. Instinct must be right; it is unerring nature, a higher endowment than reason, and runs through all forms of life.

The twiners run toward the nearest support and lay hold of it, and twine around it: and if that support be removed, they will turn again and seek the next nearest. This, in a brute is called instinct; and in a man, wisdom; and in the hop vine vegetable economy.

The hen, with maternal care, gathers her brood under her wings to protect them from the cold damp air of evening; and in like manner plants fold their sepals and petals around their germs which contain their seedlings, the young and tender embryos of the succeeding generations, the vegetable chickens, brooded by the same maternal care. The Christian mother folds her young and tender infant to her bosom from whence it receives warmth and nourishment; being taught her pious duty by the same Being who taught it to the beast, the bird, and the rose. One principle runs through the whole, equally to accomplish the same purpose: while man exclaims, "See my superior soul!" Nor does this instinctive principle stop in the animal and vegetable kingdom. The great sea of matter itself is impregnated with it.

The planets belonging to our system, revolve one way about the sun; viz., from the west, by south, into the east: they turn on their axis the same way; and almost all plants, that twine about a support take the same direction; as also the innumerable coils of sea and fresh water shell-fish. One primal law pervades the whole.

By this law, the mighty orbs that circle the sun produce their days, nights and seasons. Here action is directed to accomplish an end. Now when man acts with such a design, we say he acts from the impulse of a sane mind. But we see planets, and suns, man, beast, birds, and vegetables, with the same design, acting to accomplish an end.

And until we know what mind is, we have no right to say that one form of matter acts consistently from the impulse of mind, and that other forms acting equally as consistently, are blindly compelled to act by the laws of nature. Mind is a law of nature, and all we know of it is its effects. Thus we see that what is improperly called inanimate matter acts with a design: and this is the only proof that man possesses a mind.

Man possesses a sense of feeling; and this is equally true of the brute; yet there are some of so low an order that they give no evidence that they possess this faculty: in this respect they seem inferior to the sensitive plant.

So where soul, life, mind, and will begin and end, we know not; or rather we know they begin with God and end unknown. All created, sublunar things, are matter; mere dust, in various forms. One form of it called wood, is made into a cart and loaded with dirt; another parcel of dust is harnessed to it for a team; and another lump of the same earth is seen in the forward end of the cart for a driver; and away goes the whole together. Behold, I have shown you a mystery; let him explain it who can.

"And are but parts of one stupendous whole,
Whose body nature is, and God the soul."

Alas! thou erring lump of earth: God is no respecter of forms of dust, for he made them all; and he gave yours a soul to fit it for a sphere he designed it to move in; and to every lump a soul to fit it to its own sphere. Let us descend a step lower in created forms, and we see the same mysterious principle at work in the mineral kingdom. This is observable in the science of crystallography. Any substance dissolved in a solvent, and crystalized exhibits a wonderful design to accomplish an end. Submit the solution containing the dissolved substance to a high magnifying power, and evaporate it; and the first appearance of the infinitesimals of matter are seen coming together and turning over and round, so as to unite in due form to complete a perfect and regularly formed body called a crystal. Now by what instinct, mind, or soul, do these particles shape themselves, and move together to form a body? and who is their marshal to arrange them into cubes, prisms, rhombs, octahedrons, and a multitude of other forms? It is what we call mind in man; instinct in brutes; vegetable economy in plants; and may be called mineral economy in crystals; but if we call it chemical affinity, still the term is as unintelligible as that of mind. But it is all one and the same thing, "THE SOUL OF MATTER."

It exists in every form; and ceases to exist when the form is destroyed. As the identity of the soul principle depends on the identity of the form; the soul or mind cannot exist without the identity of the form. For instance; man, as a material living being, possesses a mind; one that is identically the mind of one individual; and not the mind of another; but on the dissolution of the individual, this individual and identical mind ceases to exist until the material man re-assumes his individual and identical form. This is death and resurrection: in which the identity of the materrial form and the identity of the mind both stand or fall together. And since matter cannot exist without attributes, and attributes cannot exist without matter; souls cannot exist without bodies of some grade; and bodies cannot exist without souls of some grade. It follows, then, that living and conscious forms must possess living and conscious souls (or attributes, call them what we may) and inanimate forms must possess inanimate souls. There is, therefore, nothing more scientifically correct than the language—"Man became a living soul." For as soon as he became alive—the man was the living soul; and the living soul was the man.

It will now be in place to consider in what respect is man superior to other animals. It is not because he has any quality, property or soul less independent of his material form and organization; but because he has powers and faculties preeminent and peculiar to his own organization.

One peculiar trait in his character is, his superior ability to learn by experience, and his insatiable thirst for knowledge, and to obtain it in his own strength. From this circumstance he has acquired a better general knowledge of things; while the lower animals possess a better intuitive knowledge of particular things. This endowment, with his superior reflective faculty, brought him into collision with the revealed will of his Creator, by whom and to whom he becomes accountable for his conduct. No doubt he was made, endowed with a higher instinct (amounting nearly to inspiration) than any other animal. And had he continued in his primal state, his instinctive powers would have kept him superior in intuitive knowledge to all other earthly beings.

But as he was a free agent, he departed from his primal intuitive knowledge, which is given only on the spur of the moment, and chose his own way of seeking wisdom by relying on his own strength rather than on his Creator, and sought wisdom in advance of his necessities. This is not in accordance to the order of nature; which is—"Give us this day our daily bread."

The lower animals have not perverted this order; and they receive from the bountiful hand of their Creator all they really need; what they need; and when they need. But this ever bountiful hand supplies no faster than the present want of the creature demands; and this keeps the creature just where he should be; ever dependent on the great Giver.

The sparrow receives her food day by day, taking no thought for to-morrow. She has no artificial wants; and because she has not tasted the tree of knowledge she has no ability to create them. But not so with fallen man; he multiplies his wants and then unjustly complains that God does not supply them.

The animals, by intuition, take no thought for to-morrow; therefore God supplies their real wants day by day: while man having fallen from intuitive wisdom, is left to himself, to rely on his own resources and to multiply his artificial wants and supply them the best way he can. This is the wretched effect of artificial knowledge, to lead us to trust in ourselves rather than in God. The tree being tasted, man fell from intuitive and unerring, day by day wisdom, to self education: and from an unerring principle to an erring one: thus taking the business of teaching true wisdom out of the hand of God and assuming it himself. This is the world's great error: men are more willing to be taught of erring men than to be taught of an unerring God. No wonder, therefore, that human wisdom is inferior to brute instinct; for man is taught of man, while the beast is taught of God.

Man is in a fallen state, the brute is not, therefore his instinct remains a monument of the excellency of man's unfallen nature, and what it will be when restored.

We must now inquire why man was made thus liable to so disastrous a reverse of fortune. He was made to fill a certain sphere that no other being could: for there are as many spheres to fill as there are forms to fill them. And man, to fill his sphere, must have been endowed with just such faculties. And had he been endowed with faculties high enough to have kept him from sinning, he would have been an angel, or some being fitted for a hgher sphere. And had his endowments been not high enough to have sinned then he would have been a brute, or some animal fitted for a lower sphere; in either case there would not have been found a man to till the ground.

His primal state was mere animal; and as such he had no hope of eternal life. This hope was made to hang on his obedience to God, and consequent right to the tree of life. But he could not have been a subject of obedience unless he was liable to disobedience. "For the creature was made subject [i. e. liable] to vanity [or sin] not willingly but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope." His primal condition was liability to sin and die like a brute, or to obey and live forever. But to obey is to pursue virtue, and to pursue virtue, is to pursue happiness; and a happy life is the only one fit for eternal duration, and the only one that can attain to it: for, an eternal, unhappy life cannot enter into the divine plan of a good Being. Therefore, eternal life hangs on the pursuit of virtue. But virtue consists only in overcoming an evil; and where there is no evil to overcome, there is no virtue to practise and no hope of eternal life. It was therefore necessary to put before the creature man a tempting evil to overcome, as a stepping stone to a higher state. By this divine arrangement a lower order of beings were made susceptible of attaining to a higher state: and yet not hurl from their sphere any higher order of beings. Now there can be no "Universal Progression." For as the whole of anything is equal to the sum of all its parts, as long as there are parts, the parts must be parts; and one part cannot be another part, without crowding another part out of its place.

We have shown that one universal soul, variously modified, pervades the great sea of matter; and if it is progressive in one form it is in another; and the lower forms must be continually hurling those above from their sphere: until each by turns dethrones the Almighty, and leaves a perfect blank behind.

The first progress made by human wisdom was downward; and six thousand years of self education has not brought man up to the high state from which he fell, nor even placed him on the level with the intuitive knowledge of the lower animals. Nothing but a change of education can raise the fallen creature; and that change is the work of grace to turn men from their interdicted knowledge to the revealed will of God. This is given through the holy prophets and apostles; and is inspired wisdom; and must have been the instinctive wisdom of man prior to that obtained through the forbidden tree. The fruit of this tree is a miserable substitute for kind nature's unerring instinct; and is what Isaiah xxv., 7, calls "The vail that is spread over all nations," and will be destroyed, or as the margin reads swallowed up in the future age, in the restitution of all things: when as Joel says—God will pour out his spirit upon all flesh.

In the restitution Christ and his saints will be the full embodiment of this Spirit, through which true knowledge will be disseminated to all nations. And as the interdicted tree knowledge and the curse go hand in hand, in this world; so in the world to come, the restored intuitive knowledge and the blessing to all nations are inseparably connected.

CAUSES OF SUDDEN DEATH.

Very few of the sudden deaths which are said to arise from the diseases of the heart do really arise from that cause. To ascertain the real origin of sudden deaths, the experiment has been tried in Europe, and reported to a scientific congress held at Strasburg. Sixty-six cases of sudden death were made the subject of a thorough post mortem examination. In these cases only two were found that had died of disease of the heart. Nine out of sixty died of apolexy, while there were forty-six cases of congestion of the lungs—that is, the lungs were so full of blood they could not work, there not being room enough for a sufficient quantity of air to enter to support life. The causes that produce congestion of the lungs are—cold feet, tight clothing, costive bowels, sitting still until chilled after being warmed with labor or rapid walk, going too suddenly from a close, heated room, into the cold air, especially after speaking, and sudden depressive news operating on the lungs and circulation of the blood. These causes of sudden deaths being known, an avoidance may serve to lengthen out valuable lives which would otherwise be lost under the verdict of heart complaint. That disease is supposed to be inevitable and incurable; hence men may not take the pains they would to avoid sudden death if they knew it lay in their power. A judicious and persevering use of the inhalation of the common air through the inhaling-tube, would, we are persuaded, even in persons who have no tendency to consumption, in many cases prolong life full ten years. It would toughen the throat and lungs, and do away with all the liability to congestion and inflammation of these organs, to which so many are liable by reason of the lack of out-of-door, vigorous exercise, and of a sedentary life; and especially as persons advance in age, it would tend greatly to keep up to its normal condition the circulation and arterialization of the blood and a healthy state of the digestive organs, and thus lessen the liability to sudden death.

NEVER trouble your heads that you have not commentators and expositions; pray and read, and read and pray; for a little from God is better than a great deal from man. There is nothing that so abides with us as what we receive from God; and the reason why Christians at this day are at such a loss for some things is, because they are content with what comes from men's mouths, without searching and kneeling before God to know the truth of things.—Bunyan.

THE doctrine which cannot stand the test of rational investigation, cannot be true. We have gone too far when we have said such and such doctrines should not be subjected to rational investigation, being doctrines of pure revelation. I know of no such doctrine in the Bible. The doctrines of this book are the doctrines of eternal reason, and they are revealed because they are such.—Adam Clarke.

THERE is this difference between happiness and wisdom: he that thinks himself the happiest man, really is so; but he who thinks himself the wisest man, is generally the greatest fool.

TERMS OF THE HERALD OF LIFE.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR; or, 48 numbers; One Dollar for six months; or, 24 numbers; invariably in advance. When served by Carrier in New York City, 48 cents additional.

The Postage on the HERALD OF LIFE, prepaid quarterly or yearly at the office where it is received, is 20 cents a year to any part of the United States. The postage to Canada and the British Provinces is also 20 cents a year, and must be prepaid in New York; for such papers, therefore, the price will be $2 20 a year or $1 10 for six months.

We can not undertake to prepay postage upon newspapers, except where the law obliges us to do so; that is, anywhere out of the United States.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ALL LETTERS relating to the HERALD OF LIFE, whether on business or other matter, must invariably be addressed:

GEO. STORRS, Box 4,658,
New York.

ALL NAMES of persons, sent us, should be written plain, so that we shall not have to guess them out. Also in ordering, the name of the POST OFFICE, COUNTY, AND STATE must be given, and written plainly; and if a CHANGE is called for, state the Office to which the paper has previously been sent. Unless attention is paid to all these matters confusion and delay are inevitable.

THE SPRINGFIELD CAMP-MEETING.

IF the separation at Wilbraham last year was one of peculiar sorrow, the meeting at Springfield this year was a compensating one. The ground has been consecrated by the prayers and praise of the largest gathering of Advent believers that has probably ever taken place. It proved to be one of the best also, with more love, more sober contemplation of the great questions affecting the history of our race and its impending destiny, and earnest work of preparation and consecration.

I went early, and reached the camp on Sabbath morning, the day preceding the formal opening. The weather was lovely all through the week, with only one shower on the last day. From Springfield, where I stopped over night, I took an omnibus and rode the intervening mile through a line of "unwalled" residences, enriched by hedges, groves, and lawns of living green. The only thing to mar the pleasant scene was the levity of the young and gay, who were on their way to the meeting as if it were a worldly frolic, and not one where truths of momentous importance to their salvation were proclaimed.

The committee who had charge of the grounds, in laying them out, exercised most excellent taste in making them appear like the old camp at Wilbraham. The trees are unlike the majestic ones at the old place, but are more numerous. An abundance of excellent water flowed on both sides of the camp. Altogether, the aspect and convenience left nothing to regret on account of the change.

The services began on Sunday by a most timely discourse from Br. Grant. It was characteristic of the man—full of kindly suggestions to meet the duties of the intervening week.

The Life tent I found in charge of Br. Littell, who had to take the place of Br. Wolcott, who was sick. This was a great disappointment, not only to his personal friends, but many who expected to make his acquaintance at this meeting.

On Monday the time was occupied in putting up tents and getting ready to participate in the services of the week. Br. Carpenter gave a discourse in the evening on the Bible, which was listened to with much interest. It should be published in tract form. Except that of Br. Hastings, there was no discourse of much interest until Wednesday evening. Br. Hastings' subject was on church order, and was ably handled. Some of his remarks seemed to bear directly on certain abuses that he did not care to name; but those concerned might understand what.

On Wednesday evening Br. Pyle gave the first discourse that vibrated the hearts of the great gathering, and he had the most eager listeners. It was on the signs of the times, showing the harmony of prophecy and history, and, by his arguments and facts, bringing to view the fulfilment of every possible incident of prophecy within a short circle of time. Although not positive, he regarded it most probable that sometime within a year would bring the consummation of his hope. He spoke quietly, with no declamation, but was full of tender feeling that manifested his earnest conviction in his own statements.

Br. Pyle would have given his discourse in the Life tent, had he not been invited to the main stand. He is settled in the belief that there is no resurrection to life of any wicked. His work, however, he feels, is the proclamation of the Lord's coming, and in that he is acting in accordance with the views of all who listened to the able discourse referred to.

On Thursday the annual meeting of the "Life Believers" took place. For a full account of the proceedings, the reader will have to refer to the record given by the Secretary, Br. McAllister. Unlike the conditions last year, when we had neither home nor shelter from a pitiless storm, our "Union" met in a spacious tent, on a lovely morn, and consummated its work in the same satisfactory manner as in all previous times.

On each day, services of some kind were held in Br. Wolcott's tent. The conference and prayer-meetings were exceedingly interesting; on Wednesday and Thursday especially.

Br. Storrs received an invitation, soon after arriving on Thursday, from the Preaching Committee, to preach on the main stand. All the members of that committee were earnest in their desire to make our friends feel that the promises made should be faithfully kept on their part. If all their efforts were not successful, it was no fault of theirs. On that score we, as a body, can urge no complaints. Brs. Grant, Himes, Menger, Matthewson, and others of the leading friends controlling the affairs of the camp, are entitled to affectionate regard, and they have endeared themselves more than ever by their manifest love for all the brethren.

Starting forward as a small handful of believers in our doctrines, we have become in five years second in strength only to one other body, and it, seemingly, is moving steadily on to the same ground. God has truly acknowledged his truth in our hands in his manifest care over us through every trial and difficulty, and to-day we have bright skies and fair winds as we journey on to the end where we shall all lose sight of our small differences in the glories of that perfect kingdom which we have struggled so long to enter.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 9, 1868.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NOBLY have LIFE believers come up to the support of "our own paper." See the Secretary's Report of the Anniversary of the LIFE AND ADVENT UNION, and the list of pledges, viz., $2,588. That was bravely and nobly done; showing there is no abatement of interest in the matter of its continuance. But one voice was heard: that was, Let the HERALD OF LIFE be sustained at all hazards and at whatever cost.

Now, friends and subscribers, two more numbers complete Vol. V., and the first of October commences Vol. VI. Shall there not be an effort to see if we cannot double our list to commence the new volume? One subscriber each will do it. We will accept the pay as in advance for the volume if paid promptly before January, 1869, if $2 are paid for the entire volume. This is some departure from our regular terms: but try it and see what can be done. Prompt advance pay is preferable, always; but if that cannot be, send it by January; do not fail of that.

OLD SUBSCRIBERS. Some of you may have paid somewhat beyond the present volume; but suppose you make the paper a donation of what is still your due, and send pay for the next volume in full? Then you will know when your subscription ends, and not be in doubt in the matter. You see what sacrifices some have made for the continuance of the paper. With your approval, we propose that you help in the way suggested; only let it be a freewill offering. May the rich blessing of our covenant God rest on and abide with you all.

THE CAMPAIGN DOCUMENTS.

IN the last three months we have put in circulation four thousand of the pamphlet LIFE FROM THE DEAD; three thousand each of A DEFENCE OF THE BIBLE, and THE JUDGMENT. These have all been paid for by donations or otherwise. This work, so well begun, must still be prosecuted to the end of the Campaign. To this end, let us still contribute to the funds by donations or by purchase of documents. We have just ordered another lot of them printed, at a cost of a hundred dollars or more, the late camp-meeting having entirely exhausted our stock on hand. About one hundred and fifty dollars' worth of these and our other works were disposed of at that meeting, mostly as a free gift. Let us now replenish the funds to go on with this work. We know that much good has already been accomplished, and the campaign must go on with increased vigor; and we trust it will.

The three works can still be had for 14 cents, including the postage; or, 100 of each for $12, including postage, or for $10 when sent by express or taken at our office.

In ordering these works, you need not suppose you must take an equal number of each. State which you want; that is, what proportion of each; and if you do not wish any of some of them, say so; and we will send you the amount of your money in either one of them, if that is your wish.

Never could so much be accomplished with so little expense in spreading the Life views. We are now sending out the fifth thousand of "LIFE FROM THE DEAD: or, The Righteous only will Live again."

"THE LIVING SOUL."

THE article under the above head, on the first page of this sheet, may seem long to the eye, but if you have any taste for a rich subject you will find it too short in reading. It ought to be put into a tract and circulated by tens of thousands. Who will help do it? Let us have the funds and it shall soon be ready to go on its mission. The first two thousand will cost about $40. Shall it be issued?

PHOTOGRAPHS OF THE EDITOR.

WHILE at our anniversary, some expressed a wish to have a recent photograph of the EDITOR, as he has changed somewhat in his appearance in the last two years. To gratify such, we have obtained a new supply, which can be had for twenty-five cents at the office, or twenty-eight by mail. They are taken by R. A. Lewis, Chatham Street, New York.

THE EDITOR AT CAMP-MEETING.

A CAMP-MEETING, at our time of life, is no desirable place for us, and we go there, if at all, for the sake of others, and not our own. In these days we see no necessity for them, and think them an expensive luxury, really more of a sort of picnic than a strictly religious gathering. The fact that the LIFE AND ADVENT UNION was organized, five years since, at one of these camp-meetings, has made it a sort of necessity that our anniversary should be held at the same time and place, since. At first our Life views were hardly tolerated on the camp-ground, but they have been steadily advancing, till last year, when it was found necessary to select and fit up a new camp ground, the opposition so far yielded as to appoint some of the Life believers on the committee for that purpose, and more than $500 was raised from our friends for this object; and the UNION, itself, paid $100 for that object from its funds.

Under these circumstances it was to be expected that we should occupy a place at the meeting. Accordingly, the "Life and Advent Mission Tent" was pitched August 22d, Saturday, and spread itself beautifully. It is large and pleasant, and will hold four or five hundred persons. In this tent we held the anniversary of the UNION, Thursday, Aug. 27. We did not arrive on the ground till that morning. We were waited on by a few of our friends, who informed us that the "Committee on Preaching" had determined to ask us to preach on the "Preachers' Stand" at any time we might choose, and that they asked no pledge of us as to what we would preach, but desired us to be as considerate of their position as we could. We remarked to those who communicated with us, that no pledge, implied or otherwise, would be given by us. If we could not preach untrammelled we would not preach at all. Such was the understanding, and with this understanding we went on the "Stand," Friday, P. M., and spoke to some three thousand people. We preached on "God is love," and endeavored to make that characteristic appear in its true light in the Divine government of the world. About the only direct allusion we made to our peculiar views on the non-revival of the wicked dead, was, after showing that our subjection to death itself was an act of love, we said, "If love will bring to life again the wicked dead, let them come." That we said nothing on our peculiar views that should have given offence to our opponents may be seen from the following notice of the Springfield Daily Evening Union of our discourse as follows:

> At two o'clock the audience, which, though not as large as yesterday, contained as many as could be comfortably seated within hearing distance of the stand, were addressed by Rev. Geo. Storrs, of New York, a leading man in a wing of Advents who disbelieve in the resurrection of the wicked, even to be judged. He made no allusion, however, to his peculiar doctrine, but gave them a moderate plain talk on the character of God, claiming the views entertained by many of the Deity led to infidelity. His text was, "God is love."

Thus it is evident we gave no just cause of offence to the believers of the reliving of the wicked dead. We meant our sermon for a peace offering to the utmost verge we could go without hiding our own faith, which we can never do to please any man, or body of men. We believe the congregation generally were satisfied that we had said the least we honestly could have said, believing as we do. A few of the preachers, we learned, were offended, and accused us of violating our "pledge." What pledge we do not know, for we made none, as we have before stated. If we are correctly informed, the "Committee on Preaching" were not dissatisfied with our course; if other preachers were, we regret it, but cannot relieve them; we have no concession or apology to make.

Sunday morning, Aug. 30th, Br. Miles Grant preached in our large tent an excellent practical discourse on following peace and things whereby one may edify another. In the afternoon we preached, in the same place, on following "holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord." We briefly noticed in what holiness consisted, viz., harmony with God, and then showed, from the general tenor of the Bible and positive declarations of Scripture, that the wicked could never see God, and consequently the wicked dead would never be revived into life. We explained the adverse texts to harmonize with this view, and answered as many questions as any were pleased to ask, occupying perhaps an hour and a half in all. We trust the labor was not in vain.

We have returned to our labor on the HERALD OF LIFE with the consciousness that we have done what we could to promote the cause of truth on the glorious Life theme, and determined to prosecute our work with what strength our Father in heaven may bestow on us. Let us have your prayers that we may, in all things, seek not our own, but the things that are Jesus Christ's.

A SALUTATION FROM JACOB GRIM.

TO THE FRIENDS OF THE HERALD OF LIFE AND MEMBERS OF THE LIFE AND ADVENT UNION, GREETING:

IN and through the kindness of our heavenly Father we were permitted to meet at Springfield, according to appointment, on Thursday, August 27th.

The contrast from last year was remarkable. Then the rain descended in torrents during all the time we were on the ground. This year the sun shone in all its glory. We had quite a good gathering. Through the kindness of Br. E. Wolcott, of Ocean Port, N. J., we had a beautiful tent to meet in. The tent was large and well filled; and the spirit manifested was that of men and women in earnest, and filled with a determination to accomplish that which they have undertaken. The enthusiasm was not so great as last year, which we attribute to the rain and surrounding circumstances at that time; being hemmed in so close to our tent during the rain. But the determination to sustain the HERALD OF LIFE was just as strong as last year. We met in the morning at 10 o'clock for conference and and a free expression of sentiments; and in the afternoon at 2 o'clock we met for business. After the meeting was opened with prayer by our Br. Storrs, we proceeded to the election for officers, to serve the ensuing year. The following named Brn. were elected: Jacob Grim, of Phila., president; Wm. H. Thorne, vice-president; Wm. H. H. McAllister, secretary; and Leonard C. Thorne, treasurer. Geo. K. Carroll, John Kemp, Thomas Redhead, Richard Martin, Wm. Roworth, all of New York and Brooklyn, directors.

The effort was then made, upon a resolution being offered, to raise by pledge the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars, exclusive of subscriptions, for the purpose of sustaining the paper for the ensuing year. In less than three hours the whole sum was pledged for the support of the paper. The friends then rose and sung the doxology in praise to our heavenly Father for his kindness manifested unto us.

And now we would say, let every subscriber to the HERALD OF LIFE pledge themselves, that before the close of the first six months of the current year shall have passed away, they will increase the subscription list at least one name besides their own; and thus we can double our number, and be the means of doing much good. We feel satisfied there is not an individual whose influence is so feeble that he cannot do thus much. God has blessed his truth, and He has blessed the feeble efforts put forth to spread the truth; and He will still bless us in our efforts to scatter it abroad, broad-cast.

So far as I am individually concerned, I would rather give up all our preaching than give up the HERALD OF LIFE. Through the paper we can reach many whose ears we could never get to give us a hearing.

Let us each and every one, then, resolve if we cannot work in any other way, we can and will work in this way. Circulate it among your friends, speak of the paper and the truths it contains; and thus we may be the means in the hands of God, in doing much good.

Just before the meeting closed we again placed the name of our venerable Br. Storrs at the head of our paper, as Editor. And may our kind and heavenly Father spare his life to us for many years, that his name may head our banner.

On Friday afternoon, by invitation, Br. Storrs preached from the large stand of the Advent Camp Ground, from the words, "God is love." The audience was composed of several thousand persons of all classes; and the attention was good. The benches were placed in front of the stand forming half a circle; and it is said would seat over three thousand persons. These were nearly all filled, while many stood near the stand. The attention was good throughout the whole discourse. Just before the close of the lecture we walked around on the outskirts of the circle to see if those farthest from the speaker could hear, and we found Br. Storrs' voice was so clear that we could hear him at any point inside of the tents that composed the half circle.

We never experienced such a desire to hear what we had to say on the life theme; many who had never heard of the arguments in its favor came to our tent and asked many questions concerning the truth of the resurrection, as it is in Jesus the LIFE-GIVER. I confess, for one, I came away from the ground fully convinced that our meeting was not in vain. We formed many pleasant acquaintances, and met many who, though we have been acquainted through the paper, we had never before met face to face. And now kind friends, may we all so labor the coming year that we may be able at its close, to say the world has been the gainer for our services in it, and God's cause has been promoted, and some soul has been blessed through our labors, is the prayer of your brother in Christ. JACOB GRIM.

DELAYED AND DECLINED ARTICLES.

AN editor may sometimes be negligent in the examination of articles. This may be unavoidable, especially when the article or series of articles is long and long "continued;" and perhaps not very plainly written. They may in such cases be laid by for a leisure time for examination, and possibly overlooked afterward, till he is roused by a complaint of the writer that his articles do not appear in the paper; and perhaps this is accompanied with a wish to know if we do not allow articles in our "free paper" the sentiments of which differ from our own. We can assure all such that, to our knowledge, we have never declined an article for the reason that the writer was not in agreement with our views.

Some persons write on subjects which, in our best judgment, we are compelled to decline, because, to us, it is manifest no good can result from their introduction into the HERALD OF LIFE. We may misjudge; but we use the best judgment we have. Long articles sometimes are sent, made up mainly of quotations of Scripture. The writer seems to have supposed that such a course would fill up space, but to have overlooked the fact that some exposition is wanted of those texts to make his communication interesting to readers. The author insinuates, perhaps, that the paper is "sometimes partly filled with pieces" he has in his "house," but forgets that articles he sends us are "sometimes" almost entirely filled with words from a book which nearly all have in their "houses;" none the worse for that, provided that something besides mere quotations, with an assumption of what they teach, accompanies them. As a general rule, an article made up of mere quotations of Scripture we decline, because such a method is not interesting, and gives little light beyond the mere words, which all had before.

One who complains says:

> The paper was started for the purpose of having the privilege of conferring with each other through it without making opinion a test to speak; if I understand it. Must I be compelled to believe you bar my articles from the paper on account of their being out of harmony with yours?

"The object of this Union is to use all available means to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness."

The statement is made at the head of the paper every week, that,

> THE OBJECT of this paper is to promulgate the truth of "LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST:" or, a future life and a resurrection from the dead, are both conditional; and only bestowed at the second advent of Christ, "at the last day."—See our motto.

We repeat, we never have excluded an article, from any one, for the reason that the sentiment was "out of harmony with" ours. We have excluded some because they involve questions on which the Christian world have speculated for ages without any sanctifying result; and nothing but speculation and perplexity can grow out of them: for example, How God exists. They only darken counsel by words of speculation, which seems to us to be labor lost, if nothing worse.

Hardly any writer fails to have some good things, or points in his article; while, possibly, they are compassed about with so many superfluous words, and perhaps so crowded together that it is extremely difficult to separate the useful from the other, so that the labor is not undertaken; and if we had performed it, the writer probably would have been as little satisfied as though we had declined the whole.

We intend to exercise our best judgment in all these matters, and to seek not our own, but the things which are Jesus Christ's. If our brethren are grieved sometimes, so are we, also. Let us try to bear one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ.

ZION'S HERALD ONCE MORE.

THIS is the third time within a few weeks past, we have had occasion to notice the above named Methodist paper. We have ever maintained the kindest feelings toward the Methodists, as a body, since we withdrew from their church organization in 1840. Among them are many we highly esteem to this day; tho' most of our former associates in their body have fallen asleep, or have become unable to labor in preaching.

When we first came out in the gospel faith of life eternal only to the righteous, Zion's Herald was the first to open fire on us. This was in 1841, '42. We asked the privilege of a brief reply; but this was denied us; we were thereafter by those under the influence of that paper, counted an "infidel." Time rolled on. Abuse and falsehood were heaped on us by such mushrooms as Prof. Mattison, who were but babies when we bore the heat and burden of the fight, with a few others in the M. E. Church, against slavery, in 1835 to 1840. We were censured in 1836 by the "General Conference" of that church, then in session in Cincinnati, Ohio, for attending, one evening, an anti-slavery prayer meeting.

That venerable body of more than two hundred ministers, passed that vote of censure with only seventeen dissenting voices.

Thirty-two years passed away. We have kept right on our way, following truth on all religious questions, wherever we found it; thus advanced far beyond Methodist theology on many points; while they have advanced only as circumstances compelled; for since 1836 the General Conference has so progressed on the question of slavery that at its last session, at Chicago, Ill., it actually voted to "rescind" the vote of censure passed on us and one other preacher—Rev. Samuel Norris, now residing in Brooklyn, N. Y.—in 1836. That was a noble and praiseworthy act; but their own credit was involved. That church had all become, now that slavery was dead, what we were in 1836 in the face of its living power. A dead lion is not so much to be feared as a living one; but we thank the General Conference of the M. E. Church, for doing us justice after so long time.

We are engaged now, and have been since 1840, in another battle against a worse enemy of God and truth than slavery, viz., Inherent immortality, endless torture for human beings, and the doctrine of an almost almighty and omnipresent spirit-devil, upheld in being by our Creator to deceive the ignorant children of men, and thus prepare them for eternal or endless and hopeless torments. Slavery, before such a system of theology, is all but a virtue. Yet now these Methodists, so recently converted to views we held and promulgated through persecution and censure thirty-two years ago, manifest the same spirit toward us on the Life views, they did then on our slavery views.

We, however, are neither dismayed nor discouraged; for as they have been brought to our views on the subject of slavery, so, ultimately, they will be compelled to take our ground on the Life views. It may be from necessity, as in the slavery case. God will yet as truly abolish their view of man's nature and the destiny of the wicked, as He has overthrown the groundwork about slavery held by them in 1836. If we are to endure their censure another thirty-two years, then so be it; though we think the change will come with them in a much shorter period. We know that some of the best minds in the Methodist E. Church are already undergoing a change in these matters, and the truth will not always lie crushed in that church on these great questions. There are too many noble minds in that body, to be kept always chained by the superstitions of heathenism and papacy. Light will reach them, and they will burst the fetters of iron with which they have so long been bound, and stand forth the LORD's freemen. Zion's Herald may now sneer at such a suggestion; but the day will surely come. We do not expect to see it in this age of our life; but we shall see it hereafter, and see the joy that will fill the hearts of converted Methodists that they are delivered from the awful and God-dishonoring doctrine of immortal souls in hopeless torture. The LORD will accomplish it in his time, and we are content to labor and bear reproach till it come.

These remarks have been called forth by the following ones in Zion's Herald of Aug. 20th, which was handed us at Springfield, during the Camp-meeting. Of course, that paper still declines an exchange and we are indebted to one of its subscribers for it. We shall append a few notes, which is all that is necessary after our introduction. It says,

> The Herald of Life occupies a column in attempting to answer about a dozen lines of THE HERALD's on the annihilation of the wicked. The Herald of Death, it should be called, as every soul is alive now, and it is only a cessation of that life which is to occur, it declares, to certain classes of men. (1.) There is no need of answering its answer. George Storrs struck telling blows against slavery in the old New England Conference days. They hit every time. Now he is as one that beateth the air. (2.) If the devils live, as he does not deny in this article, then sinners may out of the body. (3.) If they may for a time, then forever. Does a fair interpretation of the Word prove this? We think it does. Christ declared Judas had gone to his own place (4), and the rich man and the rich fool whose soul was "required," sought for, of him. (5.) There was not much sleep for that poor sinner in that dread requisition. (6). He warned them that the sinners should go away into everlasting punishment, and that some should "arise to everlasting contempt." (7.) Our brother thinks if he should fall away, his continued assurance of immortality would be a delusion of the devil. But what if the consciousness of all mankind, Christian and non-Christian, think otherwise. (8.) Better come back to the old work. (9.) Preach the gospel that is revealed, and leave the mysteries not essential to our salvation for eternity to disclose. (10.)

(1.) Our HERALD is a "Herald of Death" to all such vain traditions as inherent immortality and endless torments. Such dogmas must and will die, and we are helping to kill them.

(2.) But it seems we "hit" sometimes, now; else why hide your heads and refuse to exchange with the HERALD OF LIFE, or even send us your paper when you speak of our views? We send you ours when we speak of you. Are you afraid of "one that beateth the air?" If we fight as you say, it is because the doctrines we oppose are airy things, and probably had their origin in that place.

(3.) This is strange logic. Because devils, or satans, live, and are found on every side of us, real and tangible, therefore intangible souls of "sinners may live out of the body!" We rather guess that logic "beateth the air."

(4.) Will you please tell us what was Judas' own place? We suppose you have read the learned Methodist commentator, Dr. A. Clarke, on his case; and he thinks Judas might have gone to heaven! At any rate, our Br. of Zion's Herald should know the Bible better than to put words in our Lord's mouth that he never uttered. "Christ" did not "declare that Judas had gone to his own place;" but if he had, it does not follow that he was among living men anywhere. "The wages of sin is death." Death is the final place of sinners. We hope Zion's Herald will yet be able to get that idea into its mind.

(5.) If any one can tell what is meant by this mixed up sentence, they are welcome to all the information it gives.

(6.) No; nor has there been to this day to that symbolical sinner; viz., the Jews, as a people, whose condition in this world is represented by that parable, since their death politically, not literally. What has this to do with the positive testimony of the Bible that "there is no knowledge in sheol," and "the dead know not anything?" Is a parable to be produced to contradict plain and positive testimony?

(7.) "Christ" never said "some should arise to everlasting contempt:" no, nor did any other of the Bible witnesses say so; not even Daniel. See our response to Dr. Field on that point. As to "everlasting punishment," we believe that as truly as our opponents. The only difference here is, they believe it is torture, and we believe it is death that is the wages of sin.

(8.) No man's "consciousness" is to decide the future of men. What does the Bible teach? That is the question.

(9.) "The old work" of preaching inherent immortality is truly an "old work," first preached by the serpent in Eden, but never preached by the LORD'S prophets, Jesus Christ or his apostles. Our Br. may rest assured we shall not "come back to the old work" by which sin was introduced into the world, and through which hatred to God has been kept up to this day.

(10.) That is just what we are doing; and we are trying to get you and all others to help us. Will you do it? We wait to see.

We fill rather more than "a column" this time, Br. Herald, in responding to your kind notice of us; but hope you will accept it in brotherly love, as we are not conscious of having any other feeling in our heart toward you. We would be glad to see your face weekly, especially since you have improved in your mechanical appearance; but as you and the Christian Advocate, of this city, decline an exchange, we must be content with the Methodist Quarterly Review and The Methodist, of this city, both good and able periodicals. From them we learn something of Methodism, and we are glad to see there is a progressive spirit manifested by them.

JOHN V., 28, 29.

BY ELD. Z. CAMPBELL.

THIS text is often quoted to prove a resurrection of all who have literally died. But I am not able to find any literal resurrection at all in the text. To understand it correctly it is necessary to keep in mind a fact generally overlooked; it is this, "Sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for all have sinned." By the Adamic transgression all mankind are really dead in facto, and morally, or prospectively: for all, being under sin, are under sentence of death; even a death moral and physical from which, by the first man, there is no resurrection to life. In harmony with this universally dead state the Lord said, "Let the dead bury their dead:" i. e., Let the morally dead bury their dead. From this universal state of moral death, there is a resurrection to a newness of life by the gospel clearly shown by the Lord in this chapter, beginning at the twenty-first verse; "For as the Father raiseth up the dead and quickened them; even so the Son quickeneth whom he will." The twenty-second and twenty-third verses give the reason why the Son quickeneth whom he will: "For the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son." And for a further reason why, "That all men should honor the Son even as they honor the Father," etc.

The twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth verses come more explicitly to the same point. I will transcribe them with a little parenthesizing of my own, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that heareth (present tense) my word, and believeth (present tense) on him that sent me hath (past tense) everlasting life, and shall not come (future tense) into condemnation, but is passed (present tense) from death unto life." This must harmonize with the twenty-first verse, "even so the Son quickeneth whom he will." Now, whom will he quicken? The answer is in the twenty-fourth verse: "He that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me." And now, when will he quicken them? At the same time they hear and believe: that is, in this present life. But it may be a question what this quickening means. Let the Lord himself answer. "But is passed from death unto life." This is just what it means; and it cannot be a transition from a physical death to any life. The twenty-fifth verse is still more to the same point. "Verily, verily I say unto you, The hour is coming (present tense progressive) and now is, (present tense) when the dead shall hear (future tense) the voice of the Son of God: and they that hear (present tense) shall live," (future tense.) Comments on this verse are omitted until we come to the twenty-eighth verse. The twenty-sixth verse is but another phase of the twenty-first verse. As the Father hath life in himself, and power to raise the dead and quicken them, so also he has given his Son the power to quicken whom he will. And the twenty-seventh verse, like the twenty-second, transfers this judgment and power of the Father to the Son.

This brings us to the twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth verses, the Gibraltar of those who maintain the general resurrection of all men. "Marvel not at this: for the hour is coming (present tense progressive) in the which all that are in the graves shall hear (future tense) his voice, and shall come forth (future tense); they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation."

In these two verses very little more is affirmed than in the twenty-fifth verse. "The hour" in both verses is the same. In the twenty-fifth, "The hour is coming, and now is," is an hour which had already begun, and was still progressing, and while progressing the dead were hearing the voice of the Son of God, and thereby made to live; and those who would not hear were thereby brought forth to condemnation. This hour commenced with the preaching of the Son of God, and all who heard, believed, and obeyed, were made alive by it, in the same manner that the prodigal son was dead and alive again. But this hour did not end when the Son of God ceased to preach in person; for he commanded his disciples to preach the same word to all the world, "to every creature."

And in the twenty-eighth verse the same hour is extended until the word shall have been preached in all the world, to every creature. Then all that are in the graves will have heard his voice, and they that hear will live. And they that do evil (neglect to hear), come forth also, but not to life or death, for they were already dead, but to damnation or condemnation; for "he that believeth not is condemned already."

It is evident that our Lord intended to enforce upon the minds of his hearers the fact that he was the Christ, and that through him the world was to be judged by his gospel (Rom. ii., 16), which judgment had already began under his preaching; and also to call the attention of the people to himself as the only true LIFE-GIVER to the dead; and he apprised them of the fact that, if they would listen to his word by faith and obedience, they were not only loosed from moral death, but, continuing in his word, they should not in future come into condemnation; and that this was the judgment the Father had committed unto him.

And further, that the time would come, and had already commenced in him, in the which all the world would hear his gospel, and would in like manner be judged by it; that is, as many as believed should pass from moral death unto a newness of life in him, and escape condemnation. The same principle is set forth in Mark, xvi., 15, 16. "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned."

This passage may now be paraphrased thus: He that believeth and is baptized is passed from death unto life, and shall not come into condemnation; but "he that believeth not is condemned already." John. iii., 18.

It is self-evident that the life, death, quickening, and resurrection of the twenty-first, twenty-fourth, and twenty-fifth verses are all of the same tenor and import; and it is not to be expected that our Lord would break the thread of his discourse, and so abruptly dash on to a life, death, and resurrection of an entirely different tenor, in the twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth verses, without giving his hearers any notice of the change of his subject.

Thus far this very important subject is examined for the good of the lovers of truth, and cheerfully submitted to them.

BR. E. WOLCOTT, Oceanport, N. J., wrote us, just before our anniversary, that in our "estimate" we could "reckon on $100 from the friends in Monmouth Co., in subscriptions and donations." We were sorry that sickness prevented this dear and devoted brother from being present with his tent at our meeting; but he said, "You will have my prayers, (if not my presence) during the meeting, that God, for Christ's sake, will overrule and direct in all things to the furtherance of the truth and the salvation of men." We trust his prayers have been and will be answered; and may his health soon be restored so that we may have his renewed labors in and with his beautiful Tent; for the use of which we thank him much, on behalf of the Life and Advent Union; and, also, we thank those young men —Brn. Littells, from Rahway, N. J.—for their labor and care of the Tent during the Camp-meeting week, embracing our anniversary. They have only been a few months in our Life views; but they work nobly for the cause, and donate time and money to promote it. May their reward be great in the kingdom of God.

FROM WM. H. H. MCALLISTER.

ST. ALBANS, VT., August 31, 1868.

BR. STORRS: I would say through the HERALD OF LIFE to the dear friends I met at Springfield, that I arrived home safely the next morning after I left them. The good Father has always preserved me when traveling by railroad. I feel that I am under his special protection. How good is such trust.

An interesting incident of my trip home I must here relate. The car I took at Springfield was quite full, and I gave a part of the seat I had taken to a lady. For a few miles we were not very sociable, but after a while commonplaces were introduced, then a little mud-turtle she was transporting home, called up the topic of natural history, and by a little adroitness on my part Darwin's theory of the animal creation followed. Of course it was natural for me to observe the excitement Darwin is creating in theological as well as scientific circles, and ventured to suggest the reason, that if his theory be true, the doctrine of inherent immortality is false. We both united in condemning his theory of the origin of man as unscriptural, and then of course it was natural to ascertain what the Bible said on the subject. She said she thought that man had a threefold nature, body, soul, and spirit. She quoted Gen. ii., 7, to substantiate this. I told her if she had no objection I would like to give my views of that and related subjects. She desired me to do so. For nearly three hours we talked of the nature of man, the state of the dead, the penalty of sin, the resurrection as man's only hope of a future life, and some other subjects brought in incidentally. She showed a thorough acquaintance with the Bible and sometimes helped me with quotations, for it was too dark to consult the Bible. She told me she was a resident of Montreal, formerly from Maine, a member of the Episcopal church. She was quite strenuous for church organizations, combatted me strongly on the subject of water baptism, and thought we were making too much of the advent of our LIFE-GIVER. On the other points she gave a tacit consent as we passed. I do not say that she was convinced, that is asking too much, perhaps; but if the word spoken was truth, I pray the Lord that it may not return void. She seemed deeply interested, and from one remark I inferred that the subject was not entirely new.

In speaking of church organization, I gave her our position in general terms and asked her if her church would allow me to become a member? She thought it would, but afterward thought they might not wish me to give free expression to all my views. It came very natural to speak of Archbishop Whately and Judge Halsted in this connection as being members of her church and holding similar views with myself. It gave me great pleasure to speak of Judge Halsted's labors in the cause of Bible truth.

On the subject of baptism, she thought water baptism was not essential to salvation, but that a Christian was not excusable for neglecting the ordinance. After giving my reason for preferring the Spirit baptism, I told her I thought water baptism would fail for the want of a properly appointed person to administer it. I want to ask you, Br. Storrs, if you think there is any one now divinely appointed to administer this rite?

It is seldom that I have so interesting a conversation. My lady friend was talented, educated, candid, not afraid to differ or agree, and I pray she may be led into all truth.

Such conversation as this I call preaching, though the audience was small, and I could not help feeling that the Lord had given me this opportunity to declare the unsearchable riches of his truth: and as these and more extended opportunities are offered, may his will be done through my feeble efforts, and some fruit be gathered for the eternal harvest.

Your brother, waiting for the kingdom.

FROM DR. J. O. ORR.

[The following letter, though marked "confidential," is too interesting for us to enjoy alone, and the writer will please pardon us for giving an extract to our readers. Dr. ORR is a great physical sufferer.—EDITOR.]

BOND HEAD [CANADA], Aug. 30, 1868.

BR. STORRS: With trembling hand and shattered system from acute bronchitis I cannot well write to you; nor can I refrain, because thy God is my God, and thy Saviour and LIFE-GIVER is also mine. Glory to that one name. My hope in him blooms with immortality. The 11th of next November I will be 57; and as I lay on my couch, when the paroxysm will come on, O how delighted I would be to hear the last shrill trumpet, were it only His holy will: then I would have an opportunity of seeing Br. Storrs and all the brethren and sisters whom now I cannot see. Our trials would then be over forever; and perhaps our letter writing.

There is a subject, my dear old Teacher in the Truth, which I cannot get out of my mind with reference to the glorious advent. I advert to Math. xii., 40, where Jesus calls their attention to his final suffering: "For as Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth." Now, though we cannot literally understand this assertion, yet he was in the tomb of Joseph on the morning of the third day; but he was up before the sun. Yet we are to remember it was ON THE THIRD DAY: and I cannot divest myself of the idea, now that all time calculations have passed away that our old pioneers had advanced. I for my part go with you in ceasing to have anything to do with definite time in future; and only suggest that the first year in the three thousandth will correspond best with the Saviour's time-table above. But we must wait 133 years for that period. And if this den of infamy has that much warp yet to weave out, I am truly thankful that I will be asleep in Jesus long ere then; and their polished plans of sinning then will do my repose no harm. I hardly expect to see another anniversary meeting, from the way I feel; I have fallen away from 166 to 130 pounds in the last four months. I cannot attend to my professional duties only when they will bring their own carriage for me, and treat me like a child in gentleness, because there are many of the old stock who will have none else.

At the present moment, I meet only in family prayer and reading the Scriptures; for though the Methodist and Presbyterian are close by, yet their Platonic doctrine of immortal soulism would so perplex me that I prefer to remain reading Br. G. Storrs and Paul with Halsted. O how anxious I am to hear the results of your meeting. I look upon your preservation at this fearful crisis as miraculous. God wants you at the helm. And O, may he shield you bodily and intellectually. You will please let me have a little meat in due season while you remain at your post. My hopes as regard to the HERALD OF LIFE have never been brighter. God be your help in every trouble, my dear old friend, is the hearfelt prayer of a sincere brother.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—To Br. Orr's suggestion on Matth. xii., 40, we would say, supposing it to be correct that the advent is to occur in "the first year of the three thousandth," it may still be true that that year is in the immediate vicinity of where we are now, and not 133 years off; because, it is a tolerably well settled fact, that in our present chronology of the Bible there are serious defects, and that the six thousand years from the creation of Adam is almost if not quite expired. If so, then Christ was laid in the tomb in the fifth thousandth year, a century or more after its commencement; which would correspond to the first day, leaving the sixth thousandth year to terminate near where we now are, and the seventh, corresponding with the third day, about to open. It seems to us, according to the best light we have, that the day star is rising, and the resurrection morning is not far off. But whatever may be the truth on the subject, let us work and watch till it comes, and all will be well.

We hope that our dear Br. Orr will be able to triumph in Christ while he is being "made perfect through sufferings," as was his and our Lord before him. So shall he have an abundant entrance into glory at the return of our LIFE-GIVER from heaven.

C. R. CROSSETT, JR., Springfield, Mass., writes: I am a lover of the truth: "and have hope toward God." May I ask you to explain Proverbs ii., 19? "None that go unto her return again, neither take they hold of the paths of life." I am trying, by the help of God, to follow your good advice, "hold fast unto that which thou hast attained." etc. Please accept this money [$2] to help spread the truth. I am poor in this world's goods, but rich in faith.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—The answer to your desire for an explanation of Prov. ii., 19, will be found in the preceeding verse—"For her house inclineth unto death, and her paths unto the dead." Now, the 19th verse is plain, corresponding with Prov. xxi., 16, "The man that wandereth out of the way of understanding shall remain in the congregation of the dead." What greater folly than visiting the house of "the strange woman," of Prov. ii., 16–19? None that do it are likely ever to have a resurrection from among the dead: they never "take hold of the paths of life." While "Marriage is honorable in all, and the bed undefiled; whoremongers and adulterers God will judge" to eternal death. Heb. xiii., 4. It is of such Prov. ii., 19 speaks.

ELD. J. LEWIS writes from Beck's Creek, Ill., August 25: I preached on the inheritance last Sunday. Two ministers were present. One of them opposed my view, laboring hard to prove the "sky kingdom." I replied, and he responded again; and again I replied, and we feel well assured that it resulted in the furtherance of the truth. Near three hundred present. Brethren, be not discouraged. Victory is on our side. I have scattered all the "Campaign Documents" and they are cutting their way through. I now leave for Oconee, Shelby Co., Ill., which will be my post-office address for the present.

BR. LEWIS writes from Oconee, Aug. 27: I am with Br. and St. Babcock; good old soldiers of the cross of Christ. They say they cannot be thankful enough that we found them out and got them to subscribe for the HERALD OF LIFE; but for that they would have remained in ignorance of the non-revival of the wicked dead, and the order of the judgment. They prize the HERALD more and more. You may expect help from them soon. Cheer up, brethren; by the help of our blessed Lord the HERALD OF LIFE will triumph in its onward course.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We sent you, several weeks since, two, three or more large packages to Beck's Creek, which you do not speak of having received. Please look over the back HERALDS and see whether you have received all. You speak of no papers coming to Beck's Creek for "four weeks past." Mrs. Macdonald's paper has been sent regularly during that time, and we have now sent the four again. Post-offices should be looked after by subscribers. Go directly to the Postmaster, and tell him of your failure to receive your papers. This course has cured the defect in several instances, to our knowledge. These complaints come to us frequently. Your remedy, in nearly every case, is with your own post-office. We use great care to have the work well done in mailing in our office. No office can take more care.

LIFE AND ADVENT UNION.

CONSTITUTION OF "THE LIFE AND ADVENT UNION."

ARTICLE I. The object of this Union is to use all available means to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

II. Any person believing in Life through Christ alone, and sustaining a Christian character, may become a member of this Union by subscribing to the Constitution.

III The officers of this Union shall be a President, Vice-President, Secretary, Treasurer, and five Directors, who together shall constitute the Managing Board, and who are to be elected annually.

IV. The Managers shall be authorized to collect funds for the Union, which funds shall be transmitted to the Business Agent, who shall keep account of the same and transfer them to the Treasurer.

V. The Annual meeting and such other meetings as may be deemed necessary by the Board of Managers, shall be called by giving three weeks' notice.

VI. The Secretary shall keep a record of the names and post-office addresses of the members.

VII. This Constitution may be amended by a two thirds vote at any Annual meeting.

LIFE AND ADVENT UNION.

FIFTH ANNIVERSARY.—SECRETARY'S REPORT.

ACCORDING to previous notice, the fifth annual meeting of the Life and Advent Union was held at two o'clock P. M., on Thursday, Aug., 27th, in the Life and Advent Mission Tent on the ground of the National Advent Camp-meeting, in Springfield, Mass.

Br. Jacob Grim, the President, called the meeting to order, and by his invitation, prayer was offered by Br. Geo. Storrs.

The Secretary not having the minutes of the last meeting, the reading of them was necessarily omitted.

Br. Leonard C. Thorne as Treasurer reported as follows:

Total receipts the past year		$4,815 48
Interest allowed by Treasurer		110 82
Total		$4,926 30
Paid out during the year	$4,815 48
Interest paid	28 78	—4,842 26
Balance in Treasury		$84 04

Br. Storrs stated that in addition to the moneys reported by the Treasurer, about $500 had been received during the year for tracts.

It was moved by Br. W. S. Campbell that the Board of Managers shall have power to employ a man to assist the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE, in the office and out of the office, in such manner as may be required, subject to the direction of the Board of Managers. The motion was seconded, and followed by various remarks touching the necessity that Br. Storrs should be relieved from his burden of business cares in connection with the office. The motion was at length laid on the table.

On motion, the Chair was asked to appoint a committee of three to nominate officers for the ensuing year. Brethren David W. White, of Philadelphia; Stewart Carlisle, of Wilmington, Del., and A. W. Macdonald, of New York, were appointed such committee.

The following nominations were reported: President, JACOB GRIM; Vice-President, WILLIAM H. THORNE; Secretary, W. H. H. MCALLISTER; Treasurer, LEONARD C. THORNE. Directors, GEO. K. CARROLL, JOHN KEMP, THOMAS M. REDHEAD, RICHARD MARTIN, and WILLIAM ROWORTH.

All these brethren were unanimously elected. Br. Grim thanked the Union for the renewal of confidence in himself, manifested by his re-election to the position of President, and pledged his continued exertion to retain the same.

Moved by A. W. Macdonald that we do now raise $2,500 to support the HERALD OF LIFE the ensuing year in addition to subscription moneys. Passed.

Under the above motion the amount of $2,588 was pledged. See list of pledges.

While the pledges were being made, Br. Jas. F. Redhead was appointed to assist the Secretary by taking subscriptions for the HERALD OF LIFE.

On motion of Br. W. H. Hanford, Br. GEO. STORRS was elected Editor of the HERALD OF LIFE for the year ensuing.

On motion of Br. Carroll the favor of God in raising moneys to carry on our work was acknowledged by singing the doxology,

"Praise God from whom all blessings flow."

The meeting was informally adjourned.

W. H. H. MCALLISTER,
Secretary.

PLEDGES TO SUSTAIN HERALD OF LIFE.

THE LOVE OF GOD TO MAN.

WERE the whole earth a parchment made,
And every man a scribe by trade;
Were the vast oceans turned to ink,
And every stick into a quill;
To write the love of God to man
Would drain the oceans dry;
Nor would the scroll contain it all
Though spread from sky to sky.

KIBBY.

BY MRS. P. A. HAYNES.

THE afternoon was cheerless. From a chilly gray sky the large snow-flakes were silently falling. The roads were almost impassable. Mud every-where, dirty snow, half-frozen puddles, a dreary blast, that sobbed through the leafless trees—this was the aspect of the day. At the foot of a long hill stood a solitary team; team it could scarcely be called, though the cart was stout and well made, the load large and heavy. The poor beast that surveyed the long muddy hill before him, with a sort of hopeless misery, could scarcely be called a horse; his rugged coat seemed to stand on end, as if he had once been throughly horrified and had never got over it. His thin neck seemed scarcely capable of supporting his overgrown head; his ears lopped forward, his under lip hung down, and he visibly trembled, as he looked at the miry hill. It was evident that he had never known kindness. At last his master seemed to consider his brief respite at an end, for he suddenly jerked the reins in his big, strong hand, while the other flourished a raw hide in an ominous manner. The poor drudge understood him, for he made a trembling stagger forward, his muscles bulged out, his head bowed, his knees bent themselves to the shape of the hill—but all in vain! After a few faint plunges, a snort and a gasp, he settled back between the shafts.

"Sulky, are ye!" bawled his master. "Git up, I say!" and the keen blows fell with a crisp sound upon the miserable beast. In vain he tugged; in vain he turned his poor head sideways in his agony, to shield his face from the blinding blows, His feeble strength was vainly exerted, and after each useless effort, he fell back shuddering. His wretchedness would have moved a heart of stone. But his master had no heart. Blows, kicks and poundings followed; the poor beast groaned doleful groans: when on the brow of the hill, a horse's head appeared. Ha! here was a horse that might well lay claim to the name, as with graceful step, and head held coquettishly on one side, he disdainfully surveyed his humble fellow, while descending the hill.

The traveller turned aside to pass. Suddenly he drew rein. The horse noted everything; he looked at the teamster—his load—and at the drudge. The drudge never raised his eyes.

"You will have to take off part of your load, my man," said the traveller, in a pleasant tone, from behind his mufflers, "your horse can never take that load up the hill."

"He can and he will," was the teamster's answer. And another series of blows, kicks and poundings was bestowed. The traveller looked on. Could you have looked under his brows you would have seen his eyes flash.

"It is useless cruelty," he exclaimed; "he'll die in his tracks, but he'll never start your load, for your wheels are set. If you wish I'll assist you."

"No," said the teamster, in a brutal tone, "he shall take it out. I'll fix him!" and a great volley of oaths followed. "He shall go to the knackers, blast him! I hain't much use for him; he's run out lately; his mate is a deal better than him, but he's dead lame."

"How old is he?" asked the stranger.

"You'd think, sir, he was forty, to look at him; but I'll be burnt if he's a day over eight, come next grass!"

"What is he worth," was the stranger's next inquiry.

"Oh, blast him, not much!" and pushing back the cap from his sweaty brow, the blowzy teamster roared out a laugh.

The traveller looked around—at the long hill behind him, and at the black level road before him—and seemed to consider. "Did you say you should have him killed."

"Oh, yes, bless your soul! he's worth nothin' for a heavy pull."

"Sheer your load off a little one side if you can," said the traveller.

After much pushing, prying and flogging this was accomplished. After quite an effort the traveller succeeded in drawing forth his porte-monnaie from beneath his many wraps.

The man looked stupidly on, and the carriage horse stood quietly regarding matters. The snow fell softly, the poor drudge shivered and sighed. Out came a crisp new bill.

"Will that do?" was all the traveller said.

The man stared. "If I am hard, I'm honest, dang it," he muttered, "if you want the beast take him; he hain't worth no money."

The traveller unhitched the beast, took off his harness and threw it on the load. From under the seat of his carriage, he took a gay new horse- blanket, and spread it over the drudge's back, who, after some coaxing, stepped up behind the axle of the carriage and suffered himself to be tied. The traveller got in, and raising his cap for an adieu, drove slowly away, vanishing in the misty distance, while the teamster, with his harness on his shoulders, went up the hill, giving vent to his astonishment in shrill whistles.

"Papa has come, Eva! and oh, mamma, he's got such a queer looking sort of a horse. Thomas says its my pony; pony, indeed!" and the delicate looking little boy put on a frown of contempt. Mamma looked curious as papa came in, and after a pleased look all around, bent to receive his children's kisses. In many long words, and with many flourishes the story of the drudge was told. The children kissed him again when he had finished.

Summer came. Through all the long winter the drudge had been well fed and cared for. He was no longer a drudge. His head was erect, his eyes bright—his coat sleek, his step light, and though he would never be a beauty, still little Harry now gladly laid claim to him.

"I know what his name is," said Eva, "for pa told me; its Kibby." Thomas tied Kibby under a green tree in the door yard, and he whinnied joyfully as the children ran up, with round, red clover blooms in their aprons. Eva patted his cheek, while Harry mounted upon his back. A pretty picture they made, standing in the checkered shadow, and had his old master passed just then, he wouldn't have known his drudge.—The Little Pilgrim, by Grace Greenwood, Philadelphia.

"PRAYING IN THE HOLY GHOST."

BY REV. THOMAS L. SHIPMAN.

"THE Spirit," says Paul, "helpeth our infirmities; for we know not what we should pray for as we ought, but the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us with groanings that cannot be uttered." The Spirit inspires those longing desires which words have no power to express. He teaches us both how to pray and what to pray for. He gives us that knowledge of ourselves and that knowledge of God which we need in order to "pray as we ought." We must know ourselves before we can pray. How can we ask for pardon without any sense of sin? How can we ask for sanctification without any knowledge of the corruption of our nature? How can we plead the promises of God, "exceeding great and precious," without any knowledge of those promises? How can we approach God as "the rewarder of them that diligently seek him," without believing that "he is?" "The fool hath said in his heart "There is no God." Unbelief is practical atheism. The wicked have no sense of the divine presence. "God is not in all his thoughts." The commission of sin in any form shows the insensibility of the wicked to the divine presence.

The most bare-faced sinner is generally awed into decency in the presence of serious and respectable persons. This proves that the wicked have no sense of the divine presence—for surely the felt presence of God must awe them more than the presence of any fellow creature. Facts sometimes present this truth in a strong light. Two clergymen were quartered on the hospitality of a family in high life during the session of a religious body in the place. At the close of the session the elder clergyman turned to their host, and, after thanking him for his hospitality, added: "We have been very pleasantly disappointed while under your roof." "In what respect, gentlemen?" "We were told that you were very profane; we have been members of your family for two days, and have not heard the slightest profane expression from your lips." "Gentlemen," said he, "I must acknowledge that I am addicted to profane language, but you do not suppose that I would use such language in the presence of Christians, and especially Christian ministers!" "Now," said the former, "you grieve me, for you show that you have more respect for us than you have for your Maker." "Gentlemen," said he, "I never saw it in that light before. I thank you for your reproof."

So also it happens when Christians yield to "an evil heart of unbelief in departing from the living God," they become practical atheists. They have no lively sense of the divine presence. They have no communion with God. God is a God not at hand, but afar off. They cannot pray, not only because they have not the spirit of prayer, but because they do not realize the divine presence. In the language of St. Clair, in that work of world-wide fame, "It is all speaking to nothing." Now it is the office of the Spirit to make the presence of God felt, and to draw out the heart to God. To the soul taught by the Spirit, drawn by the Spirit, prayer is more an instinct than a duty. Just as naturally as children approach the parent whom they love, in whom they confide, with their requests, do the children of God approach their heavenly Father in prayer, when, through the agency of the Spirit, they are made to realize the divine presence, and are inspired with confidence to cry, "Abba, Father." They pray without ceasing—not all the while with the lips—but they have all the while the spirit of prayer. It is no task to pray. The heart is all the while going out to God in prayer.

"The great reason," says a writer on this interesting subject, "why so many Christians have so little familiarity with prayer is, that they have so faint a conception of God—so few associations which connect them with him. So little have their necessities pioneered a road to God, that they travel a new and uncleared path every time. Their soul has no wants; it realizes very little its degradation in sin; it looks out upon the conventional places and treasures of life, and they nearly come up to its low desires. The heart is undeveloped. Incapacity of prayer is want of life. If one is born into God, prayer is his birthright just as much as breathing is the first gift of natural birth. And although Christian necessities lead to times and seasons in prayer, yet a full soul prays always—prays without ceasing." If these thoughts touching prayer, expressed with great felicity, are according to truth, and that they are, every one who has ever prayed knows by his own experience, then what we need most in order to pray is to know more of God—more of him as a Father—and to approach him with more of the confidence of children to a parent. If we knew more of God, we should trust him more, and trust where we cannot trace him, and have nearer access to him in prayer. We know how Christ, our elder brother, prayed; with what confidence he approached the Father; but his Father is our Father, and his God our God. Those who are most familiar with prayer, are found, I believe, most abundant in intercessory supplication. They know so much of God, from familiar acquaintance, that they have confidence to enlarge their hearts—to take in the world in their prayers.

Their brethren are perhaps troubled to pray for anything; straitened with unbelief, and with no gushing forth of the heart toward God, they think only of their own miserable case, while these are encouraged to pray for everything, and they forget themselves in their generous desires for others. They do not expect to be heard for their much speaking, but they expect to be heard with speaking or without speaking. It is not important to speak with the lips when the heart is full; but yet the lips will speak, for "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh." It is vain to talk of praying with the heart, if we never pray with the lips, for the spirit of prayer will move the lips in prayer: but then it is the spirit that prays, and the lips are only a passage-way—a vent for the struggling emotions of the heart. It is egregious nonsense to talk about the spirit of prayer that never moves the tongue. We might just as well talk of giving alms in spirit, or paying our debts in spirit. Just as the spirit of charity will open the hands to give, the spirit of prayer will open the lips to pray; with all prayer, all kinds of prayer, silent and vocal, secret and social, ejaculatory and prolonged—all parts of prayer, adoration, confession, petition, thanksgiving, and all "in the Spirit," in the Holy Ghost, with the fervor which he inspires and with the confidence which he emboldens.—The Advance.

FROM L. D. TANNER.

BR. STORRS: I inclosed in a letter to your address, some time in March, I think, one dollar for 24 Nos. of the HERALD OF LIFE, which have probably been duly mailed to my address, but now when that time is expired, they are, as they should be, as duly stopped, for I have, for long years of association with unpopular agitations, believed that persons who could spare money enough to pay for sugar, tea, and tobacco, or rum, whisky, and lager beer, should never allow themselves to take a reform paper on free cost.

Whatever other sentiment the New Testament may teach, it gives no countenance, by the example of its authors and actors, for people to calculate on the enjoyment of comfortable conditions in this life, or a life to come, without the employment of such activities as have a tendency to benefit themselves and the race.

As Jesus was not a mercenary speculator, so was he equally no mendicant or pauper, and no person who has head, heart, hands, feet, and health, should for shame be seen begging his way, or partly begging his way, through the world, in disuse of these abilities.

For myself, at three score and three, I would rather be a little pushed in business than have nothing to do. Inactivity invites the formentation of putrefaction, and that body deservedly verges to ruin that has abandoned useful activities. I never have understood yourself to be the almoner of wealth earned by ancestors or others; and how you have honestly lived when advocating so many corrosive points to corrupt society is a marvel, in reference to yourself, as it is in the case of Phillips, Garrison, or Greeley, and more, as you have struck at the root by which society is corrupted, and they only, and sometimes tardily, too, at the branches.

A false theology for ages has filled the trumpet with an uncertain sound—inherent immortality—so that bad politics, resulting in an oppressive government, and bad philosophy, resulting in corrupt manners, were always supported by a theology worse than either.

The rains are descending, the winds blowing, and the floods beating on these sand-founded structures of the bygone ages, and soon I think it will be said, "They fell! and great was their fall."

I know the record of the righteous is on high; and if the providence of God precludes any other, that record is of course enough; yet it has of late seemed to me, as yourself has acted about the same part among religious journalists as Mr. Greeley has among political, it would be profitable if your friends could have your "Recollections of a Busy Life" in your department of journalism, as his friends have had his in his department.

I have thought for months I would rather see the Lord come than to see a shower of gold dollars fall right into my house, yet much as I desire his coming, I do not expect it while Rome, the eternal city of the mother of harlots, stands unburnt; and there is not, either in the political or religious world, a cry of "Peace and safety." If Grant should be elected, that cry might arise in the political world quickly thereafter. If George Storrs and the HERALD OF LIFE were both dead, then such cry might soon arise in the religious world, as yourself and the religious journals you have conducted have been most doleful accusers of those nominal religious brethren who make up the millions of Papal and Protestant Christendom; not that for this sake I want you to die, for the cry might not come then, but the unfailing sign of his coming we do, as we think we should, steadfastly desire; at least when it shall be his own best time; till then, it seems to me, we should, with wise reference to the will of God, as revealed in his word, attend patiently to all the duties of the present life, religious, civil, literary, and political, as the responsible servants of the Lord Jesus, who wisely said, Occupy till I come.

Before I close I would like to ask whether the latter clause of Luke xviii., 8, is to be understood as a Greek negation, more emphatical than any affirmative could be, and indicating that believers in Jesus will be found in reference to his second coming in about such a state as were the apostles in reference to his resurrection? or, does it foretell even a worse state than theirs? With high esteem, your brother.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—Your paper has not been discontinued, though the time had expired for which it was paid.

The expression Luke xviii., 8, "When the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?" most likely refers to the lack of faith among the great body of professed Christians in the event, either as to its nearness, or as to its being a personal coming; perhaps, both. Such seems to be the case now; and likely will be increased by the continual failure of such as insist on knowing the exact time, whether hour, day, month, or year. Such failures tend to discourage, if not ultimately to destroy all faith in the event itself, or to bring ridicule on the doctrine of the second personal advent. Nevertheless, he will come, and it may be as unexpected, at the time of its occurrence, as his resurrection from the dead. Blessed are all such as take heed to the injunction—"WATCH."

THE BOOK OF LIFE.

THE Bible, to all its other excellencies adds this, that it is The Book of Life. It is not only a basket of silver network, but it contains apples of gold. It is the record of glad tidings to a perishing world, a message of joy to all people. In it, Wisdom hath mingled her wine, and slain her fatlings, and furnished her table, and calls all the hungry and needy to come and partake. The entrance of its words giveth light and imparteth understanding to the simple, and maketh wise unto salvation. It is a balm from Gilead for the sick, oil for the bruises of the wounded, reprieve for the prison-bound, and bread for them that are ready to perish. Its different books are but so many angels of mercy, carrying contentment into the abodes of poverty, enabling even the children of want to lift up their eyes to God who ordereth all things well, and to eat their scanty meals in peace—staying the hearts of the persecuted and oppressed, causing them to rejoice and sing under the yoke, at the stake, and in the hottest of the fires, as on their passage-way to crowns immortal in the world to come—calming the minds of the fevered, mollifying where all earthly medicines fail, and kindling glad hopes of recompense yet to be revealed—lighting up comforts in the breasts of those that mourn for their dead, and assuring them of blessed reunions in a better life—and kindling even the dying eye and inspiring the dying heart with thoughts of speedy triumph, causing lips already closed for death to open once more in utterances of victory.

We may talk of the venerable age of the Bible, and its scientific accuracy, and its literary beauty and sublimity, and its wonderful influences upon the ideas, laws, governments, and general order of society and mankind; but it is all nothing in comparison with the spiritual good and immortal hopes and consolations which it begets in those who receive it as a message from their God. Are we voyagers upon troubled and dangerous sea? Here is a chart by which to steer in safety to the happy shores. Are we soldiers, beset with foes and required to endure the shocks of battle? This is an armory from which all needed weapons may be drawn at will, and by the right use of which we may hew our way to immortal triumph. Are we pilgrims and strangers, worn out and weary in our search for the home from which we are exiles? In this book gush out the pure, fresh waters of life, the cooling shades from the Rock of salvation appear, and the guiding word is heard from pilgrims in advance, to cheer and encourage us till we reach the mansion of our Father. Indeed, it is beyond the power of language to express the excellency and richness of spiritual treasure which we have in this Holy Book. It is the miraculous cruse of the Shunamitess which never exhausts. It is the wand of Moses which swallows the serpents of life, and parts the sea of trouble, and brings forth waters in the thirsty wilderness. It is the ladder of Jacob on which our spirits ascend to commune with God and angels. It is the telescope of faith by which we look on things invisible, survey even the third heavens, and have present to our view what is to be in after-ages. It is the chariot of Elijah in which to ride up the starry way to immortality, unhurt of death. It is the channel of the Almighty Spirit as it goes forth for the sanctification of the race—the very gulf stream of eternal life as it pours out for the resuscitation of our wilted and decaying world.

Most wondrous Book! Bright candle of the Lord!
Star of eternity! Only star
By which the bark of man could navigate
The sea of life and gain the coast of bliss
Securely! Only star which rose on Time,
And on its dark and troubled billows still,
As generation, drifting swiftly by,
Succeeded generation, threw a ray
Of heaven's own light, and to the hills of God,
The eternal hills, pointed the sinner's eye!

A dreadful eclipse it would be to the world of letters and thought, for the Bible, and what it has done for man, to be blotted out. But that were nothing to the moral and spiritual night that would go along with such a calamity. Besides carrying away with it a vast proportion of the intellectual and moral life of the last eighteen centuries, it would silence every preacher of salvation, and abolish at once his office and his text. It would stop every work of mercy and plan of philanthropy in the world. It would transmute into a lie all our fond anticipations of the return of Jesus to renew the world, restore our dead, complete our salvation, and bring us to an eternal heaven. It would hush forever the glad tidings with which men have comforted themselves for these many weary ages. It would put out the mother's hopes of her dead babes, quench the wife's fond desires for her husband's ever lasting peace, destroy the widow's consolation as she lingers by the grave of her burried love, and extinguish the matron's last comfort as she trembles on the verge of eternity. It would take with it all the reliefs and blessedness which prayer in the name of Jesus gives, and leave the sinner without pardon in the extremities of life. It would take away the last appeal of the slave against his oppressor, remove the last check of tyranny, and lift from the wicked hearts of men the last restraints, giving carnival to every lust and play to every passion, without correction, without limit, and without end! We stagger, and are horrified, at the mere idea of the loss that would be inflicted. Chills run down our pulses at the contemplation of the despair and wretchedness which would ensue. It would be the destruction of THE BOOK OF LIFE.—Prophetic Times.

RANDOM READINGS.

BISHOP MEADE, of Virginia, once said: "Our girls are poorly educated, but our boys will never find it out."

PAIN and pleasure, serenity and storm, are the alternate companions of every man in the journey of life.

"I NEVER complained of my condition but once," said an old man, "when my feet were bare and I had no shoes: but I met a man without feet, and became contented."

THEOLOGY is a science; religion is a spirit. The mere theologian may prosecute his task in a logical and exact manner, but the system he erects may be as dry and lifeless as a statue or a skeleton.

GOD will accept your first attempts to serve him not as a perfect work, but as a beginning. The first little blades of wheat are as pleasant to the farmer's eyes as the whole field waving with grain.

GENTLE INFLUENCES.—If the secret of all regenerate hearts could be laid open we should doubtless view with a mixture of astonishment and gratitude the quantity of benefit which has been and which is effected in the world by the familiar converse, and even by the silent looks, of truly good men.—Bishop Jebb.

A man in the lunatic asylum at Cincinnati, according to his own statement is 400 years old. He loaned Shakespeare five dollars which he never got back, presented a bosom pin to Columbus, just before his first voyage to America, and was on intimate terms with Queen Elizabeth, whom he familiarly calls "Lib."

AN Ohio school-girl went through her calisthenic exercises at home for the amusement of the children. A youthful visitor, with interest and pity on his countenance, asked her brother "if that gal had fits?"

"No," replied the lad, contemptuously, "that's gymnastics."

"Oh! 'tis, hey?" said verdant; "how long has she had 'em?"

DR. ARNOLD once lost all patience with a dull scholar, when the pupil looked up in his face and said:

"Why do you speak so angrily, sir? Indeed, I am doing the best I can."

Years after the doctor used to tell the story to his children and say:

"I never felt so ashamed in my life. That look and that speech I have never forgotten."

SIR WALTER SCOTT'S wife, though an excellent and sensible woman, was a matter-of-fact one. One day, while walking in the fields in early spring, he dilated to Lady Scott on the beauties of nature, the verdure, the wild flowers, the playful lambs, etc.

"Ah! my dear," said the lady, "you remind me that we must have a nice roast leg of lamb, with mint-sauce for dinner to-morrow!"

WHEN Rowland Hill was, some years ago, in Scotland, he was introduced to a minister, he somewhat resembling himself in piety and eccentricity. The old man looked at him for some time very earnestly, and at length said:

"And what do you think of it," said Mr. Hill.

"Why, I am thinking that, if the grace of God had na changed your heart, you would ha been a most tremendous rogue."

Mr. Hill laughed heartily, and said:

"Well, you have just hit the nail on the head."

IT was the saying of Sir Robert Peel, "I never knew a man to escape failure, in either body or mind, who worked seven days in the week.

A BROKEN and contrite heart unlocks our inward senses, and makes us see, and hear, and feel the things which could no more be seen, heard, or felt before, than a man in a deep sleep can hear, and see, and feel the things that are said and done about him.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the LIFE-GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Argument from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. POST. D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

This work has been out of print for some months, but is now re-printed.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the true teachings of the BIBLE is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage, 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.

No. 1. EARTH, NOT HEAVEN, is to be the inheritance of the saints. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS. Price 5 cents.

ALL NAMES of persons, sent us, should be written plain, so that we shall not have to guess them out. Also in ordering, the name of the POST OFFICE, COUNTY, AND STATE must be given, and written plainly; and if a CHANGE is called for, state the Office to which the paper has previously been sent. Unless attention is paid to all these matters confusion and delay are inevitable.

LET US KNOW.

[WE take the following from the Advent Herald of Sept. 1st, an “orthodox” advent paper. We join with it in its call to let us know what the work called “Adventism,” written by Eld. Wm. Sheldon, and published by Eld. J. V. Himes and others, and commended highly by men and women preachers out west, and some here in the east, has done with the millennium? Yes, and we wish to know what they have done with the “four questions” we have three times put to them on the doctrine of this work called “Adventism?” But more on that topic after this article from the Advent Herald.]

ADVENTISM VERSUS PRE-MILLENNIALISM.

The word Millennium, from the Latin mille, a thousand, and annus, a year, literally signifies “a thousand years,” and is generally used by theologians to denote the thousand years between the resurrection of the “blessed and holy,” and that of “the rest of the dead” mentioned in Rev. xx. To the doctrine that the two resurrections here brought to view will be literal—the first occurring when “the Lord himself shall descend from heaven” (1 Thess. iv., 13–18), there was scarcely a dissenting voice among Adventists twenty-five years ago. It was then our common faith as a people, and we had reason to suppose it to be so still. That a very few individuals have imbibed the notion of Prof. Bush that the Millennium is in the past, and that some ultra materialists hold that the wicked will never be raised, we know, but that Adventists as a body had renounced pre-millennialism is something we never dreamed of till recently. But have they done it? you may inquire. Well, we will tell you what we know about it.

A work written by Eld. Sheldon, endorsed by Eld. Himes, printed by the Western Advent Christian Publishing Association in Michigan, sold by the thousand, and lauded to the skies by many in the Voice of the West and elsewhere, and which purports to give a fair and candid answer to the question, Adventism—what is it? has left the Millennium out of its prophetical scheme. The doctrine of the pre-millennial advent has shared the fate which the writer thinks the wicked will have—it has been annihilated! The author's position is that “the judgment is at the coming of Christ, ‘for the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father with his angels, and then he shall reward every man according to his works’” (pp. 53, 54;) “the resurrection is a prerequisite to judgment, and must precede the judgment, ... the dead ones must come out of death's dark prison before being judged, and they must be judged before being rewarded: for reward is the result of judgment” (pp. 42, 43;) “all are to live again at the judgment day to be judged; but saints will die no more, while sinners, then judged obnoxious to the wrath of God, will die the second death, and thenceforward ‘shall never see life,’ but abide beneath the irrevocable stroke of the penalty death” (p. 102;) “the commencement of hell is at the judgment day and its location is to be the earth, at the time of the flood of fire” (p. 103;) and “this measurement [the 2,300 days of Daniel viii.] reaches forward to the time of the second stage in Christ's coming, when he shall descend with all his saints to their purified inheritance,” (pp. 194, 195) which period will probably end “in A. D. 1875.”

Now if this work is—as it is claimed to be—a fair exponent of Adventism, it will be seen from the above that the “Adventists” have not only departed from their original views on the state of the dead and the end of the wicked, but also on the Millennium. Formerly, as has been already remarked, the millennium was placed between the resurrection of the just and of the unjust and our Saviour's second advent placed at its commencement, but in this wonderful book they have taken away the millennium and we know not where they have laid it! We would like to have the Editor of the Voice of the West copy this article into his paper and tell his readers where the millennium has gone. In the meantime—at least so far as we can see—“Adventism” stands opposed to “Pre-millennialism,” and all who endorse and circulate the work are engaged in opposing the faith that the Lord comes before the millennium.

Be it known, however, that the “Evangelical Adventists” are unchanged in their views respecting man's nature and destiny, and are as firm believers in the personal, pre-millennial advent as they ever were.

REMARKS BY EDITOR OF HERALD OF LIFE.

We use the term “orthodox,” in our introductory remarks to the foregoing article from the Advent Herald, in the sense it is usually understood, viz., for believers in the inherent immortality of the soul and the eternal misery of the wicked, and the doctrines naturally connected with such belief. These orthodox adventists style themselves “Evangelical.” The Greek of this term is evangelikos, from evangelion: EV—good, well; and ANGELLO—to announce: literally, “To announce good:” or, the “gospel announcement: the glad tidings of Christ.” Those who hold and promulgate the truth of those tidings are the evangelical. Hence every honest Christian is such in his own estimation, and so is every sect. Now, if to announce good is evangelical, then the “orthodox class are not very exclusively so; for they announce some of the most horrible things that the human mind can possibly conceive. On the other hand, we maintain the gospel of Christ is good news, and only good. It finds men dying, going out of life without hope of a future one, and utterly powerless, of themselves, to survive in life, or ever to revive into it. In this condition the proclamation is made, in the love of God, of a LIFE-GIVER, who is both able and willing to revive from death and bestow eternal life on every soul of man who will accept this LIFE-GIVER and become subject to him. This proclamation is “To announce good,” and only good; and is therefore truly “evangelical.” Our gospel makes no man's condition worse hereafter than it would have been if he had never heard of it; but is an infinite good now, because it informs men how they may live again, though they die; and that such life will be eternal, and filled only with pleasure and joy. We, then, are the “evangelical;” and we do not yield the title to any pretenders who mix up a system of immortal souls and eternal or hopeless torture, in another life, with the good LIFE-GIVER's mission.

We believe, too, in the millennium; and that only those who have suffered with or for Christ, in some way, will be raised from the dead at its commencement; and that the resurrection at its close is another class of saved ones, whom God's love and mercy will bring from death's dominion, who never had the gospel in its purity, if at all, but who had “feared God and worked righteousness” according to the light they had; if a resurrection is to take place at the end of the millennium, of anybody. Surely, the life-giving power of Christ will never touch the incorrigibly wicked dead: “they shall not see life:” “the wages of sin is death,” and death holds such eternally in his dominion. This class of sinners were “ultra materialists:” that is, they had no spiritual nature, and never accepted the Spirit of God when it strove with them, but chose to “live after the flesh,” and “utterly perish in their own corruption.” 2 Pet. ii., 12.

Truly, “Adventism” has “taken away the millennium, and we know not where they have laid it!” and we, with the Advent Herald, would like to know what they have done with it. We think they have buried it between “two thieves,” viz., “A universal, simultaneous, mortal resurrection of saints and sinners, and judgment after.” We pledge ourself to help the Advent Herald to dig the millennium out of such a mass of confusion; but we will not promise to use it in the same way, after it is exhumed.

Now we appeal, once more, to the author of “Adventism” and its publishers to give us a fair and honest answer to our “four questions” on the foregoing subjects. Will they do it? Those questions are as follows:

1. Is the resurrection of the whole Adamic family to take place at one and the same time?

2. If so, are they all raised mortal?

3. If all are not raised mortal, how are we to account for it without admitting a judicial judgment before the resurrection? or,

4. Why is one class raised mortal and the other immortal?

The questions have to do only with the statements in “Part I” of Adventism; and we did hope Br. Himes would give a frank answer to them, that we and all others might understand the exact position of the work called “Adventism,” which he and others are so dilligently scattering. We said, “we earnestly desire to harmonize with him and all others so far as our convictions of truth will allow.”

JOHN CAMPBELL, New Castle, Me., writes: I send $5 for the HERALD OF LIFE another year; and am glad enough to get it for that or any price I am able to pay. We must have the paper; and may the good Lord sustain you, is my prayer night and day; hoping and trusting that He will guide by that wisdom which is from above, remembering that “God is love,” and in all our doings we should endeavor to resemble Him. Yours, in hope of immortality, eternal life.

HOW TO REGARD THE LORD'S COMING.

To most people, the doctrine of the near coming of Christ is only a terror and an annoyance. They do not wish to think of it. They would rather not hear about it. If they could have their own way, they would prefer that Christ might never come. The young mother looks upon her child, and would like that day at least postponed until she can see him a man, and settled in the world. The statesman, who has spent his years elaborating systems of reform, is offended with the idea that this present order of things may close before his schemes are tried. The politician, in his zeal for his country, because being enriched by his country's favors, cannot endure to think that his patriotic devotion is likely soon to be needed no more. And the self-seeking preacher, the hypocritical professor, the Pharisaic humanitarian, is particularly sensitive to the dangerous fanaticism of those who venture to read aloud God's word with reference to the signs of the Saviour's coming, or undertake to compare them with the actual state of things around us. And all who live as if this world were man's highest portion, and spend their energies in pursuit of its pleasures, honors and possessions, cannot for a moment anticipate Christ's speedy coming without the deepest deprecations. Luther well read the human heart when he said, “There be very few who would not rather that the day of judgment might never come.”

But this is not the way in which our Saviour would have us affected by this subject. It is indeed a terrible thing for the guilty, and is meant so to be, that it may break up their false security, and arouse them to repentance and a better life; but it is designed to be a joy and consolation to all true believers. It is intended to be a thing of precious promise and of glad hope to them. Yea, and with all the terribleness with which it is to be attended, with all the fears of the timid and faint-hearted, with all the petulance and impatience with which it is viewed by the sensual and the worldly, and with all the alarm which it has for the unsanctified and the guilty, the day of Christ's coming is really a joyful day, a desirable day, a blessed day, which every member of Christ may well wish to come as speedily as possible. And so the Saviour describes it in sundry places. “When these things begin to come to pass.” He does not propose to us to become alarmed, nor tell us to tremble and be afraid, nor admonish us to be dismayed, as if some terrible calamity were about to befall us; but He commands us to “look up,” and lift up our heads, in peaceful anticipation, and in glad longing for the speedy accomplishment of all that has been foretold. All alarming fears He would have us lay aside, and joyfully believe that it is our redemption that is approaching.

It is indeed, a solemn and startling thought even for good people to entertain, that we have come to, and are daily treading on, the very margin of the day of judgment. Yet there is reason to believe that it is the truth. Luther, in his day, maintained that all the predicted signs had already appeared; and they have been tenfold intensified since his day. There is nothing now that we can see that remains to be fulfilled before the predicted coming of our Lord. All the dates, by the best light the Church now has, are in their last years. The increase of knowledge, inventions, enterprise, revolution, earthiness, unbelief, apostasy, scoffing, surfeiting, and running to and fro, with the signs in sun, moon, and stars, foretold by prophets, apostles, and Christ himself, as bordering on the end, has taken place. Men of learning, piety, and soberness of mind, in all sections of the world, are giving it out as their profound conviction that the time has about come, and that any of these days or nights the judgment scenes may be upon us. And cold and dead must be the heart that can realize the idea without being thrilled through and through. But still, while it should kindle every spiritual energy into flame, and beget in us the most devout watchfulness, there is nothing in it to cause dismay to the true Christian. Have we not had enough of the aches, and ill, and losses, and bereavements, and death scenes, and funerals, and graves, and battles with sin, error, and death, which are our inheritance in this present world? Have we not seen enough of the curse, experienced enough of it, to wish to feel now the glory of deliverance—to desire to look upon the earth once in its Sabbath dress—to be anxious to see these thunder-riven hills transformed with Edenic beauty, and this long down-trodden creation relieved forever of all its groans and miseries? What is it that Jesus has bid us pray for when He teaches us to say: “Thy kingdom come; . . . Deliver us from evil?” What, but the interference of His own Almightiness to lift us out of this state of conflict, imperfection, sorrow, and trial? And “when these things begin to come to pass,” shall we suddenly alter our petitions, and say: “Let not Thy kingdom come!” or, “Let it not come yet!” What is the day of judgment but the day of the coming of the kingdom? Doth not the Saviour say, “When these things,” these forgoing signs, “begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh;” that we should know, when we see these things come to pass, “that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand?” How, also, did St. Paul view that day? Have we not his words to show us in what manner we should contemplate it? “There is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord the righteous judge shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing.” 2 Tim. iv., 8. Has he not moreover told us, that it is part of our highest consolation, while in this vale of tears, to be “looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ.” Tit. ii., 13. Wherefore, then, deny our faith, and let go our profession, at the very moment when we are about to enter upon the possession of its eternal fruits and promises? Terror and trepidation, at such an hour, and at such a prospect, Luther pronounced suspicious and unfavorable systems, which pertain rather to the unrenewed and the lost, than to such as have been washed in the Saviour's blood, and justified by faith in the word of his gospel. He that cometh is not an angry tyrant, nor a relentless foe, but our own dear Lord and Redeemer, who loved us unto death, and whom we profess to love, coming to receive us into his own everlasting glory. Shall we trust in him now, and believe that he has satisfied for our guilt, and not continue to trust in him then, when he is about to be revealed as our eternal deliverer from every remaining evil? Let the wicked tremble, and those be in anguish who have never consented that he should be their Saviour; but as for those who have tasted of his goodness, let them look up, and lift up their heads.

And if the indications of the nearness of that day were even far less than they really are, if, instead of the great mass of evidence from fulfilled prophecy which we have to show that our Lord's return is at hand, we should be able only to refer to a few particulars pointing in that direction; it ought to fill us with rejoicing. The fewest weeds, floating upon the sea of time, indicating that we are drawing toward the continent of glory—the smallest flowers here and there, however fragile, if messengers of the approaching spring-time of immortal blessedness, ought to awaken in us emotions of intensest gladness. And now that the signs are so numerous, and daily becoming more and more intense, shall we not note them with joyous hearts, and rouse us up as men who really expect to be saved?—Prophetic Times.

FEW SAVED:

OR, THE AWFUL CONDITION OF THE WORLD AND CHRISTENDOM.

BY A WATCHMAN.

SUCH is the title-page of a work of some sixty pages, put into our hands by Eld. D. T. Taylor, of Rouse's Point, N. Y., at our late meeting at Springfield, Mass. We presume he is the author of the work. Its revelations of the state of the world and churches are of the most astounding character, and seem all but incredible; yet they seem to be well authenticated. Truly, if they are any approach to truth, the hope of “the world's conversion” is the greatest delusion that ever entered the mind of man. Nothing but the personal return of Christ from heaven, to be enthroned as King on David's throne, can possibly better the condition of this world and groaning creation. Whoever reads the work must be satisfied there is no possibility of any other agency putting an end to the rolling tornado of sin and wickedness that is sweeping over earth's entire surface. We give our readers a few of the first pages of the work below, and may hereafter give more. It commences as follows:

Momentous question! This solemn inquiry was made by the disciples of our Lord. He gave them a sorrowful and dubious answer. Let us investigate it in the light of stern figures and stubborn facts. To be finally and forever saved in a life immortal, is the most stupendous thought, the most important thing, that can agitate the human mind. Yet start not, reader, when we state that in all the ages that ever occurred on earth, and in all the great crises which ever befell our race, the saved were few in number, while the lost were many. And the reason of this sad fact was, that the good at such epochs were in the minority, while the bad were in the majority; it being true in every age and in all places, “Wide is the gate, and broad is the way, that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat: because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it.” Matt. vii., 13, 14.

At the epoch of the deluge] “few, that is, eight souls were saved by water.” 1 Peter iii. 20. And still there were hundreds of thousands, and doubtless millions, of people upon the earth at the flood. It seems amazing that so few should be saved. Only eight! One single family. The world had stood sixteen centuries and a half. We read of no famine or epidemic that had swept away the multitudes of people. They lived to a great age, and the number of unsaved must have been immense. The bare thought is appalling. It was a fearful crisis in the affairs of men; a solemn day in the annals of the government of God. The reason for this terrible and world-wide judgment was, “the earth was corrupt before God, all flesh had corrupted his way, the wickedness of man was great, every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually, and the earth was filled with violence through them.” Gen. vi. For this cause the holy and almighty Creator doomed the whole human race, saving a few only. Alas, how few!

Again, a little later there were five fair and populous cities, situated on the fertile plain and valley of Jordan, whose inhabitants, “giving themselves over to fornication and going after strange flesh” (Jude 7), and because “their sin was very grievous” (Gen. xviii., 20), God rained fire and brimstone from the skies on four of these cities, namely, Sodom, Gomorrah, Zeboim, and Admah, and they, with their teeming multitudes, went down in ruinous and devouring flames. But where were the few? They being warned, believed, fled, and were saved. Four went forth from the doomed city; three only reached Zoar, the city of refuge; and even this handful soon forgot their strange deliverance and their God.

And still, a few hundred years later, another terrible crisis occurred—a national one—preceded, like the others, by an age of mercy. A people went out from Egyptian bondage. Their number might have been three millions, but their enemies were more powerful and numerous still. And all about this elect company, and all over the broad earth, there must have been scores of millions who knew not God. We know not the statistics of the world before the flood, of the lost cities, or of ruined Egypt. But a “multitude” (Ezek. xxxii., 31, 32) went down in the Red sea, and with them horses, chariots, and a proud monarch who had dared contemptuously to ask, “Who is the Lord?” God's chosen people were saved. Compared with their enemies, and the countless heathen tribes who environed them, Israel's great family must still have been in the minority. The truly just on earth were, as ever previously, a “few.”

Furthermore, in this nation, small as it was, the true followers of God were in the small minority. The multitude murmured and rebelled against God; thousands of them fell in a day in the wilderness; the graves of lust hid the carcasses of a host; even Moses and Aaron died outside of the land of promise; and of the six hundred thousand men who left the land of Egypt, only two, Caleb and Joshua, who “followed the Lord fully,” entered the promised inheritance. Num. xiv.

Again, in the days of Elijah there were not only millions of “heathen round about,” but doubtless millions of the professed people of God also. But the nation had become apostate. They forgot God. They killed the Lord's prophets. They threw down his altars. They forsook his covenant. The man of God said in despair, “I, even I only, am left, and they seek my life, to take it away.” 1 Kings, xix. The prophet said, “I only am left.” But God, who had keener eyes to detect the evil and the good, said, “Yet I have left me seven thousand in Israel.” But what were seven thousand among so many? Evil had reigned. The majority were sinful; there were “few saved.”

At the close of the old Hebrew dispensation, at the end of a long age—an age of mercy and goodness on the part of God, and rebellion and apostasy on the part of man—we have, as in all previous ages, the same old dismal story of sin's triumphs. The righteous were but “few” on earth. Only one small country, Judea, was enlightened with a knowledge of heaven's will. This whole Judea was but one five-thousandth part of the habitable globe. Light and truth shone down upon its inhabitants. But though time's career was two-thirds gone, nearly five thousand times as much of the earth's surface lay in darkness and in the powerful grasp of the evil one. There were perhaps one hundred millions of people in all the world. But how “few” were righteous! How few looked and waited for the great Redeemer! To how small a number did he reveal himself at first! How few knew him and believed in him to the last! The Annas and Simeons were a little people; the Herods and Pilates ruled the world, and were a great number. How few followed Jesus to his tomb! How few saw him when risen from the dead! The masses, as it is now, clung to earth, and but a “little flock” knew and followed their Maker. And when Jerusalem perished, the ungodly multitude (perhaps there were three millions) perished in her and with her; but the “few” were, as ever, saved. Perhaps four hundred Christians fled from the doomed capital, and found secure refuge; the multitude were swept away as with the besom of destruction.

If we come down the stream of time fifteen centuries, we find the world again enveloped in midnight, and the “holy flock,” as before, a “little” one. Few of the great mass of earth's inhabitants were saved at the Reformation. The majority were, as now, Satan-bound. The multitude walked in moral gloom and death. Down to this period, doubtless, according to the estimates of Burke, twenty-five thousand million had been slain in human wars. There were supposed to be five hundred millions of souls on earth, but we know that, when the Reformation came, there could have been in all the corrupt, superstitious, and stupid masses of Greek and Romish Christians but a mere handful, a few hundred thousand, who followed the Lord in all his ways, and were saved.

Thus we may lay it down as a stubborn, undeniable truth, that in every age of dispensation for man, whether a local economy for a city or a nation, or whether a more general dispensation for the entire world of mankind, each age went on in sin, and closed up in judgment, with the destruction of the enemies of the Lord, but with the salvation of his chosen people who served him. And while the age coursed forward, and when it ended, the majority, and in some instances the vast majority, nine hundred and ninety-nine out of a thousand, it may be, were evil, and served the evil one, while the truly righteous and holy seed were “few,” and sometimes very few. Alas, how unerringly He spoke who said, “Many are called, but FEW are chosen.”

And how will it be in the end of this age? Let the burning lips of God's prophet answer. “The earth also is defiled under the inhabitants thereof, because they have transgressed the laws, changed the ordinances, broken the everlasting covenant: therefore hath the curse devoured the earth; and they that dwell therein are desolate; therefore the inhabitants of the earth are burned, and FEW men left.” Isa. xxiv., 5, 6. “So shall it be in the end of this age.” Matt. xiii., 40.

This age has lasted longer than did the age before the flood, by more than three hundred years. It is drawing to its close. It is an age of boasted progress. It is an age of marvellous light. It is an age of wonders. It is a pregnant age: out of its womb come most stupendous things. It is an age of great expectation. It is a sublime age; magnificent events crowd its borders. But as the age courses swiftly to its close, is evil still in the majority? Are the righteous comparatively but few? We shall find it so. Let us look ot the world and the church as we find them to-day.

Great Britain, the United States, and Prussia, are confessedly the bulwarks of Protestant Christianity. The vast centres and representative cities of these gigantic nations are London, New York, and Berlin. We propose, first, to investigate the moral and religious condition of these Christian cities.

First, London.* Here are found three and a half millions of people, more than all the inhabitants of the six New England States put together. They are crowded on to one hundred and forty square miles, or a spot of earth fourteen miles long and ten miles wide. Here are found twelve thousand children trained and nursed in crime. They are taught to pick pockets, plunder, and pilfer. They are the gamins of the city. Three thousand persons receive and hide stolen property, and four thousand are annually committed for crime, this being not over one per cent. of the arrests. Here are found ten thousand gamblers, twenty thousand others who live by begging, and who are demoralized, and thirty thousand with whom theft and fraud are a regular profession. Here are an hundred thousand persons totally without education. One hundred and fifty thousand are abandoned to drunkenness and profligacy, and lead lives of debauchery and licentiousness. Beside these, there are one hundred and fifty thousand more who are habitual gin-drinkers. In London, one house in every sixty is a brothel or a place of assignation, and the army of prostitutes numbers fifty thousand, and by some is estimated as high as eighty thousand, while there are born four or five thousand illegitimate children each year. To govern this mighty city, eight thousand police are required. Here are consumed annually fifty-five million gallons of intoxicating drinks, such as ale, beer, porter, spirits, and wines, which are fifteen gallons to each man, woman, and child. Reeking from the satanic press, five millions of immoral and blasphemous publications are here circulated weekly. And here live full two millions of persons, of all nations in the earth, who never attend public worship at all. Beside these, there are over two hundred thousand Roman Catholics, the eternal foes of Protestantism, and also twenty-five thousand unbelieving Jews, who deny the Lord that bought them.

To counteract this enormous mass of crime and irreligion, London has eleven hundred places of worship; and aside from the regular ministry, the city missionary societies employ nearly four hundred missionaries and agents among the ignorant and depraved. There are also seven hundred Sunday-schools in the city. If these eleven hundred places of worship, including churches, chapels, halls, etc., were filled to their utmost capacity, they would seat but one million souls. Consequently some two and a half millions of sinful, dying persons, a population exceeding that of the entire State of Massachusetts, (which State has fifteen hundred church edifices), can find no room in the houses of worship on Sunday; and more than that, they do not care to. In fine weather, when the skies and streets are favorable, the churches of London are only one-fourth full. Hence, the average attendance at the house of God on Lord's day, is not over two hundred and fifty thousand. Startling fact? Moreover, it is estimated by the city clergymen, that a number of persons equal to this church attendance, are every Sunday conveyed out of the metropolis by railways, steamboats, etc., for the purpose of spending their time in idleness, dissipation, and sin.

But we have not yet come to the worst feature. In twenty-three churches there are but six hundred communicants, and in all London there are less than one hundred and seventy-five thousand church communicants in all the Protestant denominations. Of this small number, nearly one-half are members of the English Episcopal church; the remainder are Dissenters. And, sad to say, we are told that of this body of church-members, not over seventy-five thousand ordinarily avail themselves of the privilege of celebrating the Lord's supper. A terrible condition of things, where only one in every twenty is a professed Christian; where there are nineteen unsaved to one that is saved; and where of those who do believe in and profess to practise the religion of Jesus, full one-half are doubtless spiritually dead. Such is the moral destitution in the emporium of the world. The church of God is indeed a "little flock" amidst "the multitude of the wicked." Psa. lxxiv., 19.

THE CAMPAIGN DOCUMENTS.

IN the last three months we have put in circulation four thousand of the pamphlet LIFE FROM THE DEAD; three thousand each of A DEFENCE OF THE BIBLE, and THE JUDGMENT. These have all been paid for by donations or otherwise. This work, so well begun, must still be prosecuted to the end of the Campaign. To this end, let us still contribute to the funds by donations or by purchase of documents. We have just had another lot of them printed, at a cost of a hundred dollars or more, the late camp-meeting having entirely exhausted our stock on hand. About one hundred and fifty dollars' worth of these and our other works were disposed of at that meeting, mostly as a free gift. Let us now replenish the funds to go on with this work. We know that much good has already been accomplished, and the campaign must go on with increased vigor; and we trust it will.

The three works can still be had for 14 cents, including the postage; or, 100 of each for $12, including postage, or for $10 when sent by express or taken at our office.

In ordering these works, you need not suppose you must take an equal number of each. State which you want; that is, what proportion of each; and if you do not wish any of some of them, say so; and we will send you the amount of your money in either one of them, if that is your wish.

Never could so much be accomplished with so little expense in spreading the Life views. We are now sending out the fifth thousand of "LIFE FROM THE DEAD: or, The Righteous only will Live again."

THE "GENEROUS OFFER" REVIVED.

IT will be remembered that the Hon. O. S. HALSTED, last winter made the offer to send his work, "THE THEOLOGY OF THE BIBLE," to any subscriber of the HERALD OF LIFE for $2, and himself prepay the postage. The retail price of the work is $3. By accepting the judge's offer, you, in fact, get this invaluable work for a little more than half price; as the author gets but $1.68 after paying postage. The book is one to stdy; and with it your Bible will be more perfectly understood. The offer is a most generous one, and we hope many more will avail themselves of it. It is not restricted to your taking one copy at this rate. You can have any number you choose to send the money for. Send $2 for each copy; writing your own name and Post Office address plain, and the work will come to you free of any other expense.

Direct your communication to Hon. O. S HALSTED, 417 Broad St., NEWARK, N. J.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 16, 1868.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

NEW AND OLD SUBSCRIBERS.

ONE more number of the HERALD OF LIFE will complete this volume, and October commences our sixth. Shall we begin it with at least a thousand new subscribers? To encourage each of our old subscribers to renew and to send us one, two, or more new ones, we make the following offer, viz.:

For one new subscriber, for the year, with pay in advance, we will allow you fifty cents on your own subscription, and the same on each additional new subscriber; so that for four new ones you will have your own paper without further charge. Try it.

Let us have your response as early as possible; it will enable us to determine how many copies we shall print to commence the volume; and unless we receive it at an early day we may not be able to supply the first numbers.

We have hitherto, usually, discontinued papers when the subscription money was exhausted; though we have not rigidly practised that course; especially, the volume now closing, so that some are in arrears; but we make no claims on them on that account. It has been suggested that we so far alter our practice as to conform to that of other publishers; that is, continue to send to all old subscribers till such time as they notify us they wish a discontinuance and pay up arrearages. The law allows that course, and the subscriber is legally held to pay for a periodical sent him, whether he ordered it or not, if he takes it from the Post-office. We confess we dislike to send any one a paper without an assurance that he desires its continuance.

However, we find it is the usual practice among publishers to discontinue none till notified to do so, except at their own discretion. Shall we adopt this practice? We know it will largely increase our list of subscribers, but will it increase the amount of our funds? Quite a number, it is true, do not find it always possible to pay strictly in advance; and if their paper happens to get discontinued, may neglect to renew afterward; though they would cheerfully have paid for it, if it had continued to come.

We wish to do what is right and best for all concerned. We say then, as most of our subscribers have paid only to the end of this volume, and therefore advance pay for the next will be due the first of October, we will continue to send to you, trusting you will remit the subscription price at as early a day as possible. If you wish your paper discontinued, please let us know at once.

QUESTIONS BY REUBEN CADWELL.

CORTLAND, N. Y., SEPT. 3, 1868.

BR. STORRS: I would like it if some that have more light than I would answer a few questions, or point out the errors involved in the following:

1. Can any one inform us that Rom. viii., 19–24, is a favorable translation, by which to understand the apostle?

2. As the living, natural creature is here referred to, 19th, 20th, and 21st verses, and could alone be subjected to vanity or suffering, does the "bondage of corruption," in this connection, express any more, and reach even into death (before the subjection is taken off), and teach the resurrection of some from death? If so, what reason have we for referring it to a class, and not to all, since it says, the "creature itself, also, shall be delivered?"

3. Does this verse refer to the Christian only, and mean as he goes into death a natural, animal creature, by "subjection," so the creature thus sown in death, shall itself be delivered also—be born from the dead, the sons of God by resurrection; viz., those who suffer with him.

4. Does this interpretation exclude the "earnest expectation," and the birth, or deliverance, by restitution, of man as a natural living soul; and animals, since they are embraced in the "groaning" of creation?

5. Does this deliverance, verse 21, come to the first by a restitution; and to the latter—the saints (verse 23), by a redemption from mortality and death?

6. As they all travail in pain together, is not the deliverance from the "suffering of the present time" as certain to the one class as to the OTHER?

RESPONSE BY THE EDITOR.

The text upon which the foregoing questions are based is one of great difficulty, and has perplexed many commentators not a little, and they are much divided on the true meaning of it. Dr. Bloomfield, in his critical Notes on the Greek of the New Testament, on this text says,

"There is perhaps no passage of the apostle more difficult than the present, or on which the opinions of commentators are more various." He adds, "The sense depends much on the meaning assigned to ktisis."

Dr. Bloomfield then notices several views that have been taken; but comes to the conclusion that the term means "the world;" which "waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God." The first sense of the term seems to be creation; and so it is rendered in verse 22, in this text. Dr. B., after remarking on the meaning of other terms in the text, and giving the ideas of different persons, says the sense would be,

"For the world (i. e., God's creatures), was made subject to imperfection, corruption and misery (not by any will of its own; i. e., not as a punishment for any voluntary demerits of the sufferers; but by him who thus subjected it), yet with a hope [on their part] that this very creation [i. e., these his creatures] will be delivered from the bondage of corruption, and admitted to the glorious liberty which pertains to the children of God."

On the general sense of this portion of Scripture, Prof. Stuart, late of Andover, Mass., in his Synopsis, says,

"Now that such a glory is yet to be revealed; (in other words, that there is a world of surpassing glory beyond the grave) the whole condition of things, or rather of mankind in the present world, abundantly proves. Here a frail and perishable nature serves to show that no stable source of happiness can be found on earth. From the commencement of the world down to the present time, it has always been thus. In the midst of sufferings and sorrows to which their earthly existence exposes them, mankind naturally look forward to another and better world, where happiness without alloy and without end may be enjoyed. Even Christians themselves, joyful as their hopes should make them, find themselves still compelled by sufferings and sorrows to sigh and groan, and to expect a state of real and permanent enjoyment only in heaven; so that they can only say, for the present, that they are saved because they hope or expect salvation in another and better world. The fact, that here they, like all others around them, are in a state of trial, and that they only hope for glory, shows that the present fruition of it is not to be expected."

From such statements we may be led perhaps to a true understanding of the apostle's meaning in this text. It would seem to be this: Man was designed by his Creator for a higher life or sphere than that of which he was first put in possession, and of course was constituted with aspirations for advancement not possessed by the inferior animals; but the first trial proving a failure, the race, then unborn, were subjected to a severer course of discipline by sufferings and sorrows, which the love of God for the world intended should stimulate them to seek for a better state; and which the first promise, that the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head [the head and power of evil], was calculated to inspire; so that from that day to the present time, notwithstanding all the sorrows and pains of life, men have been constantly looking for a "golden age" somewhere in the future; and that hope has sustained them in the darkest and most trying events of life. No man can be found, and probably never was found, who had not this hope, because it is implanted in us by our Creator to prompt us to exertion to find out the means to reach that "golden age," and to be partakers of that glory.

No human mind is so dark as not to anticipate such a day somewhere, and at some period; and hence, "the earnest expectation of the creature [the world of mankind] waiteth for the manifestation of [what Paul calls] the sons of God"—that "golden age" the world is looking after. Then the apostle goes on to say that "the creature [the world God loved so as to give his Son] was made subject to vanity [weakness, misery, corruption, death], not willingly, [not for personal sins, or as a punishment], but by reason of him who hath subjected in hope." God subjected all the race to this state, not in wrath, but in love, that men might be led earnestly to look after and seek for a better state. Afflictions, trials, pain, and death itself, have a natural tendency to lead men to look for something better in the future; and they desire and expect somehow to have part in a "golden age" before them. God has made them creatures of hope; and he has prepared a golden age, and invites all to look for it and share in it. That hope no man can divest himself of; but they may, and most do, give it a wrong direction; that is, they may seek the realization of this hope in a manner God has never promised; and hence they may fail, or "come short of entering into that rest," or glory "God has prepared for those who love him."

God has subjected the race to vanity in hope, "because the creature [creation—the world, the earth] itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God." The deliverance here spoken of seems to be of the earth or globe itself; because, to suppose it has reference to all men is to destroy all distinction between the children of God and others whom the apostle says "shall die," because they "lived after the flesh," verse 13, and because they were not "led by the Spirit of God," and hence were not "the sons of God;" therefore will not have "the glorious liberty of the children of God," verse 21.

The expression pasa ktisis, rendered "the whole creation," verse 22, is the same found in Mark xvi., 15, "Preach the gospel to every creature;" and in Col. i., 23, "The gospel was preached to every creature;" which shows the apostle had in his mind the same class of creatures, or mankind, and not the inferior animals, whatever may be the result to those animals.

From these remarks, it may be seen, that while all men travail in pain, and have hope of deliverance somehow, it does not follow that actual deliverance will come to any who will not be led by the Spirit of God. Only such as are thus led, and the irresponsible earth, that has groaned for six thousand years, will actually be delivered from this state of vanity to which all have been subjected in hope; others who refused God's method of making them his children, and chose to seek the realization of their hope in some other way, will "utterly perish in their own corruption," or, vanity. 2 Pet. ii., 12.

We have thus not formally answered Br. Cadwell's questions, but have taken a general view of the subject as briefly as possible, without being positive as to the exact sense in which the apostle used some of the language of this exceedingly difficult portion of Scripture, which belongs to that portion of Paul's writings which Peter said, "were hard to be understood." 2 Peter iii., 16.

"BEARING THE CROSS."

[The following article was written by us, and first published in the Bible Examiner in 1845. Whether it has ever before appeared in the HERALD OF LIFE, we are not certain; but whether it has or not, we think it well to refresh our own mind and the minds of others with the sentiments it contains. Well will it be for us all to cultivate that state of mind which shall lead to the course of life presented in the article. If we have hitherto come short, that is no reason for us to despair. Let us try again; and seek a larger measure of the Spirit of the God of love that we may "be conformed to the image of His Son."]

MUCH is said, among professed Christians, about "bearing the cross;" but we fear little is understood or really practised in this matter. Some seem to think speaking in meeting is the cross they must bear; and when they have done that, they think little more about the cross. We apprehend that is a very small item in bearing the cross. Men are all naturally in love with this present world. To this world we must become crucified. Crucifixion is a hard death; but few persons are willing to die such a death; there is, however, no other way of entering into the kingdom of God. We must be "crucified unto the world, and the world unto" us. Most professed Christians, it is to be feared, have made a covenant with the world not to part with it; and the tempter satisfies them if they speak in meeting some times, and give something to support the gospel, they may keep their covenant with the world: but, "If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him." 1 John ii., 15.

How then are we to be separated from the love of the world, and be crucified unto it? First—By a believing view of the Lord Jesus Christ, who became poor—was despised of men—a man of sorrow, acquainted with grief—endured reproach—resisted temptation, though he "suffered, being tempted"—when he was reviled, reviled not again—murmured not, though wounded, bruised, put to grief, and his soul made an offering for sin, scourged, spit upon, his hands and feet pierced with nails, his soul in agony—all this he bore, and no lisp of impatience ever escaped him. Would we be crucified unto the world, let us learn of him: contemplate his poverty—his life—his sufferings—his resignation—his patience—his loving and forgiving spirit, till the whole mind is humbled within us: and then realize this truth—"If so be we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together." Rom. viii., 17. Do you ask what it is to suffer with him? We answer—To suffer with the same meek, patient, forgiving, resigned spirit that he had. This leads us to say—Second—If we would bear our cross and be crucified unto the world, remember, every trial of our life—whether temporal or spiritual, personal or family, from friends or enemies, direct or indirect, great or small, of short continuance or long, or whatever be the nature or character of it, is by the appointment or permission of that God who willeth not the death of the sinner, but who is seeking by all these trials to crucify us unto the world, and fit us to be glorified with his Son Jesus Christ. How shall this design of our heavenly Father be accomplished? It cannot be, unless we "bear our cross." Do you ask again—What is it to bear our cross? We answer—It is to suffer all the trials, of which we have spoken, patiently. We are not to quarrel with the instrumentality God may employ, nor indulge in fretfulness under it. If we do, we do not "bear the cross." And though we should speak like angels in meeting, yet if we fret and complain under any of the trials of life, by which God is seeking to crucify us unto the world, it is hypocrisy for us to talk about our "bearing the cross"—we are but deceiving ourselves. God has assured us, "all things work together for good to them that love him," Rom. viii., 28; yet we can murmur, fret, and complain at those things which God has permitted or appointed! Alas, alas! Shall we dream we are ripening for the kingdom of God while this is the case? No, we are ripening for death—for perdition. Saith our Saviour—"In your patience possess ye your souls." We shall learn soon, or when it is too late, that these words are words of solemn and awful import. If we indulge in murmuring, complaining, or impatience at any trials, insults, sufferings, or injuries, from whatever instrumentality they may come, and that spirit is increasing upon us, we are just as surely travelling in the road to perdition as God has said—"The soul that sinneth it shall die." We speak not now of one "overtaken in a fault," to which all are liable in the hour of temptation; but we speak of him upon whom this spirit is not abating but increasing—and it is increasing, except we bear our cross daily: for every day will bring some cross, in some form. Happy the soul who is constantly looking to God for grace to bear every cross. We may pray to have the cross removed; but we may not pray for it only in submission to the will of God, "If it be possible, let this cup pass from me; nevertheless, not my will but thine be done." That is our example; and we cannot safely follow any other. "My grace is sufficient for thee," will often be the answer; and did we know now what we shall know hereafter we should praise God for every trial and every cross we have to bear: yea, a living faith will praise God even now, that he does not leave us to our own way, lest we should be like the children of Israel, whose impatient murmurings were answered by giving them "flesh," but "leanness" was "sent into their souls." "Be patient in all things:" that is bearing our cross; then, when Christ appears, we shall have a crown.

STANDING QUESTIONS.

1. Is there positive testimony that the wicked dead will be made alive?

2. Is there testimony as to the means or power by which they are to receive life?

3. If alive, by what means is that life sustained during the judgment, or any period allotted to torment after?

4. Do the Scriptures distinctly teach that any who are made alive by the resurrection at the last day are mortal?

5. Do the Scriptures not distinctly affirm deathlessness, or incorruptibility, to all who are made alive by that resurrection?

If life is the gift of God, does he give it at all to those who have died in their sins? If Christ is the LIFE-GIVER, does he give life to dead sinners who have gone down to death without union with him, and without the indwelling of God's Holy Spirit?

THE CITY ABRAHAM LOOKED FOR.

BR. STORRS: I heard a very fanciful discourse on the city for which Abraham looked—at least, on its location. The speaker took the solar system as the outskirts in one direction of God's dominion. He then went to other central suns and systems of worlds, and thus on, and on, and on beyond all the fixed stars to systems of worlds unseen, to a central world, larger than all the former put together, and controlling them; and in this was the City of the living God that Abraham looked for.

It is evident, I think, the "continuing city," for which Abraham looked, belongs to this earth, and will continue identified with it in all the changes the earth and the heavens may pass through; and fill all the descriptions in its different stages of progress and perfection, the "continuing city," and metropolis of that kingdom which cannot be moved.

When I got home, I took the Bible to see if I could find and locate the city. I found much in the Psalms said about it, similar to what we find in the 46th, 47th, and 48th Psalms. While searching the prophets farther to identify it, a thought was suggested which, if true, removes many difficulties in regard to it. And if it is not true, I find no means of harmonizing them. The thought proves the city and country for which Abraham looked, have three differing states of existence, and go through two very great changes before they become eternal or enduring.

I have held for some time, the Holy City John saw, belongs to the new heaven, and new earth state. That it was designed to represent a literal city, in connection with spiritual and immortal inhabitants, represented in their symbolical order and glory; God and the Son being the temple and the light of it. On this idea I place but little stress. But what has ever puzzled me (and therefore I have passed them over), was the 24th and 26th verses of chap. xxi., and perhaps I may add, the 1st, 2d and 15th verses of chap. xxii. of Rev.; which involves the physical condition of the earth and heavens, and the natural order of society, or men in the flesh as now, in connection with it. And I discovered the same contrariety in Isa. lxv., 17–25, and chap. lx. throughout, which refers to Jerusalem made an "eternal excellency," the joy of many generations; which, however, was the Jerusalem so hated and forsaken that no man passed through her, but the uncircumcised and unclean; which with Isa. lxv., 19, contains the key to the identity of the Jerusalem here, the city of God, with the one John saw, and connects it back with the Jerusalem in which was heard the voice of weeping and the voice of crying, and in whose land "violence, wasting, and destruction should no more be heard;" lx., 18. Does not what Isa. says involve all that John says? There shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying; neither shall there be any more pain.

Now I think these are not two cities; one of, and on the earth, and the other not; but they are one and the same. And these things are said of it in different conditions, David speaks of Mount Zion, as the joy of the whole earth. He also says, the streams of the river "shall make glad the city of God."

. . . . "She shall not be moved; God will help her, and that right early." One would think such a city did not need help. But David foresaw it under bondage, and trodden down. Yet this desolated state will pass away; for God will help her. It may be thought this city does not exist in any form; for the Apostle says, We have here no continuing city, but we seek one to come. The substance of this declaration, as I understand it, is—all earthly cities are under, at present, the rudiments of this world, and as such, will pass away; and we are mortal, but the "one to come," belongs to the kingdom of God; and the saints, being made deathless, will possess and enjoy it forever. So when God shall make or create the trodden down, the wasted and desolated Jerusalem, an eternal excellency, and the voice of weeping or crying be no more heard in her, the former will be swallowed up in the latter.

I think this city belongs to the earth under sin, and to the earth redeemed. I think it is embraced in Abraham's title of being the heir of the world; and the Bible reveals no other; hence he could have faith in no other; at least, if to him was revealed any other, we have got no trace of it. And as God's people were to rejoice forever, in that which God should create, I think Abraham will rejoice with them.

This city, Isa. lxv., 17, which God will create or "prepare," Heb. xi., 16 (for there can be but one such city), in which was Mount Zion, where David dwelt, and which becomes the "heavenly," Heb. xii., 22, and to which "the redeemed come," Isa. xxxv., 10, and all whose names are written in the Book of Life will enter, and God himself will dwell with them and be their God, and they shall be his people; and in which, I think, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob will dwell also, since God is not ashamed to be called their God.

I will again refer to two or more seeming contrarieties as a sample of others. In Isa. lxv., 19, he says, The voice of weeping shall no more be heard in her. In the very next verse he says, The child shall die an hundred years old; but the sinner being an hundred years old, shall be accursed. In Isa. lx., he says, The abundance of the sea shall be converted unto thee, and the forces or wealth of the Gentiles shall come unto thee. But in Rev. xxi., John describes it also, when the former things were done away, and there was no more sea (and one would think) no more kings of the earth.

It was this seeming contrariety that gave rise to the thought of their identity, and how to reconcile them with it, which I have presented. For John's description is as consistent with itself, as Isaiah's. To my mind, there is no valid reason why kings and nations, and their glory and honor, should be taken contrary to their natural import, and all that is involved in doing this. The same words, with others, occur in Isa, lx., 10–12; and the prophets, where we know they have their literal and natural meaning, and they are applicable to the earth and city in some of their different conditions.

Does not Isaiah teach the process and the way by which God will bring in the new heavens and the new earth state? For his creating Jerusalem, and placing it, and its inhabitants, ultimately, in the condition described, would involve a corresponding change of the earth and heavens.

It has not been my object to prove the existence of the city of the living God as an object of promise, and to locate it; but to learn how to reconcile the descriptions given in any one place, with others of the same city, by the same writer. If the above is not the way to harmonize them, I would like to know what the right way is. And it may be worth our pains to know what city Abraham sought which has foundations, whose builder and maker is God, lest we form to ourselves one that will suit our fancy, or accept heathen fables as the one he sought.

CORTLAND, N. Y., Sept., 1868.

P. S. After writing the above, I made up my mind, I was a careless reader of the Bible, because I did not stop sufficiently to consider the meaning of the reading. I selected Rev. xxi., 24 and 26, as indicating a previous state of the holy city, and its connection with the nations of the earth. But I might with just as much propriety have selected the third and fourth verses as teaching a previous state from which it was redeemed, to make it the holy city, and free it from sorrow, pain, and death. (Let the unbelieving read Isa. lii. The description of the holy city here, is that of the other, as far as it goes.) For the angel says, the tabernacle of God—dwelling or dwelling-place, is with men; and so the angel explains it, "And he shall dwell among them"—not that they should go to dwell with God. But where was God's tabernacle, as seen by John? It was in or the Holy City Jerusalem. It was where there were men—in Jerusalem—on the earth. For "There shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying." Why? Because the former things are passed away. Did these things exist, where God now is? But they did exist among men, where God's tabernacle was placed. And that evidently, was first, the natural state of its inhabitants, as now. For it is said—"There shall be." Where; shall be? in God's city-tabernacle—"no more" the things named. Amen. If this is common sense perverted, will some one show me the perverting principle? R. C.

SPIRITISM AS IT IS.

No theory or development was ever made that so truly comes under the character of a "damnable heresy" as "Spiritism." But it is the offspring of the inherent immortal soul theory. It is this last-named theory in its legitimate result. An inherently immortal soul can neither die nor suffer, and needs no superior being to aid it or sustain it in existence. Atheism is the natural landing-place of the doctrine of inherent immortality. When will true Christians open their eyes to see the soul-destroying character of this "deathless spirit" teaching?

"It is just as sensible to pray to the ocean, or the sun, as it is to the Jewish 'Unknown' Jehovah, or the Christian's God. Nature justifies a 'faith' in no such abortion. The whole system of modern theology is based on the speculative idea of a personal God. But my god is more real and tangible. 'I can see it in the clouds, and hear it in the wind.' . . . People of shallow brains are so apt to get mad when they hear a free thinker speak irreverently of the great, overgrown boss of the universe. Seriously, what a person believes in reference to the great Idol is of no benefit to me."

Letters and Extracts.

FROM WM. H. H. McALLISTER.

St. Albans, Vt., Sept. 11, 1868.

Br. Storrs: I have a few causes for encouragement which I desire to communicate to the readers of the Herald of Life.

Last Sunday I attended the Methodist E. Church in the forenoon; and, as is my custom, I staid during the Sabbath School. The Bible class with which I sit is under the instruction of the pastor. Our teacher was called away to attend a funeral and invited me to take charge of the class. The lesson was in the 14th chapter of Luke. We disposed of the chapter in order without any difficulty till we came to the 14th verse. Here a question arose as to the time of the reward. What did Christ mean when he told his host that he should be recompensed at the resurrection of the just? As our time was limited and had been nearly all taken up in considering the previous part of the chapter, we had to leave it undecided, but when the school had closed, one prominent member of the class came to me and said he was in hopes we should have had time to consider that question fully, that the lesson was just getting interesting as we were obliged to leave it. I told him that the same question would probably come up next Sunday, when we could pursue the investigation further. The prospect is now that he will be away on that day, but it is my intention not only to have the subject fully considered in the class, but at my earliest opportunity to see this man and have a full conversation with him on this and related points. He has recently come to this place, is a physician of good attainments, a fine man, and will weigh down the whole church beside. The spirit of inquiry which he manifested is a cause of encouragement.

Last Monday I received a visit from a young man with whom I have some acquaintance, and with whom I have had some conversation upon religious subjects. He is a member of the M. E. church, and is now attending school with the intention of entering the ministry. He said that he had such a pleasant chat with me last year that he could not deny himself the pleasure of calling again. We had a full and free conversation. I endeavored to bring out of the store-house of divine truth such things as would be best adapted to his present condition. He has fully made up his mind as a preacher to be trammelled by no sectarian bonds. He is independent and wants only the truth. Upon this point I told him that the only true stand that he could take was to plant himself squarely on the Bible. Taking that for his creed and acknowledging his responsibility for his opinions and actions to God only, he could find true religious liberty. I have confidence that he will come out right in the end. I gave him the "Six Sermons," "Man in Death," and some small tracts which I think will be of service to him.

This friend introduced me to a cousin whom I had understood to hold some views like my own. He lives about a mile and a half from me, and, together with his wife and wife's mother, believes something that makes them unpopular in the churches. I had but a moment's time with him, and merely said that I would like to have some conversation with him to compare views, to see wherein we could agree, and he added, in a very candid manner, "look into those points upon which we differ." This is fair, I am sure; for as I do not wish to bring any one to my views without first giving the evidence that they are correct, so no one must expect to convince me without the proof.

To some these matters may seem trivial and unworthy of special mention; but to me, yearning for communion with some congenial Christian, whose heart will beat in unison with my own in response to the hope within us, they afford strong consolation. If I am only faithful, in due time God will give the increase. Yours for the truth.

FROM MARIA M. WEAVER.

Westfield, Mass., Sept. 8, 1868.

Br. Storrs: I much desired to have been at Springfield the day our people met, but duty kept me at home. Am glad the Herald is going to be well sustained. Hope many more of its friends will write for it.

We are favored, to-day, with a visit from Sr. Helen Robertson. It is truly cheering to meet with those whose trials are similar to our own.

The little flock in this place are holding on to the truth, leaning on the Lord, and bearing much bitter opposition from professed brethren. O, how hard it is to make some of our Adventists know that they are prejudiced. How hard to make prejudiced minds understand anything.

May the Lord teach us all to know ourselves, and help us to glorify Him. Amen.

FROM DANIEL HOWARD.

Chillicothe, Mo.

Br. Storrs: In studying the word of God, it will not do to form hasty conclusions in regard to the meaning of any passages of Scripture, but to take all Scripture containing subjects of a like import, and compare them together; and thus allow one Scripture to unfold and develop another.

It seems to me that John v., 29, has been seized upon by those who believe in an indiscriminate resurrection of all mankind to judgment, as if it contained the whole theory of the resurrection of the dead. But to my mind, it cannot be made use of to prove the resurrection of the literally dead at all. This I argue, first, because it is evident that Christ there made use of figurative language as he was talking to the Jews, for "without a parable spake he not unto them," and should be taken and understood in connection with the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus. In that parable, we understand that Christ places the Jewish nation in a state of death; and as Scripture abundantly shows that they are not always to remain there, it seems only reasonable that he should bring to view their resurrection, as well as their death, and that, too, by the same figurative language. And if this does not bring their resurrection to view, where in all the parables of Christ is it brought to view? It has been justly remarked that in the teachings and parables of Christ, He copied after the Old Testament Scriptures very often. Is it not probable, then, that he had the vision of dry bones resuscitated, in his mind, when he uttered the parables recorded in Luke xvi. and John v.? and that these Scriptures, when taken in connection with Dan. xii., 2, are to be understood as referring to the death and resurrection of the Jewish nation? Ezekiel brings to view the resurrection, or regathering and conversion of the whole house of Israel, and speaks not of individuals; while Daniel and Christ speak of the Jewish nation in an individual capacity, and hence must speak of the purging out of the rebels.

I argue secondly: That the resurrection brought to view in John v. cannot have reference to the resurrection of the literally dead, because the subjects of this resurrection are a mixed class, which cannot be the case with the subjects of the first resurrection; for such are blessed and holy, and exempt from the power of the second death.

Br. Storrs: I have moved from Decorah to this place. I am enjoying better health than I have for some time: am able to work at my trade, which I have not been for the last year until now: I am not preaching much, only on Sundays. The people in this section have closed their ears to anything but Platonic theology, and it is not to be wondered at; for they have been imposed on by false teaching; and that, too, purporting to be advent preaching, until they will not hear. The Methodists think their faith is as good, believing in the Holy Ghost baptism and eternal torments, as a faith that raises the wicked just for the purpose of putting them back in the condition they were before, unconcious in death, and no baptism but water; and I think theirs preferable, myself; for if we have no baptism but water we have never been sealed by the Holy Spirit of promise, and must remain in the congregation of the dead, having no life in us. It seems to me that Ephraim is joined to his idols, and might as well be let alone.

I left the Minnesota Conference this summer; and now, thank God, I am a free man, calling no man master upon the earth. O how good it is to be free.

The Herald of Life comes freighted with delicious fruit. O how it feeds the hungry soul; it is the herald of life indeed; it wipes out the last stain that has been placed upon the character of the God of love by false teachers. He has never appeared so lovely as He has since I saw that man had no life out of Christ; and that in Him dwells all the fulness of the Godhead bodily; and that He has the keys of death and the grave, and will unlock the one and lock up the other when he comes in this kingdom; for Paul says, When this mortal puts on immortality, and this corruptible puts on incorruption then is brought to pass the saying of the prophet Hosea, "O death, I will be thy plague, O grave, I will be thy destruction;" and not a thousand years after, as some will persist in saying.

A correspondent in P—, Tenn., writes: The papers and tracts sent me are nearly all out to professors, preachers, lawyers, doctors and other reading friends. Only one Preacher has named the subject to me. He only had your tract on the Judgment. He said it was entirely new to him, but that your argument was Scriptural, and unanswerable in the main, in his opinion. So I intend to hand him your "Six Sermons," the first opportunity. It seems very difficult now-a-days to approach the masses, except through their vanity or humoring their fables. It seems that in ancient times they were very accessible through their profound ignorance. One neighbor (a doctor and professor) I met, having had some papers from me, said, "Your views on the non-resurrection of the wicked seemed rational, and in part, at least, Scriptural; but he feared the holding forth such doctrine would encourage crime and outrage.

But he promised to call and get more papers and documents of yours. But he has been riding day and night since among the sick.

Herbert L. Patterson, Northport, Me., writes: It has been but a short time since I became a reader of the Herald of Life, and I do feel to thank God that I ever heard the blessed truth it contains. Truly light will and does shine upon the pilgrim's pathway. The path of the just is as a shining light, that shines brighter and brighter until the perfect day. O, thank the good Lord forevermore for his goodness to such poor creatures. We need to have on the whole armor of Christ in this evil time, when iniquity abounds, and the love of many has grown cold. I would say to the dear brethren and sisters, let us be faithful a few more days, and Jesus will come and take us home. O, thank God's heavenly name for this blessed hope of soon seeing Jesus, and being made like unto his glorious body. My longing heart cries out, O, come; creation groans for thee. Dear pilgrims, put on courage in the Lord. The long dark night of sin and sorrow is almost over; the saints will soon possess the kingdom; then all will be happiness and joy. I do want to be there with all the loved of earth and Jesus, our elder brother. O, I want to be little and humble at the foot of the cross. I want to feel the power of an endless life. Dear pilgrims, pray for me that I may endure to the end; for only those who do, have a promise of being saved. How can I bear the piercing thought to have my worthless name left out? By the help of the Lord, I mean to be there when the general roll is called. Dear Br. Storrs, may the good Lord bless, strengthen and comfort you in your labors of love. Your brother, in hope of eternal life, when Jesus our Life-giver comes.

Edward B. Fish, Glens Falls, N. Y., writes: Inclosed please find $1 15; for which I wish you to send me your Herald of Life for six months and the three Campaign tracts. Our village contains about five thousand inhabitants, and five orthodox, besides two catholic churches. But none to preach future life only in Christ, and for his faithful ones; and the coming of our Lord, soon, to establish his kingdom on earth. I know of none of your publications taken at our office. I hope that I am mistaken; for I should like to find companions in our peculiar faith. I have been a member of the M. E. church for about seven years; but for satisfactory reasons have withdrawn, and now fully trust in Christ as the Life-giver, and "Watch" for his coming without sin unto salvation, to all his saints. Yours in the faith.

H. Loveland, Lewistown, Ill., writes: I must say, I was perplexed to understand some things in the Bible till I received some of your writings, which I got of Father Lewis. They seemed so plain that a poor illiterate man, as I am, need not err therein. I give God the glory, and thank you for it. I have been rather tardy in renewing my subscription for the beloved Herald because of the scarcity of funds. I cannot get along well without the paper, so I send 1$ now and will send again soon; for it is all the preaching we have that has the resurrection and the inheritance of the saints in it, untrammelled by the traditions of men. The Herald of Life must be sustained. May the God of peace sustain you and all the dear brethren, is the prayer of your friend in truth.

Mrs. C. C. Cook, Oceanport, N. J., writes Aug. 24: I have often wished to write you a few lines concerning the Herald of Life. It is a great comfort to me to hear from the dear ones scattered abroad through the land: it is next to my Bible to peruse in my lonely hours. My earnest prayer is, it may live till Jesus comes; and that it may help to prepare a people for his blessed kingdom. I wish to take it as long as it lives. I must have it. My father will continue to take it. I think it is ripening him for the home of all the redeemed ones. Your Sister, looking for our blessed Life-giver soon, to give us a welcome home.

Dr. Hugh Taggert, Shelburn, Vt., writes: I am with you on the state of the dead, and confess being a dull scholar on Bible truths, which have cost me years of study. The Six Sermons are valuable, and the Herald of Life, long may it live. I am surprised and rejoice that you have been enabled to stand the storms so long. Poverty, affliction and persecution are the reason you have not heard from me often. The resurrection from the dead is the Christian's hope. The sinner is without this hope, and shall never have part in it. O, the glory portrayed to the Christian's mind of the coming kingdom. I will meet you there. Farewell.

OBITUARY.

Scotland, Conn., Sept. 9, 1868.

Br. Storrs: With a sad heart and trembling hand, I sit down to pen a few lines for the Herald of Life.

Little did I think that in one short week, from the time I met with you and others of "like precious faith," in the Life and Advent Mission Tent, and listened with such profound delight to the gospel as it fell from your lips, I should be called to pass through such a severe trial.

We came from Springfield to our home, on Tuesday of last week, with our dear little boy, who had not been well for a number of weeks. He bore the tiresome journey on the cars much better than we expected; and we felt cause for thankfulness that we were all home again alive; but our dear child commenced to fail rapidly from that day, and we called a physician, but all to no purpose; he could not save him, and he lived and suffered till Sunday noon, when he died.

Who but those who have passed through similar trials, can know what it is to part with a dear and only child? This is the third time we have parted with all the child we had; and God grant, in his mercy, this may be the last trial of such a nature. Our first, and only child, died in 1855; a very bright active little fellow, of 9 months. The next died in 1865; a dear little girl of 21 months, so interesting that none knew her but to love her; but death marked her for his prey and took her from our fond embrace. We bowed in silence at the stroke and tried to profit by it, and humbly trust we did; for we most firmly believe, "The Judge of all the earth will do right." Thirteen months ago, God gave us another child, and our hearts rejoiced with trembling; our friends and neighbors rejoiced with us; and we hoped, as well as they, that this one might live. He grew very fat and seemed healthy, till he was 6 or 7 months old, when a niece of ours, who had no parents living, died in our house of consumption.

She loved our child very much and was in the room with him all winter before she died. Our babe was taken sick soon after her death, and has failed from that time, till last Sunday he died of consumption. He was getting his teeth, too, which caused him much suffering, and we felt glad when he ceased to suffer and was at rest from pain and sorrow.

We do not feel like murmuring, though we loved our child very dearly, and would gladly have kept him with us till Messiah came, if our lives should be preserved till that day.

Brn. and Srs., pray for us, that this affliction may be sanctified to our good, and that we may be made, by this chastisement, better and wiser.

We know there is "No Life out of Christ," and desire to be found in him, when he shall come again to earth, to set up his kingdom. Your afflicted sister, Abby A. Perry.

We have received the first and second numbers of this new Magazine. Of its merits we are not prepared to judge, as we have been too much occupied with other matters to examine it thoroughly; but from a cursory glance over it we are favorably impressed. Price 10 cents single number. Yearly subscription, $1.

Tracts—We have received from the author, Eld. R. V. Lyon, Suspension Bridge, N. Y. three tracts or sermons, on the following topics, viz.:

Paul's Commentary on the Penalty of Sin. 12 pages.

The Birth of Water and of the Spirit. 12 pages.

The Great Salvation. 15 pages; to which is added remarks on "The One Thing Needful;" 8 pages.

We have not had time to examine either, but presume there will be much found in them that is interesting.

John Newton says: "If an angel were sent to find the most perfect man, he would probably not find him composing a body of divinity, but, perhaps a cripple in the poor-house, whom the parish wished dead, but humbled before God with far lower thoughts of himself than others think of him.

Christian love transmutes all things, even those which seem adverse, into spiritual wealth; like the philosopher's stone changing all it touches into gold. The Christian is heir of all things because he has the mind of Christ. —C. F. Hudson.

NOBLE SENTIMENTS.

Dean Alford having been severely criticised for fraternizing with the Congregationalists at the recent centennial celebration at Cheshunt, writes to The Guardian to explain his object in what he had done.

He says: That object is the frank recognition of the Christian bodies around us as Churches of Christ, without any compromise of doctrine, and with no ulterior views. As to the former compromise of doctrine, I claim to be, as to every church doctrine, unchanged by "fraternization" with those who differ from us; and they on their part stand on the same ground. On the firm maintenance of this principle, all true recognition and union depend. Whether they omit in their worship an article of the Creed, is no matter of mine. They love and serve the Lord Jesus Christ; they are my brethren; I believe the time is come when I am bound to show that I regard them as such. And as to the latter point—abandonment of ulterior views respecting them—I have no hesitation in saying that, as I do not expect, so neither do I wish for, any re-absorption of Nonconformists into the Church of England. I believe it would be the worst thing possible, both for ourselves and for them. We are to be "not unwise, but understanding what the will of the Lord is." We may, if we please, lower ourselves by exclusiveness and uncharitableness, so as to become in that day a mere sect among sects; but we may also, and I hope we shall, so lift in our esteem our Christian brethren around us, as to find ourselves, when deprived of the aid of the State, a Church among Churches.

A Seasonable Reproof.—A general officer, then in a high command, and no less justly famed for his liberality of spirit and urbanity of manners, than for his military and other distinguished talents, had laid it down as a rule that his doors should be locked, and his servants in bed before midnight. A young aide-de-camp who had lately arrived in the family, having more than once infringed this wise regulation, the general took the following method to correct him.

One morning the gentleman arrived, and with a gentle rap, made no doubt of his being admitted as heretofore, but what was his surprise and confusion, when instead of beholding John, the servant, he saw his General standing before him with the latch in his hand. The young officer was beginning to make the best apology in his power, when the General stopped him short by saying, "Pray, sir, come in, I beg you will not think of making any apology; the fact is, as I knew you were out of the house, and as I have, ever since I have had the honor of being in this command, made it a rule to send my servants to bed at twelve o'clock, I was apprehensive they might keep you waiting at the door; I therefore thought it best to sit up for you, that you might not suffer so unpleasant an inconvenience." A better lesson could scarcely have been given. It produced the desired effect.

"A word spoken in due season, how good it is." "The words of the wise are as goads, and as nails fastened by the Master of Assemblies."

RANDOM READINGS.

A Gormandizer.—Dr. George Fordyce, the chemist, contended that as one meal a day was enough for a lion, it ought to suffice for a man, and for more than twenty years he took but one. A pound and a half of rump steak, half a broiled chicken, a plate of fish, a bottle of port, a quarter of a pint of brandy, and a tankard of strong ale satisfied the doctor's moderate wants, and regularly engaged one hour and a half of his time. Are there not others who preach abstinence, or cry out against three meals per day, who follow Dr. F.'s example?

We have not only the promise of the blessing as a consequence of our faithfulness, but we have moreover the assurance of success, which comes from the fact that the world will listen to men who are thoroughly in earnest, when they discourse of things which are confessedly of supreme importance.

Pride often miscalculates, and more often misconceives. The proud man places himself at a distance from other men; seen through that distance, others, perhaps, appear little to him; but he forgets that this very distance causes him to appear equally little to others.

A Costly Funeral.—The late Queen of Madagascar was buried in a silver coffin worth $30,000, and a box of coin, which it took fifteen men to carry, was buried with her. The mourning requires all her subjects to shave their heads and go barefoot for ninety days.

Whoever is afraid of submitting any question, civil or religious, to the test of free discussion, is more in love with his own opinion than with truth.—Watson.

Not a few seek to accommodate truth to their views and feelings; it is wiser to accommodate our views and feelings to truth.

He prayeth best who loveth best,
All things, both great and small;
For the dear God who loveth us,
He made and loveth all.—Coleridge.

Truth is a hardy plant, and when once firmly rooted it covers the ground so that error can scarce find room.

Though obedience be better than sacrifice, yet for a man to sacrifice himself is sometimes the best obedience.

This above all—to thine own self be true;
Thou canst not then be false to any man.

The Time for Family Prayers.—Henry Ward Beecher says that the best time for family prayers is immediately after breakfast and immediately after supper—for then the children will be most likely to be quiet, and feel that they have something to be thankful for. No one will be hungry; no one will be sleepy; and if ever the whole attention will be given to devotion it will be at those times.

Such has been our practice most of the time for over forty years; yet all heads of families cannot practise it. Necessity sometimes calls him away even before his children are up in the morning, and it may keep him away from home till they are in bed at night. No positive rule can be fixed for all families, but the above is a good one where it is practicable.

A Paradise!—It is estimated that New York City annually consumes 75,000,000 cigars. Fancy its literati, laborers, and loafers sitting down to the job of puffing that pile into smoke! Can there be any doubt our city must be a paradise? How delightful it must be to dwell in tobacco smoke!

An Old Man.—A man in the lunatic asylum at Cincinnati, according to his own statement, is four hundred years old. He loaned Shakespeare five dollars, which he never got back, presented a bosom pin to Columbus, just before his first voyage to America, and was on intimate terms with Queen Elizabeth, whom he familiarly calls "Lib." This man is not the only lunatic. There are others out of the asylum.

Regard hypocrisy as the most odious sin in the sight of God and men. To have no holiness is bad enough; but to pretend it when we have it not, is double impiety.

CONSTITUTION OF "THE LIFE AND ADVENT UNION."

Article I. The object of this Union is to use all available means to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

II. Any person believing in Life through Christ alone, and sustaining a Christian character, may become a member of this Union by subscribing to the Constitution.

III. The officers of this Union shall be a President, Vice-President, Secretary, Treasurer, and five Directors, who together shall constitute the Managing Board, and who are to be elected annually.

IV. The Managers shall be authorized to collect funds for the Union, which funds shall be transmitted to the Business Agent, who shall keep account of the same and transfer them to the Treasurer.

V. The Annual meeting and such other meetings as may be deemed necessary by the Board of Managers, shall be called by giving three weeks' notice.

VI. The Secretary shall keep a record of the names and post-office addresses of the members.

VII. This Constitution may be amended by a two thirds vote at any Annual meeting.

Poetry.

The Great Physician.

When the trembling heart lies bleeding,
  Quivering in its anguish keen,
Then, O then, thou great Physician,
  Balm of Gilead! intervene.

Only thou the Spirit knowest,
  Thou whose power hath formed the man,
Thou who life and health bestowest,
  And the inmost thought dost scan.

Unto Thee we come for healing,
  Fountain thou of life and love,
Earth hath never fount or feeling
  Like to that which dwells above.

Purify us! purify us!
  Let the fiery furnace glow;
From the dross of earth refine us,.
  Make us whiter than the snow.

Earthly idols! God of mercy,
  Do they keep our hearts from thee?
Take, O take them --leave us noth!ng,
  Still, O God! we trust in thee!

Earthly forms may fade and perish,
  And their beauty pass away,
And our yearning hearts may cherish,
  Love that never can decay.

But the word which Thou has spoken,
  Never, never will it fail!
Though the heaven and earth may perish,
  And the powers of death assail.

Safe the souls whom thou dost cherish,
  None can pluck them from thy hand;
Rock of ages! firm foundation;
  On this let me ever stand.—Selected.

The Little Housekeepers of St. Domingo.

BY GRANDMA GAGE.

"Oh! Grandma, won't you tell us about the little housekeepers to-day? What if it doesn't rain! You can tell stories on shiny days as well as cloudy ones. Can't you?"

"Ah! my little Harry, that wanted six months without rain, and now two weeks only of pleasant sunshine have gone by, and he is beginning to long for a rainy day."

"No, no, Grandma; not for a rainy day, but for a story on a sunshiny afternoon; that's all."

"Very well said, Harry." Grandmother stands corrected. So this afternoon we will all go to the summer-house in the garden and have a good talk."

"Hurrah!" shouted Harry. "Won't that be jolly!"

"May I ask Fred Walton and Ike Stevens to come?" asked Charley.

"And Susie Stanbrough and Hattie Wilson?" said Ella.

"And please, Grandma, may Smutty come, too?" lisped little tender-hearted Carrie.

"Smutty!" growled Harry, in a dismal voice of contempt. "Smutty! Guess we don't want any niggers in our gang!"

"What's that, Harry?"

"Why, Carrie wants Smutty to come and hear your stories. He's old Mammie Watkins' boy, that sells apples and peanuts on the corner down here, and she sends him to get the cold victuals. Sometimes he gives Carrie a little weeny piece of his candy, or one little old peanut; and so she thinks he must come and hear your stories. No, siree. He's not a coming!"

"Why not, Master Harry?" asked Grandma, laying her spectacles on the table beside her.

"Because he's black," answered Harry, while his face flushed as if conscious of being wrong.

"Who made him black?"

"I suppose God made him black; but then black boys don't go with white boys, you know."

"And why do not black boys go with white boys? Can you tell? Do you not play with him sometimes?"

"Yes, ma'am. But—but then—he never comes in with us. We only let him play sometimes—sometimes—when—Well, he's a nigger, and the boys call him Smutty because he's black, and they'd laugh at us if we were to ask him into the summer-house."

"Well," said Grandma, "this case grows serious. You only play with him sometimes. Charley, when do you play with Richard Watkins, whom you call Smutty?"

"When we want him to help us fix our kites, because he knows how better than we do; and when we want a good paper, or string, because his mother will always give us some. And he knows how to fix the wagon when it is broken; and he can lift bigger lifts; and he is the best player at base-ball, and we like him on our side; and to help us to carry home the marketing; and—"

"That will do, Charley. So you want the colored boy to play with you when he can help you, go with you when he can be useful to you; but when you can help him, or amuse him, then he's a nigger, and you can't have him in the summer-house. Oh! Harry, Harry, my brave little boy, is this right? Is it just? Is it doing as you would be done by? If Richard is wicked; if he does not keep clean face and hands; if he says bad words, or talks naughty things; then we do not want him."

"No, no, Grandma, Richard is good, and stays near his mother, and is kind to everybody, only Grandma, I hear almost everybody say he's a nigger; and when we are done our play, and go in, or anything, all the boys shut the door on Smutty," said Harry, with a choking voice. "Indeed, Grandma, I did not mean to be naughty;" and the big tears stole down Harry's cheeks while he begged to be forgiven.

So, of course, Grandma forgave him; and in the afternoon they all met in the summer-house, and Harry came leading in Richard, with clean face and clothes, looking very happy that he could hear the story of "The Little Housekeepers."

"In the West India Islands there is no winter, and the trees are always green, and the sun shines every day warmer than it does here even in harvest time—in July and August. About these islands there are trees that produce rich and luscious fruits, which decay very soon in the sun, and give out very bad odors. In the houses, too, which seldom have any floors but the smooth earth, things soon become mouldy and disagreeable, if not kept very clean. So, in every house, and every place where people live, there are little housekeepers, who are always on hand to see to things, and compel the boys and girls, young folks and old folks, to keep things in order. Some of the housekeepers are black and glossy, and have half a dozen or more feet and hands, and they have their bed-chambers in the holes and corners and cracks, and are ready to come out the minute things are left amiss and go to work.

"If Master Harry were to let the crumbs of his cake fall on the floor, as he sometimes does, there would be a hundred of them after him in ten minutes, and every atom would be carried off into their store-house. And, as like as not, while he stood watching them clean up at his feet, some of them would feel inclined to run up the legs of his pantaloons, and scatter about in his pockets, hunting for more; and, if they should find a supply, they would give the signal, and he would be covered in a moment; and when he felt them scampering over him, he would begin to spat them with his hands, and then, oh, what a time he would have! For every blow they would give him a sting with their sharp little broomsticks, till he would roar for mamma, or Bridget, or somebody, to deliver him from the housekeepers."

"Ha, ha, ha!" shouted the children, as Grandma made wry faces and told how Harry would act.

"Now, guess what they are."

Not one could think. But little black Dick, whose mother had been in Cuba, until a kind gentleman brought her to the United States and set her free, laughed heartily at their perplexity and asked, "May I guess?" And when Grandma said "Yes," he said, "They are ants."

"That is right, Richard," said Grandma. "God has provided these little housekeepers in the houses and scavengers in the streets and fields, that they may eat up and carry away everything that can be eaten in a very short time. If the dirt floors of the houses, or even those made of tile, or cement, or wood, are not kept swept sweet and clean, the ants will overrun the house, and the big housekeeper will have to attack them with buckets of water, and brooms and bushes, and only when all is made pure can the people enter in and live comfortably. This is one reason why in that country people do not keep clothes on little children. They would drop the juice of fruits, or the pulp of bananas, or megpels, or the sap of sugar cane, which they chew, on their clothes, and the ants would get upon them to "clean up," and sting the little ones.

"A banana, megpel, pine-apple, orange, or any other fruit unbroken is not disturbed by them. All these things have hard, or bitter, or spicy rinds, or shells, made so for their protection. But the moment they are broken and left they are in danger, and will soon be overrun by an army of these little workers, who will speedily dispose of all that will decay.

"There is another kind of housekeepers that take care of the ants. We should call them lizards in our country. Some people call them "swifts." They are seen darting about in every direction, and would make you scream with fright. But in that country they frighten no one. They are of many colors, and some will change color in a few moments. Those are called chameleons.

"They keep about in great numbers wherever the ants are, and live upon them. I once put a piece of cake upon the window-sill, and sat a little way off. In five minutes a line of march was formed from the ground outside, up the wall, and across the stone of the window-cap to the cake, and then the depredators commenced their work, forming a second line back, each with a load as large as it could carry, and in ten minutes more two green lizards crept near the returning outer line, and flattening themselves down until they seemed no thicker than moss-pictures on a rock, and turning to the whitish gray color of the stone, they became as still as the stone itself. Yet every instant I could see a little commotion in the line of workers that were carrying away the cake, and I knew that the little, slender tongue of the lizard, covered with something like glue, had been thrust out, and half a dozen of the little black housekeepers caught and deposited within the red pouch, which could scarcely be seen, so quickly was it opened and shut.

"Pretty soon a whole line of housekeepers were on the watch, and scarcely one of the first line could have escaped, had I not raised my finger with a quick motion, when away the larger housekeepers flew like a flash, leaving the black ones to finish the cake.

"My next story will be about the canals on the trees, and the honey-bees in the old ruins. Thanks to little Richard, who knew how to guess what were the housekeepers."—Selected.

The Kingdom of God.

BY GEO. L. HART.

"But seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." Matt. vi., 33.

One of the greatest promises, indeed, is this from the lips of the greatest of Prophets. Some are disposed, to give it an application altogther in this present life; but I think, after due consideration, we shall behold a truth that harmonizes with every other. Although appearing to teach an abundance to every saint, we know that at times the Lord's dear children are brought into trying circumstances in this life. But, thanks be to God, the life to come will have no lack. It is evident from the language used by our Lord, that life and its accompanying supplies of food and raiment, are considerations, which our Father is pleased to bestow as a reward of righteousness and faith. We are led to consider in the words, kingdom of God, the glorious association of power and wealth.

We learn in the book of Genesis, that the earth was as the kingdom of God, placed in the hand of man to order and subdue; that man, associated with God, would have been abundantly able to bring into subjection every revolt. That every thing was good, is true. But a tendency to become corrupt without a restraining hand, isproved from the fact, that after the withdrawal of God from the kingdom of man, the general retrograde began.. If Adam had retained his sonship, thorns and thistles would not have had much labor of body bestowed, to have subdued them. Jesus could speak to the unfruitful fig tree and it withered away: and nature in her unrestrained course hurls with her tornadoes and whirlwinds, the administrators appointed, before her to destruction; there is no restraining hand: the association of power is lost. But Jesus, the second Adam, the restorer, speaks to wind and wave and the word is a power to calm. Here is the great secret. Associated with him we reign in his throne, as he reigns in the Father's. I think I see a beautiful illustration in the Israelitish government, from the anointing of Saul to the establishment of David in the kingdom. Much has been said about God's kingdom, Christ's kingdom, and David's kingdom; but I understand that Christ's kingdom is God's; and David's was, as far as it typically illustrated the associated reign. Saul was anointed king. God associated himself with him till he rejected him; then God chose another, said to be after his own heart. Thus Saul was like Adam, the rejector and the rejected.

David was like Christ as far as he kept the association.. The words in Micah iv., 8, "O tower of the flock, the stronghold of the daughter of Zion, unto thee shall it come, even the first dominion," must harmonize with Isaiah ix., 6, 7. Thethrone David occupied is like the throne of the first dominion. After the rejection of Saul, unassociated with God, he died with all his house; unable to cope with his adversaries. Only physical force was left to him; just as it was with Adam, by the sweat of his face was he to eat until death. Thorns and thistles were to be certain obstructions to ease in producing food. The kingdom of God, with man associated in it, was one of righteousness; and as long as man was obedient, he reigned in life. But sin, the demon of the human race, entered the dominion by the disobedience and weakness of the flesh, and hath reigned unto death in the lost domain. From the rejection of Saul to the reign of David, we find the stronghold of Zion is once more occupied by one of the expelled Canaanite tribes; see 2 Sam. v. This was the high tower and largest fortification of Jerusalem. But David associated with God takes the stronghold from the Jebusites, and it is called from this time the city of David. Previous to this time, from his anointing, he was king, and reigned over all that came to him; but here, he, at the death of Saul's house, is over all. Here, I think, the names in Micah illustrate the associated reign of Christ. From the rejection of man in the kingdom prepared from the foundation of the world, to the anointing of Jesus, sin had reigned a triumphant sovereign. Earth was the territory it had used as a Golgotha for its victims. But the King of Israel is appointed. Hear him, Luke x., 18 "I beheld satan, as lightning, fall from heaven." John xii., 31 "Now shall the prince of this world be cast out." Said Paul "He put away sin by sacrifice of himself." "As the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also partook of the same, that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the accuser;" and in Rom .v., it is said, "death reigned from Adam" by sin. So we find the accuser which accuses us before God. But Jesus having died for our sins, takes them away, and the accusation is cast down from heaven and in its place righteousness in our High Priest appears, the pledge deliverance to the children who were in bondage; and deliverance from sin; consequently death hath no dominion; the law of righteousness is life; and the same, through the spirit, frees us from the law of sin and death. See Rom. viii,, 2. Thanks be to the blessed God that giveth us the victory through our Lord, the God of dead ones, the anointed Saviour.

No wonder such association as the reign of the Eternal, and consequently His righteousness, was the great first principle of the doctrine urged by our Lord. Jesus by this association, was the rich heir of all things; but he became poor, till the time of his triumphant resurrection and ascension; when, enthroned as Judge, he entered glory; not to forget such as seek his face, but as a merciful Priest-King, to save all that are made just through faith in his blood. How beautiful. God is just, but saves all by Jesus that are justified in him to eternal life. The energy of the Spirit works in this association. The change is first in character; then the physical: bringing by the Christ from the dead ones all that believe to immortality; after which we are entertained at the table of heaven's high King; no possibility of suffering then. Then let us not complain, as we are left behind to finish up the sufferings of the spiritual man; even the sufferings of Jesus, which were not all in our behalf appointed: but humanity is perishing: and as Jesus suffered when here, as he gazed on their lifeless forms even to weeping, may we not forget we are to finish the mission; and if we thus suffer we shall reign.

Yes, my dear Brethren, in seeking the kingdom we unite our destiny with the suffering King. As the typical king David, with his followers, were persecuted not only by the Philistines, but by the Israel, over whom he subsequently reigned at the end of Saul's house, so Christ is persecuted and all that unite with him till sin and the kingdom of the animal man is destroyed; when, like David over all Israel, he will reign the Prince of Peace. O glorious hope of heavenly rest. Thy kingdom come, dear Lord, we pray, till all things are added. Enough at present to contemplate this and all other promises. We will patiently suffer. Earth, the beautiful new earth, our home, Jerusalem a rejoicing, Mount Zion recovered, at last, to which we all will come; a fortification complete; salvation eternal its walls; sin cannot enter; consequently death never gives sorrow; her people an everlasting joy. O Spirit divine, let the bright vision lift me up to things above, where Christ sitteth; that the inspiration of thy promises may influence me in the divine life, that the nature of sin may be destroyed, that I may attain the power of resurrection, even the anointing; then I shall enter at last her pearly portals, and converse with the saved in that land of rest. No whispering there. Nothing secret; no shame to cover; each note of praise might be prolonged in echo, till all the universe of angels and men had heard, but only to bring a universal response, Amen. O earth, thy King is coming; his voice, with that of his associates, will cheer thy disconsolate and saddened face; thy deserts are no more; thorns are all gone; beauteous flowers bloom amid the wastes; ye winds, thy ungoverned course is stayed to breathe in gentle symphony the accompaniment of the redeemed; ye warblers of the grove, over thee also will the restoration bring a thrill of joy, till in voices of love and gratitude ye bring your tribute in the assembly of the saved. And the once monsters of the deep will find the ancient oozing places, Job xxxvii., and act in peace; the fiat of the first dominion Kingdom restored. Psalms viii.; Heb. ii., 7–9.

O children, be faithful. He is coming soon; each note of war tells the crisis of the angry nations is at hand. He will speak ere long in sore displeasure; they are vexed; yet Zion is the hill of God, and ye nations must lick the dust. O "kiss the Son;" let this be our exhortation, dear ministry. His hand is stretched out from Heaven's throne still; redemption is available. O sinner, come; love divine impels me; you are drawn. Will you die? O come. The Spirit says, come; the Bride also, united by it to her Lord, feels the blessed unction and invites, and you may imbibe and reecho the invitation and be a chosen vessel of God, and be in the future world a recipient of life's fountain and together rejoice.

Cambridgeport, Mass., August 20, 1868.

Br. Storrs: It does appear as if our Broadway Baptist Church here, was doomed to be the nursery of false views, and "doctrines of devils." Last Sabbath I listened with pain to a youth from Harvard; his text was two words, taken from the account of the rich man and Lazarus, Luke xvi., 25, "Son, remember." By these words he tried to prove, that the memory of the wicked as well as fire, should torture poor helpless men to all eternity; told us that instead of having five senses as we now do, we might there have seventy-five, to remember more keenly, and feel more sensibly the pains of hell. But through all his discourse, he did not bring one passage of scripture to prove his assertions; which I notice, is the dilemma of others who try to prove and mix with the gospel, these old heathen fables. We thought the preacher could have applied this text to himself with advantage, "Son, remember," if he had remembered a little more scripture. Such as this, Isaiah xxvi., 14, "they are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise; therefore hast thou visited and destroyed them, and made all their memory to perish."

Now I believe the narrative of the rich man and Lazarus to be a literal fact, and not a parable. It represents the rich man in a flame, being destroyed. As we read of those who have been burned at the stake, and have conversed freely as they burned. But ask these advocates, how long the rich man remained in the flame, What do they say? Do they ever give us a direct scriptural answer? No: they cannot. We look to Scripture for the answer; David tells us in Psalm cxlvi., 4, "His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish." Again, "A fire goeth before him, and burneth up his enemies round about." So this gives the rich man but twenty-four hours in the flame at the longest; and if his thoughts perish within the day his breath goes forth, then that fine sermon from Harvard on the durability of the memory of wicked men is worthless.

And he will make it plain,

Now if any thing was ever made plain, it is the short duration of torment of this rich man and all other wicked men. In view of the utter impossibility of existing in a flame, Isaiah exclaims, "who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire?"

Math. iii., 12, "He will burn up the chaff." Mal. iv., 1, "The day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord."

Jesus said, "They that take the sword shall perish with the sword." Where are those ancient swords? They are perished and gone. So have the wicked men of those days. Jesus said he came to bear witness unto the truth, "Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice." We have the testimony of Prophets and Apostles, and of Jesus, that wicked men cannot endure and live in torments; but they perish; their thoughts perish; their memories perish. Shall we take God's word or men's?

Yours, for that word, that liveth and abideth forever.

From Eld. Samuel L. Walter.

Br. Storrs: I have been thinking of writing you to say that the brethren out here are anxious that the Herald of Life should be sustained. We can't do without it, as it sheds light on the gospel, which is good news, or glad tidings to perishing men. As Paul says, "It is the power of God unto salvation, or life, to every one that believeth." Is it not good news to men who are going down to death, that if they "believe into the Son, they shall not perish, but have everlasting life?" We want the Herald of Life to go on, and never to end its work of heralding to dying men, "Life only in Christ; or, the righteous only will live again." "As the whirlwind passeth, so is the wicked no more." "The wages of sin is death." There is no promise of life to the sinner; and the truth on these and other subjects must be heard. I pray that all believers in the gospel of life may be one in sustaining the paper. We have not a man we can give up. We do not want to see one name wanting in the columns of the Herald. I will try and do more for the paper and the tracts this year than I did last; and others will do so, as their crops are better, and they will be able so to do.

I should like to be with you at the anniversary. I pray that God's blessing may follow your deliberations and that he may grant the Herald to start on its voyage the coming year with its canvas all spread, and filled with a steady breeze, so that its voyage shall be accomplished. The brethren that have and will sustain it have nothing to fear for their own safety while they have so many prayers going up to our covenant-keeping God for his blessing to be their portion in the life that now is, and that which is to come. I am in hopes of getting a hearing at this place. I remain yours, in hope of life when the Lord comes.

Chester, Pa., Aug. 22, 1868.

Br. Storrs: I have disposed of the tracts and pamphlets that I got some time ago; and I want a few more Campaign Documents. I like to have something to give away. You know it is "more blessed to give than to receive." I am sorry that I am not able to do something for the Herald of Life above the mere subscription price. I will try this year and give a little more if I can. But you must keep in mind, Br. S. that I am old and poor. I have just entered on my sixty-fourth year, and have nothing to support me and those dependent upon me, but the work of my hands. I love the "Herald" as I love life. God knows it; and I would like to do something for it, but I am not able: I pray God that it may be sustained; and that its light may not be eclipsed; no, not for a "month." If I am well, I will try and renew my subscription about this time next month.

May God bless the cause, and water it more than ever, and give it prosperity, and may you be spared to superintend the "blessed Hope" until the Lord comes, is the prayer of your poor brother.

Br. Storrs: After bidding adieu to the dear children of God at Springfield, I soon found myself in the quiet city of Manchester, N. H., where tidings awaited me of the severe illness of my father, bidding me hasten to Vermont. You will therefore do me a favor by sending our loved paper, the Herald of Life, to Williamstown, instead of Manchester, I hail its weekly visits as a blessing from the Lord. My poor heart overflows with gratitude to God when I consider his many mercies, even amid life's varied ills; such sweet assurance and strong consolation have we who have fled for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before us in the gospel. Yours, hoping for life where the inhabitants will not say, "I am sick."

Lory Jencks, Dansville, N. J., Aug. 24, wrote: You may count me as one that will help sustain the Herald of Life. I hope there will be an increase of subscribers for Volume VI. I will try to help to that result, and think I shall get some; for I believe it to be the best religious paper published. It advocates a blessed truth which is in harmony with the character of God, "No Life out of Christ."

BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail, the postage has to be pre-paid.

Six Sermons on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1843. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, The Righteous only will live again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Argument from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

This work has been out of print for some months, but is now re-printed.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the true teachings of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage, 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.

No. 1. Earth, not heaven, is to be the inheritance of the saints. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 4. The Soul Saved or Lost. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

THE OBJECT of this paper is to promulgate the truth of "LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST:" or, a future life and a resurrection from the dead, are both conditional; and only bestowed at the second advent of Christ, "at the last day."—See our motto.

TERMS OF THE HERALD OF LIFE.

Two Dollars a Year; or, 48 numbers; One Dollar for six months; or, 24 numbers; invariably in advance. When served by Carrier in New York City, 48 cents additional.

The Postage on the HERALD OF LIFE, prepaid quarterly or yearly at the office where it is received, is 20 cents a year to any part of the United States. The postage to Canada and the British Provinces is also 20 cents a year, and must be prepaid in New York; for such papers, therefore, the price will be $2 20 a year or $1 10 for six months.

We can not undertake to prepay postage upon newspapers, except where the law obliges us to do so; that is, anywhere out of the United States.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ALL LETTERS relating to the HERALD OF LIFE, whether on business or other matter, must invariably be addressed:

GEO. STORRS, Box 4,658,
New York

ALL NAMES of persons, sent us, should be written plain, so that we shall not have to guess them out. Also in ordering, the name of the POST OFFICE, COUNTY, AND STATE must be given, and written plainly; and if a CHANGE is called for, state the Office to which the paper has previously been sent. Unless attention is paid to all these matters confusion and delay are inevitable.

SOUND VIEWS.

DEFINITE TIME.

I HAVE become convinced that the preaching of definite time, as it has been preached by some, does not produce a salutary effect upon the community. I am alone responsible for the position I take on this question. I regard those who are looking for the speedy coming of Christ as the people of God, raised up for a specific purpose, and that the work to which they are called is not yet accomplished, is manifest to every candid and intelligent observer. We draw our conclusions from the work done, and the work to be done. The relationship they sustain to the world now is synonymous with that of Noah to the antediluvians, in one respect, at least; and that is, it is a work of warning. They may be said to occupy a different position, in some respects; that is, they have a duty to do in removing the errors from the minds of the people, which are calculated to create in them a spirit of indifference to the great event at hand. This is no small part of the labor; for when the necessity of the event is shown, and the people see that the hope of future life depends upon the second coming of Christ, nine-tenths of the work is accomplished necessary to secure interest in the event.

Thirty years ago the world did not contain any denomination of Christians whose faith was such as to show a necessity for the coming of Christ in judgment, or the resurrection of the dead. During the last thirty years a people have come on to the stage of action, numbering their tens of thousands of laymen, and hundreds of preachers, in possession of talent of no mean order, and in possession of funds to a good degree, and in possession of what is indispensable to success—the grace of God. But what has this people done? They have achieved a mighty work. They have so far revolutionized the theology of the day, as far as they have carried their advance, that it is seldom we hear, in places where this faith has been preached, those old radical ideas of eternal torture in a hell of liquid fire. As a general thing, every battery is soon silenced against which the truth has been levelled, and that is the next thing to a surrender. But to what extent has the conflict been pressed? I answer, it seems hardly begun. When we look about us, and see the vastness of the field, and the limited number of laborers engaged in the harvest, we conclude that much more must be done.

Now what shall we do? Shall we sit under the shade and wish it was supper time, or night, or time to rest? or shall we up and at it, knowing that the work must be done before the supper can be eaten, or the rest enjoyed? It will do to sit down and sigh and cry for rest when the work is all done; but while the field is so thickly strewn with golden sheaves that must be gathered, there is no time for sitting in the shade. O that God would give us more of the spirit of Jesus, so that we could think more of the perishing around us, and less of self; then we can wait with patience for the early and latter rain, and work while the day lasts. Let us be governed more by general principles, and less by technical points, and we shall have a salutary influence, and be less liable to disappointment ourselves, and be less obnoxious to the minds of many who are far from being friends, or indifferent to consistent Bible faith. The friends of truth are often its deadliest foes, in consequence of their inconsistent conduct in attempting to advance it. Five radical, imprudent preachers can create more prejudice in the minds of honest people in six months than ten consistent ones can counteract in six years.

God has, in the way of general principles, placed within our hand a good reason to believe we are living in close proximity to the judgment, or the establishment of the everlasting kingdom. The four monarchies to rise and fall, from Daniel's time to the sitting of the Ancient of days, are mainly in the past, and are sufficient of themselves to lead to the conviction that we are near the end; but when we come to set the definite time of the end, it is quite another thing. Jesus had access to Daniel's periods, and times, and days, and quoted from his prophecies, and with all his wisdom did not know the day or the hour (and I think he was as wise as man in general), which leads me to conclude that it is no easy task to determine the exact time when the end will be.. With me, the event is a certainty; and while I thus feel, I am determined to labor with reference to it, and be ready for it at all times. Noah preached the event, but not the time. When God revealed the time to him, he went into the ark, and God shut him in; and "as it was in the days of Noah, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." A knowledge of the event, and a readiness to meet it, is what we need; and, while we enjoy this, let us occupy till he comes, and be willing to labor, and not be over-anxious about the time of rest. Let us love the labor; and while we see so much to be done, let us push the conquests with renewed energy, till the labor is all done, and the last servant of God is sealed. Then we will rest. The rest will be the sweeter when we reach the final goal, on account of the intenseness of the labor. Let us press onward, resting assured that the supper will be eaten when the table is full, and the rest will be enjoyed when the work is all done.

Have you done all you could, brother? sister? Are your talents, your means, your hands, all employed in the prosecution of this glorious work? If not, it is in vain for you to sigh for the rest, for it will be enjoyed only by the laborers. Work while the day lasts. "Be instant in season, out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort, with all long-suffering and doctrine; for the time will (has) come when they will not endure sound doctrine;" and you shall receive the crown of righteousness with Paul.

FUGITIVE THOUGHTS ON THE DEVIL.

N. C., Sept. 12, 1868.

MY DEAR BROTHER: Fugitive thoughts arising from the memory of early instruction are not easily banished from the mind. And if such a thing as oblivion or forgetfulness of erratic and false training or mental culture were possible without any loss of the intellectual faculties, would it be prudent or wise to desire a total oblivion of the fallacies of heathen philosophers or doctors of divinity?

The devil holds a prominent place in the creed of saint and sinner; the devil in whose personality you profess to believe. Belief is the offspring of evidence—evidence furnished by unerring witnesses recorded for our instruction, as the only unerring, infallible guide to a correct view of Scripture truth. But who is to give us a true translation of the inspired testimony? Who is, in our day, an infallible guide? "Trust not in a friend—have no confidence in a guide"—"The serpent beguiled me." "Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers." So it seems there was one serpent in the garden of Eden in the days of Adam, and many serpents and vipers in the days of Christ. Even in the time of Shakspeare there must have been as many devils as there were inordinate cups. "Every inordinate cup is unblest, and the ingredient is a devil." "O thou invisible spirit of wine, if thou hast no name to be known by let us call thee devil." And the utterance of the Son of man must satisfy any candid man that in his day there was one devil among the twelve whom he had chosen. It is to be presumed that a devil has the nature or attributes of the devil who sinned from the beginning. It would be desirable, perhaps, to know, and surely must be of great importance to ascertain, if it is revealed, who was the first sinner—or who sinned from the beginning. Very many candid, sincere, intelligent persons of sound understanding are of the opinion that Adam was the first sinner, nor have they much confidence in the idea that sin first commenced in heaven, or that anything defiled entered there. If any man is so illuminated that he can give us a description of the devil, prove his existence previous to the creation of the serpent, or Adam, and give us plain, Scripture language, unmixed with metaphor, allegory, metonymy, synecdoche, or personification, he will no doubt confer a very great benefit upon the present generation. And if Br. Taylor fail to do it, perhaps Br. W. may throw some glimmering of light upon the subject. However things may turn out, let it be just and lawful for me to continue my fugitive thoughts or reminiscences of the past.

Many, no doubt, are more afraid of the devil than they are of God. We are commanded to fear God and keep his commandments; for the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, and a good understanding have they that obey God. But, is it said anywhere in the Bible, "Fear the devil?" Is the devil in whom you believe, ubiquitous? Is he at the same time everywhere, tempting, devouring, destroying, or attempting to destroy the elect? How does he transform himself into an angel of light, so as to deceive, if possible, the very elect? For my own part, I really and sincerely believe there are millions of devils now on earth; just as many (and no more) as the number of inhabitants. Will this belief entitle me to your favorable notice? Thank God, says one, he after all, believes in a devil—and millions of devils! Ah! the devil beguiled me, quoth one, and I stole a sheep! Alas, cries another, satan tempted me, and I told lies! O wretched man that I am, satan hath buffetted me, in the form of a woman, and I was guilty of ———. I am miserable, groans another, the devil beguiled me, and I got drunk—came home, killed my wife and child! But not to enumerate every sin in the catalogue of crimes, is satan, the devil, the remote, exciting and proximate cause of all the corruption and abominations on earth? Examine this devil, this satan, or the devil himself; have you ever seen him? If one biographer of Martin Luther deserves credit, Luther knew the devil; was so intimate with him that he had eaten a bushel of salt with him. Let no man conclude this is a popish slander. There are many now living who not only believe in the devil, but have seen him as often as they beheld themselves in the glass, or committed any of those crimes enumerated by Paul as the works of the flesh. Men are at enmity with God. They, in an unconverted state, hate God. "But now have they not only hated me, but my Father also." "They hated me without a cause." Were these devils of the highest order? Had each of them a devil in himself? or was each of them the devil himself? From the abundance of unbelief and evil in the heart the mouth of the wicked speaks. Were there no personal devil, or imaginary devil in creation, would sinners be any way benefitted, or would they continue precisely what they are? One or two questions may be proposed for discussion: 1st. Must all that is said in Scripture relative to satan, serpent, or devil, be taken literally? or, what expressions are literal and what figurative? It is to be feared many are working outside the Bible.

But to conclude these fugitive thoughts. One thing seems indispensable—a knowledge of a certain personage—a personal being—one's self. Self-knowledge is a great gift—a great blessing. Know thyself. God has imparted this knowledge to us. He has revealed our true character in the Bible. If wicked, we are commanded to forsake our ways; or unrighteous, our thoughts, and return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon us, and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon. Let the evil be forsaken and the good chosen. Don't slander the devil; take to thyself all thy vileness; don't blame the devil. Confess your sins. He that hideth his sins shall not prosper; but he that confesseth and forsaketh them shall obtain mercy. The spirit of evil in the children of disobedience is well known and understood by all who are saved by grace, through faith. The works of the flesh are manifest. All who labor under the heavy burden of sin are invited to Christ that they may live. Believe in him, receive the grace of God so freely offered; deny all ungodliness and worldly lusts; live soberly, righteously; abhor that which is evil; cleave to that which is good. We are commanded to hate and abhor that which is evil. Be pleased to say if we are commanded to fear the devil? to hate and abhor him? "I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear, but now mine eye seeth thee; wherefore, I abhor myself. Sinner, if you want to see the devil, take a view of thyself, and review the dark deeds of thy past life, and thou wilt see the worst devil thou wilt ever see—thine own polluted self." But beware how you attribute your sins to some being in the air. Don't fight the air. Learn to know and abhor the lusts of the flesh, by yielding to which thou hast sinned: how grievously thou knowest.

So, dear br., you believe in a personal devil: the personality of the devil. Is the devil a person? If so, and you describe him to the life, and send me his photograph, you'll do me a favor. Is the Pope antichrist? Are you sure? Who made you a judge? Is every unbeliever—every sinner, antichrist? All right. No more at this time. My thoughts are fugitive; perhaps they may fly to thee. Don't treat them in an unkind spirit.

Who will exculpate himself in our courts of justice by saying—the devil tempted me and I violated the law? or, say to God, the devil (ubiquitous), whom you permitted to tempt me, overcame me—he is powerful—I am a weak mortal. Fine excuse—wonderful logic!

FRANCIS ———.

[The pamphlet from which we gave so large an extract last week, gives us the following view of New York City; and truly it does not speak very encouragingly for "the conversion of the world;" and makes one pray, Come Lord Jesus; and come quickly."]

LET us come to New York, the great metropolitan city of the United States, where we find a million of inhabitants on twenty-five square miles. Here one hundred thousand persons are every year arrested for misdemeanors and crimes; this being one criminal or vagabond to every ten of the whole number of people. Here is a grog-shop for every one hundred inhabitants. Here are one hundred thousand children between the ages of five and sixteen who never enter a Sunday School; of these, forty thousand are unmannerly and filthy juveniles who roam the streets as paupers, vagabonds and heathen.

Here over seven millions are annually spent for public amusements—circuses, theatres, etc. Here are ten thousand drinking saloons, gambling hells, ticket-swindling shops, lottery-dealing shops, houses of ill fame, obscene publishers, bogus hotels, and like places of vice, whose keepers swindle the community out of twelve millions of dollars every year. The places of amusement and vice cost fifteen times as much as the clergy, and over two millions are annually paid the police to keep the villains straight, and guard the city.

The cost of licentiousness to the city is ten millions yearly; there are twenty thousand prostitutes, with one hundred thousand persons annually treated by the medical profession for immoral diseases, and the number of persons annually infected by such diseases can not at the present time, according to Dr. Sanger's estimates, be less than four hundred thousand. The immoral and obscene, as well as blasphemous publications, are countless.

There are also five hundred and fifty thousand Roman Catholics, mostly foreigners, whose influence is adverse to true religion; with seventy-five thousand German infidels, also atheists, deists, and rationalists, besides a host of spiritualists, and added to these some forty thousand infidel Jews. The Tribune estimates there are in the city fifty thousand families of infidel and atheistical tendency, without a copy of God's word.

The judicial and municipal government of the city gets worse and worse year by year. The city is controlled by corrupt men, and there seems no hope of remedy. In the words of H. W. Beecher, "All the framework of society seems to be dissolving. On every side we find men false to the most important trusts. Even the judges on the bench are bought and sold like meat in the shambles. One must go into court with a long purse to obtain justice. The judiciary of New York stinks like Sodom and Gomorrah. Men say they hardly know a court in which to trust a case."

In New York, church-goers have declined thirty per cent., while theatres have increased fifty per cent., all within forty years. Eighty years ago when the population was only twenty-three thousand, there was a place of worship for every thirteen hundred and fifty souls; now there is but one for every three thousand souls. In 1850, forty-one of every one hundred persons could be seated in her two hundred and fourteen churches, but in 1860 only thirty-one of every one hundred could be seated in her two hundred and fifty-three churches. Now there are three hundred and seventy-five churches and other places of worship in all the great city. These will seat less than four hundred thousand people; where are the other six hundred thousand? Shut out into the streets. No place to worship if they desired it, and, sorrowful to say, full half a million of these not desiring any. Half the population of the city shut out of God's house both by compulsion and free choice, to associate with irreligion, godlessness, and vice.

"Here," says the Evening Post, "are half a million of people who never receive any ecclesiastical instruction, and to whom the preaching of the gospel is as strange as to the inhabitants of New Zealand or Ashantee." "A half a million of Pagans within sound of the church bells of the metropolis," mournfully echoes the Christian Advocate.

But the most startling fact is yet to be stated. The Christians in New York do not equal in number the harlots of London. Rev. Joseph Duryea says there are but sixty-four thousand communicants in all the Protestant churches in this greatest city on the western continent. Sixty-four thousand church members professing Christianity at least—though hundreds do not possess it—to one million of people! Only one saved to fifteen or sixteen others who are unbelieving, unforgiven, and unsaved. A little better than London, but alas! the "saved" are indeed "few." Just think of it, over nine hundred thousand judgment-bound souls within a compass of twenty-five square miles, all in their sins and unprepared to meet God!

COMING OF CHRIST.

CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS, on his memorable voyage across the Atlantic, was pacing the quarter-deck one morning in deep concern. The previous night, his officers and crew, reproaching him with his illusive hopes, had been threatening to abandon the enterprise in despair. "A new world," he was saying, as he paced the deck that morning, "A new world is yonder!" At length as he gazed upon those "untried waters," his practised eye discerned a "sign." Some drift-wood floated past. Like Paley's watch on the desert heath, it was its own certain interpreter. They must be near the mouth of some majestic river by which that drift-wood had been floated down. "Brothers!" exclaimed Columbus, his eye glistening with a calm ecstasy, and his finger pointing to the "sign"—"Brothers! look at that! We shall soon see land." The infirm hearts were bold again; from that hour they were other men.

Is not the church of the living God at this hour on the wide untried ocean, steering her course to the kingdom—the "New World" of her "faith and hope?" The voyage has been protracted, till the men of feeble faith have begun to lose heart and to "faint." But stay, my brother! look at that drift-wood. The "signs" declare that the glory is not far off.

Some imagine that to look into the future, to examine the signs of the times, is work only for the idle and for the visionary. God's operatives in the world, the great doers, the brave endurers, are men, they say, of sterner stuff. But is it so? . . . Why has God assigned to the "sure word of prophecy" so large a place in his revealed will? Not surely to gratify a prurient curiosity—not to indulge the idle speculatist, but to meet the daily necessities of the pilgrim—the daily wants of the "good soldier." To affirm that we do not need to study the prophetic word, is to affirm that God has erred in giving to that word a place in his Bible.

How different is God's real thought concerning this matter! "The revelation," we read, "of Jesus Christ, which God gave unto him, to show unto his servants things which must shortly come to pass." And it is added: "Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those things that are written therein; for the time is at hand." Rev. i., 3.

Does not this mean, that the gracious Lord would have his servants sustained in their conflict by the hope of the good time to come? Does it not mean, that, whilst they are called to pass through the dark "night," he would have them solaced by the assured prospect of the "day?" Does it not mean, that, whilst his eye is on us now from the mountain as we are still "toiling in rowing," he would have us to know that ere long he will be at our side on the stormy waters, and will bring us to our quiet haven?

"I will come again," said the Master to his sorrowing brethren before he suffered, "and will receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also." He is away now; but the Comforter is with us, to speak to us about our absent King. "He will show you things to come," said Jesus, defining the leading characteristic of the Holy Spirit's office. And why "things to come?" Because the hope of the glory is that which animates us now in our struggle—"we are saved"—we are carried victoriously through "by hope." John xiv., 3; xvi., xiii; Rom. viii., 24.

When the disciples on Olivet stood gazing up into heaven, fearing that they had lost their Master, and with him the hope of the coming kingdom, a message came, announcing that they should see him again. Solaced by the hope, they went everywhere—charging the "little flock" to be of good cheer, for speedily they should have the kingdom—and charging the unsaved to repent, if they would not be self-excluded from this glory which was so near at hand.

No one who ponders the Acts and the Epistles and the Revelation, can doubt that the attitude in which the Lord would have his church stand, is that of waiting, watching, longing for his return.

Take only two passages as a specimen. The first is Rev. xxii., 20. The last words which Jesus uttered, or ever shall utter till he come again, are these—"Surely I come quickly." The certainty of his return, and its possible nearness, are the two elements of "strong consolation." And why should the troubled church deprive herself of either element of her consolation? John, the exile, could not do without either, and so his instantaneous, happy response was—"Even so come, Lord Jesus."

The second passage is Titus ii., 11–14. What conceivable language could assign to the hope of our Lord's appearing a place more momentous in the dynamics of the christian life? In verse 12, we have the grand practical end which God's gospel of grace was designed to accomplish—"Teaching us, that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world." And in verses 13, 14, we have the motive power which is to stimulate the heart in aiming at this end—"Looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ, who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity and purify unto himself a peculiar people zealous of good works." Who has not felt, that in the measure in which this hope occupied the heart, the life has been transformed, the whole soul has been lifted into heavenliness? The "hope" may occupy a place in our creed, and the life remain unaffected; but to love the appearing, is the certain source of an earnest, self-denying, happy, working life.—Rev. J. Bailie.

ABOUND IN THE WORK.

PAUL, in one of his epistles to the Corinthian church, devotes considerable space to a declaration of the gospel, and to an explanation of the important part which Jesus took in perfecting the plan of salvation. He told the doubting brethren at Corinth what would have been the condition of the race had Christ failed in his mission; proved to them that our Lord had gloriously triumphed, and completed the redemption scheme; illustrated the manner in which deliverance is to be effected, a future life bestowed; expressed thanks to God "which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ;" and concluded with this exhortation, "Therefore my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord; forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord." All-important though it was in the morning of the Christian church that believers should be so deeply rooted in the truth as to be steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, it is no less momentous in these days of general departure from "the faith once delivered unto the saints," that all who are blessed with extrication from the mass of error and corruption fostered upon the church by the arch adversary, (unsanctified, designing humanity,) should use all diligence in giving heed to this injunction of the apostle. Were the vital points in Paul's theology, the doctrines of the gospel dispensation, new to the people of that day? So long have some of those prominent features been buried beneath the rubbish of human tradition that they are regarded as no less new now. Did the people then recognize that the triumph of those doctrines would break down the established order of things and bring to nought the authority of the learned doctors of the law? So it is clearly seen now that their triumph would overturn the whole structure of latter-day theology; drive fat-officed minions into the truth, or into obscurity; destroy the proudly wielded power of the "doctors of divinity," so called, who vainly seek to strengthen their very sick patient; and deliver from a terrible bondage all them who, under the assurance of progress in enlightenment, have been filled with heathen darkness. How violently the gospel's march was opposed in apostolic days, the fierce, long-continued, and relentless persecution of all the saints, and final martyrdom of many, but too clearly portray. How stubbornly and bitterly its every point of march is contested now, the untiring zeal with which its pretended friends strive to turn people from it to the vile inventions of antichrist, makes mournfully apparent. But whatever opposition may be experienced, as instruments in the hands of God, believers in an uncorrupted gospel, we are to be "steadfast, unmoveable." We are to be firmly anchored in the truth, trusting in it as confidently as we would trust a bridge the strength of which we know, the safety of which we have often tested. We are to let nothing move us from it; suffer nothing to shake our faith in, or win our minds from the hope of the gospel. We must arm ourselves well for the good fight. When the struggle is fiercest, when the warfare is sharpest, we should the more closely wrap around us the mantle of kindness, of patience, of humility, and love, thus making a superiority in the practice of all Christian virtue, a continual walk in godliness, bear testmony to the sanctifying power of the truths we proclaim.

"Always abound," says Paul, "in the work of the Lord." None need inquire of others concerning this work. Christ is himself our instructor. He not only points out the work but confers ability to perform it. Each follower of Christ, if a true follower, is a workman of God, and he is not only required to work for the triumph of truth, but he must abound in that work. He must not be spasmodic is his efforts, sometimes waxing hot in zeal, and again sinking into withering coldness; now so ambitions of rapid progress as to be impatient of the firm, steady walk of others; then, "unstable in his ways, suddenly falling behind, a stumbling block to the less experienced. We that have been brought to a more perfect knowledge of gospel truth have special responsibilities. Myriads of keen eyes are gazing upon us, watchful of our every movement. If we shun all appearance of evil they are slow to acknowledge our consistency. If we only seem to do evil, busy tongues transform us into workers of iniquity. But if we do evil, the sin is immediately charged against the peculiar truths we uphold, as their natural fruit. We should, therefore, be constant and zealous in well-doing, letting every Christian virtue have their perfect work, that we "may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing." Then when temptation comes suddenly upon us, as it sometimes will, we shall be near the unfailing fountain of all good, and from it we may draw strength to endure. "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation: for when he is tried, he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love him." Are we, lacking wisdom, sometimes in doubt as to the line of our duty? We have only, in faith, nothing wavering, to "ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not." Let us then, not only work, but so abound in that work that we shall ever improve; steadily progress in righteousness; constantly exceeding our former selves; and all this not for a week, or month, or year, but always; beginning, continuing, and finishing everything that we do to the glory of God, the honor of Christ, and the good of our fellow men. Thus abounding in the work we shall know that our "labor is not in vain in the Lord;" and, having in the appointed way sought for glory and honor and immortality, we shall be rewarded with attainment "unto the resurrection of the dead." At that unspeakably happy, joyous time may all the redeemed children of God, being the children of the resurrection, exclaim, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" L. C. A DIALOGUE.

BY WM. H. WHITMAN.

BR. STORRS: The following is a dialogue, that ran through my mind, while attending a business meeting to employ a man to preach on Sundays for a stated salary; viewing the future judgment as the clergyman employed views it. So we head the dialogue.

A POPULAR CLERGYMAN BEFORE THE GREAT WHITE THRONE.

JUDGE.—What was your calling in the other world?

CLERGYMAN.—I was a preacher of the gospel.

J.—Was the gospel you preached popular?

C.—Yes: and some of my co-laborers and myself thought we would convert the whole world.

J.—Did you not know that it was "written" that the world would be like as it was in the days of Noah and Lot, and there would be scoffers in the last days?

C.—Yes: but the doctrine we preached gained ground so fast, it seemed the world would be converted to it.

J.—Then you were carried away by your success, and forgot that you were to be judged by my words in the last day?

C.—Yes, we were to some extent: there were a few individuals who taught the world would grow worse and worse; but they were so insignificant, in our estimation, that I and my co-laborers treated them with a good deal of contempt, and thought we were serving thee in doing so.

J.—That is precisely the word I spake. Have you not read that my followers would be cast out of the synagogues? and even killed, and men would think they were serving me in treating them so?

C.—Yes, I have read it; but never thought that we were guilty of it; but that it would apply to the Methodists, Presbyterians, Baptists, and other denominations.

J.—But you have just confessed that you have mistreated some for defending Bible truths.

C.—But I felt sure that those I mistreated were not thy servants; wilt thou not forgive me, and save me in heaven?

J.—Were you a hired clergyman?

C.—Yes.

J.—What was your salary?

C.—It was among the lowest that was given, about $600 a year.

J.—Well, did you never read the words recorded by my servant John, "The hireling careth not for the sheep?"

C.—Yes: but I thought it did not apply to me, but to the protestant world; some of them would get $10,000 and some $30,000 a year.

J.—That makes no difference, you admit that you were a hireling, and knew my words that were to judge you in the last day, "The hireling careth not for the sheep." No wonder you have been mistreating some of them, and you cannot justify yourself now, unless you can make me out untruthful.

C.—I do not wish to do that. But as I was truly honest, wilt thou not save me in heaven?

J.—Did you take money from the poor to get your salary?

C.—Yes: some paid me money who were not worth a dollar where I was worth a hundred.

J.—Well, did you not know that my word commanded you to help the poor, instead of taking from them?

C.—Yes: but I thought I was doing right, for I labored very faithfully for the cause; and besides I gave away some money.

J.—Whom did you give it to?

C.—I gave it to other preachers, worth as much, or more than myself, and institutions of learning.

J.—Then, the poor you have neglected?

C.—Yes: I am sorry that I did; but wilt thou not grant me a place in heaven?

J.—How did you use your money that you took from some of these poor men you speak of? You did not give it all to other preachers and institutions of learning, did you?

C.—No: I had to dress well, or I would not make a good appearance in the pulpit. Then my wife had to dress in a better manner than others, because she was a clergyman's wife, and must appear a little above the common people; for such was the custom among clergymen.

J.—So then, you forgot my words which said, "be not conformed to this world?"

C.—No: I read them often, but did not apply them to myself and family. I pray thee save me in heaven.

J.—I will have to give you a place on the left hand; for you stand condemned without further questioning. Depart from me—depart.

The above would be a very short trial in the judgment. And if each individual case is to be acted on, as we hear the popular clergymen preach, how long will the judgment last?

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 23, 1868.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

THIS number closes the present volume of our paper. We have found a steady increase of subscribers up to the end of this volume; and especially for two or three months past; which, with the anniversary demonstration, is evidence of an increased interest in the views of Life only in Christ which we advocate. Our friends have stood firm at their post, as a general thing. They show no disposition to turn to the right hand or to the left. They have not put their hands to the work to look back, or to be drawn aside by private interests or selfish ends. The cause in which they have engaged is, to them, the cause of God and his truth; and they love it too well to let other considerations enter into their plans for carrying on the work.

Volume VI. commences with October 7th. Consequently there will be no issue next week; but it will appear as early as possible the week following. This interval of one week gives us an opportunity to regulate our books preparatory to the commencement of the new volume, and to make the entry of a thousand new names, which we want you to send us at once. Just make up your mind that this vacant week shall not pass without your sending from one to four new subscribers each. If you cannot get them to pay for a year, get them for six months. Let them try the "$1" plan, and see if the next dollar can be kept back. Now let every one of you give at least one day to this work and see what the result will be. We know it must be good. Remember, a subscriber for the entire volume is better than one for six months. But if you cannot get them to take a whole loaf, let them see how good a "half one" is.

WE have on hand a supply of these three "Campaign Documents," and trust the friends of Life only in Christ will continue the good work of scattering them everywhere; especially the two first named. Those present our advanced ground as Life believers, and set forth the crowning views of the Life theory. Thousands of them have already been sent forth on their mission, and thousands more are to be put in circulation. They are put to purchasers at cost; but many must be given away. To pay for these, we look for donations from such as can help bear the expense.

Those who wish to send these works to their friends or acquaintances, can have the first two sent by mail, postage paid, for ten cents; or the three together for fourteen cents. By the 100 copies, sent by mail, LIFE FROM THE DEAD will be $6 25. THE JUDGMENT, $2 25. DEFENCE OF THE BIBLE, $3 50. If sent by express, or taken at our office, $5 per 100 for the first named; $2 for the second; and $3 for the last. But send for which you choose, and as many as you desire, and we shall send them at the same rate.

Our object is to put the two first named, especially, in circulation as extensively as possible. The other, "A DEFENCE OF THE BIBLE," may or may not go with the two first, as you choose. Yet it may be well to have a few of them for some particular persons.

Now is the time to work, and to work in earnest. An interest is being awakened for information on these subjects. We have calls from various quarters. A gentleman in Vicksburg, Miss., writes us that chance or Providence has thrown two or three copies of the HERALD OF LIFE into his hands. He tells us, if we have any works for gratuitous circulation in the South, he will distribute them for us. He seems in good earnest in the matter. He is a member of the Methodist Church, but is no believer in the future torment theory. The South must have our help. Who will send us the funds for that purpose. Those who can aid, please do so as early as possible.

Some "orthodox" advent preachers in Tennessee, have boasted that they have kept our views from getting any hold there. Be it so. Doubtless they think to do God service by that course. To their own Master they are responsible, and not to us; nor are we responsible to them. Tennessee is receiving some of our HERALDS and tracts. We rather think we shall have witnesses there as well as elsewhere.

ELD. HIMES AND THE LATE CAMP-MEETING.

IN the Voice of the West, for Sept. 15, Eld. Himes, in giving an account of the Springfield camp-meeting, makes some statements which we regard as incorrect, and also refers to a transaction at the close of our discourse, on Friday, which we, in our account, left unnoticed, as another peace offering. We were glad also to see the World's Crisis left it out of their account of the meeting. Eld. Himes seems pleased with the affair: hence we feel called on to speak of it also. Eld. H. first speaks of our discourse, (which remarks we may notice ultimately), he then says.

> After the sermon, Br. H. Pratt, of Rochester, N. Y. read the hymn, "I love thee, I love thee," etc. and in reference to the allusion of Br. Storrs to the non-resurrection of the wicked, said: "I love my Savior too well not to believe that he told the truth when he said, 'Marvel not at this: for the hour is coming in the which all that are in their graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth: they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation.'" This remark created quite a sensation, and brought out loud amens: but all passed off with the manifestation of the best of feeling on the part of most present. "Let brotherly love continue."

To those who heard and saw this transaction we need say nothing; if their minds can discover Christian courtesy in it, very well. We had entered into no detailed defence of our view of the non-revival of the wicked dead, and hence did not feel disposed to press the subject by commenting on texts relied on to prove the opposite. What Eld. Pratt did, says Eld. H., was "in reference to the allusion of Br. Storrs to the non-resurrection of the wicked." We italicize one word to show that the subject, by us, was not entered on argumentatively, Eld. H. being judge. What call was there, then, for Eld. Pratt to take the course he did? We believe that every fair-minded man on the ground, even though opposed to our views, disapproved of Eld. P.'s course. We have reason to believe that Eld. Grant, and Eld. Mathewson, if not some other preachers, did. Because they did, we took no notice of the matter. Eld. Himes, it seems, approved, and sends out his approval through the Voice of the West.

Now to the thing itself. We had been dwelling on "Love:" the love of God and love to one another. Our "allusion" to the non-revival of the wicked dead was in the least offensive language we are capable of using without hypocrisy. We had not attempted to destroy the force of any text relied on by the defenders of their revival. At the close of our discourse, Eld. P. came forward as described by Eld. H. Was the spirit of love manifested in the transaction? Let those judge who saw and heard. The matter is what we have to do with. What did he say? "I love my Saviour too well not to believe that he told the truth when he said," etc., (reading John v. 28, 29).

Can any fair construction be put upon this introduction to the text, except this, "Eld. Storrs believes or teaches that my Saviour did not speak the truth" in that text? We so regarded it at the time, and so regard it still; but, as Peter once said, "I know that through ignorance ye did it." Acts iii., 17. Hence we let it pass unnoticed; and glad would we have been had Eld. H. done the same, and followed the good example of Eld. Grant; but he has all but compelled us to respond.

Be it known to all men, the truthfulness of our Lord's words, John v., 28, 29, has never been called in question by us, not even impliedly. The construction some men put on those words, we do question, and shall not override the general tenor of the Scriptures and positive testimony that unbelievers "shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on them," (John iii., 36), to adopt any man's construction of John v., 28, 29. We think that text can be harmonized with what we regard as the general tenor of the Bible and the known truth, "God is love." The text does not say that the doers of evil are made alive. It does say those who have done good come forth to the resurrection of life. Both classes are taken cognizance of at the resurrection, supposing it to be the literal resurrection, at the last day; and the final state of both is then manifested and unalterably fixed by the "Son of man," who is the executive officer of "the judgment written." Hence, while both classes are unmanifested, as to their final state, till the resurrection; both are then made a manifest disposal of; the doers of good come to the resurrection of life: the others, unmanifested till then, by the resurrection process, are openly condemned "not to see life," but to have the wrath of God abide on them. That is their "damnation;" literally, condemnation. That is the final disposal of them. This view is harmonious with the general tenor of the Scriptures, and manifests that "God is love" even to his enemies. When they can be of no benefit to themselves or any one else, He causes them to "remain in the congregation of the dead." Prov. xxi., 16.

The question of the true sense of John v., 28, 29, we will not argue further at this time; but we will notice Eld. Himes' statement of the exultation of some, at Eld. Pratt's effort. He has told a part of the truth, but not all of it. Not only were there "loud amens," but loud cries of "glory;" and they reminded us of a circumstance that occurred at Great Falls, N. H., when we were a Methodist preacher, and believed in inherent immortality and eternal torments. In a large assembly we were portraying the horrible condition of the lost. In the midst of our awful picture a brother shouted "loud"—"glory to God." Very much like it were the responses to Eld. Pratt's ebullition, from persons who profess to have rejected the doctrine of eternal torments, but give "glory and amens" to the idea that sinners are to be made alive from death and tormented awhile before their final death. Such persons remind us of the story we heard, many years ago, of a good "orthodox" lady, somewhere in the west, who kept a public house. A Universalist sought rest in her mansion and she refused to entertain him because he did not believe in eternal torments; and he had to go on his way to find lodgings elsewhere. Not long after, he had occasion to travel the same road again. Once more he called at the house of this orthodox lady. To pacify her feelings so as to get entertainment for the night, he told her his views had undergone some change since he was at her house before. Said he, "I have come to the conclusion that some sinners hereafter will be tormented at least fifty thousands years." "Bless the Lord," said she, "that is better than nothing."

Wherein those shouters and ameners at Springfield differ from the orthodox landlady it is difficult to tell. They do not, it is true, believe in endless torture—but, "Glory to God and amen" to torturing them without hope for "fifty thousand years," the shortest imaginable period in which their fancied judgment, after resurrection, can be accomplished; and it is more likely to occupy a million or ten millions of years. Such a mortal resurrection, and the misery attending is what called out the "loud amens" and "glory" that gives Eld. J. V. Himes such apparent satisfaction.

However, his case is not hopeless; he has made "progress;" for though he withstood us, or was dumb on the immortality question for more than twenty years, while we fought the battle, standing in the forefront of the hottest of it, he has at last come to the conclusion that we were right, all that twenty years, and he was wrong; but when he comes to wheel into line, he finds we have taken an advanced post, viz., that not only is the doctrine of eternal torments not true, but the doctrine of any hopeless torments in a future life is equally false.

Now he sets himself against us on this doctrine, as he did for twenty years on the other. Very well; less than twenty years more, if the age should last so long, Eld. H. may be found making a movement for the new line we now occupy. We hope the kingdom of God may come before so long a period shall pass. But sure we are that Eld. H. and the mortal resurrectionists cannot stand where they are. The idea of a mortal resurrection for saints and sinners will never prosper when it comes out in fair and open fight. The man that can advocate it in the face of the apostolic declarations that "the dead are raised incorruptible—in glory—in power," and with "spiritual" bodies, must not rebuke us because we do not allow his and his co-workers' construction of certain texts which they think teach the reliving of the wicked dead, while not a text can be found that saith they will live again. We do not say they cannot infer it from some texts; but we do say, not one text in the Book of God saith that a man dying in his sins shall ever be revived into life, or be made alive from the dead.

LIGHT WANTED.

ELD. J. V. HIMES, speaking of our preaching at the Springfield camp-meeting, among other things, says,

> It should be understood, that some of the friends of Br. Storrs applied to the committee for the privilege to pitch their tent on the ground in connection with the annual Camp-meeting. They have paid a portion of the expenses in fitting up the ground, and enjoy the right of holding their own meetings, in subjection only to the general rules of the camp. The committee treated them in a liberal and Christian manner, though it is understood that they do not give countenance to their views of the non-resurrection of the wicked.

This statement is liable to mislead. If any of our "friends applied to the committee for the privilege to pitch" the LIFE AND ADVENT MISSION TENT on the camp ground at Springfield, it is unknown to us. We went there of right, as all of our "friends" understood it. They had been invited to help fit up the ground, and some of them had been appointed on the committee to help in the matter, and to solicit funds for the purpose; and, if we are not misinformed, members of the Life and Advent Union actually paid more than $500 for that object. Are we now to be told that we went there as a gracious privilege granted us by a "Christian committee," provided we would behave well, and not violate "the general rules of the camp?" If these things are so, and Eld. Himes seems to know, we ask that "liberal and Christian manner"-ly committee to return to our friends the money they have received under "false pretences," or disavow such insinuations as proceed from Eld. H. We wish to deal with honorable men.

We have had enough, and more than enough of this deceitful pretence of "brotherly love" while stabbing us by insinuations. We condemn no man because he dissents from our doctrinal views; nor withhold fellowship from him merely on that account. But the man who wilfully misrepresents our position, and deliberately covers up his own, holding to a mortal and simultaneous resurrection of all Adam's race, and yet spreads those views covertly, is a tax on our charity, we confess. We are sorry to be compelled to say thus much. But, with Paul, we would say, "Let no man think me a fool;" if they do, let them "suffer fools gladly, seeing ye yourselves are wise." 2 Corth. xi., 16, 19.

AN OLD HEATHEN.

So the Rev. ABEL STEVENS called Plato, in one of his letters from Europe, published in the Christian Advocate of this city, some few years since. And what has this "old heathen" done? According to Mr. Stevens, he has done what Christianity could not do. No wonder Mr. S. called this a "strange fact." Mr. Stevens seemed to glory that "Plato always had a similar influence in the church!"

The truth is, the so-called "Church" has attempted to establish the dogma of an "immortal soul" in man, which is unsustained by a single text in the volume of inspiration. But this immortal soul theory has compelled its advocates to adopt the mystical system of explanation, which has led thinking minds to the conclusion that there is nothing rational in the Book professing to be a revelation. The consequence has been a grievous departure of many men of investigating minds, into what is called "Rationalism." From that position, Christianity, as it is doctrinally maintained by the immortal soul advocates, cannot reclaim them; so Christ and his teaching must be abandoned for "PLATO!" Not till this "old heathen" has done his delusive work, can immortal soul Christianity be made to bear on a man of mind and fit him for the mystical system of "Spiritualism," which from the Bible alone can never be taught, because not there. There is indeed a Bible "spiritualism;" but it is just as different from the Platonistic Christianity, as a resurrection from the dead is different from an immortal soul. But we give our readers Mr. Stevens' remarks and leave them to make their own conclusions. He says:

> "I showed in my last that a great change came over the theological mind of Germany under the influence of Schleiermacher. He was led back from German skepticism by the help of an old heathen—this is one of the strange facts above alluded to. Plato made Schleiermacher ashamed of the crude, materialistic, heartless unbelief of Rationalistic theologians around him. Plato has always had a similar influence in the Church. Some of the 'Fathers' believed that many Christian truths had been revealed to him by inspiration. A Platonist in philosophy, Schleiermacher soon was in a mood to receive the purer spiritualism of Christianity itself. He published Plato, and began to preach Christ. His students felt his influence. A corps of excellent scholars and really spiritual men rose up around him; yet while he sent forth from his lecture-room the great and good Neander, who at his Christian baptism renounced his old Jewish name (for he was a Jew) and assumed the Greek one of Neander, (the 'new man,') Strauss also, the champion of the Mythic theory of Christianity, went forth from it—so uncertain is the influence of what is called philosophy. Strauss was an exception, however, to the great Platonist's usefulness."

ZION'S HERALD.

WE thank the conductors of that paper for sending it as an exchange for the HERALD OF LIFE. It has assumed the form of a quarto of 12 pages, with cover; mechanically it is well executed and closely printed. We like its plan of confining advertisements to its cover. Religious papers half filled with advertisements, it seems to us, have a drawback on their character.

With Dr. Haven, editor of Zion's Herald, we never had any personal acquaintance. From what we have heard of him, we have formed a favorable opinion of his character and abilities. We hope our exchanges will be a mutual benefit.

Perhaps the Christian Advocate, of this city, may now favor us in like manner; though heretofore declining. We know that paper has wronged us in time past, by publishing the misstatements of H. Mattison, and refusing to correct them when distinctly pointed out. This we regard as out of character in any religious paper. But we hope it may yet be led to see that pure Christianity is not promoted by making untrue statements of the position of others, as the writer referred to has repeatedly done in the Christian Advocate, while no correction has been allowed from us. All religious papers are liable to be imposed on by misrepresentations in the communications of correspondents; but they should be ready to correct them when fairly pointed out, even though it may bear hard on the reputation of the offender. Let him learn to be more careful in his statements in future, and not "do evil that good may come."

DONATION OF BOOKS.

WHEN we were at Springfield, Mass., at the camp-meeting, we received a request for some of our principal works, on the Life views, from the "City Library Association," for the Theological Department. We sent them two copies of LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST, and two of BIBLE VS. TRADITION; also, our Review of Rev. T. M. POST, on IMMORTALITY. We have received the following acknowledgment:

CITY LIBRARY ASSOCIATION ROOMS,
SPRINGFIELD, MASS., Sept. 17, 1868.

REV. GEO. STORRS: Dear Sir—I am directed by the Board of Managers of the City Library Association to acknowledge the receipt of a valuable donation of books made by you to the Association, and to return thanks to you in their behalf for the same. Very truly yours,

WILLIAM RICE,
Secretary & Librarian.

We shall be pleased to make any similar association a like donation, in any part of the country, and to add a copy of the HERALD OF LIFE, without charge, for their use, if desired.

THE American Presbyterian has our thanks for noticing a few works we sent it a short time since. We exchanged with that paper when we published the Bible Examiner, years ago, and count it one of the best among our exchanges. The following is its notice referred to:

> George Storrs, of New York, Editor of The Bible Examiner, sends us three pamphlets: (a) Man's Destiny. "Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D.D., of St. Louis, Mo.," reviewed by George Storrs. (b) The Atonement by Jesus Christ: What is it? (c) Man's Nature and Destiny: or, the Animal Man and the Spiritual Man. A Sermon, by Geo. Storrs. The doctrines here inculcated and defended are those of the Annihilationist wing of the Second Advent body, of which Mr. Storrs has long been the recognized leader. He may indeed be regarded as the author of the annihilationist theory, though something like it seems to have been taught in primitive times by Arnobius.

We would be much obliged to the Presbyterian if it will inform us where we can find the teachings of Arnobius, to which it refers; we have not been able to find it and would be glad to see it.

"SPIRITISM."

THIS development came in to help the advocates of the natural immortality theory just at a time when the supporters of that theory were at their wit's end, having been routed by the Bible testimony of Life Eternal only through Christ, and of man's inherent mortality. Its mission was, avowedly, "to convince men of the immortality of the soul." As such, it was hailed by many believers of the common dogma of natural immortality. But it soon manifested a departure from "orthodoxy" in relation to man's final destiny; being, in fact, on the side of universal salvation. That alone, it seems, kept the largest portion of "orthodox" persons from giving themselves up to the guidance of the spirits, professing to be the spirits of their dead friends.

We never called in question the reality of the various manifestations said to be made by this development; but we have steadily rejected the idea that the spirits of the dead had anything to do in the matter. If we could not explain the manner of these manifestations, we never have for one moment wavered in the fact that dead men were no actors in these developments: our faith in the Bible forbid the indulgence of a thought which we regarded as virtually giving the lie to inspiration. The book of God is distinct in its utterance that "There is no remembrance of God in death"—that "the dead praise not the Lord"—that "in the very day" of one's death "their thoughts perish"—that "the dead know not anything"—and "there is no knowledge in sheol," the state of the dead. Psa. vi., 5; cxv., 17; cxlvi., 4; Eccl. ix., 5, 10.

Such being the fact we have stood firm, that God is true, though every man be found a liar. By some it has been wholly attributed to the devil; but we have been more inclined to the opinion that it resulted from some unknown cause in the mediums themselves and in those who consulted them. In confirmation of this view we saw, some years since, an extract from the American Journal of Insanity, containing an abstract from a paper by Dr. BELL, read at the meeting of Insane Hospital Superintendents in Boston. From that abstract we make a few extracts.

Dr. BELL first narrates a series of experiments in "table moving." Next he speaks of "long conversations with what purported to be the spirits of persons dead for twenty-five to forty years, in which every question he could devise relating to their domestic history and to events in it, known only to them and him, had been truly answered. Some of the subjects put mentally — i. e., without speaking or writing—had half a dozen correct replies, forbidding of course completely, on any doctrine of chances, the contingency of accident or coincidence, as such mental questions, per se, negative the explanation of previous knowledge on the part of the medium."

The account then proceeds as follows:

Pretty early, however, in his investigations, Dr. Bell began to find that, however correct his spiritual conferees were in most of their responses, the moment a question was put involving a response the truth of which was unknown to him, uniform failure occurred. Sometimes, where he believed at the time that his questions were truly answered, subsequent information had shown him that he had been mistaken. He had answers which he believed to be true, when the facts were decidedly otherwise.

Pursuing this train of inquiry, he found the "spirits," while averring that they could see him distinctly "face to face," never could read the signatures taken from an old file, and unfolded without his having seen the writing. Yet as soon as he had cast his eye upon the signature, without allowing any one else to see it, it was promptly and correctly reproduced by the alphabetical rappings. And again, when he had made a previous arrangement with his family that they should do certain things every quarter of an hour at home —he, of course, not knowing what—while he was to ask the "spirit" what was done at the instant, uniform failure occurred. He proved, too, that the theory of the "Spiritualists" to meet such difficulties, viz: that evil or trifling spirits interfered at their end of the telegraph —was not tenable. For the responses just before and after these gross failures had been eminently and wonderfully accurate, and the "spirits" not only declared that they saw with perfect clearness what was going on at his house, but denied that there had been any interruption or interference.

Dr. Bell also gave examples where test questions involving replies unknown to the interrogator had been designedly intermixed with those which were known. The result uniformly was that the known responses, however curious and far remote, were correctly reproduced; the unknown were a set of perfectly wild and blundering errors, the responses often being obviously formed out of the phraseology of the question, as a stuck school-boy guesses out a reply!

The result of the inquiries of Dr. Bell and his friends—for several gentlemen of eminently fitting talents pursued the investigation with him—was briefly this: that what the questioner knows, the spirits know; what the questioner does not know, the spirits are entirely ignorant of. In other words, that there are really no superhuman agencies in the matter at all—no connection with another state of existence; but that it bears certain strong analogies to some of the experiences of clairvoyance, in that mysterious science of animal magnetism, as it has been protruding and receding for the last hundred years.

Dr. Bell concluded by the expression of his full convictions that, while the faith in spirits must be given up as being connected with these facts, it was a topic, whether regarded as a physical novelty, or even as a delusion, cutting deeply into the very religious natures of our people, which was worth our fullest examination. There were great, novel, interesting facts here. They had not been treated fairly and respectfully, as they should have been. The effect was that the community, knowing that these were facts, if human senses could be trusted at all, went away from those who should have thrown light upon the mysteries, but who would or could not, to those who gave some explanation, even if it was one which uprooted all previous forms of religious faith. He hoped that the members of this Association, who were as much required to examine this topic as any order of men except, perhaps, the clergy, would not be afraid of looking it in the face from any apprehensions of ridicule or of degrading their dignity.

We think Dr. BELL's conclusion on these topics is the most rational and worthy of attention of anything we have seen. To sneer at the facts is folly; they are too well attested to admit of a rational doubt; but that they are produced by the spirits of dead men is not for a moment to be admitted, unless we are prepared to reject the Bible as a revelation from God. That they are a mere human production from some cause not yet fully understood is most likely. That these manifestations will utterly destroy many persons we have no doubt, and they seem to be a fulfilment of 2 Thess. ii., 9–12, which runs as follows:

"Even him whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all power and signs and lying wonders. And with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish: because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved. And for this cause shall God send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie: that they all might be damned who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness."

"VAIN PHILOSOPHY."

[We would like much to have the Methodists' papers, all over the land, republish the following sensible article from the pen of the venerable Dr. BOND, in 1854, then Editor of the Christian Advocate of this city. It was a response to a correspondent. Dr. BOND speaks as follows:]

WE have deeply felt the importance of the subjects to which our correspondent refers: "The relations of the spiritual to the material world, and the disposition made of the soul on its separation from the body." We have consulted philosophy and philosophers in regard to these subjects with no success. Philosophy, applied to spiritual things, constitutes what is called natural theology, and from natural theology is derived what is called natural religion. Now natural theology must be derived from natural phenomena; that is, from the works of creation, as they are exhibited to our senses, and from the providential government and superintendence manifested in these works. Both in antiquity and modern times men of the greatest ability and most patient industry have inquired of the phenomena of nature and providence, and have ended in nothing but vain speculations in respect to spiritual things. Their theories are vain imaginations, unsupported by proof which carries conviction to the judgment, or satisfaction to the longings of human nature after sure and certain hope in respect to the future.

At the very threshold of the temple of knowledge, the philosophers of both ancient and modern times have met with an insurmountable obstacle to their progress. They could not proceed a single step without answering the inquiry, Has man an immaterial spirit in him—something distinct from, and capable of existing independently of matter? They found the opinion everywhere prevalent that he had; but how did it originate? Tradition had handed down the belief from the earliest ages, but mixed up with the most puerile conceits and absurb superstitions. Could it stand the test of philosophical inquiry? One thing was perceived at the outset. The question as to the existence of spirit could not be subjected to ordinary philosophical tests. Philosophy examined matter, its qualities and laws, as it was presented to the senses; but spirit was neither tangible nor visible—was not cognizant of any sense. How then could its existence be demonstrated? If any attempted to demonstrate the existence of spirit by the operations of mind, the argument was met by the objection that no one was so well and accurately acquainted with the powers of which material organization was capable as to be assured that no peculiarity of organization was competent to perform functions attributed to the mind. It was not more inscrutable than he thinking of subordinate animals, and the functions which are performed by what is called life in vegetables. It excelled these in degree, but so might human organization excel in degree all other forms of life.

But if philosophy could not demonstrate the existence of an immaterial spirit in man, it could not assure us of a future state of existence, and consequently could not reconcile the existence of moral and physical evil in the world with the omnipotence and goodness of God; for it was evident that a good man, possessed of omnipotence, would not have made a world like this, where no degree of excellence could exempt a man from the evils of life—from pestilence, famine, oppression, pain, bereavements and death. It was true, then, as Paul declared in his day, that "the world by wisdom' (i. e., philosophy), knew not God," and it is true still. They could not assure themselves of his unity, much less of his omnipotence and moral attributes comprehended in the word goodness. On the contrary, when they contemplated the moral and physical evil existing in the world, and viewed the apparently unjust administration of providence, they could come to no other conclusion than that there existed both good and evil deities, mutually counteracting each other in the government of the world. True, they could not contemplate the phenomena of creation without perceiving evidence of intelligence and power in the works and in the government of creation. These attributes were evident—everywhere seen. They were apparent in the movements of the heavenly bodies by fixed and invariable laws, and the structure of the smallest insect testified to the same intelligence and power by the adaptation of its organization to the purposes of its economy. But whether this intelligence and power resided in one God or in many gods, philosophy could not decide. And, indeed, had it decided on unity as a divine attribute, the other attributes of intelligence and power would have afforded no basis for religion, as they would have taught nothing which could direct man how to worship and serve the Creator so as to procure his favor.

With these views we renounce, wholly, all reliance upon metaphysical theology, and consequently upon natural religion, and betake ourself solely and exclusively to revealed theology and religion, as found in the holy Scriptures. We have settled the only question which remained to be answered after philosophy failed us, namely, Are the Scriptures true? Do they contain a revelation from God to man? We find their truth attested by evidence which our judgment cannot resist; demonstration as satisfactory as the Q. E. D. of Euclid; "They have God for their author, salvation for their end, and truth, without any mixture of error, for their matter. Here, then, we rest our faith and our hope in all spiritual concerns. Our only business now is to inquire, What has God said? What does he require? What does he promise? What does he threaten? With John Wesley, we are homo uni libri—"a man of one book"—in regard to the interests of the soul for time and eternity; and "looking into the perfect law of liberty, and continuing therein, not being a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, we are happy in our deed."

DEATH WORSHIP.

IT is seldom, of late, that we have seen such rank idolatry manifested as is found in the following lines of poetry, which we clip from one of our exchanges. Read it, and see to what the doctrine of inherent immortality leads.

DEATH IS LIFE.

No skeleton monster, with poisonous breath,
A terror, a tyrant, that comes from below,
But God's blessed angel of mercy, is Death,
Relieving the soul from its burdens of woe.

'Tis only the close of the lily at night,
To open again at the morning's first ray;
The fading of stars at the coming of light,
Before the full glory of opening day.

The rainbow that heralds the reigning of peace,
The sleep that is dreamless and ends in the sky,
The veil between man and the "holiest place"
Of God's golden temple for Christians on high.

The grave is life's cradle, its shroudings of white
Are saints' swaddling clothes for the opening of life,
Then welcome Death's rising that bringeth the light,
Dispelling the gloom of our sorrow and strife.

If this language does not supplant Jesus and the resurrection, we would like to know what could do it. "The wages of sin is death." Rom. vi., 23. "The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death." 1 Cor. xv., 26. "All wrong," says the above poetic effusion, "death is no monster, no tyrant; it is God's blessed angel of mercy." . . . . "Then welcome death's rising that bringeth the light." That is, when death comes he is the rising sun that bringeth the light of life, "the opening of life."

Christ is not mentioned in a single line of this poetry. No wonder, for Death has taken Jesus' place as the great Deliverer. We might employ the words of Peter, and say, "Ye have denied the Holy One and the Just, and desired a murderer to be granted unto you; and killed the Prince of life, whom God raised from the dead." Acts iii., 14, 15. Yes, Death, the murderer, is glorified in the foregoing poetry. Death is declared to be "God's blessed angel of mercy." Why, then, we ask, did God take his Son out of this blessed angel's hand by raising him from the dead? We ask again, Is not Death glorified and Jesus ignored in the above poetry? Is not the resurrection from the dead made useless, if not impossible, by it? What has thus perverted the truth of God? Not the good heart of the author of the poetry; but a head filled with inherent immortality. That doctrine is the "Barabbas," the murderer of truth, in these days.

"LIVING SOUL."

THE article in the HERALD OF LIFE on the above subject, two weeks since, will be put in a tract if sufficient funds are sent for that purpose. Thus far only eight or ten dollars have been pledged. Shall it be issued? Now is the time to do it, if done at all. We wait for funds. About $40 is wanted to print 2,000.

CORRECTION.—On the last page, in the Letter from Thos. McClary, in the twelfth line, for "embrace this *com*ing doctrine," read, "this *crown*ing doctrine."

A DILEMMA FOR UNIVERSALISTS.

ACCORDING to Universalism, Christ died to save all mankind; therefore, all mankind will be saved.

Query. What are mankind saved from?

They are not saved from their sins; for Universalism says, all are sinners. They are not saved from punishment in this life; for Universalism says, all must suffer for their sins, in this life, and there is no escape.

They are not saved from future punishment; for Universalism says, there is no future punishment. They are not saved from hell; for Universalism says, there is no hell to be saved from.

Christ did not die, that the spirit might go back to God; for that was done, according to Universalism, before Christ died.

Christ did not die that he might redeem the body from death; for Universalism says, there is no resurrection of the body.

Now in the name of reason and truth, what will Christ save mankind from, according to Universalism? Will some of their Divines tell us? The above we give to some intelligent Universalist to answer. If an answer is given we will make known the result.

MARRIED, in Cambridgeport, Mass., by Eld. E. G. Chadsey, at the residence of the bride's father, Miss ELLA F. EATON to Mr. EDWARD F. KEEFE.

TO BR. MCALLISTER: I've got my work "done up," baby asleep, and have just read your letter in the last HERALD. And, hoping you will receive it as from one who simply wishes to comfort and encourage you, and other isolated believers, I take my pen to write a few facts brought to mind by your closing remark about "yearning for communion with some congenial Christian, whose heart will beat in unison with" your own.

Where we came to this place, there had not been an Advent meeting here for years. The few that remained of a former lively church had gone back into various Sectarian societies. Husband was the only one in town that believed the life views, and his constant talking on the subject soon made him unpopular among this class. But we established meetings in our house; people came out some, and a good interest was manifested. The old stock of Adventists got revived, and we felt happy at the prospect of the society of saints. But soon they commenced fighting. Husband had not brought the disagreeable heresy into our little meetings, but they soon understood his belief, and to make the story short, after coming to me to help them contrive a way for dead sinners to get life, and after I exhausted my ingenuity and gave up the possibility for them ever to live again, they separated themselves from us; appointed meetings among themselves on the same evenings that we had ours, and requested us to meet by ourselves. Soon they sent for a noted "mortal resurrectionist," and if they didn't try hard to fight life into dead sinners!

Well, in our loneliness, husband prayed the Lord to give him one brother to be with him in this holy Westfield war. I had laid down my weapons at this time. (Ask Dwight if I didn't fight to the best of my ability, sometimes.) The Lord heard prayer. Where do you think he found a man for our companionship? Why, he took a pale young man from among unbelievers! They called him a "stripling;" and so he is; for he can strip their theology into shoe-strings any time. He heard the truth, and it made him tremble as did Felix. Not the idea of coming up at the judgment; but of staying down at the judgment: not being counted worthy to come up at that last chance for life, was what moved him. And blessed be the Lord, he stands firm to-day, and his mother and sister are with us, and their society is sweet.

This isn't all, Br. McAllister. Three other brethren are with us, besides our "Mother Bush" and her twin daughters. Lately another man has called, and I guess we can count him pretty soon. So you see, its safe to keep waiting on the Lord to renew your strength. The longer you wait the more comforting the gift when obtained.

Don't suppose we are very precious in the sight of our organized advent body here. Indeed, "all manner of evil has been said about us falsely," for this truth's sake. But with the Lord on our side, we expect to get victory by-and-by.

We some expect to have Br. Wendell preach here soon. Let the Lord send the preachers. Our part is to receive them and care for them. The committee here that don't believe in sectarianism refused to let Br. Wendell preach in their hall, and said they didn't want to have the doctrine preached in town.

O my Lord! talk about liberty! about freedom from sectarianism! Its all talk and feeling, nothing that shows itself in acts. Some of them hiss at us.

Well, they can't quite "kill the body," though they try hard to kill our influence. Poor souls, some of them "know not what they do." Let us pray for them; be kind, yet earnest in our endeavors to enlighten the willing ones, and surely, though slowly, we shall find seed springing up around us, so we can "return bringing sheaves with" us, to our joy and God's glory. Your Sister.

JOSEPH LINGLE, Harrisburg, Pa., writes: I have been giving my paper to all I could get to read. They cannot controvert the truth it advocates, but will not confess it. I almost despair of light advancing in this section. It seems as if the people were determined to remain in darkness. I am confident if they would examine they would be convinced of the truth we advocate; but they will not examine. The more I read and examine, the plainer I see the correctness of the views maintained in the HERALD OF LIFE. Yours in hope of eternal life at the appearing of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—Do not be discouraged, Br. Lingle. Keep beating the rock. God may yet cause the waters to flow, and water the dry places like a river. At any rate let us sow the seed and work while the day lasts, and leave the result with our Lord, which will be to us each according to our labor, and not according to our success. Our Lord himself could do no mighty works, in some places, because of their unbelief. Let his followers, then, not faint, but keep doing in humble reliance on God's grace and Spirit.

S. S. CALL, Newport Centre, Vt., sends us four or five names for the HERALD, and writes: Through the mercy of God and the love of the brethren we are to have the HERALD OF LIFE another year, if the Master does not come before it ends. I am in hopes of sending one more subscriber soon. I will pay one dollar toward printing in a tract the article "LIVING SOUL." I will also pay five dollars toward printing in a cheap form "THE WATCH TOWER; or, Man in Death," provided they can be got up for ten cents per copy. I want them for gratuitous distribution. Can they be had at the price named? I cannot but express my high esteem of the friends who have done so nobly in sustaining our precious HERALD, and say to the officers of the "Life and Advent Union" you shall have my prayers and my best endeavors that your labors may be crowned with success, and that the paper may, as heretofore, continue to excel even itself. May God bless you all.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We will get out an edition of a thousand of the "WATCH TOWER; or, Man in Death," for $100. But it must not be expected that we can use paper as good as that on which we print our regular edition, advertised in our Catalogue of Books. Others are calling for a cheap edition of this work, but Br. Call's pledge is the first that has been made for the object. If the amount we have named is furnished the work shall be done. After the first thousand they may be put at a still lower price.

JOHN HAYES, Epping, N. H., writes: I am a stranger to you, but thought you might like to know how the Life views are received this way. It seems to be all opposition here. One man said to me, that the Bible so clearly taught the resurrection of the wicked dead, if that doctrine was not true he would give up all faith in the book. This man was an advent believer of '43. I like the HERALD OF LIFE much; but it reaches me irregularly, and Aug. 12 I have not received at all.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We regret the irregularity of your reception of the paper, but think the fault is at your Post-office. Please talk with your Postmaster about it. We have sent you Aug. 12 again.

THE EARTHQUAKE IN SOUTH AMERICA.

WE get some faint conception of those great geological catastrophes which swept away whole systems of living things, and entire continents, in the great earthquake of last month on the Western Coast of South America. The details show a coast-line one thousand miles in extent reaching from Chili, past Bolivia and Peru into Ecuador, and a belt of country extending back to the Andes, in which twenty towns and cities appear to have been utterly demolished, some thirty thousand lives lost and three hundred millions of property destroyed. The shocks of the earthquake were violent and protracted to an unusual degree even in those countries, the earth reeled to and fro like a drunken man, all the motions of a steamer on a stormy sea were experienced on the solid ground, and the enormous return wave of the startled ocean fell, like an avalanche, upon the miserable ruins left by the earthquake, and swept them clean from their places into the sea. The oft visited Quito, in the lap of the Andes, is again in ruins. It is rumored, in the first panic, that extensive mining districts, in the interior, with as many as eighteen thousand inhabitants, have been swallowed up, leaving no trace behind.

We wait for the story as it shall be told in a calmer and perhaps less exaggerated form, but we see little reason to doubt that for violent and destructive effects over a vast range of country, this is unparalleled among all calamities of the kind recorded in history. The only occurrence that can compare with it is the earthquake of 1797, when the country from Santa Fe to Panama was convulsed, and 40,000 persons perished. In the great Lisbon earthquake of 1757, sixty thousand are believed to have perished in about six minutes, but though the shock was felt over seven and a half millions of square miles, its destructive efforts were mostly confined to the city of Lisbon alone. There was an earthquake in Calabria, at the end of the last century, in which 40,000 persons perished. In the Island of Java in 1772, forty villages, with all their inhabitants, were overwhelmed in ruin. The Tribune mentions an earthquake in the kingdom of Naples, in 1857, attended with the loss, as was believed, of fully 30,000 lives, and it gives the following terrible summary of less destructive visitations, adding that twelve or thirteen earthquakes, more or less destructive, are believed to occur every year, and that thirteen million of the human race are believed to have perished by earthquakes.

In October, 1746, Lima and Callao were demolished, and 18,000 persons buried in the ruins; in April, 1755, the City of Quito was destroyed; in July, 1773, Guatemala, with 8,000 of its inhabitants, was swallowed up; in February, 1797, occurred the terrible earthquake above alluded to; in March, 1812, the City of Caraccas, the capital Venezuela, was reduced, with all its splendid churches, to a heap of ruins, beneath which 12,000 of the inhabitants were crushed to death; on the 2d of April, 1831, Valaparaiso was terribly shaken, and more than 400 houses destroyed; in April, 1854, St. Salvador was destroyed; in June, 1868, the Valley of Mexico was convulsed, and property to the value of several millions of dollars destroyed; in March, 1839, Quito in Ecuador suffered terribly, about 5,000 persons having been killed, and an immense amount of property destroyed; in March, 1861, the greater part of the city of Mendoza, in the Argentine Republic, was overthrown, and 7,000 lives lost, and in December, 1862, 150 buildings and 14 churches were destroyed in Guatemala.

The West India Islands have also suffered terribly. There was the earthquake at Jamaica, in 1692, which destroyed Port Royal; that at Martinique, in January, 1839, by which nearly 700 persons were killed, nearly half the capital of the Island destroyed, and the whole island damaged; that of May, 1842, at Cape Haytien, in Hayti, which destroyed nearly two-thirds of the town with from 4,000 to 5,000 of its inhabitants; that at Guadaloupe in Febuary, 1843, resulted in the entire destruction of Point-a-Pitre and lastly, besides several inferior ones, that with which the island of St. Thomas, and other parts of the West Indies, were visited in October of last year, causing the loss of property valued at several millions of dollars. The St. Thomas catastrophe was followed in the early part of this year, by the earthquake in the Sandwich Islands.

What a comment is all this upon the instability and uncertainty of that which is the very foundation of all man's dependence for this life; that to which he points as the essence and illustration of all that is stable and true—mother earth. How unreal is even his "real" estate. But a little ways beneath our feet struggle the elemental forces which thus show their readiness and give a hint of their power to whelm the earth in one universal catastrophe. Who, then, is ready for the new heaven and the new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness.—Am. Presb.

MATTHEW slightly records his own conversion, and in modest terms, "he arose and followed Jesus;" but Luke generally adds (chap. 5), "he left all and followed him." Matthew and Levi are the same person. Luke relates only the hospitality of Matthew; but Matthew describes only the sinners which made up his society, previous to his conversion. The soul that has heard and obeyed the Saviour's call will not speak lightly of its own sin, nor delight in dwelling upon the sins of others.—Quesnel.

JEFFERSON'S OPINION OF WAR.—Never was so much false arithmetic employed on any subject, as that which has been employed to persuade nations that it is their interest to go to war. Were the money which it has cost to gain, at the close of a long war, a little town, or a little territory, the right to cut wood here, or to catch fish there, expended in improving what they already possess, in making roads, opening rivers, building ports, improving the arts, and finding employment for their idle poor, it would render them stronger, much wealthier and happier. This I hope will be our wisdom.—Jefferson's Virginian, page 250.

CURE FOR NEURALGIA.—Some time since we published, at the request of a friend, a receipt to cure neuralgia. Half a drachm of sal ammonia, in an ounce of camphor water, to be taken a tea-spoonful at a dose, and the dose to be repeated several times, at intervals of five minutes, if the pain be not relieved at once. Half-a-dozen different persons have since tried the receipt, and in every case an immediate cure was effected. In one, the sufferer, a lady, had been affected for more than a week, and her physician was unable to alleviate her sufferings, when a solution of sal ammonia in camphor water relieved her in a few minutes.—Alta California.

THE WISE MAN'S COUNSEL.

BY MRS. L. H. SIGOURNEY.

"Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might."—KING SOLOMON.

Do what thou hast to do,
  While thou hast eyes to see,
While yet thine ears can hear the word
  That wisdom speaks to thee;
While thou hast power to walk,
  While thou hast voice to pray,
While thou hast reason's guiding lamp
  To understand thy way.

Do what thou hast to do,
  And not to others leave;
They may thy wishes overrule,
  Thy motives misconceive,
Thy purposes contest,
  Thy plans with coldness view—
Now, while the life-tide warms thy breast,
  Do what thou hast to do.

Do what thou hast to do,
  Before the night of gloom,
That swiftly wraps the sons of men
  In darkness and the tomb;
For though thy feet may tread
  On blossoms bright with dew—
Behold! the grave is for thee spread—
  Do what thou hast to do.

Children's Department.

A NARROW ESCAPE.

BY MRS. H. L. HASTINGS.

MANY of the dear little children have asked me to write them a story; and so I will tell them about how God hears and answers the prayers of little children, as well as older persons.

Some may think that children are too small or too poor to be noticed by the great God. But that God has sent his dearly beloved Son into this wicked world to save little children. And when Christ was on earth he called the little ones to his arms and blessed them;—not the good children or the rich children only, but just such children as we see about us every day, roguish, and wild, and sometimes disobedient; yet Jesus loves them all.

How blessed it is to think that Jesus loves us, and hears us when we pray. We may be in trouble sometimes, and be blamed for something wrong which we have thoughtlessly or carelessly done; and we may be tempted to deceive to escape reproof; but Jesus knows all about it, and if we carry it to him in prayer, he will work it all out for our good. Have we done wrong? Let us tell Jesus about it, and he will give us strength to confess the truth, and will protect us from all harm.

Now I will relate what the Lord did for me once, when I was a little girl six years old. If my little readers will look upon the map of Vermont, a little north-west of Montpelier, they will see a river called the Winooski, or Onion River, which runs to the north-west, and empties into Lake Champlain. On the south side of this river, in the town of B., stood the little brown cottage where I spent my childish days with my widowed mother, who sought to guide me in the fear of God.

The banks of this river were my favorite resort; here I used to watch the little speckled trout and other fishes, sometimes catching the little fish in my hands, and at other times dipping my bare feet in the water, picking up shells and pebbles, and making cakes of mud, and doing as all children do who have a chance to play by the water-side.

My faithful mother used to watch over me with an anxious eye, and often cautioned me to be careful about the water, lest I should fall into the stream and so be drowned. But one day when I was playing on the shore, picking up the pebbles and skipping them along the water, two of my brothers, who were much older and larger than I, came along where I was, and, wading the river at a shallow place, crossed in safety to the other shore. Then they climbed up the hillside and were soon out of sight, and I was left alone.

Now you all know that little girls do not like to have their big brothers run away and leave them alone, so I cried some, and all the more because I knew that over on the other side there was a hill where checkerberries were plenty, and where the children often went to gather them. I knew too, it was time for the berries to be red and ripe, and I supposed my brothers had gone to pick some; and the more I thought about it, the more I wanted to go there, too.

And now came the temptation. I reasoned with myself, if my brothers could wade across the river safely, I could do the same; and so, forgetting the warnings of my kind mother, I ventured out into the stream. I did not fear any danger, and walked boldly on. The water rose higher and higher about me, as step after step brought me nearer to the strongest part of the current in the middle of the stream. By this time the water was up to my waist, but I thought I could cross over if it did not cover my mouth. But when the water came up to my shoulders my little heart began to flutter with fear, and then I remembered what my mother had told me about the danger of being drowned, and I tried to turn back to the shore, but found the current was too strong for me to go either backward or forward.

Distressed and frightened, I began to call, "Mother! mother!" but mother was out of hearing, and no one else was near to rescue me from the waves. Then I remembered what my mother had previously told me, that "God would hear the sinner's prayer," and I lifted my heart and voice, crying, "Oh, God! save me! Oh, God! save me, and I'll never do so again!" But just as I began to pray, my feet slipped from beneath me, and away I went, swept by the swift current, lying on my back, and the waters dashing over my head at times, though I managed to keep my face mostly above water.

A few rods below me, a large, high rock jutted out into the bed of the stream, forming a kind of promontory, above which the current swept round in a dark and deep eddy. I had often sat upon this rock and watched the foam upon the dark waters, and had seen shrubs and flowers and leaves, and sometimes dead animals, floating upon its surface, beneath the solemn shadow of a huge overhanging elm, which was covered by a large grapevine. I had always feared this dark and shadowy place, and now the current was hurrying me swiftly toward its depths, and I had no power to escape.

Well, "in my distress I cried unto the Lord," and besought him to have mercy upon me, and to save me. But still the stream bore me on—quicker than I can tell the tale the strong current shot past the corner of the rocky promontory, and the eddy was behind me, and the current was yet carrying me on. I still prayed the Lord to save me, and when a little further down, the stream swept me back toward the shore from which I started, and carried me under some overhanging willows which skirted the river bank, and whose bending branches brushed against my face. Wasn't I glad to see them? And didn't I stretch up my little hands to grasp them? and didn't I cling to them for dear life? Holding to those branches, I soon drew myself on shore, and ran home, glad that I had escaped from death, but trembling with the fear of a whipping, which I knew that I deserved, and expected that I should surely receive.

At first I thought I would tell my mother that I had accidentally fallen into the water, and wet my clothes; but I remembered how the Lord had saved me, and did not dare to tell a wicked lie. So I concluded to own the truth, and as I remembered how God had heard my prayer in the water, and delivered me from death, I prayed that he would keep my mother from whipping me when she heard the story of my fault.

Being afraid to go in with my wet clothes on me, I crawled in at my little bedroom window, and got some dry clothes, which I put on, and then hung my wet ones out to dry. I thought at first I would wait for my clothes to dry, but I feared it would take too long, and so I prayed about it, and concluded to go at once and tell mother the whole truth. So I went up stairs, where my mother sat weaving at the old loom.

"What have you got those clothes on for?" said mother.

"Because I have been a naughty girl."

"What have you been doing?" said she.

"The boys have gone over the river to pick checkerberries," said I, "and I wanted to go with them, and I fell into the river. I am sorry, and I will never do so again," said I, bursting into tears.

My mother looked surprised and frightened, and said, "Oh, what a naughty girl! How did you dare disobey me? Now you have come very near being drowned, just because you disobeyed your mother. You deserve a good whipping for this, and if I wasn't in such a hurry to get out this web of cloth to-night, you would get it. But if you ever do so again, you won't escape."

I turned away, and tripped down stairs with a light heart, forgetting all my troubles, and believing that the Lord had heard my prayer, and had helped me be honest and tell the truth, and had kept my mother from whipping me. And this is the end of my story.—The Christian.

MISAPPREHENSION AND MISCONSTRUCTION.

THESE often cause labor, and not rarely disagreement and unpleasantness; and they rise from various causes. Oft from prejudice and jealousy, and not unfrequently from a lack of carefully noticing the language written, and perhaps as oft from the want of so clothing our ideas in such language as will be unmistakable. To the latter, perhaps, I ought to plead measurably guilty in my article upon the question of Adam's mortal or immortal condition, published in the HERALD OF LIFE of Aug. 26th, to which Br. Storrs kindly responded, thinking that I was laboring under a difficulty from the idea that God's work of creation must be as perfect as an all-wise and almighty being could make it, before he could with propriety pronounce it "very good."

In this matter, I think I am not in a difficulty. I think it easily seen that I used the term perfect in reference to his physical condition as being free from all contaminating, corrupting, dying elements, in himself, before he sinned, and in which state there was no conflict in his physical condition with the life principle or element; thus he was perfectly adapted to the condition in which he was placed to live, and having life would live on until that harmony was broken by sin; when as a consequence, corruption, wasting, dying and death ensued.

Again. It appears to me that the idea of unlimited perfection, which would have placed man beyond the possibility of progression or retrogression is precluded by my admission that Adam was made a subject of law, and placed on trial or probation, which always supposes a better and advanced state obtainable; and when, for many years past, it has been asked, Why did not God, seeing the consequence of sin, create man in a condition in which he could not sin? my arguments have, invariably been, that God, as a wise and just being could not have made him otherwise than a subject of law, when he could develop moral character and receive reward or punishment; otherwise he would be a mere machine in the hand of his Creator.

These things I have written not particularly for the instruction of others, but that my view of those things might be correctly understood; not that I lay great weight upon them, but consider it all important that we walk humbly with God, having clean hands and a pure heart, as our highest privilege and duty; enjoying that peace which is like a river, flowing from the witness of our acceptance and harmony with God, which I have enjoyed in an increased measure since listening to several most excellent practical discourses at our late camp-meeting at Springfield. May the Lord help us all, as his dear children, to improve until we arrive unto the stature of a perfect man in Christ Jesus. Amen. Your Br., loving the appearing, and expecting redemption through Jesus.

FROM THOMAS McCLARY.

WILMINGTON, DEL., Sept. 14, 1868.

BR. STORRS: Enclosed find $57; $50 of which is to redeem my pledge to sustain the HERALD OF LIFE for the coming year; $2 is to renew my subscription for the paper, and $5 for the tract fund. You have my prayer for the Divine blessing to rest upon you; to give you all of that wisdom which is so profitable to direct your efforts to the accomplishment of the greatest possible good. You have been and are still a pioneer in promulgating the precious truths of life only in Christ. Many have been led to see and embrace this coming doctrine through your efforts; but yet many, very many, are cherishing the terrible delusion of inherent immortality. This most awful of lies of the old serpent, "Thou shalt not surely die," is deluding multitudes to their destruction. Of all the people in the world, we who believe in a future life for the righteous only, should be (and I believe, judging from my own experience), are the happiest. Our God is Love; and armed with this most powerful of weapons, we can present the Giver of eternal life for the acceptance of mankind, reasoning from the Scriptures of divine truth. How good and precious it is that we can bring our God-given reasoning faculties to bear on this whole subject. Yes, truly from the Garden of Eden until the Kingdom is set up in the new earth, goodness and mercy have followed the children of men all the days of their lives. We are constantly beset with enemies from without and within; even we who have so much light and may perish by not giving heed to the holy Scriptures. May we as brethren and sisters of the same precious faith earnestly contend for the faith once delivered to the saints; loving and cherishing those things which will be pleasing to the Master. If we have ten talents, or less, may we have grace to consecrate them to His service. If wealth, let us give cheerfully as God has prospered us. If we have nothing to offer but ourselves (and that will be the most acceptable gift) let us lay ourselves on the altar; He will accept the gift. Soon the King will say, Come ye blessed of my father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the World. Your brother in Christ.

FROM F. WINANS.

CHICAGO, ILL., Sept. 14, 1868.

BR. STORRS: It is some time since you have heard from me. The aged gentleman I spoke of in a former article, has been around again, and preached on the subject of redemption by Christ. He takes the same view that we do, who believe in life only in Jesus, and that literal death is the doom of impenitent sinners; but says that all who die in sin must be resurrected and die again; and this is what constitutes the second death spoken of by John the Revelator. If so, how much worse off are the children than our first parents, of whom it is written, Gen. iii. 17, "And unto Adam he said, because thou hast done this, and harkened to the voice of thy wife and hast eaten of the tree of which I commanded, saying, thou shalt not eat of it, cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life. Thorns, also, and thistles shall it bring forth to thee, and thou shalt eat the herb of the field. In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken; dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return."

This is the condition to which the whole progeny would have been reduced, had it not been for the provision made in Christ, the second Adam. Now, who ought to believe that those who neglect or refuse the remedy should have any of its benefits, of which redemption from death is one?

I must set down this person, before mentioned, as nearly converted: at any rate, he is unconciously helping the cause. When he attempts anything else, he only shows his weak spots, and is found beating the air. He tried to prop up the poor old tottering Dagon by putting all the infants in the category; also, idiots of what we term wicked. The infants he puts as half the race.

But it won't save the darling. All that "sleep in Jesus, will God bring with him." Some of the infants, we have evidence from the holy Scriptures, will come from the land of the enemy; viz., those that were slain by the order of Herod to make a victim of the holy Child Jesus; but no such opiate for the wicked; "they shall never see life; but the wrath of God abideth on them." They are "taken away with a stroke, and a great ransom shall not deliver them." They are "suddenly destroyed, and that without remedy." The remnant of the tares, by the Saviour's definition, Matth. xiii., that will stand in the way, will be gathered in bundles and burned. He shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all that offend, and them that do iniquity. Mind it don't say, them that did iniquity and are already dead; but them that do. And what shall be done with them? Cast into the furnace of fire. To die two deaths? O, no. To receive the penalty of transgression, which is death.

Paul's Second Epistle to the Thessalonians, and Malachi's burning day harmonize with the same, and has reference to those that shall be in the way, and disobeying the gospel at the revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ from heaven. So there is no wicked person threatened with two deaths, any more than Adam the first.

The words second death, found in the Book of Symbols, will be found to mean no such thing as is foisted upon them; but are susceptible of explanation in such manner as to harmonize with the general tenor of the Scriptures.

If you can bear with me a little longer, I want to bring forward two passages of Scripture which will prove universal salvation, if a universal resurrection is found in them. Isa. xxvi., 19. "Thy dead men shall live; together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust: for thy dew is as the dew of herbs; and the earth shall cast out the dead.

Observe, all that awake and arise, sing Next, Rev. v., begin at verse 9. "And they sang a new song saying, Thou art worthy to take the book and to open the seals thereof; for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation; and hast made us unto our God kings and priests, and we shall reign on the earth. And I beheld, and I heard the voice of many angels round about the throne, and the beasts, and the elders, and the number of them was ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands; saying with a loud voice, Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honor, and glory, and blessing. And every creature which is in heaven, and on earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, Blessing, honor, glory and power be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever."

Here, as in the other passage, after going over and through every place where a soul could be found to be redeemed from, if it includes every person that ever lived, universal salvation is inevitable. A universal resurrection draws after it universal happiness, or salvation.

FROM C. R. AND O. A. PERCY.

SOUTH NORWALK, CONN., Sept. 12, 1868.

BR. STORRS: and to the dear readers of the HERALD OF LIFE: Again we are permitted to write a few lines for the much prized paper. We would say for the dear ones, we arrived home safe from Springfield, Mass.; and felt to say with Paul, that we thanked God and took courage. Our God is with us, and a present help. When you think how kindly and mysteriously the way was opened for us to attend the meeting, and how precious the season was, with the dear ones from different parts, and the pleasant acquaintances we were permitted to form with many whose writings we had long read, and there met face to face, and the sweet spirit there manifested in our conference and prayer meetings, and of hearing the word made so plain, that our God is a God of love; why dear ones, we think we can hear all of you sing, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow." And we must now consider by all these privileges we must profit, not only ourselves, but others. Most of us are now at our homes again; and old and new trials may come. Now let us let our lights shine. We cannot grow in knowledge and grace, and in the love of God except we are active. Each has a work to do; in every place in life can be found something still to do and bear. Not one of us can say, we can do no good. If we are His, and are in the Vine, and drawing nourishment therefrom day by day, we must grow; and the world will see us thrive; and we will exert an influence that will tell for God. O the strength and depth of love to God and our fellow beings. Yes, how strong we may feel when in perfect confidence we come to our Father and ask for the things we most need; and to feel our feet on the rock of truth. Nothing can harm us. Sickness, sorrow, and even death itself cannot move us if Jesus, only Jesus, is near. Darkness may shut her clouds down, and the storm may rage against our frail barks, yet if a Father's hand is leading us, amen to all, Light will come in the morning; and thanks be to our God for this refuge. Do let each one of us be faithful to our God and his truth, that we may never bring any more reproach on his blessed cause, and that we may be found on the watch when he cometh, is the prayer of your unworthy brother and sister.

BR. STORRS: Two weeks ago this morning the camp-meeting was broken up, and while others went each to his home, I remained to visit for a time the flock in Springfield. It is good once more to be with those who were well known in past years, and to find that they are walking in truth.

Yesterday forenoon I went to hear Br. Scott, who, though he holds our views of Life only through Christ, is still in the Methodist church. His text was from the words of the Master—"And why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?" He said that Jesus always announced himself a Dictator. He was one, and had the right. He had no confidence in blind obedience or blind worship. We have the word of God, and that is the only standard. Other standards he put in the balance, but pronounced them wanting whenever they conflicted with the one infallible standard. Br. Scott is an independent, original preacher, and, like Paul, will cause friction wherever he goes. His preaching hits.

Br. Burbank is here at present, to remain over two Sundays, and preach evenings during the week. I went to hear him in the afternoon. Text John iii., 16. "God so loved the world," etc. We were all edified and comforted. In the evening we had a prayer and conference meeting in the vestry. The room, though quite large, was full, and we had a most interesting meeting. Forty-five spoke, and gave in blessed experiences. Of these, the larger portion are young people, who have lately given themselves to the Lord. I have not been in just such a meeting for a long time, and it was truly soul-cheering. Some of these young people are untiring in their efforts to bring in others, and the Lord is blessing their labors. There are tokens of a great reviving. O Lord, bless thy truth!

Some one may ask, Are they all Life believers? No; we cannot expect so much as that; but many of them are, and we pray that they may have wisdom so to present this crowning doctrine and life-giving portion, that others shall be drawn to it.

Br. Chas. A. Hastings has a Bible class in the Sunday school which is doing its work. Of course there is strong opposition on the part of some; but we all well know that is no bad omen. Amen.

The coming of our precious Lord and Master draweth nigh. Therefore, let us not sleep as do others, but let us watch and be sober, and faithfully announce the truths we are peculiarly in possession of to a dying world.

SIFTED WHEAT.

GOTTHOLD one day looked on while a farmer's wheat was being threshed, and observed that the men not only stoutly beat it, but trod upon it with their feet; and finally, by various experiments, separated the good grain from the chaff, dust, and other impurities. How comes it, he asked, that whatever is of a useful nature, and intended to be profitable to the world, must suffer much, and be subject to every kind of treatment; but that man who himself does with other things as he lists, is unwilling to suffer, or to permit God to deal as he lists with him? Wheat, which is the noblest of all products of the earth, is here threshed, trod upon, swept to and fro, tossed into the air, sifted, shaken, and shovelled and afterward ground, resifted and baked, and so arrives at last upon the tables of princes and kings. What then, do I mean in being displeased with God, because he does not strew my path with rose leaves or translate me to heaven in an easy chair? By what other process could wheat be cleansed? And how could I be sanctified or saved, were I to remain a stranger to the cross and to affliction?

SHABBY CLOTHES.

WHEN John Tillotson was dean of Canterbury, a remarkable scene took place in the hall of that worthy man's residence. From some cause or other the dean's father had not risen out of his country obscurity by his son's elevation; so, visiting the dean in London, he presented himself in his usual dress of a simple countryman.

"Is John Tillotson at home?" he asked, on the door being opened, after a single knock, by one of the dean's servants.

"John Tillotson!" growled out the servant, "and don't you know better manners? The dean is at home, but not to see the like of you; so you had better be off."

"But he'll see me," replied the father, coolly, "for all you can say."

And Mr. Tillotson was right; for after the servant had dealt out a good deal of insult, which he thought very appropriate to a man shabbily dressed, another servant went in to the dean and told him what was taking place at the hall door.

"It is my worthy father," exclaimed the dean, after hearing the description of the strange visitor.

And then, instead of being ashamed to acknowledge his relation to one so meanly clad, ran out to the door, and fell down on his knees, in the presence of his servants, to ask his father's blessing.

THE story is told of a young minister, not unknown to fame, that he was one morning walking to church with some friends, when they fell in with an old colored man, who assured them that he had rejoiced in a Christian hope for upward of fifty years. "Are you going to this church?" It was the only church in the village. "No, sah—I neber go to that church." "You never go to church, and yet you have been a Christian these fifty years?" "No, sah—I neber go to hear them young ministers practize—I's a preacher myself—I is."

HOW SHALL THE BED BE PLACED.—The late Dr. Julius Von dem Fischweiler, of Magdeburg, asserts in his will that his age, 109, is entirely to be ascribed to the constant habit of sleeping with his head toward the north. Persons who find themselves restless and unable to sleep at night, would do well to adopt this plan, as it is undoubtedly a great conducive to health.

BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

ON all books and pamphlets sent by mail, the postage has to be pre-paid.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the LIFE-GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

This work has been out of print for some months, but is now re-printed.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the true teachings of the BIBLE is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage, 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.

No. 1. EARTH, NOT HEAVEN, is to be the inheritance of the saints. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS. Price 5 cents.

No. 4. THE SOUL SAVED OR LOST. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS. Price 5 cents.

No. 5. MORAL DEPRAVITY; by GEO. STORRS. Price 5 cents.

No. 7. DOOM OF THE UNGODLY: or, THE WICKED DEAD REMAIN ETERNALLY UNDER DEATH'S DOMINION. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS. Price 5 cents.

No. 8. THE WAGES OF SIN: by a Presbyterian Clergyman. Price, 5 cents.

No. 10. LETTERS TO A CLERGYMAN; or, Life only through Christ, not a heresy; by Dr. J. K. FINLEY, Pittsburg, Pa. Price, 5 cents.

The foregoing tracts are the Bible Examiner size i. e., octavo; and are 16 pages each. Price, 5 cents single. Four of either can be sent for 2 cents postage; where that number is called for, we will send them at our own expense. They will be sold at $3 per 100; but in that case, sent at the expense of the purchaser. One dozen of the foregoing will be sent for 50 cents, and we will pay the postage.

No. 9. THE ESSENTIAL BAPTISM; by the EDITOR of the Bible Examiner, 32 pages. Price, 7 cents.

MAN'S NATURE AND DESTINY; or, the Animal man and the Spiritual man. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS. Price, 5 cents.

THE ATONEMENT, by GEO. STORRS, and THE GOSPEL HOPE, by the same; both works now printed in one Tract. Price, 5 cents.

All letters in relation to any of these works must be addressed,

"GOD IS LOVE."

A SERMON BY THE EDITOR.

IN all our investigations of religious truth, or inquiries after it, it is essential that we have some central and undoubted truth to be our polar star, or a light that shall control all our movements in our investigations. Without this, our course will be clouded, and we can arrive at no certain conclusions on which to rest with an undoubting faith, feeling we are on that foundation which is immovable. Happy for us, revelation has given the needed solar light, which lights up the whole system of revealed religion, and is the polar star, by which we may always determine with certainty our course. That light, that guiding star, is the grand truth,

"GOD IS LOVE." 1 John iv., 8, 16.

Here is certainty: here there is no ground for doubt; and here there must be no doubt: to doubt is to peril all. If this grand truth is questioned, or held as if it were possible to be untrue, we are liable to wreck at every step in our investigations in relation to the government of God over the creatures he has made; nor can we be certain that any of our conclusions in these matters are correct.

The first great business, then, of all teachers of religion, is to fix this truth in the minds of men so that it shall be undoubted and unquestioned. Till this is done, little or nothing can be accomplished in leading them "to serve the living and true God, and to wait for his Son from heaven." 1 Thess. i., 9, 10.

The grand chart, then, by which we are to make our voyage in search of truth, and by which every other view, claiming to be truth, is to be tested, and its real character decided, is this solar truth, "GOD IS LOVE." Any system or theory that will not harmonize with this, and does not revolve around this as its controlling power, we may rest assured is not of God. However plausible it may appear, even though it may resemble an angel of light; however much it claims to be a revelation from God, if it has not on it, in blazing brightness, "GOD IS LOVE," it is a deceitful light, an ignis fatuus—a false and bewildering phantom which has originated in some diseased human brain, which has yet to learn the true guide into all truth.

The beloved disciple who leaned his head on his Master's bosom at the last supper, and who, of all others, drank deeply into his Master's spirit, understood this grand theme and manifested its spirit in all he said and wrote. Love was with him the all-absorbing thought. It was his sun, his guiding star to determine his own relation to God and that of all others. How clearly does he set forth the subject in the chapter before us: "Beloved, let us love one another, for love is of God [flows from him as its fountain;] and every one that loveth is born [begotten] of God [hath received of his spirit of love, verse 13], and knoweth God; [is a partaker of the divine nature]. He that loveth not, knoweth not God, for God is love . . . . Hereby know we that we dwell in him, and he in us, because he hath given us of his spirit; [his spirit of love. Like as God is love, so we, in our measure, are love; and by this we know that we are of God.] And we have known and believed the love that God hath to us. God is love; and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him," etc.

In these statements of John, the great chart is spread out before us which is to guide us in all things doctrinal, experimental, and practical. Anything which fails of conformity with this grand theme, whether in doctrine, experience or practice, is not of God, and is to be rejected from our religious system.

But can this view be reconciled with God's government of the world? Not by the schemes generally held, and which are misnamed "orthodox," and to which we are called upon to do homage; but by the Bible interpreted strictly in view of this solar truth all is harmony, and God's whole administration is seen to be but the outgoing of love to all the subjects of his government. To make this statement plain to every unbiased mind, let us contemplate the dealings of God with men from the beginning of the world.

When God created man, he fitted up for him a garden of delights—everything that was good for food and pleasant to the eye; nothing is lacking to constitute his state one of pleasure and joy. This was love's installation of man in life's joys. But man was only an animal being at present, though superior to all other animals, appointed as their lord, and designed by love for a higher sphere, or to have superadded a spiritual nature, capable of a more intimate union and communion with his CREATOR.

That this advancement into an endowment of a spiritual nature, which should constitute him undying, and thus, Godlike, should not become an evil, love was careful so to order that it could not possibly become a curse instead of a blessing; or, in other words, love guards against the possibility of endless suffering.

To settle this point love tests the man as to whether he will develop a mind in harmony with the divine mind, or a mind in perfect subjection to the will of his CREATOR. Such a development was essential to man's safety and happiness, if he is to pass into a spiritual and immortal, or undying state. For to let him pass into such a state without a voluntary subjection to, or harmony with the divine will, would be to make him an immortal sinner, and consequently eternally miserable, because eternally out of harmony with a superior power.

Hence before endowing man with a spiritual and immortal nature, the love of God appointed a trial for him; and love decided that if the development should prove unharmonious with his CREATOR, the man should return to the dust from whence he was taken. Thus, not only the trial itself was an act of love, but the appointment of death in case of failure was also an act of love—it was the best thing that could be done for one whose will developed itself in opposition to the will of God his Maker.

Death itself, then, is seen to be an administrative act prompted by love as a preventive of continued sin and misery. Love could never allow a being to come into existence, or remain in existence when his sorrows and sufferings, on the whole, would outweigh his joys and pleasures. Love made such an event impossible. It could not be otherwise and God be love; but "GOD IS LOVE," and that made it certain that whatever should be the final result of man's trial, his existence, while it continued, should have joys and pleasures far outweighing all his pains and woes. That such is the fact in this life, no sane mind will dispute: hence, all men love life, and wish to protract it as long as possible, notwithstanding its infelicities.

If such are the facts in the present state, it is not possible for love to appoint for sensitive beings a state of unmitigated or hopeless suffering; and the idea is an impeachment of the Divine character and administration. Love, then, we see, at the outset provided against a life, whether long or short, made up of hopeless sufferings; no attribute of the divine Being, who is LOVE, could allow such a result; even justice, of which some religionists talk so much, could never override love to produce such a result. Hopeless torture in a future life, then, is an impossibility; it can no more take place than God can cease to be God.

We have said that death itself is the appointment of love. This is true in regard to all the incorrigibly wicked. After love has exhausted all the means consistent to be used with reasonable creatures and their freedom of will, if they continue to resist the efforts of love, and persist in hostility to the divine will, a continued life must be plunging them deeper and deeper in unhappiness till life itself would become a source of living torment, not unlike the fancied theological hell. Hence love appoints death to end their wretched existence before they reach that horrid condition. How boundless the love that thus ends their mad career in sin and self-torments.

These remarks are applicable to such cases as that of Sodom and Gomorrah; also, of the old world destroyed by the flood. Wickedness in these cases had attained that maturity that their state was hopeless for the better, and love cuts them off to make an end of it, and as a warning to others not to live ungodly.

Love appoints death, also, for the righteous, that they may rest a while till the time appointed of the Father for their glorification. This life, while it has its joys for the righteous, the chief of which is the blessed hope of the future and eternal weight of glory, has continued trials also for them. Their own personal conflicts with evil in themselves, and the sufferings often experienced in this quarter, is one source of their affliction. The trial by the wickedness of others, either from persecutions in some form, or from the general disregard of God and his authority, and the oppression of the poor and needy, whose sighs come up into the ears of God like the sighs of the Israelites in Egypt, is another cause of sorrow and trial to the good, and often their righteous souls are vexed—distressed—by the unlawful deeds of those by whom they are surrounded, and among whom they are obliged to dwell. After enduring these things till they are fitted to reign on the earth with Christ in his glory, love appoints them to rest, or sleep in the dust of the earth till the fulness of time shall come for their glorification. It would not have been love to continue them in life's trials to the time appointed of the Father for the earth, their inheritance, to be renewed. Think of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and other ancient worthies, being continued in this trial state for thousands of years; then ask yourself if it was not an appointment of love that they rest in the sleep of death till the time for the consummation of their hopes should arrive, and thus the intervening space be, to them, annihilated; and the moment of their closing their eyes in death be to them the moment of their glorification, together with the whole family of the redeemed? A right conception of these things makes the great fact "GOD IS LOVE," stand out in amazing glory, and should cause us to magnify his wisdom, power and love altogether.

But the most amazing development or manifestation of the grand truth that "God is love" is found in the wonderful fact that he sent his Son into the world to rescue us from the death state to which we all were hastening, and from which we were powerless to deliver ourselves. The statement of this great fact is thus announced by the Son of God himself: "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

Here, in one verse, is summed up the state of man without divine intervention, viz., going out of life, perishing, returning to the dust, without power to survive in death, or revive from it; hopelessly lost to life, of himself. In this state, God's love made its most wonderful manifestation. It put forward the highest loved One of the Infinite, and subjected him to humiliation such as earth never saw; to reproach such as no mere human being could think of voluntarily submitting to; to sufferings such as no man can fully estimate; and to death in a most horrid and revolting form; all in love to dying men, and to open a way for their deliverance from sin, and "death, the wages of sin." Why this great and marvellous undertaking? Because "GOD IS LOVE," and he "so loved the world"—the whole race of men; not a soul of the human family was left outside of this range of the love of God. But this love, in order to avail in rescuing men from death, from perishing, must be met by love in return; or, faith in God's love, and a reliance upon the Son of God's love for the needed deliverance from death, wherever Christ is proclaimed. Without this return of love and confidence, or faith, on man's part, man fails of a rescue from death, and "remains in the congregation of the dead;" there is no deliverance for him; he has rejected the only provision love has provided, and confirms himself as a victim of death and its eternal empire or dominion.

Love makes not the sinner's condition worse for this manifestation of God to the world in the person of his Son. Men were going out of life hopelessly, but for this love. Love gives them a chance to recover from death on easy terms; and those terms slighted or refused, love leaves them where it found them, and excludes them wholly from any part in the resurrection power; thereby putting an everlasting end to their being, sins, and suffering; thus demonstrating the grand truth, "God is Love."

It may be thought that we leave justice out of sight. But this is a mistake. God is just, and hence the Justifier of him that believeth. "He that believeth not is condemned already;" he has not to wait for some future period for an announcement of his condemnation, though the executive judgment will demonstrate to all that God's love was slighted by the sinner, and that love now leaves him in death, as the only disposal it can make of him; and justice has no demand on the sinner that is not fully met by his being left in death's dominion. If he is to live again from death, it must be because love demands it, and not from any claim of justice. If the love of God calls the sinner again into life, then let him come; for such a life cannot be a hopeless one. The fact of life restored is evidence that love has mercy still in store. It is impossible that love can give life from the dead for the purpose of hopeless suffering and to return the sinner into the same state from which he had been called, viz., death.

Thus, then, "God is love;" and that makes it impossible that any human being, once dead, can be restored from death, except in a state of hope. Any other view strikes down and gives the lie to the grand leading truth of God's governmental administration, that he is love. Any other view shocks the reason God has endowed man with, and is a libel on God's government, and its natural tendency is to lead men to reject a revelation which they are taught has made "death the wages of sin," and yet revives dead men to hopeless sufferings and another extinction of life, thus forced on them, or endless torture.

From such thoughts we turn to the fact, God has provided for the perishing children of men an inheritance where no sorrow, no pain, no want, no death can ever disturb their peace or interrupt their joy, or in the slightest degree invade or mar their pleasure. All this because "God is love;" and all this is a free gift of his love to those who have sinned against him, but who, by the manifestation of his love, have been won from the ways of sin to give love for love; for "We love him because he first loved us;" and "Herein is love, not that we [first] loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins." "In this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent his only begotten Son into the world that we might live through him." See 1 John iv., 9, 10, and 19.

This love gives eternal life; a life to run parallel, in the future, with the life of God himself; endlessly increasing in new joys and glories, as shoreless as eternity itself. Then will the redeemed ones be ever exploring the depth and breadth of the grand truth, "God is love," and still be shouting, "O the depth of the wisdom and love of God." And as eternity rolls on, and they take new soundings in the shoreless sea of God's love, still they cry, "O the depths!" And as wave after wave of love rolls over them, and bathes their whole being with its comforting power, how will they exultingly cry out, "Unto him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power that worketh in us; unto him be glory by Christ Jesus throughout the endless succession of ages." Macknight's translation of Eph. iii., 21.

When the bliss of that immortal state shall exceed all that thought can reach, the grand chorus will still, everywhere in God's vast universe, be echoing and re-echoing, "GOD IS LOVE." Yes, "every creature in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them," will join in the harmonious and triumphant song, "GOD IS LOVE." See Rev. v., 11–14.

"They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat; for the LAMB which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them to living fountains of waters; and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes." and all this because "GOD IS LOVE."

What can we say more? This love, O, man, O, woman, young or old, calls after thee from reason's dawn to the day of life's close, saying, "Why will you die?" Will you not hear this voice of love? We know you have been born and educated under a human theology that has sought to arouse you by horrible representations of God's designs toward you, till your heart has become so hardened that, insensibly, you have come to regard God's service as only an awful necessity, and to be entered upon only to escape a horrible state of endless torture, which you have been taught God has prepared for his enemies. Such representations have so blinded your minds that when we approach you with the grand message of this discourse, we seem to you "as one that mocketh!" Such a message begins to take hold of your heart, but the prejudice of your education makes you fear we are but deceiving you; and your old teachers cry out, "Infidelity;" so that though you are almost disposed to yield to love's power, you start back with fear lest you should believe too much, and thus be wrecked.

Well, if love cannot win you, what will? The dread of the theological hell may sometimes alarm, but you know it never kindled love in thy heart. It has made many hypocrites, professing to love God so that they may escape the hell of torments, but it never did and never can produce the genuine principle of love. We do not say that none who believe the doctrine of future and hopeless torture, or eternal torments, do not love God; but we do say, those views never produced love in the heart of man, and never can. It is only when the mind turns away from such views to contemplate the love of God in Christ that love arises in the sinner's heart.

We ask you, as a perishing creature, to turn your eyes at once to the grand truth of our text, "God is love." Let no other thoughts intrude till this is so established in thy heart that sin will be hateful in thy sight, and you find yourself cleaving to the fountain of love, and all thy sins will vanish away before the rising stream of that love which shall flow through thy entire being, and you will find yourself a new creature in Christ Jesus, whom God in his love gave unto thee, O sinner, to bear away thy sins, and to anoint you with the Holy Spirit of promise, which shall shed abroad the love of God in thy heart in such heavenly measure as shall make the yoke of Christ easy and his burden light. All this, because "GOD IS LOVE."

BR. STORRS: After a long time of silence, I take my pen to write a few lines for our paper. More than two years have passed away since I was convinced that the righteous alone would have a resurrection from the dead, and this day finds me of "the same opinion still." Now that my mission work in Philadelphia is closed, I have more opportunities for reading, study, and thought upon this and other Bible truths, and the way will be opened for me to proclaim these views to those who desire to hear them. I hope to labor to some extent in new fields. The opposition to the truth that "none but the children of God will be the children of the resurrection," is very strong in many places. I have often heard of "the harsh spirit of non-resurrectionists," but I find that the greater part of this harshness is now on the other side. May the Lord incline them to be gentle and kind.

Changes have occurred in the views of our opponents, and to my mind the most of them are very far removed from the Scriptures. For instance: our opponents to some extent hold that the righteous and wicked will come out of their graves as they went down into them, i. e., mortal. The promulgation of our view seems to have driven them to this "wall." Formerly they held that the righteous would come up immortal: but that position would prove that all the world had been judged beforehand, and it precluded the necessity of the resurrection of the wicked. To avoid so evident a conclusion, resort was made to the strange theory of the mortal resurrection of both classes, and that resurrection a simultaneous one.

Others hold to the distinct resurrection of each class, some believing that there will be an interval of a thousand years between the two, while others think there will be but a brief interval; it may be a minute or an hour. But here the difficulty is as great as at first: for, if the righteous come out by themselves in a body, and the wicked come out in a body one minute afterward, it proves that judgment has already passed, else why raise the righteous out from the wicked?

But the simultaneous mortal-resurrection theory is gaining ground. To my mind there are a multitude of insurmountable obstacles in the way of embracing this view, which I may present at some future day for the consideration of our friends.

May the Lord bless and sustain you in battling with the sword of the spirit every form of error, and in thus being a "Herald of Death" to lies and liars; may you be heartily sustained by earnest prayers and heavy purses. Pray for me, that I may be an able minister of the word, while I at the same time will study and meditate upon these things. Your br. in Christ.

REV. DR. PATTON ON DANIEL.

REV. DR. PATTON, of New Haven, Conn., spent a portion of the season in this place, St. Albans, Vt., and vicinity, and occasionally supplied the Congregational church, which is without a regular pastor. During his stay here, he delivered a lecture on Dan. ii., 34, 35, 44, 45.

The main purpose of this lecture was to prove that the prophecy of Daniel has its fulfilment in the establishment of a democratic form of government on the American Continent; and by an ingenious method of computation, the prophetic periods of Daniel and Revelation, were shown to extend to, and terminate in the year 1776. I am unable to give the data of this calculation.

The Dr. reviewed briefly the dream of Nebuchadnezzar and Daniel's interpretation of the same; and then compared this with Daniel's visions of the 7th and 8th chapters, showing that the same powers are brought to view in each; the four universal kingdoms to bear rule over the earth. These have had their day and all passed away, except the divided state of the fourth kingdom. He claimed that the same rule of interpretation should be applied to the prophecy with reference to the fifth kingdom as to the others, which would make it a literal, civil government. He considered briefly the two forms of government known to the world, the despotic and the democratic, and the antagonism existing between them. The "image" seen by Nebuchadnazzer symbolized despotic governments; the "stone cut out of the mountain without hands" a democratic government. The smiting process is the result of the antagonism, and will go on, the democratic gaining till it finally becomes a "great mountain and fills the whole earth."

He gave his reasons at some length why this could not mean Christianity, the church, or Christ, as most people have held. As near as I can recollect, his main argument on this point was that the mild character of these did not accord with the smiting character of the "stone kingdom." These have, also, existed under all forms of government and have come in conflict with none.

The "cutting out" process, in his view, was the origin of our government under divine care and protection. It was cut out of the religious persecutions which drove persecuted Christians to seek a home on this continent. In this is fulfilled the prophecy that "the saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom forever, even forever and ever."

This sketch gives but a few of the main points of this lecture. It was new to me, and its author showed a good deal of ingenuity in arguing this theory. I leave those who read this sketch to make their own comments.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—We travelled over the same ground as that described in the foregoing report, twenty years ago, and were favorable to it for a time; but we be came satisfied it was a mere fancy scheme. Democracy, thus far, has shown no symptoms of being the kingdom of God, but as much opposed to God and His rule of the world as any other despotism. Democracy has proved itself the "clay" of the image, and is the last attempted development of humanity to "be as God." The whole tendency of this development is to atheism. It claims man is capable of self-government; and hence virtually, and often openly, scouts the idea of God's authority in the government of the world. Where do we find any party in politics asking if the men they are called on to put in office will rule in the fear of God and regard His authority as paramount to all other claims? Call this democratic government "the kingdom of God!" The thought itself is impious. No, "A KING shall reign and prosper, and shall execute justice and judgment in the earth." Jer. xxiii. 5. "A KING" democracy hates. "We will not have this man to reign over us," is its war cry. But God will set His KING on his holy hill of Zion," Psa. ii., and "The law shall go forth from Zion, and the word of the LORD from Jerusalem, and He shall judge among the people, and rebuke strong nations afar off," etc. Micah iv., 2, 3. This proud and wicked nation—a nation of democrats—will yet be humbled in the dust. It has come to say, "I will be as God;" it has exalted itself to heaven and claims to be "the kingdom of God," though rejecting God's chosen KING. If it ever comes to welcome Jesus as its Lord and KING, then we may talk of its being "The everlasting Kingdom, that shall never be destroyed, but shall stand forever." Till then, we reject all such constructions of prophecy as Dr Patton's.

A SERMON BY THE EDITOR.

IN all our investigations of religious truth, or inquiries after it, it is essential that we have some central and undoubted truth to be our polar star, or a light that shall control all our movements in our investigations. Without this, our course will be clouded, and we can arrive at no certain conclusions on which to rest with an undoubting faith, feeling we are on that foundation which is immovable. Happy for us, revelation has given the needed solar light, which lights up the whole system of revealed religion, and is the polar star, by which we may always determine with certainty our course. That light, that guiding star, is the grand truth,

"GOD IS LOVE." 1 John iv., 8, 16.

Here is certainty: here there is no ground for doubt; and here there must be no doubt: to doubt is to peril all. If this grand truth is questioned, or held as if it were possible to be untrue, we are liable to wreck at every step in our investigations in relation to the government of God over the creatures he has made; nor can we be certain that any of our conclusions in these matters are correct.

The first great business, then, of all teachers of religion, is to fix this truth in the minds of men so that it shall be undoubted and unquestioned. Till this is done, little or nothing can be accomplished in leading them "to serve the living and true God, and to wait for his Son from heaven." 1 Thess. i., 9, 10.

The grand chart, then, by which we are to make our voyage in search of truth, and by which every other view, claiming to be truth, is to be tested, and its real character decided, is this solar truth, "GOD IS LOVE." Any system or theory that will not harmonize with this, and does not revolve around this as its controlling power, we may rest assured is not of God. However plausible it may appear, even though it may resemble an angel of light; however much it claims to be a revelation from God, if it has not on it, in blazing brightness, "GOD IS LOVE," it is a deceitful light, an ignis fatuus—a false and bewildering phantom which has originated in some diseased human brain, which has yet to learn the true guide into all truth.

The beloved disciple who leaned his head on his Master's bosom at the last supper, and who, of all others, drank deeply into his Master's spirit, understood this grand theme and manifested its spirit in all he said and wrote. Love was with him the all-absorbing thought. It was his sun, his guiding star to determine his own relation to God and that of all others. How clearly does he set forth the subject in the chapter before us: "Beloved, let us love one another, for love is of God [flows from him as its fountain;] and every one that loveth is born [begotten] of God [hath received of his spirit of love, verse 13], and knoweth God; [is a partaker of the divine nature]. He that loveth not, knoweth not God, for God is love . . . . Hereby know we that we dwell in him, and he in us, because he hath given us of his spirit; [his spirit of love. Like as God is love, so we, in our measure, are love; and by this we know that we are of God.] And we have known and believed the love that God hath to us. God is love; and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him," etc.

In these statements of John, the great chart is spread out before us which is to guide us in all things doctrinal, experimental, and practical. Anything which fails of conformity with this grand theme, whether in doctrine, experience or practice, is not of God, and is to be rejected from our religious system.

But can this view be reconciled with God's government of the world? Not by the schemes generally held, and which are misnamed "orthodox," and to which we are called upon to do homage; but by the Bible interpreted strictly in view of this solar truth all is harmony, and God's whole administration is seen to be but the outgoing of love to all the subjects of his government.* To make this statement plain to every unbiased mind, let us contemplate the dealings of God with men from the beginning of the world.

When God created man, he fitted up for him a garden of delights—everything that was good for food and pleasant to the eye; nothing is lacking to constitute his state one of pleasure and joy. This was love's installation of man in life's joys. But man was only an animal being at present, though superior to all other animals, appointed as their lord, and designed by love for a higher sphere, or to have superadded a spiritual nature, capable of a more intimate union and communion with his CREATOR.

That this advancement into an endowment of a spiritual nature, which should constitute him undying, and thus, Godlike, should not become an evil, love was careful so to order that it could not possibly become a curse instead of a blessing; or, in other words, love guards against the possibility of endless suffering.

To settle this point love tests the man as to whether he will develop a mind in harmony with the divine mind, or a mind in perfect subjection to the will of his CREATOR. Such a development was essential to man's safety and happiness, if he is to pass into a spiritual and immortal, or undying state. For to let him pass into such a state without a voluntary subjection to, or harmony with the divine will, would be to make him an immortal sinner, and consequently eternally miserable, because eternally out of harmony with a superior power.

Hence before endowing man with a spiritual and immortal nature, the love of God appointed a trial for him; and love decided that if the development should prove unharmonious with his CREATOR, the man should return to the dust from whence he was taken. Thus, not only the trial itself was an act of love, but the appointment of death in case of failure was also an act of love—it was the best thing that could be done for one whose will developed itself in opposition to the will of God his Maker.

Death itself, then, is seen to be an administrative act prompted by love as a preventive of continued sin and misery. Love could never allow a being to come into existence, or remain in existence when his sorrows and sufferings, on the whole, would outweigh his joys and pleasures. Love made such an event impossible. It could not be otherwise and God be love; but "GOD IS LOVE," and that made it certain that whatever should be the final result of man's trial, his existence, while it continued, should have joys and pleasures far outweighing all his pains and woes. That such is the fact in this life, no sane mind will dispute: hence, all men love life, and wish to protract it as long as possible, notwithstanding its infelicities.

If such are the facts in the present state, it is not possible for love to appoint for sensitive beings a state of unmitigated or hopeless suffering; and the idea is an impeachment of the Divine character and administration. Love, then, we see, at the outset provided against a life, whether long or short, made up of hopeless sufferings; no attribute of the divine Being, who is LOVE, could allow such a result; even justice, of which some religionists talk so much, could never override love to produce such a result. Hopeless torture in a future life, then, is an impossibility; it can no more take place than God can cease to be God.

We have said that death itself is the appointment of love. This is true in regard to all the incorrigibly wicked. After love has exhausted all the means consistent to be used with reasonable creatures and their freedom of will, if they continue to resist the efforts of love, and persist in hostility to the divine will, a continued life must be plunging them deeper and deeper in unhappiness till life itself would become a source of living torment, not unlike the fancied theological hell. Hence love appoints death to end their wretched existence before they reach that horrid condition. How boundless the love that thus ends their mad career in sin and self-torments.

These remarks are applicable to such cases as that of Sodom and Gomorrah; also, of the old world destroyed by the flood. Wickedness in these cases had attained that maturity that their state was hopeless for the better, and love cuts them off to make an end of it, and as a warning to others not to live ungodly.

Love appoints death, also, for the righteous, that they may rest a while till the time appointed of the Father for their glorification. This life, while it has its joys for the righteous, the chief of which is the blessed hope of the future and eternal weight of glory, has continued trials also for them. Their own personal conflicts with evil in themselves, and the sufferings often experienced in this quarter, is one source of their affliction. The trial by the wickedness of others, either from persecutions in some form, or from the general disregard of God and his authority, and the oppression of the poor and needy, whose sighs come up into the ears of God like the sighs of the Israelites in Egypt, is another cause of sorrow and trial to the good, and often their righteous souls are vexed—distressed—by the unlawful deeds of those by whom they are surrounded, and among whom they are obliged to dwell. After enduring these things till they are fitted to reign on the earth with Christ in his glory, love appoints them to rest, or sleep in the dust of the earth till the fulness of time shall come for their glorification. It would not have been love to continue them in life's trials to the time appointed of the Father for the earth, their inheritance, to be renewed. Think of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and other ancient worthies, being continued in this trial state for thousands of years; then ask yourself if it was not an appointment of love that they rest in the sleep of death till the time for the consummtion of their hopes should arrive, and thus the intervening space be, to them, annihilated; and the moment of their closing their eyes in death be to them the moment of their glorification, together with the whole family of the redeemed? A right conception of these things makes the great fact "GOD IS LOVE," stand out in amazing glory, and should cause us to magnify his wisdom, power and love altogether.

But the most amazing development or manifestation of the grand truth that "God is love" is found in the wonderful fact that he sent his Son into the world to rescue us from the death state to which we all were hastening, and from which we were powerless to deliver ourselves. The statement of this great fact is thus announced by the Son of God himself: "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son that whosever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

Here, in one verse, is summed up the state of man without divine intervention, viz., going out of life, perishing, returning to the dust, without power to survive in death, or revive from it; hopelessly lost to life, of himself. In this state, God's love made its most wonderful manifestation. It put forward the highest loved One of the Infinite, and subjected him to humiliation such as earth never saw; to reproach such as no mere human being could think of voluntarily submitting to; to sufferings such as no man can fully estimate; and to death in a most horrid and revolting form; all in love to dying men, and to open a way for their deliverance from sin, and "death, the wages of sin." Why this great and marvellous undertaking? Because "GOD IS LOVE," and he "so loved the world" —the whole race of men; not a soul of the human family was left outside of this range of the love of God. But this love, in order to avail in rescuing men from death, from perishing, must be met by love in return; or, faith in God's love, and a reliance upon the Son of God's love for the needed deliverance from death, wherever Christ is proclaimed. Without this return of love and confidence, or faith, on man's part, man fails of a rescue from death, and "remains in the congregation of the dead;" there is no deliverance for him; he has rejected the only provision love has provided, and confirms himself as a victim of death and its eternal empire or dominion.

Love makes not the sinner's condition worse for this manifestation of God to the world in the person of his Son. Men were going out of life hopelessly, but for this love. Love gives them a chance to recover from death on easy terms; and those terms slighted or refused, love leaves them where it found them, and excludes them wholly from any part in the resurrection power; thereby putting an everlasting end to their being, sins, and suffering; thus demonstrating the grand truth, "God is Love."

It may be thought that we leave justice out of sight. But this is a mistake. God is just, and hence the Justifier of him that believeth. "He that believeth not is condemned already;" he has not to wait for some future period for an announcement of his condemnation, though the executive judgment will demonstrate to all that God's love was slighted by the sinner, and that love now leaves him in death, as the only disposal it can make of him; and justice has no demand on the sinner that is not fully met by his being left in death's dominion. If he is to live again from death, it must be because love demands it, and not from any claim of justice. If the love of God calls the sinner again into life, then let him come; for such a life cannot be a hopeless one. The fact of life restored is evidence that love has mercy still in store. It is impossible that love can give life from the dead for the purpose of hopeless suffering and to return the sinner into the same state from which he had been called, viz., death.

Thus, then, "God is love;" and that makes it impossible that any human being, once dead, can be restored from death, except in a state of hope. Any other view strikes down and gives the lie to the grand leading truth of God's governmental administration, that he is love. Any other view shocks the reason God has endowed man with, and is a libel on God's government, and its natural tendency is to lead men to reject a revelation which they are taught has made "death the wages of sin," and yet revives dead men to hopeless sufferings and another extinction of life, thus forced on them, or endless torture.

From such thoughts we turn to the fact, God has provided for the perishing children of men an inheritance where no sorrow, no pain, no want, no death can ever disturb their peace or interrupt their joy, or in the slightest degree invade or mar their pleasure. All this because "God is love;" and all this is a free gift of his love to those who have sinned against him, but who, by the manifestation of his love, have been won from the ways of sin to give love for love; for "We love him because he first loved us;" and "Herein is love, not that we [first] loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins." "In this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent his only begotten Son into the world that we might live through him." See 1 John iv., 9, 10, and 19.

This love gives eternal life; a life to run parallel, in the future, with the life of God himself; endlessly increasing in new joys and glories, as shoreless as eternity itself. Then will the redeemed ones be ever exploring the depth and breadth of the grand truth, "God is love," and still be shouting, "O the depth of the wisdom and love of God." And as eternity rolls on, and they take new soundings in the shoreless sea of God's love, still they cry, "O the depths!" And as wave after wave of love rolls over them, and bathes their whole being with its comforting power, how will they exultingly cry out, "Unto him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power that worketh in us; unto him be glory by Christ Jesus throughout the endless succession of ages." Macknight's translation of Eph. iii., 21.

When the bliss of that immortal state shall exceed all that thought can reach, the grand chorus will still, everywhere in God's vast universe, be echoing and re-echoing, "GOD IS LOVE." Yes, "every creature in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them," will join in the harmonious and triumphant song, "GOD IS LOVE." See Rev. v., 11–14.

"They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat; for the LAMB which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them to living fountains of waters; and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes," and all this because "GOD IS LOVE."

What can we say more? This love, O, man, O, woman, young or old, calls after thee from reason's dawn to the day of life's close, saying, "Why will you die?" Will you not hear this voice of love? We know you have been born and educated under a human theology that has sought to arouse you by horrible representations of God's designs toward you, till your heart has become so hardened that, insensibly, you have come to regard God's service as only an awful necessity, and to be entered upon only to escape a horrible state of endless torture, which you have been taught God has prepared for his enemies. Such representations have so blinded your minds that when we approach you with the grand message of this discourse, we seem to you "as one that mocketh!" Such a message begins to take hold of your heart, but the prejudice of your education makes you fear we are but deceiving you; and your old teachers cry out, "Infidelity;" so that though you are almost disposed to yield to love's power, you start back with fear lest you should believe too much, and thus be wrecked.

Well, if love cannot win you, what will? The dread of the theological hell may sometimes alarm, but you know it never kindled love in thy heart. It has made many hypocrites, professing to love God so that they may escape the hell of torments, but it never did and never can produce the genuine principle of love. We do not say that none who believe the doctrine of future and hopeless torture, or eternal torments, do not love God; but we do say, those views never produced love in the heart of man, and never can. It is only when the mind turns away from such views to contemplate the love of God in Christ that love arises in the sinner's heart.

We ask you, as a perishing creature, to turn your eyes at once to the grand truth of our text, "God is love." Let no other thoughts intrude till this is so established in thy heart that sin will be hateful in thy sight, and you find yourself cleaving to the fountain of love, and all thy sins will vanish away before the rising stream of that love which shall flow through thy entire being, and you will find yourself a new creature in Christ Jesus, whom God in his love gave unto thee, O sinner, to bear away thy sins, and to anoint you with the Holy Spirit of promise, which shall shed abroad the love of God in thy heart in such heavenly measure as shall make the yoke of Christ easy and his burden light. All this, because "GOD IS LOVE."

BR. STORRS: After a long time of silence, I take my pen to write a few lines for our paper. More than two years have passed away since I was convinced that the righteous alone would have a resurrection from the dead, and this day finds me of "the same opinion still." Now that my mission work in Philadelphia is closed, I have more opportunities for reading, study, and thought upon this and other Bible truths, and the way will be opened for me to proclaim these views to those who desire to hear them. I hope to labor to some extent in new fields. The opposition to the truth that "none but the children of God will be the children of the resurrection," is very strong in many places. I have often heard of "the harsh spirit of non-resurrectionists," but I find that the greater part of this harshness is now on the other side. May the Lord incline them to be gentle and kind.

Changes have occurred in the views of our opponents, and to my mind the most of them are very far removed from the Scriptures. For instance: our opponents to some extent hold that the righteous and wicked will come out of their graves as they went down into them, i. e., mortal. The promulgation of our view seems to have driven them to this "wall." Formerly they held that the righteous would come up immortal: but that position would prove that all the world had been judged beforehand, and it precluded the necessity of the resurrection of the wicked. To avoid so evident a conclusion, resort was made to the strange theory of the mortal resurrection of both classes, and that resurrection a simultaneous one.

Others hold to the distinct resurrection of each class, some believing that there will be an interval of a thousand years between the two, while others think there will be but a brief interval; it may be a minute or an hour. But here the difficulty is as great as at first: for, if the righteous come out by themselves in a body, and the wicked come out in a body one minute afterward, it proves that judgment has already passed, else why raise the righteous out from the wicked?

But the simultaneous mortal-resurrection theory is gaining ground. To my mind there are a multitude of insurmountable obstacles in the way of embracing this view, which I may present at some future day for the consideration of our friends.

May the Lord bless and sustain you in battling with the sword of the spirit every form of error, and in thus being a "Herald of Death" to lies and liars; may you be heartily sustained by earnest prayers and heavy purses. Pray for me, that I may be an able minister of the word, while I at the same time will study and meditate upon these things. Your br. in Christ.

REV. DR. PATTON ON DANIEL.

REV. DR. PATTON, of New Haven, Conn., spent a portion of the season in this place, St. Albans, Vt., and vicinity, and occasionally supplied the Congregational church, which is without a regular pastor. During his stay here, he delivered a lecture on Dan. ii., 34, 35, 44, 45.

The main purpose of this lecture was to prove that the prophecy of Daniel has its fulfilment in the establishment of a democratic form of government on the American Continent; and by an ingenious method of computation, the prophetic periods of Daniel and Revelation, were shown to extend to, and terminate in the year 1776. I am unable to give the data of this calculation.

The Dr. reviewed briefly the dream of Nebuchadnezzar and Daniel's interpretation of the same; and then compared this with Daniel's visions of the 7th and 8th chapters, showing that the same powers are brought to view in each; the four universal kingdoms to bear rule over the earth. These have had their day and all passed away, except the divided state of the fourth kingdom. He claimed that the same rule of interpretation should be applied to the prophecy with reference to the fifth kingdom as to the others, which would make it a literal, civil government. He considered briefly the two forms of government known to the world, the despotic and the democratic, and the antagonism existing between them. The "image" seen by Nebuchadnazzer symbolized despotic governments; the "stone cut out of the mountain without hands" a democratic government. The smiting process is the result of the antagonism, and will go on, the democratic gaining till it finally becomes a "great mountain and fills the whole earth."

He gave his reasons at some length why this could not mean Christianity, the church, or Christ, as most people have held. As near as I can recollect, his main argument on this point was that the mild character of these did not accord with the smiting character of the "stone kingdom." These have, also, existed under all forms of government and have come in conflict with none.

The "cutting out" process, in his view, was the origin of our government under divine care and protection. It was cut out of the religious persecutions which drove persecuted Christians to seek a home on this continent. In this is fulfilled the prophecy that "the saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom forever, even forever and ever."

This sketch gives but a few of the main points of this lecture. It was new to me, and its author showed a good deal of ingenuity in arguing this theory. I leave those who read this sketch to make their own comments.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—We travelled over the same ground as that described in the foregoing report, twenty years ago, and were favorable to it for a time; but we became satisfied it was a mere fancy scheme. Democracy, thus far, has shown no symptoms of being the kingdom of God, but as much opposed to God and His rule of the world as any other despotism. Democracy has proved itself the "clay" of the image, and is the last attempted development of humanity to "be as God." The whole tendency of this development is to atheism. It claims man is capable of self-government; and hence virtually, and often openly, scouts the idea of God's authority in the government of the world. Where do we find any party in politics asking if the men they are called on to put in office will rule in the fear of God and regard His authority as paramount to all other claims? Call this democratic government "the kingdom of God!" The thought itself is impious. No, "A KING shall reign and prosper, and shall execute justice and judgment in the earth." Jer. xxiii. 5. "A KING" democracy hates. "We will not have this man to reign over us," is its war cry. But God will set His KING on his holy hill of Zion," Psa. ii., and "The law shall go forth from Zion, and the word of the LORD from Jerusalem, and He shall judge among the people, and rebuke strong nations afar off," etc. Micah iv., 2, 3. This proud and wicked nation—a nation of democrats—will yet be humbled in the dust. It has come to say, "I will be as God;" it has exalted itself to heaven and claims to be "the kingdom of God," though rejecting God's chosen KING. If it ever comes to welcome Jesus as its Lord and KING, then we may talk of its being "The everlasting Kingdom, that shall never be destroyed, but shall stand forever." Till then, we reject all such constructions of prophecy as Dr Patton's.

Address to Christians.

BY MR. FLETCHER—FROM HIS CHECKS.

Love is humble. "Be therefore clothed with humility," says Mr. Wesley; "let it not only fill, but cover you all over." Let modesty and self-diffidence appear in all your words and actions. Let all you speak and do, show that you are little, and base and mean, and vile in your own eyes. As one instance of this, be always ready to own any fault you have been in. If you have at any time thought, spoke, or acted wrong, be not backward to acknowledge it. Never dream that this will hurt the cause of God; no, it will further it. Be, therefore, open and frank when you are taxed with anything; let it appear just as it is; and you will thereby not hinder, but adorn the Gospel. Why should you be more backward in acknowledging your failings than in confessing that you do not pretend to infallibility? St. Paul was perfect in the love which casts out fear, and, therefore, he boldly reproved the high priest; but when he had reproved him more sharply than the fifth commandment allows, he directly confessed his mistake, and set his seal to the importance of the duty, in which he had been inadvertently wanting. Then Paul said: "I knew not, brethren, that he was the high priest; for it is written, Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people." St. John was perfect in the courteous, humble love which brings us down at the feet of all. His courtesy, his humility, and the dazzling glory which beamed forth from a Divine messenger (whom he apprehended to be more than a creature) betrayed him into a fault contrary to that of St. Paul: but far from concealing it, he openly confessed it, and published his confession for the edification of all the churches: "When I had heard and seen," says he, "I fell down to worship before the feet of the angel who showed me these things. Then saith he unto me, See thou do it not, for I am thy fellow-servant." Christian perfection shines as much in the child-like simplicity with which the perfect readily acknowledge their faults, as it does in the manly steadiness with which they "resist unto blood, striving against sin."

Humble love "becomes all things [but sin] to all men," although it delights most in those who are most holy. You may, and ought to set your love of peculiar complacence upon God's dearest children; upon "those who excel in virtue;" because they more strongly reflect the image of "the God of love, the holy one of Israel." But if ye despise the weak, and are above lending them a helping hand, ye are fallen from Christian perfection, which teaches us to "bear one another's burdens," especially the burdens of the weak. Imitate, then, the wisdom of the good Shepherd, who "carries the lambs in his bosom," gently leads the sheep which are with young, feeds with milk those who cannot bear strong meat, and says to his imperfect disciples, "I have many things to say to you, but ye cannot bear them now."

"Where the loving spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty." Keep, therefore, at the utmost distance from the shackles of a narrow, prejudiced, bigoted spirit. The moment ye confine your love to the people who think just as you do, and your regard to the preachers who exactly suit your taste, you fall from perfection and turn bigots. "I entreat you," says Mr. Wesley, in his Plain Account, "beware of bigotry. Let not your love, or beneficence, be confined to Methodists (so called) only; much less to that very small part of them who seem to be renewed in love, or to those who believe yours and their report. Oh, make not this your Shibboleth." On the contrary, as ye have time and ability, "do good to all men." Let your benevolence shine upon all; let your charity send its cherishing beams toward all, in proper degrees. So shall ye be perfect as your heavenly Father, "who makes his sun to shine upon all;" although he sends the brightest and warmest beams of his favor upon "the household of faith," and reserves his richest bounties for those who lay out their five talents to the best advantage.

Love, pure love, is satisfied with the Supreme Good—with God. Beware then of desiring anything but him.

Be patterns to all of denying yourself and taking up your cross daily. Let them see that you make no account of any pleasure which does not bring you nearer to God, nor regard any pain which does; but you simply aim at pleasing him, whether by doing or suffering; that the constant language of your heart with regard to pleasure or pain, honor or dishonor, is

"All's alike to me, so I
In my Lord may live and die."

Christian Brotherhood.

Dr. Furnam, an English divine, was once present in a small company of brethren who had assembled to dine with a common friend, when the usual style by which they addressed each other, was that affectionate appellative of brother. Those present were very exact in using this mode of address. While their conversation was in progress, and they were freely brothering each other, there came in an aged colored woman, well known for her piety and good character. The brethren present saluted her in various ways—as "Well, old woman," "How-do, Clarinda," and so on. When she came to the Dr., he leaned forward, extended to her his hand, and said: "How do you do, sister Clarinda?" No comments were made, but it was believed he designed his salutation as a gentle reproof to those present, who did not seem to feel the true equality in which all followers of Jesus stand as brethren and sisters.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 7, 1868.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

Herald of Life, Vol. VI.

No. 1 is before our readers. We have printed a few hundred extra to make sure of supplying new subscribers; and in the hope that old subscribers will be stimulated, when they have read this, to make one more effort to send us, at least, one new subscriber each. Some have sent two, and one six, already. If you wish a few copies of this number for samples, let us know, and we will send if we can spare them.

The Sermon, "God is Love."

Our readers are not to conclude the sermon on the first page is the same we preached at the camp-meeting, though the text is the same and some of the thoughts also. We have spoken on this same text several times in different places, the year past, but have never written a line of it, not even notes, till since the Springfield camp-meeting. We were urged by some while there to give our sermon on the subject in print. We have, therefore, written the sermon on the first page for the Herald of Life. It was prepared expressly for this paper, and is more full than we have ever preached it. Our readers will judge for themselves of its value; but we praise the Lord that He prolonged our life to preach and to print it. May it prove a blessing to all who read it.

A Request not Complied with.

Some persons wish us to write their names on pamphlets or tracts they request to have sent to friends, or others, in different places. This we cannot do. The law does not allow it. If you wish them to know who it is from, inform them by letter. That is the proper way.

An Argument too Sharp.

An article copied into the World's Crisis, Sept. 23d, from the Herald of the Kingdom, on the resurrection of the wicked dead, uses its broad sword so carelessly that it decapitates itself. After starting with John v., 29, it launches it bolts against us puny folks who believe that sinners, to whom Christ has been offered, and they "believed not, shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on them." John iii., 36. Here comes the regular siege: look at this terrible explosion.

> They think it an outrage upon justice, that wicked men, who are amenable to the law of God, should be called into judgment, at the last day. "O" say they, "raise a man up to kill him again? Why, it is awful to think of it." By such talk as this, one would conclude that we were guilty of charging God with the work of killing men twice. Who affirms that God kills men twice? Does the Lord kill men when they die now? Most assuredly not. Why then talk about killing them again? If our friends can prove that God kills men now, we will admit that they have gained their point.

That is heavy firing, but it happens to kill its author and his co-workers. Will they please tell us, Did God kill the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah? It is said, "Then the Lord rained upon Sodom and upon Gomorrah brimstone and fire from the Lord out of heaven," etc. Now, if the inhabitants of those cities were killed, can't any school-boy tell who killed them? God did kill them or He did not. If He did kill them, then He will not kill them again, our opponents being judges. Now Messrs. Crisis and Co., will you stand by your own words? You say, if we "can prove that God kills men now, we [you] will admit they have gained their point." Have we not gained our point so far as the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah are concerned? Then what becomes of your main battery, John v., 29? Do you not see a breach is made in the construction you put on that text? Your construction must bring up the Sodomites; for the text says, "all," etc. We have proved what you challenged us to do. We have demonstrated that God does kill some men now; and you, by implication, affirm that He does not kill men twice; for you ask, "Who affirms that God kills men twice?" etc.

But we have not quite done with you yet. Who killed the inhabitants of the old world with a flood? The Lord said, "Behold, I, even I, [not Adam or somebody else, but I, the Lord] do bring a flood of waters upon the earth to destroy all flesh wherein is the breath of life from under heaven; and every thing that is in the earth shall die." Gen. vi., 17. Did God kill these men? If He did he will not kill them "twice," you say. Then they will have no revival into life, unless they are to have eternal life; for, "who affirms that God kills men twice?" Alas, Messrs. Crisis and Co., here is another breach in your fortifications. You will destroy your construction of John v., 28, 29, with your own battery, if you only keep to work. You have nearly demolished it already.

> When the Lord punishes men with death, that's the end of them, but this he does not until they experience the second death.

We thank you for that confession. The Lord "punished" the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah, and also of the old world "with death;" and you being judges, "that's the end of them," and that is "the second death," too; for you say, God does not kill men twice, and when He kills them, that is the second death. Just so, neighbors. The second death, in the Hebrew sense of the phrase, is a death from which there is no revival. It is not twice dying; but a hopeless death; a death where "the wrath of God abideth on them," and "they shall not see life." John iii., 36.

But we have a few more items to be disposed of by the Crisis and Co. Who slew, or killed Pharoah and his hosts in the Red Sea? Did God do it, or not? Let Moses and the children of Israel answer: "I will sing unto the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath He thrown into the sea." Exod. xv., 1. Mind you, God don't kill twice; and when He does kill, that is "the second death." This is your own chosen position; and when you have taken it you must abide the result. There is no resurrection of Pharoah and his hosts, then; so another breach is made in your stronghold.

We have another small item to test the strength of your foundation. When God was dealing with the Egyptians, prior to Israel's departure, He told Moses, "I will pass through the land of Egypt this night, and will smite all the first-born in the land of Egypt, both man and beast; and against all the gods of Egypt I will execute judgment: I am the Lord." Exod. xii., 12. Did God kill these men? If you doubt it, let the record speak. "And it came to pass, that at midnight the Lord smote all the first-born in the land of Egypt," etc. Exod. xii., 29. Our Gibraltar stands firm; and "our enemies themselves being judges" (Deut. xxxii., 31) "their rock is not as our Rock." Their bulwarks are falling by the weight of their own admissions. God don't kill twice; and when He does kill, that is the second death. The first-born of Egypt, then, do not live again. Another pillar is taken away from our opponents' construction of John v., 28, 29.

But we are not at the end of the chapter yet. When God gave Israel possession of Canaan, He commanded Moses and Joshua to utterly destroy the inhabitants thereof. What God did by the hand of Israel in destroying those wicked people, He was the author of. Of course God killed those inhabitants. If there is any demurring here, you make Moses and Joshua inhuman butchers. But they were only God's instruments, the same as brimstone and fire were His instruments in killing the Sodomites, or the water in killing the ungodly of the old world. Besides, in some cases, in Canaan, God did the work of killing direct. Observe, when "five kings went up with all their hosts" against Joshua, the "Lord said unto Joshua, fear them not," etc. So Israel went up to the battle, "And the Lord discomfited them before Israel, and slew them with a great slaughter," etc. "And it came to pass . . . that the Lord cast down great stones from heaven upon them, and they died . . . there were more which died with hailstones than they which the children of Israel slew with the sword." See Joshua x., 1–11. So God killed these men; and He don't "kill men twice;" and when He kills, it is the second death. Thus the gauzy fabric of mortal resurrectionists, making all the wicked alive to be killed again, vanishes under its own assaults on us. We might enlarge in this department, and show that God does kill every man that dies; for "If He (God) set his heart upon man, if He gather unto Himself his Spirit and His breath; [God's Spirit and breath: see chap. xxxiii., 4;] all flesh shall perish together, and man shall turn again to dust." Job xxxiv., 14, 15. If God withdraws that without which man cannot live, does He not kill him? You may sneer at the idea; but it is nevertheless true. "What is the hope of the hypocrite, though he hath gained, when God taketh away his soul?" or life? Job xxvii., 8. Who killed the hypocrite? Surely the text is clear that God did it: "In whose hand is the soul [life] of every living thing, and the breath of all mankind." Job xii., 10. "Thou [God] takest away their breath, they die, and return to their dust." Psa. civ., 29. Then "God kills" them.

If "God kills men when they die now," as we have proved He does, then it is for our opposers to prove that He ever restores life except on conditions which He has been pleased to promulgate; and if He has said, (and He has), "He that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him," (John iii., 36), who is bound to accept your inference from John v., 28, 29, that all men shall see life, when the text itself does not say so? There is not one text in the Bible that speaks of life from the dead, after man has once gone to corruption, except to believers; nor is there a text that speaks of any other life, after such death, except an eternal life: and such as attain to the resurrection from the dead "cannot die any more;" they "are raised incorruptible"—"in glory"—"in power"—and "spiritual," like the Head of the new creation—Christ Jesus—who saith, "I am the resurrection and the life."

"Penalty for Sin."

What is it? "Death." What is death? It is a state, a condition, in which the once living are no longer alive; life is extinct. The circumstances which brought about that state have nothing to do with the state itself. It is the state itself that is the wages of sin, or penalty for sin. No matter how the person came in that condition; being a sinner, death holds him under its dominion. "The law of sin and death" holds its empire over him; and unless he is redeemed from sin he cannot be redeemed from death. God has only one appointed medium of deliverance from either; and that is, "The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus." Faith in Christ brings us under this law, and by that law "He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies." He that neglects this medium of life, when made known to him, remains under the law of sin and death, and he remains there by his own act; he is not left in death for Adam's sin, but for his own, in refusing God's way out of death. The wages of sin is not dying, but being held in death.

This relying on the idea, that because men die in consequence of Adam's sin, and not for their own, and that therefore they must be made alive to die again for their own, is a mere play upon words, without recognizing the fact that it is not dying, but death—a state without life—which is the wages of sin. Ten thousand times dying would not meet the penalty unless death holds him; and once in death the penalty can claim no more than to maintain its dominion unbroken over him. That such is the teaching of the Bible does not admit of a doubt in our mind.

Materialism and Spiritualism.

We lately received a private letter from a highly esteemed minister of the Methodist E. Church, in which he speaks of our "full-grown materialism." He writes as follows:

> "If, as you claim, your exegesis of Scripture is correct, and you can find such rank materialism there, it is one of the greatest mysteries to me that earnest students of the Bible, and honest, unbiassed searchers for truth have not, at some time in five centuries past stumbled upon the same peculiar doctrines. Why should it be reserved for the Nineteenth Century that such a discovery of truth be made? If, as you believe, the true 'Pauline Theology' be what you promulgate weekly, why do we not find it declared, maintained and defended for the first century or even centuries after Christ?"

It has not been our study to know what the so-called "Fathers," in the first centuries after the apostles, taught. We long since learned that no certain reliance could be placed on their teachings. They were not inspired; and it is certain that "corrupters of the word" existed in the professed church before the apostles closed their ministry. Hence Paul saith, "We are not as many, which corrupt the word of God," etc. 2 Cor. ii., 17. And again he says, "Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the traditions of men," etc. Col. ii., 8. And in addressing the elders of the church of Ephesus, he says, "I know this, that after my departing shall grievous wolves enter in among you, not sparing the flock; also of your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things to draw away disciples after them." Acts xx., 29, 30.

If these things were so while the apostles were alive, have we not every reason to conclude the truth was sadly corrupted soon after their death? And this corruption culminated in the abominable scheme known as Popery, out of which flood of corruptions of the word of God Protestantism has but just emerged, and has not yet washed her garments white from that corrupting system.

If appeal is to be made to the theology of the first centuries after the apostles, almost any vagary can be established; for it is difficult to tell what branch of heathen philosophy was not grafted on to the professed Christianity of those centuries. We learned, years ago, that appeals to the "Fathers" were of no value. If they had truth they learned it from the Scriptures; and if they learned it there, so can we, and much more certainly, because we have the word in a more accessible condition.

We therefore reject all theories, speculations and traditions of uninspired men, and go at once to the fountain, the word of God itself. There we find "the true 'Pauline Theology,'" which we "promulgate weekly," "declared, maintained and defended" in all its fulness and glory. That word is our only chart. We call not in question the sincerity of "earnest students of the Bible" nor their "honesty;" but when you ask us to admit their searching was "unbiassed," you ask more than we can grant. Can the man be found, for the past "five centuries," who, however much he desired "truth," has sought it unbiassed by any of the traditions of men, and his own early training, or the unavoidable circumstances with which he was surrounded? or if he discovered truth outside of the theology of his day, dared to brave public sentiment by promulgating it, at all hazards? Take Martin Luther himself. He discovered that the doctrine of the "immortality of the soul" was a "Roman dunghill decretal." See his "Defence," prop. 27, published 1530. But did he dare maintain the fight, unwaveringly, amid the odium brought on him, for this belief, by his fellow reformers? How many more have seen the same truth since, and like him have recoiled at the furious opposition with which they have been assailed, and have kept silence, who can tell us? Did not Bishop Newton reject the doctrine of eternal torments? See his works, London edition of 1787, Dissertation No. 60, "On the final state and condition of men." He says, "Hell, as a place of torment, is nowhere mentioned in the writings of Moses," etc. After this, he goes on to explain the terms translated hell in the Bible. At length he says,

> "Nothing can be more contrary to the divine nature and attributes than for a God all-wise, all-powerful, all-good, all-perfect, to bestow existence on any beings whose destiny he foresees and foreknows must terminate in wretchedness and misery, without recovery or remedy, without respite or end. . . . 'God is love;' and he would rather have not given life than render that life a torment and curse to all eternity. . . . Imagine a creature, nay, imagine numberless creatures produced out of nothing . . . delivered over to torments of endless ages, without the least hope or possibility of relaxation or redemption. Imagine it you may, but you can never seriously believe it, nor reconcile it to God and goodness."

To this we may add the fact that the late Archbishop Whately strongly favored the ideas of the unconscious state of the dead, and the final annihilation of the wicked, as his sermons on "The Future States" clearly show. Multitudes of other "earnest students of the Bible" may have made similar discoveries, or "stumbled upon" these things, but have been deterred by the bigoted religionists and their persecuting spirit from promulgating them.

After all, it is not who has, or who has not, "stumbled upon the same peculiar doctrine" we hold and maintain. The question is, Does the Bible teach it? If it does, that is enough for us, even if we have to stand alone to the end of this life. We have never asked ourself whether we were to be popular or unpopular, though we knew it would be the latter, by promulgating our views of Bible truth. If it be the truth of God that is enough for us. God's approval is consolation enough, though all men, good or bad, revile us.

Now, as to our "materialism." We know not why our friend should charge us with "full-grown" and "rank materialism." We repudiate the imputation. Such materialism rejects all spiritual existences. That we have never done. Yet, so far as created beings are concerned, we may safely challenge any man to show that there was ever a creation without material, and of course "materialism." To deny this, is to deny creation itself.

We believe in Bible materialism; and we also believe in Bible spiritualism. But we do not believe in atheistic materialism, nor Roman Catholic and Protestant spiritualism. The atheistic materialism denies to all men a future life, and rejects all spiritual existences. Romanism and Protestantism both affirm man has a spiritual nature inherently, or by creation; while the great apostle affirms, 1 Corth. xv., the first man was "not spiritual, but animal," and that the spiritual was brought in by the second Adam; and he affirms, "the first man was of the earth, earthy;" decidedly a material being, and is only developed a spiritual one by an implantation of a spiritual seed and the resurrection from death, at the last trump; or a change, if alive, equivalent to a resurrection of dead ones. Then it is, by the Spirit of God given unto us as believers in Jesus, that we become spiritual beings. It is by the work of grace, and not by natural generation, that we come into the possession of a spiritual existence: not an intangible one; but that spiritual condition in which death has no more power over us forever.

Does not our friend see that he wrongs us by calling our doctrine "rank materialism," or "full-grown materialism?" So far as the finally impenitent are concerned, they are only "of the earth, earthy;" hence, are never anything else than material, so organized as to think, while alive, like other animal beings, though with a more perfect organization or intellect, and capable of receiving an engrafted spiritual element; but dying without that they perish utterly. See Job xx., 4–7, which reads as follows:

"Knowest thou not this of old, since man was placed upon earth, that the triumphing of the wicked is short, and the joy of the hypocrites but for a moment? Though his excellency mount up to the heavens, and his head reach unto the clouds; yet shall he perish forever like his own dung," etc.

An Assumption Exploded.

> "It has been the common sense of the whole race of man, with few exceptions, that the soul is immortal."—Eld. J. G. Stearns on the Immortality of the Soul. p. 16.

The foregoing statement is a purely gratuitous assumption, a thousand times uttered by believers in inherent immortality.

Not a solitary expression of any such doctrine was ever known among the Jews till after their captivity in Babylon. They may be included in the "few exceptions:" they are, however, an important exception. Bishop Whately has shown conclusively, that the wisest of the pagan philosophers did nothing more than to speculate on immortality, without ever satisfying their "common sense" that immortality is an attribute of the soul.

But supposing, contrary to fact, it could be shown that the Babylonians, Medes and Persians believed the soul immortal? What if Zoroaster, Pythagoras, Socrates and Plato taught it? What if the sentiment abounds in Homer, Ovid and Virgil? Does this prove the doctrine true? If so, the prevalence of other sentiments, held by these nations and distinguished persons, upon the same principle of reasoning, must also be true. If you receive the pagan idea of immortality, you must take along with it the pre-existence of souls—the transmigration of souls—and the rejection of the resurrection of the body! You must not divide the dose, though bitter, but swallow the whole.

The oldest hypotheses of the oriental world, upon this subject, resolved themselves into the doctrine of emanation and imanation: issuing from the "soul of the universe" at birth, and reabsorbed at death, as Bishop Whately has shown. They regarded the soul as a part of the Deity, thus making him divisible, which you say the soul is not!

Dr. Good says—"If we turn from Persia, Egypt and Hindostan to Arabia, to the fragrant groves and learned shades of Dedan and Teman, from which it is certain that Persia, and highly probable that Hindostan, derived its first polite literature, we shall find the entire subject" (of the immortality of the soul), "left in as blank and barren a silence as the deserts by which they are surrounded; or, if touched upon, only touched upon to betray doubt, and sometimes disbelief. The tradition, indeed, of a future state of retributive justice seems to have reached the schools of this part of the world, and to have been generally, though perhaps not universally, accredited; but the future existence it alludes to is that of a resurrection of the body, and not of a survival of the soul after the body's dissolution."

Here are large exceptions to the assumed position of its "being the common sense of the whole race that the soul is immortal." And we find these exceptions just where we might expect to find them, viz., where the light of revelation shed its illuminating beams! That country is Idumea! Here Job, that venerable patriarchal saint who held communion with the living God, and not with the Buthos or Demiurgus of the Chaldeans, Egyptians, etc., —here we say Job lived; and from this quarter we have, as Dr. Good expresses it, "that astonishing and transcendent composition" called "the Book of Job;" "a work," says he—"that ought assuredly to raise the genius of Idumea above that of Greece," etc., and may we not add, the knowledge of Job far above that of Zoroaster, Pythagoras, Socrates, Plato, Dr. Dick, and Mr. Stearns—all combined!

Dr. Good continues—"Yet in this sublime and magnificent poem, replete with all the learning and wisdom of the age, the doctrine upon the subject before us is merely as I have stated it, a patriarchal or traditionary belief of a future state of retributive justice, not by the natural immortality of the soul, but by a resurrection of the body!"

Dr. Good makes this belief "patriarchal or traditionary," but this is unnecessary, as Job was doubtless an inspired man. Dr. Good's testimony is the more valuable, because he believed in the popular doctrine of immortality.

Whether, therefore, the dogma of natural immortality originated with the old serpent, who said, "Ye shall not surely die," or whether it originated in Egypt, Persia, Media, Babylonia, or elsewhere, it matters not. One thing is certain, it did not originate with God, else Job would have been in possession of it; and we will put Job's knowledge and wisdom against all the Babylonians, Persians, Medes, Assyrians, Zoroasters, and Platos on earth! This is doubtless the oldest book or document extant, and on that account demands the attention of the sincere inquirer after truth on this subject.

"The Hindoo philosophers," says Dr. Good, "totally and universally denying a resurrection of the body, and supporting the doctrine (of future existence) alone upon the natural immortality of the soul, and the Arabian philosophers (among whom was Job), passing over the immortality of the soul, and resting it alone upon a resurrection of the body."

The Hindoo view of this question is the legitimate tendency of the modern dogma on the same subject—it leads to a denial of the resurrection.

"The Christian Advocate," and Methodism.

We are glad to announce an exchange with the above-named paper, after so long a time. We like to look at those papers with which we were familiar years ago. Zion's Herald came into existence several years before the Christian Advocate. The former was truly the Herald of New England Methodism, and of New England enterprise. The success of Zion's Herald induced the Methodist Book Concern, in New York, some years later. to start the Christian Advocate, about 1827, if we mistake not. Not long after, the two papers were united in one, and issued in this city. This arrangement did not work long; for New England Methodists did not relish the loss of their beloved first-born; and soon Zion's Herald reappeared in Boston, to the joy of its old friends. Since that time it has lived and prospered. The Christian Advocate became the grand organ of the great Methodist family in the United States. Not many years passed, however, before the body found it necessary to issue branch papers of the same name in different parts of the country. The exact number of them, at this time, we do not know; but they are in all sections, from the Atlantic to the Pacific oceans, and have a powerful influence in building up Methodism.

In 1836 we withdrew from the Methodist Itinerancy—i.e., from what is called the "Travelling Connection," composed of preachers who receive appointments, at the Annual Conferences, from the Bishops for the year following. We had been in that relation eleven years, and were twice a member of their General Conference, viz., at Philadelphia in 1832, and in Cincinnati in 1836; those Conferences assembling once in four years, composed of delegates from the several Annual Conferences.

The Conference arrangements were a power in the Methodist Episcopal Church admirably calculated to spread Methodism through the land, and it has done it; though the slavery question cut it in twain in 1844. That division was probably favorable to both sections, as it saved these bodies the vexation which was previously sure to arise in both their General and Annual Conferences. The Southern Methodists went on their course unmolested, and Northern Methodists, freed from the restraints of the Southern section, gradually became harmonious on the slavery question, till finally the war made them a unit.

We have said, we left the Itinerancy in 1836; but we did not withdraw from the M. E. Church till 1840, four years later. It was not dissatisfaction with her doctrines that led to this step; though our mind had been somewhat exercised on the immortality question for three years prior to that time. It was what we regarded as an undue influence exercised by the Episcopacy in restraining free action in the Annual Conferences in matters on which members believed it to be right to express their convictions. We came to the conclusion that no man or body of men had any authority from God to interfere with our responsibility to Christ, the Head of the Church; for, "Every one of us shall give account of himself to God." Rom. xiv. 12. With this view we left the M. E. Church, and have never for one moment regretted that we did so. We never have felt any hostility to that Church since we left it; and we rejoice in all the good it can accomplish. We have no doubt it numbers very many earnest Christians, both in its ministry and in its membership; and we rejoice in the prospect that they will ere long introduce Laymen into their General and Annual Conferences, believing that advance will tend to open the way for more changes; so that in doctrine they will also make an advance, at no distant day. We do not differ with that body in relation to the necessity of vital piety, or experimental religion; nor in their views of Christ's tasting death for every man, and that salvation is free for all. So far as a living religion is involved, we are in harmony with them. In various details in respect to these matters we may differ somewhat widely. But with us, that is no reason for disfellowship.

Since we left that church we have never united with any human organization called a church, and never expect to; simply because all of them require assent to some doctrine which we do not believe, or seek to restrain the utterance of what we regard as truth; thus virtually saying, "We have all necessary truth, and you must not go beyond our advanced posts." This we regard as interfering with our right as an individual, responsible to God alone for our belief. No man or body of men has any right thus to impose a restriction on the search after truth, or to restrict the candid and honest promulgation of what we believe to be the truth.

We claim union with the "one body of Christ," "the church of the living God;" and we rejoice to acknowledge all who are truly joined unto the Lord by the "one Spirit" of God as members of that church, whenever we see the spirit, or "mind of Christ" manifested; and we ask no man what his church relation is, only so that we see he truly loves our Lord Jesus Christ. He may differ from us doctrinally, ever so much, if he does so in love, or charity. We condemn no man because he does not now see as we do. God is, and has been longsuffering with us all; and it becomes us to be longsuffering with one another; waiting for the time to come when we "shall see eye to eye." We trust that time is not far off.

The World's Crisis.

The above-named paper has a long article in its issue of the 30th ult. on "The Lord's Supper Question," which it credits "Herald of Life." The natural conclusion from this credit would be that the article was editorial; i. e., by the Editor. Courtesy would demand of an exchange that its borrowed matter should be credited to the author, though the name of the paper in which it first appeared might be given, especially should the author's name be given when the writer was only a correspondent, and advocated views opposed to those of the Editor, as is true in the article above named. We ask only for justice, and therefore request the Crisis to give its readers the author's name, and please say, the Editor of the Herald of Life responded to that article, under the head of "The Logic Tested;" and if the Crisis wishes to copy our reply it can do so, and give credit "Herald of Life:" then it will speak truly. To credit the article in its columns of the 30th ult. in that way, without the author's name was a mistake, or an unfriendly act. We trust it was the former. Will it please tell us which?

The article on the Lord's Supper, and our Response, appeared in the Herald of Life, March 1, 1865; and the subject has scarcely been mentioned in our columns, argumentatively, from that day to this. Our main article in defence of the annual observance of the Lord's Supper, appeared more than a year previously, and may be found in Vol. I., No. 17, Feb. 17, 1864. What the object could be to revive the controversy, at this time, it is not for us to judge; but we are ready to meet the question and to defend the annual celebration against all others. That the others are of mere human invention, and without authority, is evident from the fact that those who reject the annual, or anniversary celebration, have as many different times for it as there are days and months in the year: some daily, some weekly, some monthly, some once in two months, others once in three months, etc. If it is an ordinance of Christ at all, we cannot be made to believe any such indefinite arrangement was left to the Church of God.

Br. F. H. Burbank will make this city his head quarters for the present. He will assist what he can in business matters relating to the office of the Herald of Life. It is especially desirable that books, pamphlets, and tracts should have more attention given to their getting out and being circulated than we can possibly give to that work; and in order to it, Br. Burbank will give a portion of his time during the week to this department; but he will be ready to go out and preach Sundays where the way opens, or where he may be invited. Let our friends now lend a helping hand to the "Tract Fund," that there may be no lack of means to carry forward this part of our work. We could use thousands of dollars for this purpose, to great advantage, if we had it; but we can accomplish more with small means than most other establishments. Now is the time to urge forward the enterprise of scattering light on the Life views.

My Post-Office Address, until further notice, will be, Box 4,658, New York.

Letters and Extracts.

Br. Storrs: According to my promise, on last Saturday afternoon, wife and myself went to Mauch Chunk. It was a beautiful day, and we arrived there at a quarter before six o'clock. The ride was delightful, and the scenery was beautiful. But on Sunday morning the heavens were overcast with clouds, and at noon the rain came down in good earnest, so that I despaired of having an audience at two o'clock, the hour of meeting. It rained in good earnest; but to our surprise, there were about one hundred persons in the hall waiting our arrival. They listened with great attenton to what we had to say. We spoke for one hour and a half upon the theme of man's mortality. In the evening the number was larger, although it rained very hard; but the people seemed determined to hear what we had to say. We spoke rather longer in the evening, on the glorious theme of life only in and through Christ, and that by a resurrection from the dead.

We feel repaid for our time and trouble, in the fact of one hundred or more having heard the glorious truths of life in their simple and, as we believe, true principles, as made known in the gospel. We hope good may come out of the visit. On the first Sunday in October we have an engagement at West Chester. If we are spared and well we expect to speak in Horticultural Hall, the same place we spoke in one year ago.

Cincinnati, Ohio, Sept. 21, 1868.

Br. Storrs: At a recent "Harvest Home" picnic—a sort of thanksgiving festival annually observed by the people of our city and county—I embraced the opportunity of distributing a great many of our "Campaign Documents," and also a number of our other tracts. Of the former I have a few left: of the latter I am out. I send you enclosed $5, for one of which you will please send me the tracts, "Gospel Hope" and "Man's Nature and Destiny." The balance, $4, is for two copies of the Herald, Vol. VI., to be sent as follows: ——— ———.

I pledge myself to take five dollars' worth in tracts on the "Living Soul," as soon as that shall have been published. I am very anxious to scatter it along with our other publications. It is the best thing out on the soul question, looking at the subject from a philosophical standpoint, to say nothing of the biblical one, and deserves a wide and extensive circulation. Since I first read it in the Bible Examiner, years ago, I have repeatedly read it again, not only to myself, but also to others, and always with much satisfaction and delight. It is a Gibraltar against the notion that man has an immortal soul. His fancied "superior soul" will vanish as the dew before the morning sun, if he will only let the light that streams forth from its pages in upon his beclouded vision.

I shall use my best endeavors to get more subscribers to our loved Herald, but do not promise myself much from men who have stereotyped views of religion, which, though baptized by them as "Orthodox" are as far from the truth as the Bible is from their creeds.

Note by the Editor.—The author of "Living Soul" has revised and somewhat enlarged the article since it appeared in the Herald, a few weeks since. He wishes "to show that what is called mind in man, in some varied form, runs through all created form of matter." Shall we have the whole in a tract? Let us hear from all who say, Yes.

From J. C. Day.

South Ashburnham, Mass., Sept. 27, 1868.

Br. Storrs: I am glad to learn, by the paper, that you are having an increase upon your subscription list; and I think as far as my observation goes, there is an increasing anxiety to learn upon our views; and I feel satisfied that there are thinking men and women, who cannot long be kept from investigation; and when candid, thinking, unprejudiced minds come impartially to investigate the Scriptures upon man's nature and destiny by his connection with the first Adam, I think they can't be long in learning that man must have some other principles of life, other than the blood life, or he can never hope to live again by a resurrection from the dead. "It is sown a natural body: It is raised a spiritual body." "The first man Adam was made a living soul," or, man. "The last Adam was made a quickening spirit." Again it is said of Christ, that he was "put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit." Now, it seems to me that if ever we are made alive from the dead, it must be by our connection with Christ by this quickening principle, the Spirit of God. It is only the new man, or the man that is "created anew in Christ Jesus," that can hope for life by a resurrection from the dead. The Apostle says, Rom. viii., 10, 11, "If Christ be in you, the body is dead because of sin; but the Spirit is life because of righteousness. But if the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, He that raised up Christ from the dead, shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you." Now, it seems to me, by a fair construction of this language that no others will be quickened into life, only those who have this indwelling life principle, the Spirit of God. And to this agreeth other texts; for it is said, "If any man have not the spirit of Christ he is none of his." And He has only promised to raise up his own. "And this is the will of Him that sent me, that every one that seeeth the Son, and believeth on Him, may have everlasting life: and I will raise him up at the last day." And "he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him. Again, "And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day." O, then, how important it is that we become connected with the Life-giver by a living, active faith, now, in the only time God has given us to secure that life, and prepare to receive it in full when the Life-giver shall come. O, how glad I am that God can work, and none can hinder. I think the camp meeting at Springfield was a success, beyond all my expectation, to the life views, notwithstanding all the opposition. Let us stand firm to our post; keep the good spirit, and keep sowing the seed; and let the winds blow and men rage, if they will; they can do nothing against the truth, but for it. The old ship will ride safe into the harbor at last. Truth will triumph in the end; God's name will be glorified, and his people saved. Amen.

Bethel, Vt., Sept. 20, 1868.

Br. Storrs: I feel to thank God and rejoice in his promises that the question asked in the Herald, a short time since, was so nobly answered at Springfield, that the Herald of Life shall live. The voice of God is that of a living Being, and will be heard; glory to His name forever more; and praise to his name for having raised up such a company of men, who are possessed of means and are willing to sacrifice money and time to work for the salvation of men. The doctrine of no future life out of Christ is the doctrine of salvation for men. This agrees with the testimony of Peter, "Thou hast the words of eternal life." And again, "There is no other name under heaven given among men whereby we can be saved." Some try to make out that man would have lived forever even had Christ not come into the world; which is virtually calling Christ an impostor; and saying that man had no need of a Saviour, a Life-giver, because an everliving being; whereas God says that he made man of the dust of the ground; and when Adam sinned He told him, "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." Theologians affirm that the body dies for sin committed; but the soul lives on forever, God's word to the contrary notwithstanding. He says, "The soul that sinneth it shall die;" and nothing is said about the body in this account of man; for the very good reason that He reckons with man as man; not a body, or part body and part soul; but the whole being, the man; so that when He says, man, he means man, and not a shell, as if speaking of a mud-turtle; but man as a whole. Thus we see that, when man, the whole man, disobeyed his Lord's command, he died; and reason says, that all there was of man died as the penalty for his sin; and the whole tenor of Scripture agreeth thereto. In this view we see the necessity of a Saviour to come into the world, to bring life and immortality to light, that men might see and believe, and not perish in death, but have a resurrection out from among the dead ones that did not and do not believe; such shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on them. They shall never see life; therefore they cannot suffer future torments. Thanks to a merciful God and a just Creator, who will not inflict what he has not threatened; but will perform all he has promised. Blessed be His name forever.

From C. B. Dwight.

Springfield, Mass., Sept. 30, 1868.

Br. Storrs: I send a new subscriber, to commence with Vol. VI. I love the Herald next to the Bible, because it speaks words of comfort and love in harmony with God's word. Life to the righteous through Christ. Eternal death to the ungodly as the penalty for sin. No anger, malice, or torment in the God of Love. For nearly twenty years (through ignorance) I have been an advocate of the torment theory.

How thankful I am that I have learned a better way, and am rejoicing in hope of the glory of God, to be revealed when Jesus comes to give Life and immortality to those who believe; and to leave the wicked to reap the wages of sin, which is death. But, says one, if that is all the punishment there is, I don't think I should ever have sought religion. Thus my friend admits that he attempts to serve God through fear of torment. How long, O how long, will the professed disciples of Christ follow a delusion and pervert the word of God, especially when they are made acquainted with the truth? But we should be encouraged from the fact that some do hear and believe. Let us continue to labor, in patience and hope, till our Redeemer comes.

I hope to do something soon toward publishing and giving circulation to the article on the "Living Soul," as I consider it the best argument on the mortality of man that I have seen, aside from Revelation. Yours, in Love.

C. N. Buzzel, writes from Ridgeway, Elk Co., Pa.: I could with difficulty get a living in the East (N. H.) at work, so I have moved to this place; off in the woods; with no meetings, and no professors except myself and wife. If we are able to stand, God will indeed have to help us to live for him. I cannot do without the Herald of Life. If you know of any advent believers in this part of Pennsylvania, let me know.

Note by Editor. We have no knowledge of any; but you must have something to scatter in that new field, and you will not be alone long. Sow the seed. The Lord will see that it takes root. You have a fine field to work in. Pray and labor till the rain of mercy causes a refreshing, and the "blade" shall appear; then the "ear;" after that the "full corn in the ear" will appear, and you shall have rejoicing in the manifestation of the grace of God.

A. L. Houghton, South Adams, Mass., writes: I wish the paper continued to me; and I also send you one new subscriber. I could not think of doing without the Herald of Life. I prize it very much; and I believe the doctrine it advocates is the truth; and my prayer is, that the blessing of God may rest upon those connected with it, in their efforts to show a dying world the Saviour's love. The "Campaign Documents" you sent me were duly received, and I scattered them among my friends. May God bless them as they go on their mission of love. I find many willing to read, and some on the point of giving up the traditions of men. May the time be not far distant when all shall believe on the Saviour as the only hope of eternal life.

S. S. Call, Newport Centre, Vt., writes: I send you one more new subscriber. Life only in Christ is working its way and making a shaking among professors and teachers of theology. Christ our all; Christ our Saviour, Christ our sacrifice, our passover, as we present it, they say has a tendency to destroy the reality of religion, i.e., it destroys their forms and ceremonies, etc. I tell them, those are but the traditions of men: for Paul saith, "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." He evidently considered that sufficient; for every man is actuated more or less by what he believes. His actions manifest his belief. Our Lord tells us how we shall know men; not by rites and ceremonies, but "their fruits."

Louisa R. Morey, Canaan, N. H., writes: My heart was made truly glad when I read the favorable report of the Anniversary of the "Life and Advent Union" at Springfield. Surely the Lord has a hand in the matter, blessed be His precious name. I often wish I could do something for our much loved paper, but do not see as I am likely to have the opportunity soon. I have not been well since last February, and most of the time able to do but little work. I am afflicted with scrofula; but I am trusting in the Lord for help in his own good way. I cannot do well without the Herald of Life, and hope to pay for it soon. I cannot attend meeting and seldom see one of like faith. May the Lord bless you and all the dear friends of truth in their labors for its advancement. Your sister in Christ.

Eld. W. S. Campbell wrote us from Mass., Sept. 21st, saying: I expect to leave for the West in about two weeks, to spend some three or four weeks, in which time I shall preach and scatter publications as I may have opportunity. After two weeks, communications to me may be addressed to Chicago, Ill.

Note by Editor.—The foregoing did not reach us till our last paper had gone to press. We hope Br. Campbell may be furnished with all the publications he can scatter, and be helped on his way.

A Word to Subscribers.

This number of the Herald of Life is sent to all our old subscribers, with very few exceptions. We send in hope, or with an expectation that you all wish to continue, only you were not prepared just now to send the pay in strict advance; but send it at the earliest possible time; we trust before January.

We confess the idea of departing from our previous practice, of strict advance payment, has made us fear the consequences might be evil. Especially, when one of our exchanges announced, a few weeks since, that it had thousands of dollars due on its books, the want of which was seriously embarrassing them. If our subscribers get half of one thousand dollars in our debt, we shall have to make a clean sweep of such as are in arrears, unless they assign a good reason for a further delay. "But, beloved, we hope better things of you and things that accompany 'prompt remittances,' though we thus speak." We have the best list of subscribers, considering their numbers, that any paper can boast of. May the conductors of the paper so direct all matters that its friends shall have no cause to complain.

The article on the above subject, published a few weeks since in this paper, has been called for in tract form. We stated it would be so issued as soon as we could be assured the expense would be met. Forty dollars are wanted for this purpose. As yet, less than half that amount has been pledged. Shall the full sum be made up? You can have your money's worth back in the tracts, if you desire it; but the object is to scatter it gratuitously. Those who are disposed to help, will confer a favor by doing so immediately. Do not delay. When published, the tract will be put among the "Campaign Documents." It ought to go out in that class.

The Watch Tower:
or, Man in Death.

A call has been made for a cheap edition of this work. We do not see that it can be issued in the present state of the Tract Fund. Our friends did well the past year; and we have books and pamphlets on hand to the amount of two hundred dollars or more, belonging to that department; but we have no funds to print more till these are sold, unless we receive donations or advanced pay, to get out new editions and new works.

Praying for an Enemy.

At an anti-slavery meeting, a minister related the following anecdote. The case occurred within the circle of his own acquaintance. A slave who could neither read nor write, heard the gospel, and the Spirit of God made it effectual to his conversion. Like all true converts, he felt a missionary spirit. He was anxious for the conversion of his brethren; and, at length, it became his uniform practice, frequently after the toils of the day were over, to walk two or three miles, and hold a meeting among the slaves. On one occasion, this meeting was discovered by the patrol, who are authorized to inflict summary punishment of ten lashes upon all slaves they find assembled together, for any reason. This was done immediately with all present, but "Old Gabriel," as he was the ringleader, they thought must be punished more severely; so they took him to the magistrate. As they were tying up his hands, he exclaimed, "Oh this is just the way Pontius Pilate did to my Massa!" Here his persecutors relented. One of them afterward was troubled in his conscience for what he had done; and after a long time, finding no peace, he went to "Old Gabriel," and asked him if he would forgive him. "Forgive you!" said Old Gabriel; "why massa, me have been praying for you ever since you tied me up!"

Poetry.

"CAST ALL YOUR CARE ON HIM."

O COME to Jesus, weary one,
Whate'er the load you bear;
Before the Cross just lay it down
And trust it to His care.

Nor cast it down to take again,
But sweetly leave it there;
He knows your every grief and pain,
And will not spurn your prayer.

Leave there the anxious weight of care
For dear ones far away;
His watchful love is everywhere,
Though dangers crowd the way.

Leave there foreboding thoughts of ill;
Believe his promise sure,
Whose loving kindness surely will
All needful good secure.

Ye hearts bereaved, o'ercast with gloom,
O come with all your grief,
And he who wept o'er Lazarus' tomb
Will give you sweet relief.

Lay down a burdened, sinful heart,
Repent and be forgiven;
Life, joy and peace will he impart
Who died to purchase Heaven.

There is no care too great or small
For His exhaustless love;
On him then freely cast it all,

A TRUE STORY.

"ONCE upon a time," as stories were generally begun in my childhood days, there lived two little sisters in the town of T——t. They loved each other dearly, as sisters and brothers should always do. As they were playing one evening on the pavement before their father's door, the little one, whom we will call "Brown-eyes," threw a pebble, which, unfortunately, hit the elder sister, whom we will call "Blue-eyes." Several gentlemen standing near, seeing the accident, expected to hear a loud scream and an angry voice saying, "You ugly thing; I'll just tell mother! You did it a-purpose—I know you did—you mean, ugly thing," and so on, as angry children will talk. But these gentlemen heard nothing of the kind. For a moment little Blue-eyes stood, ready to cry—for to be hit by a pebble hurts. As I said, Blue-eyes stood for a moment looking at poor, dismayed Brown-eyes, then she ran to her, threw her arms round her, and said, "Don't cry, little sister; I know you didn't mean to hit me. Kiss me, dear," and the sisters kissed and embraced each other fondly. The gentlemen who saw the little ones told their father of it, adding, "We never saw any thing like that before." Alas! and is sisterly and brotherly love and forbearance so rare a thing that the loving sisters' conduct should call forth a remark like that? Dear children, do be kind and loving to all, bnt especially to your sisters and brothers, whom God has given to you to love. Try to be like Jesus, who not only loves those who love him, but he loves his enemies. He died that his enemies might live.

MARY'S PRAYER.

LITTLE Mary's mother had occasion to correct her the other night. Mary was angry, and when she said her prayers, instead of asking God to bless papa and mamma, as she was wont to do, she said: "God bless papa, and don't bless mamma."

Her mother took no notice, and Mary jumped into bed without her good-night kiss. By-and-by she began to breathe hard, and at length she whispered: "Mamma, are you going to live a great while?"

"I don't know," was the answer.

"Do you think you shall?"

"I cannot tell."

"Do many mothers die and leave their children?"

"A great many."

"Mamma," said Mary, with a trembling voice, "I am going to say another prayer;" and clasping her little hands, she cried: "God bless papa, and the dearest, best mamma any little girl ever had in the world."

That's the way, children. If you knew your mothers were going to die very shortly, you could not be half kind enough to them. But do you not know that, be they long or short-lived, there lies before you, written so plainly that he who runs may read, "Honor thy father and thy mother?"

Remember that every wrong committed against loving parents will, when they shall have passed from earth, bite like a serpent and sting like an adder.—Well-Spring.

"THE WORST OF IT."

"Do you want to buy any berries to-day?" said a poor little boy to me one afternoon.

I looked at the little fellow, and saw that he was poorly dressed. In his hand he held a large basket full of ripe raspberries.

I told him I should like some; and taking the basket from him, stepped into the house. He did not follow me.

"Why don't you come in and see if I measure your berries rightly?" said I, "How do you know but I may cheat you, and take more than I agreed for?"

The boy looked up at me and smiled. "I am not afraid," said he, "for you would get the worst of it, ma'am."

"Get the worst of it!" I said. "What do you mean?"

"Why, ma'am, I should only lose my berries, but you would be stealing. Don't you think that would be the worst for you?"

Let us think of this when we are tempted in any way to cheat another. How often do we hear persons pity any one who has had his property stolen from him. Yet, though a man lose all, and keeps honest, he is rich indeed compared with the man who had robbed him.—Winning Words.

A FRIEND TO FLY TO.

A SHORT time since, I was awakened by the sound of footsteps in my chamber, and a confused noise in the streets. I soon became aware that an alarm of fire was lending its peculiar terrors to the dead of night, and that a startled child was hurrying to nestle in a parent's arms. A few gentle words, and a few loving caresses, and the tumultuous throbbings of that little heart were soon again in a sweet, sound sleep. "What a blessing to have a friend to fly to!" was the thought that came at once to my mind; and what a lesson for us all is this simple incident. "For we have not a high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin. Let us therefore come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need." We may not always have an earthly parent or friend to fly to. But a sympathizing Saviour we have always. Times of need will come, when neither father nor mother will be able to help us. He always will, who has gone to appear in the presence of God before us; Reader. remember your Friend. He has given you this gracious promise, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee."

THE BENEFIT OF PRAYER.

[The following article, which we take from the Am. Presbyterian, is so replete with sound and scriptural sense, that we take pleasure in transferring it to our columns:]

THE MEDICINE OF PRAYER.

A celebrated surgeon of this city, of the generation just past, not a professor of religion, nor much like one, has been known to beg the earnest prayers of a minister of the gospel visiting one of his patients, who had just submitted to one of those heroic performances with the knife for which the surgeon was famous. "Give us," said the worldly, but anxious surgeon, "one of those effectual prayers of faith for the recovery of the sick, which have such promises of reward." The prayer was offered, but the patient died. Singular stories were told, some seven years ago, of Dorothea Trudel's Refuge, in Germany, for the sick, who were cured by her persevering prayers, and a book was published, detailing the circumstances, some of which were certainly remarkable.

Thus there is an uncertainty about the direct remedial efficacy of prayer, while, nevertheless, the promise, James v., 15, does encourage us to use it a means of recovery in connection with other and more ordinary means. Believing prayer for the sick has just as good a warrant for expecting an answer, as prayer for any other temporal good, it must be offered in humble submission to the divine will, and with. unshaken faith, although the answer may not be in the very line of our desires. "It cannot be taken," says Mr. Barnes, in commenting on the passage "in the absolute and unconditional sense, for then, if these means were used, the sick person would always recover, no matter how often he might be sick, and he need never die. The design is to encourage . . . to the use of these means, with a strong hope that it would be effectual."

We may not be clear, therefore, on this point; but in the general position, that prayer deserves a place as a remedial agent, as truly as any famous herb or mineral, in the materia medica, there ought to be the most unwavering confidence. The physician himself needs it to guide and clear his mind, and steady his nerves in critical cases; to guide him through the often profoundly obscure region of experiments which the uncertainty of his profession compels him to make; to give him that elevation and courage which his work, as a foe of the arch-enemy death, requires. At that scene of languishing and pain, of uncertainty and peril, that borderland of the grave, that vestibule of the house of mourning, that spectacle of human weakness and of the creature made subject to vanity—the sick-bed—what exercise so appropriate as that of humbly acknowledging dependence on God, and of pleading for His favor in restoration to health, in forgiveness of sins, in the sanctification of trials, in calming the mind, in preparation for death if it is to come? The right sort of medical practice will always encourage the right sort of prayer at the sick-bed, as part of its own instrumentality.

For the secondary, reflex effects of believing prayer are incontestibly of a character to relieve, comfort, refresh and restore the sick. Prayer calms the disturbed mind by rolling its burdens upon God; prayer gives rise to a sense of the Divine presence and sympathy; prayer is felt somehow to bring the Divine omnipotence and wisdom upon the field where the powers of man are so soon exhausted and baffled. If there be any value, in the judgment of the physician, in a calm, composed, hopeful frame of mind and elasticity of feelings, and in the absence of vexation and restlessness from the patient, then believing prayer, as the great instrument in producing these results, must be reckoned as holding a high place among real remedial agents.

In these periods of intense exertion of the nervous energies, perhaps the type of disease most widely prevalent, is Nervous. Disorders attack that part of the bodily system which lies, as it were, on the very borders of the mind. Disease is, in fact, very often almost a direct result of the want of a praying, i. e. trustful, spirit. It is because men forget God, forget their dependence upon him for wealth and worldly comfort, forget that man does not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God, that they so often "break down." The punishment of prayerlessness, the natural consequence of prayerlessness, runs in a dark line through a large part of the sickness of our day. A return to prayers must, therefore, be of the nature of a specific for just the prevalent type of sickness. It is by returning to God that the nervous ague and fever-will, most likely, be soothed, the unwhole some ardor of the brain cooled, and the whole brood of anxieties that are preying on the nervous system be put to flight.

We are no advocates of an anti-worldly unenterprising style of piety, in or out of the Church. We ask not for any abatement of business energy. To pray well is to work well. But we verily believe that the quietism of the Quakers has not a little to do with the general superiority which they have hitherto enjoyed in health, in good development of body, and in longevity. We shall fare better, every way, for living in that daily, hourly trust in, and submission to God's will and wisdom, which is called "prayer without ceasing." We ask only for the abandonment of the godless eagerness with which men pursue worldly ends; we protest, in the interests of bodily health, against enterprise or pleasure which has not time to give one day in seven to prayer, which excuses itself from family worship from want of time, and which recklessly drives on the machinery of body and soul, without waiting to drop upon it that oil of prayer which is to save it from grinding, and jarring and crushing upon itself until it becomes a hopeless ruin.

Letters and Extracts.

FROM ELD. A. GUTHRIE.

TRUMANSBURG., N. Y., Sept. 23, 1868.

BR. STORRS: My health is improving slowly, through the blessing of God upon the means used for my recovery and the prayers of his children. I am so much better that I can walk half a mile with the use of a cane, and can talk some. I gave the HERALD OF LIFE to a Methodist brother, and he read the long article entitled "The Living Soul," and said he would take the paper for one year. I have furnished him with reading before, but nothing brought him to a willingness to take the paper until this article. I think it would make a good "Campaign Document." My heart overflowed with gratitude, so much that I could not refrain from weeping, when I saw the names of the benevolent ones and the sums attached to them to sustain the HERALD OF LIFE.

May the Lord give them his' rich, saving grace as a compensation. Your Br. in hope.

REMARK BY EDITOR.—We rejoice that the Lord has been so gracious to our very dear Br. Guthrie; and hope he may be able to continue in the blessed work of proclaiming "Life through Christ alone."

FROM GEO. L. HART.

NEW BRITAIN, CONN., Sept. 23, 1868.

BR. STORRS: Inclosed I send $2 for the ensuing year. Also accept my best wishes for the good that may appear in the columns of the HERALD OF LIFE. I will cast in occasionally my mite by way of contribution. And all shall be sent with this desire, only to glorify our heavenly father; and if rejected, I will not meditate displeasure.

To our dear Brethren in the Life view: We rally only to conquer. Our Captain gave command "Overcome": and retreat never was in the gospel. I am learning of him who giveth liberally. As I view the future by the spirit's ken, I hail the glorious morn that giveth exaltation to Judah's King in this world. And I ask myself, even now, if the marshalling of the mighty angels is not signalled by the shaken foundations of the earth that now is, that the Apostle in Hebrews seems to teach as the sign of removal? the shaking of heaven and earth agreeing with Haggai and Habakkuk. The tidal wave that sets in upon the shore of old ocean, gives us to understand that the law of order in the established boundary of the deep, is also among the affected in the kingdom of man. O, how we need Jesus and his kingdom. Thanks be to our God, salvation is at hand. When I read the account of the recent earthquake, and how the sea and waves roared, and tossed the large ocean steamers upon land like surf boats, the poetical prayer of Habakkuk, like the electric battery, sent a thrill of joy into my heart. Thinking that even now the beginning of the mighty end was announced, Truly the Lord is marching through the land in indignation. Man has about cast away JEHOVAH'S cords, little thinking that if left to themselves they perish. I long for the age of perfection, when wisdom will be accessible to all; when in the fulness we approach the Divine Invisible; when grace will abound in all as each promise comes to mind. Ye saints patiently labor under their inspiring influence. I love to multiply them to the weary ones who wait. What is earth, as we receive it from the earthy? life by generation, so short, compared with that of regeneration? Everlasting ages roll on: we live only to advance; undying, eternal. Would you be educated and talented? The disadvantages of the present time are gone. Memory divine gathers up from untold resources the knowledge we adore; all that is worthy of our efforts. Is honor a temptation among the titled, who are forgotten at last? Think of the honor of that age when men are equal to the angels! when God dwells with them! ever present to them. Ye kings, ye presidents, thy courtiers comparenot with the Sovereignty of Jerusalem. Each attribute extolled. One more brilliant than all will be the guiding star of eternity, Love. This bond of perfectness has achieved it all. In the world this blessed Love has mingled with the vile and wretched to alleviate and save. Then sin and all its consequences will be gone, and the vibration of those lofty stanzas of the redeemed can tell how wondrous that loved Redeemer was armed to save.

Each saint adorned; each member of the new creation responds in every exertion to please, either in blooming flowers with fragrant odors inviting, or sounds melodious to charm. And our occupation to do His will that loved us, and washed us from our sins.

ALBANY, N. Y., Sept. 22, 1868.

BR. STORRS: I thought that I would send you $2 for my HERALD OF LIFE now; but poor sister H. cannot send you any for the continuance of her paper. I felt as though I would say, put one dollar for each of us now; and when I can, I will send you more for my paper, for I want you to have no embarrassment in funds; and if I had money I would send to all the poor that have no means to get it; for I truly feel that it would be more blessed to give to all than to receive; for if all felt as I do, there would be no lack of funds for publishing such glorious truths as it contains; and for the knowledge of the Scriptures which is able to make wise unto salvation, and which is food to the hungry soul, and to the weary, rest. When I think of all the blessed things laid up in store for God's children, who will come out of great tribulation and will have washed their robes in the blood of the Lamb, and be made pure and spotless and free from all the ills of this life, I am lost in wonder, love and praise; and how can we praise our dear precious Saviour enough for coming to atone for such sinners as we were? My cup runneth over with such blessings as He alone can bestow. How many times I have praised God for letting me live in these days of light and knowledge; for it seems too wonderful for me. May you be spared until Jesus comes. Only just think of all the prayers of the people in your behalf, and how God encourages your heart by the means to sustain our dear HERALD OF LIFE, tracts, and books; and may our dear Father in heaven grant that you may have health, strength, and all needed wisdom to carry forward his great work. My daily prayer for you is, that you may have many Aarons and Hurs to hold up your hands. May God bless you in all things needful. Oh, how my heart runs out to God for blessings on all his children; that they may be kept unspotted from the world, and have grace for every trial, and come off more than conquerors through him that loved us and washed us from all sin with His own blood, and sanctifies us by his word; and has promised never to forsake us, if faithful to him. Bless his holy name, He verifies his promises to me every day; and the promise is, if we trust Him we shall want no good thing. But how I want to do good. My heart is full to overflowing with gratitude to God and love for his people: and when at the camp-meeting, Oh, how many of the dear ones I got acquainted with; to meet with them here and then to live with the dear saints in God's everlasting kingdom forever. I can say, I long for the time to come when we will meet to part no more, and to be free from sorrow, pain and sin; and to be made immortal, to die no more, is worth enduring to everlasting life; and my heart says, Come Lord Jesus, and come quickly. Yours, in hope of life.

FROM J. HAMILTON.

FREDONIA, N. Y., Sept. 22, 1868.

BR. STORRS: I have not lost my interest in the all-important truths advocated in the HERALD OF LIFE. As many others have said, it is all the preaching I have; although I live in a village of steeples and sectarian churches. Their teaching is not preaching to me; therefore the HERALD is received with increasing interest. I have been trying and will try to add one new subscriber for the paper; and it does look as though so small a thing could be accomplished; and I think it can; but the advocates of error are numerous and powerful, being the teachers of the people. I was very much interested in the article the "LIVING SOUL," in the HERALD. I think it should come out in a tract. It cannot but open the eyes of some. Oh how glad I am that God has raised up such firm and able friends to the HERALD OF LIFE. I felt to thank God with all my heart when I read the proceedings of the annual meeting; and may the blessing of God rest upon all those noble brethren that subscribed so liberally for the support of the paper, and upon our beloved Br. Storrs and his family. Please find inclosed $3 for the next volume. I hope to send more.

FROM J. W. McCAGG.

WARSAW, N. Y., Sept. 21, 1868.

BR. STORRS: Your welcome paper greets me every Friday evening, and a rich treat it is to a soul hungering and thirsting after the Bible truths. It was through the HERALD OF LIFE I first saw the doctrine of No Life out of Christ; and how clear that stands out before my mind to-day. It is like apples of gold in pictures of silver. I have never had any opportunity of hearing it preached, or conversing with any one who believed in the eternal sleep of the wicked dead, as all the adventists in our vicinity are believers in a resurrection of the wicked dead; and then each to suffer before he is dead, just in proportion to the amount of sin committed.

I can see no life from the dead except by the same Spirit that raised Jesus from the dead; and if that Spirit raises the wicked into life why are they not as well off as the righteous? I must confess, to my mind, I see not any prospect of a resurrection unless raised immortal and incorruptible. Oh how I bless the Lord for His wonderful goodness in breaking this glorious truth to my mind at so late a period of my life! How can any person expect to live again unless they believe God and obey him? He that believeth not in me, shall not see life. To believe in Christ is to receive every word of his sayings; every declaration of Jesus' words rejected, is one steps back into darkness. It is unbelief in the word of God which brings damnation to men. But God's truth is marching on. Many are searching the Scriptures. They are searching deep; and, if faithful, will find treasures which they will be willing to give all they possess in order to secure. We must be faithful a little longer. Our Jesus is sure to come; then you will meet that dear Son of yours, and I hope to meet that dear Wife of mine. Glory to God for such a faith that takes hold of God's promises, and believes He will do all he has promised. Your Brother, waiting for Jesus.

FROM A. A. BABCOCK.

ALBION, MICH., Sept., 1868.

BR. STORRS: I find the subject of life and death is making some advance in the Gospel Banner and the Prophetic Times, though it is hard for people to give up but what there must be some torment for the wicked in a future life; but they cannot tell what use it is, as there is no chance for them to improve; nor can they tell us how it can benefit the redeemed.

Let me ask one question. If I have sinned in my answer, please say so. I have said, If the theological hell is a reality, and God sends the wicked there and gives them a constitution to endure as long as He endures, can they not stand it better there than in this life with all the blessings of God and the kindness of friends? and if they can stand it, is not their condition better there than in this life where men have to get their bread by the sweat of their brow, with thorns and thistles to plague them, till they wear out, and so die and return to the ground from whence they were taken?

Immortal beings cannot suffer: that is both impossible and a contradiction. All pain indicates a partial interruption of the life principle; and if not arrested must end in death. —EDITOR.

FROM ELD. D. J. WEAVER.

WESTFIELD, MASS., Sept., 1868.

TO THE SCATTERED FLOCK OF CHRIST: How goes the battle? Well, says one, it goes well with me; but says another, it goes hard, yet I feel like holding on to the truth, let the consequences be what they may.

That shows wisdom; for the God of hosts will be with you, to care for you and keep you from falling, if you put your trust in him. Let the winds blow and the storms beat, it will only make you the brighter to shine in the future, if only faithful.

There is one consolation, to think that our Father knows how much we can bear; so let us never give up. So long as we trust in the great I AM, the stronger our faith will be to overcome all obstacles that may be placed in our way.

It is quite a lesson to learn, to be patient and wait, and let the Lord bring all things around for us; but He will do it, if we will be submissive to his will and not let our will get in opposition to his; for some times we think things ought to move faster than they do, and we begin to hurry and press them along; thus we get into trouble which we might have avoided if we had been patient and let every thing have worked easy in God's own way.

But sometimes our zeal for the truth is not what it should be, but we have to learn things by experience; and when we have learned that our will is not so much love for the truth as to have our own way, we see we are not in the place we ought to be.

Our motto should be, for the truth and to present it in love, for the love we have for it, and for the best interest of all that may have a chance to hear it. Let love be the ruling element in all things. Let our enemies see we do not mean to kill them with hard sayings, but kill them by carrying out the gospel principles, as Jesus commanded in his Sermon on the Mount.

JAMES W. SMITH, Chester, Pa., writes for some "Campaign Documents," and says: If I had the means, I would scatter a cart-load of these tracts around me. Some will read, but others will not. Some ask, why don't you let us alone? why do you interfere with us? I tell them, the Scribes and Pharisees said the very same thing. But Jesus kept interfering, and so did his apostles, and so do I. Much might be said of what I meet in my little missionary town, but I have not time now. I rejoice with all that rejoice that the HERALD OF LIFE still lives. May God bless all who have so nobly sustained it, and may they have their reward; and if my wish and prayer could be granted, I would pray that you, myself, and all that love the appearing of our Lord might be spared to see the consummation of that glorious event; for, I believe it is near. Accept my love in the "blessed hope."

SIX SERMONS on the Inquiry. Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the LIFE-GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. BY GEO. STORRS. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the true teachings of the BIBLE is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound. $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.

ALL NAMES of persons, sent us, should be written plain, so that we shall not have to guess them out. Also in ordering, the name of the POST OFFICE, COUNTY, AND STATE must be given, and written plainly; and if a CHANGE is called for, state the Office to which the paper has previously been sent. Unless attention is paid to all these matters confusion and delay are inevitable.

THE GLORY OF GOD IS LOVE.

[THE above sentiment will be found in the following sermon which we take from the Sunday Magazine (English) for Sept. The main things in it are so near in harmony with our sermon on "GOD IS LOVE," in last week's paper, that we take pleasure in laying it before our readers.]

WHEN Jesus Christ, the Son of God, and therefore our elder brother, was going about on the earth, eating and drinking with his brothers and sisters, there was one family he loved especially—a family of two sisters and a brother; for, although he loves everybody as much as they can be loved, there are some who can be loved more than others. Only God is always trying to make us such that we can be loved more and more. There are several stories—oh, such lovely stories!—about that family and Jesus. And we have to do with one of them now.

They lived near the capital of the country, Jerusalem, in a village they called Bethany; and it must have been a great relief to our Lord, when he was worn out with the obstinacy and pride of the great men of the city, to go out to the quiet little town, and into the refuge of Lazarus' house, where every one was more glad at the sound of his feet than at any news that could come to them.

They had at this time behaved so ill to him in Jerusalem, taking up stones to stone him even, though they dared not quite do it, mad with anger as they were—and all because he told them the truth—that he had gone away to the other side of the great river that divided the country, and taught the people in that quiet place. While he was there, his friend Lazarus was taken ill, and the two sisters, Martha and Mary, sent a messenger to him to say to him, "Lord, your friend is very ill." Only they said it more beautifully than that: "Lord, behold, he whom thou lovest is sick." You know when any one is ill, we always want the person whom he loves most to come to him. This is very wonderful. In the worst things that can come to us, the first thought is of love. People, like the Scribes and Pharisees, might say, "What good can that do him?" And we may not in the least suppose that the person we want knows any secret that can cure his pain; yet love is the first thing we think of. And here we are more right than we know; for, at the long last, love will cure everything; which truth indeed, this story will set forth to us. No doubt the heart of Lazarus, ill as he was, longed after his friend, and, very likely, even, the sight of Jesus might have given him such strength that the life in him could have driven out the death which had already got one foot across the threshold. But the sisters expected more than this. They believed that Jesus, whom they knew to have driven disease and death out of so many hearts, had only to come and touch him—nay, only to speak a word, to look at him, and their brother was saved. Do you think they presumed in thus expecting? The fact was, they did not believe enough; they had not yet learned to believe that he could cure him all the same whether he came to them or not, because he was always with them. We cannot understand this, because our understanding is never a measure of what is true.

Whether Jesus knew exactly all that was going to take place, I cannot tell. Some people may feel certain upon points that I dare not feel certain upon. One thing I am sure of—that he did not always know everything beforehand, for he said so himself. It is infinitely more valuable to us, because more beautiful and godlike in him, that he should trust his Father than that he should foresee everything. At all events he knew that his Father did not want him to go to his friends yet. So he sent them a message to the effect that there was a particular reason for this sickness, that the end of it was not the death of Lazarus, but the glory of God. This I think he told them by the same messenger they sent to him; and then instead of going to them he remained where he was.

But oh, my friends, what shall I say about this wonderful message? Think of being sick for the glory of God! of being shipwrecked for the glory of God! of being drowned for the glory of God! How can the sickness, the fear, the broken-heartedness of his creatures be for the glory of God? What kind of a God can that be? Why just a God so perfectly, absolutely good, that the things that look least like it are only the means of clearing our eyes to let us see how good he is. For he is so good that he is not satisfied with being good. He loves his children so that except he can make them good like himself, make them blessed by seeing how good he is, and desiring the same goodness in themselves, he is not satisfied. He is not like a fine, proud benefactor, who is content with doing that which will satisfy his sense of his own glory, but like a mother who puts her arm round her child, and whose heart is sore till she can make her child see the love which is her glory. The glorification of the Son of God is the glorification of the human race, for the glory of God is the glory of man, and that glory is love. Welcome sickness, welcome sorrow, welcome death revealing that glory!

The next two verses sound very strangely together, and yet they almost seem typical of all the perplexities of God's dealings. The old painters and poets represented Faith as a a beautiful woman holding in her hand a cup of wine and water, with a serpent coiled up within. High-hearted Faith! she scruples not to drink of the life-giving wine and water; she is not repelled by the upcoiled serpent. The serpent she takes but for the type of the the eternal wisdom that looks repellent because it is not understood. The wine is good, the water is good, and if the hand of the supreme Fate put that cup in her hand, the serpent itself must be good too, harmless at least to hurt the truth of the water and the wine. But let us read the verses.

"Now Jesus loved Martha, and her sister, and Lazarus. When he had heard therefore that he was sick, he abode two days still in the same place where he was."

Strange! his friend was sick; he abode two days where he was! But remember what we have already heard. The glory of God was infinitely more for the final cure of a dying Lazarus, who, give him all the life he could have, would yet, without that glory, be in death, than the mere presence of the Son of God. I say mere presence, for, compared with the glory of God, the very presence of his Son, so dissociated, is nothing. He abode where he was that the glory of God, the final cure of humanity, the love that triumphs over death, might shine out and redeem the hearts of men, so that death could not touch them.

After the two days the hour had arrived. He said to his disciples, "Let us go back to Judea." They expostulated because of the danger, saying, "Master, the Jews of late sought to stone thee; and goest thou thither again?" The answer which he gave them I am not sure whether I can thoroughly understand, but I think, in fact I know it must bear on the same region of life—the will of God. I think what he means by walking in the day, is simply doing the will of God. That was the sole, the all-embracing light in which Jesus ever walked. I think he means that now he saw plainly what the Father wanted him to do. If he did not see that the Father wanted him to go back to Judea, and yet went, that would be to go stumblingly, to walk in the darkness. There are twelve hours in the day—one time to act—a time of light and the clear call of duty; there is a night when a man, not seeing where or hearing how, must be content to rest. Something not inharmonious with this, I think, he must have intended; but I do not see the whole thought clearly enough to be sure that I am right. I do think further that it points at a clearer condition of human vision and conviction than I am good enough to understand, though I hope one day to rise into this upper stratum of light.

Whether his scholars had heard anything of Lazarus yet I do not know. It looks a little as if Jesus had not told them the message he had had from the sisters. But he told them now that he was asleep and that he was going to wake him. You would think they might have understood this. The idea of going so many miles to wake a man might have surely suggested death. But the disciples were sorely perplexed with many of his words. Sometimes they looked far away for the meaning when the meaning lay in their very hearts; sometimes they looked into their hands for it when it was lost in the grandeur of the ages. But he meant them to see into all that he said by-and-by, although they could not see into it now. When they understood him better, then they would understand what he said better. And to understand him better they must be more like him, and to make them more like him he must go away and give them his spirit—awful mystery which no man but himself can understand.

Now he had to tell them plainly that Lazarus was dead. They had not thought of death as a sleep. I suppose this was altogether a new and Christian idea. Do not suppose that it applied more to Lazarus than to other dead people. He was none the less dead that Jesus meant to take a weary two days' journey to his sepulchre and wake him. If death is not a sleep, Jesus did not speak the truth when he said Lazarus slept. You may say it was a figure, but a figure that is not like the thing it figures is simply a lie.

They set out to go back to Judea. Here we have a glimpse of the faith of Thomas the doubter. For a doubter is not without faith. The very fact that he doubts shows that he has some faith. When I find any one hard upon doubters I always doubt the quality of his faith. It is of little use to have a great cable, if the hemp is so poor that it breaks like the painter of a boat. I have known people whose power of believing chiefly consisted in their incapacity for seeing difficulties. Of what fine sort a faith must be that is founded in stupidity, or far worse, in indifference to the truth and the mere desire to get out of hell! That is not a grand belief in the Son of God, the radiation of the Father. Thomas' want of faith was shown in the grumbling, self-pitying way in which he said, "Let us also go that we may die with him." His Master had said that he was going to wake him. Thomas said, "that we may die with him." You may say, "he did not understand him." True, it may be, but his unbelief was the cause of his not understanding him. I suppose Thomas meant this as a reproach to Jesus for putting them all in danger by going back to Judea; if not, it was only a poor piece of sentimentality. So much for Thomas' unbelief. But he had good and true faith notwithstanding, for he went with his Master.

By the time they reached the neighborhood of Bethany, Lazarus had been dead four days. Some one ran to the house and told the sisters that Jesus was coming. Martha, as soon as she heard it, rose and went to meet him. It might be interesting at another time to compare the difference of the behavior of the two sisters upon this occasion with the difference of their behavior upon another occasion likewise recorded; but with the man dead in his sepulchre, and the hope dead in these two hearts, we have no inclination to enter upon fine distinctions of character. Death and grief bring out the great family likenesses in the living as well as in the dead.

When Martha came to Jesus she showed her true though imperfect faith by almost attributing her brother's death to Jesus' absence. But even in the moment, looking in the face of the Master, a fresh hope, a new budding of faith, began in her soul. She thought—"What if, after all, he were to bring him to life again!" Oh, trusting heart, how thou leavest the dull plodding intellect behind thee! While the conceited intellect is reasoning upon the impossibility of the thing, the expectant faith beholds it accomplished. Jesus, responding instantly to her faith, granting her half-born prayer, says, "Thy brother shall rise again;" not meaning the general truth recognized, or at least assented to by all but the Sadducees, concerning the final resurrection of the dead, but meaning, "Be it unto thee as thou wilt. I will raise him again." For there is no steering for a fine effect in the words of Jesus. But these words are too good for Martha to take them as he meant them. Her faith is not quite equal to the belief that he actually will do it. The thing she could hope for afar off she could hardly believe when it came to her very door. "Oh, yes," she said, her mood falling again to the level of the commonplace, "of course, at the last day." Then the Lord turns away her thoughts from the dogmas of her faith to himself, the Life, saying, "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live. And whosoever liveth and believeth in me, shall never die. Believest thou this?" Martha, without understanding what he said more than in a very poor part, answered in words which preserved her honesty entire, and yet included all he asked, and a thousandfold more than she could yet believe: "Yea, Lord; I believe that thou art the Christ, the Son of God, which should come into the world." . . . .

But look how this declaration of her confidence in the Christ operated upon herself. She instantly thought of her sister; the hope that the Lord would do something swelled within her, and, leaving Jesus, she went to find Mary. Whoever has had a true word with the elder brother, straightway will look around him to find his brother, his sister. The family feeling blossoms; he wants his friend to share the glory withal. Martha wants Mary to go to Jesus too.

Mary heard her, forgot her visitors, rose and went. They thought she went to the grave; she went to meet its conqueror. But when she came to him, the woman who had chosen the good part praised of Jesus, had but the same words to embody her hope and her grief that her careful and troubled sister had uttered a few minutes before. How often during those four days had not the self-same words passed between them! "Ah, if he had been here our brother had not died!" She said so to himself now, and wept, and her friends who had followed her wept likewise. A moment more, and the Master groaned; yet a moment, and he too wept. "Sorrow is catching," but this was not the mere infection of sorrow. It went deeper than mere sympathy; for he groaned in his spirit and was troubled. What made him weep? It was when he saw them weeping that he wept. But why should he weep when he knew how soon their weeping would be turned into rejoicing? It was not for their weeping, so soon to be over, that he wept, but for the human heart everywhere swollen with tears, yea, with griefs that can find no such relief as tears; for these, and for all his brothers and sisters tormented with pain for lack of faith in his Father in heaven, Jesus wept. . . . .

The Jews saw herein proof that he loved Lazarus; but they little thought it was for them and their people, and for the Gentiles whom they despised, that his tears were now flowing—that the love which pressed the fountains of his weeping was love for every human heart, from Adam on through the ages.

Some of them went a little farther, nearly as far as the sisters, saying, "Could he not have kept the man from dying?" But it was such a poor thing, after all, that they thought he might have done. They regarded merely this unexpected illness, this early death; for I daresay Lazarus was not much older than Jesus. They did not think that, after all, Lazarus must die some time; that the beloved could be saved, at best, only for a little while. Jesus seems to have heard the remark, for he again groaned in himself.

Meantime they were drawing near the place where he was buried. It was a hollow in the face of a rock, with a stone laid against it. I suppose the bodies were laid on something like shelves inside the rock, as they are in many sepulchres. They were not put into coffins, but wound round and round with linen.

When they came before the door of death, Jesus said to them, "Take away the stone." The nature of Martha's reply, the realism of it, as they would say now-a-days, would seem to indicate that her dawning faith had sunk again below the horizon; that in the presence of the insignia of death, her faith yielded, even as the faith of Peter failed him when he saw around him the grandeur of the high priest, and his Master bound and helpless. Jesus answered—oh, what an answer! To meet the corruption and the stink which filled her poor human fancy, "the glory of God" came from his lips: human fear; horror speaking from the lips of a woman in the very jaws of the devouring death; and the "said I not unto thee?" from the mouth of him who was so soon to pass worn and bloodless through such a door! "He stinketh," said Martha. "The glory of God," said Jesus. "Said I not unto thee that if thou wouldest believe, thou shouldest see the glory of God?"

Before the open throat of the sepulchre Jesus began to speak to his Father aloud. He had prayed to him in his heart before—most likely while he groaned in his spirit. Now he thanked him that he had comforted him, and given him Lazarus as a first-fruit from the dead. But he will be true to the listening people as well as to his ever-hearing Father, therefore he tells why he said the word of thanks aloud—a thing not usual with him, for his Father was always hearing him. Having spoken it for the people, he would say that it was for the people.

The end of it all was that they might believe that God had sent him—a far grander gift than having the dearest brought back from the grave—for he is the Life of men.

And Lazarus came forth, creeping helplessly, and with inch-long steps of his linen-bound limbs. "Ha! Ha! brother! sister!" cries the human heart. The Lord of Life hath taken the prey from the spoiler! he hath emptied the grave. Here comes the dead man, welcome as never was child from the womb—new-born, and in him all his brethren new-born from the grave! "Loose him, and let him go," and the work is done. The sorrow is over, and the joy is come. Home, home, Martha, Mary, with your Lazarus! He too will go with you, the Lord of the Living. Home, and get the feast ready, Martha. Prepare the food for him who comes hungry from the grave, for him who has called him thence. Home, Mary, to help Martha! What a household will yours be! What wondrous speech will pass between the dead come to life, and the living come to die!

But what pang is this that makes Lazarus draw hurried breath, and turns Martha's cheek so pale? Ah! at the little window of the heart, the pale eyes of the defeated Horror look in. What! is he there still? Ah, yes, he will come for Martha, come for Mary, come yet again for Lazarus—yea, come for the Lord of Life himself, and carry all away. But look at the Lord. He knows all about it, and he smiles. Does Martha think of the words he spoke, "He that liveth and believeth in me shall never die?" Perhaps she does, and like the moon, before the sun, her face returns the smile of her Lord.

This, my friends, is a fancy in form, but it embodies a dear truth. What is it to you and me that he raised Lazarus? We are not called upon to believe that he will raise from the tomb that joy of our hearts which lies buried there beyond our sight. Stop. Are we not? We are called upon to believe this. Else the whole story were for us a poor mockery. What is it to us that the Lord raised Lazarus? Is it nothing to know that our Brother is Lord over the grave? Will the harvest be behind the first-fruits? If he tells us he cannot, for good reasons, raise up our vanished love who sleeps in him to-day, or to-morrow, or for all the years of our life to come, shall we not mingle the smile of faithful thanks with the sorrow of present loss, and walk diligently waiting? That he called forth Lazarus showed that he was in his keeping, that he is Lord of the living, [and of the dead,—EDITOR of Her. of Life], that he has a hold of them, and can draw them forth when he will. If this is not true, then the raising of Lazarus is false—I do not mean merely false in fact, but false in meaning. If we believe in him, then in his name, both for ourselves and for our friends, we must deny death and believe in life. Lord Christ, fill our hearts with thy Life.

"THE SMOKE OF THEIR TORMENT."

No watchful observer of the great political events that are transpiring among the nations of the earth, can fail to notice how conspicuously the dark form of Papacy stands out as a grievous sufferer. Few of those fierce struggles that shake the vast structure of society to its very foundation, deposing monarchs; snatching sceptres from long reigning lines; sending haughty tyrants into miserable oblivion; annihilating kingdoms and empires; and establishing freedom and tolerance upon the ruins of wicked oppression and bigotry, fail to affect, more or less directly, that hollow-hearted and diabolical but doomed system. Almost every step in the march of human progress throughout papal domain is a development which eats, canker-like, into the very vitals of the harlot power, consuming her flesh, her substance, and so bitterly tormenting her, that her arrogant, blasphemous head and would-be protector, warns, threatens, denounces, and at last, vainly casting about for a strong arm of assistance, pronounces what he fain would constitute withering curses; but his anathemas fall as harmless as if uttered by a child, instead of by one who but a few short years ago, was accustomed to command obedience at the hands of earth's powerful potentates. A destructive invasion of the papal power has just occurred in Europe, resulting in the probable complete overthrow of Isabella, Queen of Spain, her flight into France, and an attempt, now being prosecuted, to convert that long and notoriously misgoverned kingdom into a republic. There seems not now to exist any possible chance for a re-enthronement of the Queen; and so successful have been the insurgents that it is improbable the throne itself will be permitted longer to exist. But it may be said Spain will continue Catholic, and hence no damage to that power will necessarily result. Not so, for in centralization consists its chief strength. Every departure from that principle in the government of state detracts from the influence of the Pope, and adds to his embarassment as the great centre and supreme director in the government of the church. It may be comparatively easy to control superstitious occupants of thrones, but a more difficult matter is it to sway representative assemblies to the injury of their constituents. That the movement of God among the nations brings increasing torments to her who is "drunken with the blood of the saints and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus" is a fact of so general recognition, that we need not now discuss it. Let us, however, briefly enquire whether, in the hands of Omnipotence, the very elements, the secret forces of nature, do not conspire against the hosts of Papacy and contribute to cause the smoke of their torment to ascend up forever and ever. Of a long list of earthquakes comprising about all the important ones that have occurred during the present and foregoing centuries, with a few of earlier date, let us see what proportion have taken place in papal countries.

Lima, the capital of Peru, has been visited by more than a dozen tremendous earthquakes since the conquest of the country by the Spaniards. It was founded by Pizarro in 1535, the year of the subjugation. The first university was established in 1570. In 1586, the city was nearly destroyed and many lives lost by its first recorded earthquake. In 1687, it was entirely destroyed. In 1746, it was nearly destroyed in three minutes. In 1828, another occurred by which one thousand persons perished, and property amounting to $6,000,000 was destroyed.

Callao, the original, another Peruvian town, was demolished in 1746, and sunk beneath the sea. Its ruins are still visible at low water. The established religion of Peru is Roman Catholic, little toleration being extended to any other. Quito, the capital of Ecuador, was destroyed in 1755; and in 1839, it was nearly so. The inhabitants of Ecuador are almost without exception Roman Catholics. Lisbon, the capital of Portugal, was visited by an earthquake in 1755, and 60,000 persons are supposed to have perished in a few minutes. The scene must have been frightful in the extreme. Neighboring mountains were rent and thrown in fragments into the valleys below. The sea retired, leaving the bar dry, and soon returned in a great wave fifty feet high. Multitudes of the citizens sought safety from the falling buildings by crowding upon the marble quay, which had just been constructed at great expense. It suddenly sank with them; and when the waters closed over the place where it stood, no fragments of the wreck, none of the vessels that had been drawn into the whirlpool, nor one of the thousands of people carried down, reappeared upon the surface. On the spot the water stood 600 feet deep; and beneath this, deep down in the bowels of the earth, in chasms of unknown depth, lie what was the life and wealth of this part of the earth's surface. Roman Catholic is the state religion of Portugal.

In 1793, Guatemala, with about 8,000 of its inhabitants, was destroyed. Roman Catholic, the state religion, is established by law to the exclusion of all other forms of worship.

In 1797, the whole line of country from Santa Fe to Panama was convulsed, when about 40,000 people lost their lives, and a vast amount of property was destroyed. That country was then entirely under Roman Catholic rule, the establishment of which by the Spaniards was attended with shameful persecutions.

An earthquake is recorded as having occurred in the latter part of the last century in Calabria, the southern part of the kingdom of Italy, by which 40,000 persons perished. Calabria was at that time a part of the kingdom of Naples, now no more, and its religious character is well known.

Caracas, the capital of Venezuela, was visited by an earthquake in 1812, which demolished the town and killed some 12,000 of its inhabitants. In 1826 it was again visited, and many people and much property destroyed. Roman Catholic is the state religion.

In 1692, Port Royal, on the island of Jamaica, was destroyed by an earthquake. Jamaica is a British province, but was first conquered from the Indians by the Spaniards in 1509; and with such inhumanity were the natives treated by them, that in fifty years the native population entirely disappeared. England had possessed the country but a few years when the above mentioned catastrophe took place.

Valparaiso has suffered severely from earthquakes. In 1822, it was nearly destroyed. Another destructive one happened in 1831. The religion of the country is Roman Catholic, the laws tolerating no other.

The island of Java was the scene of an earthquake in 1772, by which many lives were lost. Java is a Dutch province.

In 1839 the island of Martinique was visited by an earthquake, by which many hundreds of lives were lost, together with a vast amount of property. In 1843, in the island of Guadaloupe, occurred the only severe earthquake that has happened there since the discovery of the island. Martinique and Guadaloupe are French provinces. How predominant is the Roman Catholic religion in France the existence of her 36,800 priests sufficiently attests.

The island of Santo Domingo has on several occasions suffered severely from earthquakes. The most disastrous ones on record were those of 1564, 1684, 1691, 1751, 1770, and 1842. By that of 1751, Port au Prince was destroyed, and the coast for sixty miles submerged; and by that of 1842, many towns were laid waste, and thousands of persons perished. The whole island is Roman Catholic.

San Salvador is the capital of the republic of that name. In 1853, it contained 30,000 inhabitants. In 1854, it was completely destroyed by an earthquake, and many lives lost. Roman Catholic is the state religion.

In the winter of 1857, '58 occurred a great earthquake in Naples; and though the city suffered but little, the surrounding country was devastated, and lives, variously estimated from 22,000 to 40,000, were lost. A part of Italy; its religion is well known.

In 1858, the valley of Mexico was terribly shaken, and property to the amount of millions of dollars destroyed. The religion of Mexico is Roman Catholic; and the exercise of any other is prohibited by law.

In 1861, Mendoza, in the Argentine Republic, was well nigh destroyed, and 7,000 lives lost. Roman Catholic is the predominant religion.

The earthquakes of St. Thomas and the Sandwich Islands are fresh in the memory of all. The appalling one that has just occurred in South America, resulting in the destruction of untold wealth, and the loss of how many thousands of lives may never be known seems to have swept the coast line of Ecuador, Peru, Bolivia, and Chili; reaching back to the Andes. Roman Catholic, untempered by any very considerable advancement of the the people in civilization, is the religion of all those countries.

What a picture of desolation and death is this! and of the more than forty fearful disastrous convulsions here recorded, if we except four or five of the less notable ones, all occurred in papal countries.

It almost seems that old earth, wearying at times of its heavy burden of bigotry, of hypocrisy, of tyranny, and of soul-harrowing injustice and outrage practised in the name of Him who taught men to love one another, had in insuppressible indignation roused all its forces into mighty efforts to shake it off; and fierce with anger, had opened its mouth to plunge into unfathomable, burning depths the works of the wicked, blasphemous children of the "Mother of Harlots and Abominations of the Earth," sparing not the children themselves.

But it may be urged that Papacy has suffered in unequal proportion because its devotees are occupants of those parts of the earth's surface peculiarly subject to those dangerous phenomena. Well, how came they to occupy just such portions? Does not God control the destinies of nations? How is it that great antichristian system has been driven from most other regions that it possessed? Has the unaided power of man accomplished it? Is it not rather the work of him who is putting "down all rule and all authority and power?" Behold the harlot, the beast and the false prophet. Mark them well. View them closely on all sides. Does not "the smoke of their torment" ascend "up forever and ever." L. C. THORNE.

SANDFORD HART, Unionville, Conn., writes: I write that you may know I still live. The HERALD OF LIFE comes a welcome visitor each week and cheers me amid the gloom of earth's perilous night. I thank you for sending it to me while I have nothing to return for its support. If I thought you published for the sake of money I would ask you to stop it. But I know you do not; therefore continue it for the sake of my eternal interest until I can send something. I send one new subscriber and $1 for him.

D. SHERBURNE, Waterville, Me., writes: I have had the privilege of reading your valuable paper occasionally the past year, and have come to the conclusion, I cannot do without it; so I send $2 for it for one year. There is nothing that cheers my heart so much as to contemplate the time when all the faithful will meet where congregations never break up, and Sabbaths never end. But O, the poor sinner! he is doomed never to awake if he dies in his sins. Your brother, in hope of eternal life.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 14, 1868.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

WE are glad to know that our friends are moving in the matter of increasing the number of subscribers to our paper. We are printing several hundred more than we have ever done before, so that those who "guess" how few or how many subscribers we have, will have to guess again, and move a good ways in advance to overtake us. We shall supply all new subscribers from the commencement of the present volume so long as we have any papers left to do it. Let the work go on without relaxing the effort to increase the circulation of the HERALD OF LIFE.

Now is the time to do a work that shall tell on the Life cause with a power that shall wake up our opponents. They have no idea yet of the power of this life-giving truth: "Life only in and through JESUS CHRIST."

This grand and glorious truth generally received, would sweep away a world of superstition and error which has retarded the advance of the love of God and man. Men have regarded God as an object of dread, to be worshipped in order to escape the dreadful theological hell of inexpressible torture; and viewed Him in that way till they can see nothing in Him to love, and have given themselves up to be carried into all manner of superstitions, forms, and inventions of men, to appease a revengeful Deity, or to drown all thoughts of Him; and thus to abandon all true religion by substituting forms and ceremonies in the place of love to God and delight in His service.

Let men be made to see and feel that they are mortal, dying creatures, and that God has so loved them that He has provided a glorious LIFE-GIVER, that whosoever will accept Him as such shall receive the remission of all his past sins, and have life from the dead, never to die again; that life being a free gift of the love of God through his Son Jesus Christ, who is constituted the Head of a new creation. Such a view of God and of his good will to men has an attractive power, well calculated to disarm the enmity of the human heart, and win men to God and his Christ, and thus end in life eternal.

A WORD TO SUBSCRIBERS.

IF any have failed to receive the first number of this volume, please let us know, and we will send it, or, if you would like one or more of that number, for a sample to procure new subscribers, we will cheerfully supply them; but please let us know at once. Money for this volume we will accept as advance payment if sent by January next. Of course, we prefer it now, but wish to be as accommodating as possible to such as find it difficult to advance the money immediately.

We advise those sending money, not to be at the expense of "Registering" their letters. It is no safer, nor hardly as safe to do so. Seal your letters well, and direct simply as we have stated in our paper, and there is very little risk. But be sure you write the number of our "Box 4,658" plain, so that there can be no mistake.

"THE LIVING SOUL."

THE article on the above subject will be issued in a Tract in a few days. It has been revised by the author, and some addition made on one or two points. The probable cost of it will be $2 per 100. The funds have not been received to pay for its issue, and we look to our friends to send donations for this purpose, or that they purchase all they can use, and thereby meet the first cost of the two thousand that will be ready in a short time. Let us have your response as early as possible.

THE DEVIL'S "PHOTOGRAPH."

WATERBURY CENTRE, Vt., Sept. 28, 1868.

BR. STORRS: In your last issue of the HERALD is an article entitled—"Fugitive Thoughts on the Devil." In the article the writer asks, "Is the devil a person?" Then, on the supposition that an affirmative answer is given, says, "If so, and you describe him to the life, and send me his photograph, you'll do me a favor."

I draw from the above this inference: That if the photograph can be obtained, and the description given, the writer will believe in the personality of the devil, otherwise he will still reject the view. Now, in all candor, I wish to know if the writer, or yourself, rejects the personality of God? for, surely, it would be as difficult to obtain the photograph, and give the required description of one as the other. Please reply through the HERALD OF LIFE.

Respectfully yours,
TIMOTHY WHEELER.

RESPONSE BY THE EDITOR.

Br. Wheeler is what some would call "an extreme literalist." We did not take the term "photograph," in the article referred to in a literal sense. Photography is the art of taking the image of a thing by the action of sunlight. Our friend in North Carolina, as we understood him, did not use the term with the idea of a literal impression on steel; but that such sunlight should be produced as should establish the personality of a spirit-devil as clearly as it has the existence and "personality of God." God, so to speak, has "photographed" himself on all the works of creation; but especially in the person of his Son, "Who is the image of the invisible God;" Col. i., 15; "The express image of his person;" Heb. i., 3; so that, "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father," saith Jesus. John xiv., 9.

Let Br. Wheeler, or any one else, "photograph" the supposed spirit-devil with the same "sunlight," and we will admit he is a real, everywhere-present, almighty, or all-powerful, literal being. If we go to heathenism or to Romanism, we may get a photograph of his satanic majesty, because both are the worshippers of devils, and "sacrifice to devils and not to God." 1 Corth. x., 20. But if they get his "photograph" among those idolators, let them be sure to take his "cloven foot" in the picture, or we might not be sure it was genuine.

AN ENGLISHMAN ALARMED.

"Suppose Western mankind in general got into its head the idea, which many English clergymen have got into theirs, that the prize offered by Christianity is eternal life, that the phrases eternal life and eternal death are literally true, that man either joins Christ or dies like a flower—would not that act as a pretty rapid solvent of institutions? We think we could advance some strong reasons for believing that of all the heresies current among us, that is, perhaps, the most enticing and the most dangerous."

BR. STORRS: The foregoing extract is from the London Spectator, and shows how the truth is attracting the attention of the literati in England. What the writer calls "dangerous," we call not only "enticing" but safe. It may be "a rapid solvent of institutions" that are merely human, but the institutions of God will be preserved by the very agency used to dissolve the works of the flesh. "Wherefore, we, receiving a kingdom which cannot be moved, let us have grace, whereby we may serve God acceptably, with reverence and godly fear; for our God is a consuming fire" to the "institutions" of the first Adam. Yours in Christ. J. T. C.

BOSTON, Oct. 8, 1868.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR. We suppose it is alarming to the devotees of stereotyped human dogmas and human institutions founded on them, to find the doctrine of "NO LIFE OUT OF CHRIST" is advancing in spite of all opposition. The notion of inherent immortality is the basis on which many of the "institutions," called "churches" are built. Take away this one idea and the Romish church would go to wreck in a day; and how many of her "daughters" would go to pieces with her, it is not for us to say; but the "shaking of heaven and earth"—ecclesiastical and civil governments—must come; yea, has already begun, and they will be dissolved that the immovable kingdom may be established. Then, if not before, will men see "that the offered prize by Christianity is eternal life," and that the man who is not joined to "Christ dies like a flower." LIFE, future and eternal, is only to those who are joined to the Lord Jesus Christ. All others perish utterly and hopelessly in death.

Let this truth be engraven on every heart; a truth which will stand when the heavens and earth are "dissolved," and all merely human organizations shall have perished by its "solvent" power: a truth which no human power or arrangements can hereafter turn back, however alarming its appearance may be to sincere but timid minds.

The word of God has long enough been corrupted by the baseless notion of inherent immortality, making all men to possess an "endless life" by creation or natural generation; thus robbing the Lord of Glory of the honor of bestowing it as a free gift on those, and those only, who are united to Himself by the communication of the Holy Spirit of God. "The wages of sin is death. But the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." Rom. vi, 23. Glorious truth. Let it stand, though all things else are shaken by its power.

This "solvent" will utterly dissolve all such poisonous schemes as "Spiritism;" which is one of the offsprings of the doctrine of inherent immortality; or, it is that doctrine gone to seed and pouring forth its venom against true, Bible immortality; immortality by a resurrection from the dead, through Christ, "at the last day."

That system of doctrine which talks of man's inherent "Spiritual nature" has produced "Spiritism;" destroyed in the human mind all consciousness of the need of the resurrection from the dead, and made the second advent of "Christ from heaven" a useless affair; and has destroyed all desire for such a return; because, fancying themselves in possession of endless life without a resurrection "at the last trump."

We exhort fearful Englishmen, and fearful Protestants everywhere, to put away their alarm at the progress of that doctrine which is so clearly the teaching of the Prophets of the Old Testament, and of Christ and his Apostles in the New.

"Search the Scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life, and they are they that testify of me," said Jesus; and yet, inherent immortality denies this fact, and prevents men from seeking a future, an endless life by coming to Christ. "Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life," added the blessed Jesus. All such testimony is made a mere figure of speech by the "solvent" of inherent immortality.

Let all the friends of the truth of "Life future and eternal only in Christ" come up anew to the work, and take a lesson from the political campaigns so far as sacrifice, earnestness, and perseverance are concerned; and "Come up to the help of the LORD against the mighty" flood of human superstition which has so long deluged the world. The day dawns; the day star seems to be about to arise, when those evil geniuses, that have been produced by the fable of inherent immortality, are, like most other wild beasts who prowl abroad only in darkness, to be expelled from the theology of Christendom to take refuge in their native den—heathenism—and there to be attacked and slain by the torchlight of God's eternal truth, that man is "mortal," and "Life and immortality" are not only "brought to light by the gospel," but that "God hath given unto us eternal life, and this life is in His Son; and he that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life." 1 John v., 12, 13.

RESPONSE TO SAMUEL MASON.

THE "new covenant," emphatically, is as Br. Mason says, a covenant of eternal life to believers, without regard to nationality. It is a covenant to bestow that which the law covenant, given to Adam, and enlarged and renewed by Moses, could not do, viz., give life from the dead. The law as a covenant of life is dead by the cross of Christ. Life is not to be sought, and cannot be found by the deeds of the law. Only one ever did find life by that covenant, viz., Christ; and he voluntarily gave his unforfeited life, under the law, to redeem us from the curse of the law, which is death. "By the deeds of the law," now, "no flesh shall be justified" unto life. The law covenant has done its work, so far as justification unto life is concerned. In this respect it is at an end.

But because this is so, does it follow that none of the prophecies concerning Judah and Israel, in their national character, are to have a fulfilment in the future? Of course, there is a difference of opinion on this point among brethren equally sincere and honest in their search after truth, and there will continue to be till events shall develop the exact truth on the subject. We have thought it was better to say but little on this question, as it was liable to cause division where no essential benefit might arise to those holding diverse opinions on the subject. If, however, it is desirable to discuss it, we are willing to take our part in it, provided it can be done with the single object to elicit truth. If it is to run into a partisan controversy, it had better be let alone, because it has no importance compared with the Life question. We say not this because we are indifferent to the subject; nor because we have no opinion on it; for our mind was deeply exercised on the subject more than twenty years since, and the conclusion we came to then has never been shaken by anything we have heard or read; but we have no wish to force our views upon others. We have not regarded it as essential that we should all see alike on the question.

We are free to state what our belief is, but will not do so to draw out a long discussion. Whatever may be said of "conditional promises" is of no force in our mind, if the attempt is made to apply that principle to prophecy. Prophecy is history foreseen; and is just as true of the future as the history of the past. Prophecy foretold of Babylon's overthrow centuries before the event. The event was just as certain when the prophecy was uttered as it is to-day. Prophecy foretold the rising of mystical Babylon. It has risen. Prophecy has foretold the overthrow of this same mystical Babylon. The latter is as certain as the former, though it has not yet occurred. He who doubts it shows a lack of faith. Prophecy foretold the depression and persecution of the true church of Christ. It has also foretold its final deliverance and exaltation. The former has occurred; shall the latter be a doubtful event? or be called a "conditional" one?

These remarks or illustrations might be greatly extended; but enough has been said to fix the principle. Promises and threatenings may be conditional: prophecy never is; in the nature of the case it cannot be. It would be to say that God sees a thing and does not see it, at the same time. What would be thought of the man who should seriously maintain that the prophecy of Christ's second advent is conditional? But what is the difference, in principle, between this prophecy and many unfulfilled prophecies of the Old Testament? If these latter can be disposed of as conditional, or be transferred to another people not named, why may not the same principle be applied to New Testament prophecies? and thus Bible revelations of the future be like the heathen oracles, which were so constructed as to make nothing certain; only let things turn as they would, the credit of the oracle was preserved; for its announcement would fit any way. We cannot admit any such uncertainty in the oracles of JEHOVAH, whether found in the Old or New Testaments. Hence, we cannot admit of the transfer or annulling of prophecies made concerning Judah or Israel, but believe they will surely come to pass "in the latter days." Hosea iii., 4, 5.

Our object in the foregoing remarks has not been to argue the case from specific texts, but to enforce the principle which is to govern us in the study of prophecy. If we abandon this principle, then we are left to the fancies of different interpreters, and may be kept in the region of doubt perpetually, till faith in all prophecy may be so weakened that we find ourselves without helm or compass in passing the sea of life.

One or two items in Br. Mason's concluding remarks we will briefly notice. He says, "If the Jews had kept the covenant, they should not have been scattered; and then there would have been no necessity of a prophecy of their return." Our brother will admit the scattering did not occur till after what he calls "the new covenant" was established. The prophetic eye saw that such would be the fact; and yet that prophetic spirit looked beyond their "scattering" and "prophesied of their return." That is, the prophecy informs us that, after "the new covenant is made" Judah and Israel will "return" and become "one nation on the mountains of Israel." Ezk. xxxvii., 22. It will not be denied that this event is after their dispersion or "scattering," which had not occurred, so far as the Jews or Judah were concerned, till after the time our brother says "the new covenant" was made. This prophecy, then, of the return and rebuilding the "one nation," reaches into the new covenant, if that covenant was established eighteen hundred years ago.

If, as our brother seems to believe, prophecy is "conditional," it may not be difficult to show that the fulfilment of the conditions is as clearly a subject of prophecy as any other part of it. For example:

"I will take you from among the heathen, and gather you out of all countries, and bring you into your own land. Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean: from all your filthiness, and from all your idols will I cleanse you; a new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you; and I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh, and will give you a heart of flesh; and I will put my Spirit within you, and cause you to walk in my statutes, and ye shall keep my judgments, and do them; and ye shall dwell in the land that I gave to your fathers," etc. Ezk. xxxvi., 24–28.

It seems to us, this can have no application except to literal Israel, still in the flesh; and clearly shows the talked of "conditions" God foresaw would be complied with; and, therefore, speaks of the matter not as an uncertainty, but as a fixed fact in the future, after "the scattering," and consequently still future, and corresponds with Paul's statement, Heb. viii., "Behold the days come, saith the Lord, when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah" (the Jews.) "For this is the covenant I will make with the house of Israel" (the "one nation,") "after those days, saith the Lord, I will put my laws in their mind, and write them in their hearts; and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people," etc:

How exactly this agrees with the language of God by Ezekiel, just before quoted; and the prophecy shows that this change, with Judah and Israel, is after they are "gathered out of all countries" where they had been scattered. Compare all this with the following prophecy, Ezk. xi., 14–20.

"Again the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, Son of man, thy brethren, even thy brethren, the men of thy kindred, and all the house of Israel wholly, are they unto whom the inhabitants of Jerusalem have said" [now for 1,800 years], "Get you far from the LORD; unto us is this land given in possession. Therefore say, Thus saith the Lord God; Although I have cast them far off among the heathen, and although I have scattered them among the countries, yet will I be to them a little sanctuary in the countries where they shall come. Therefore say, Thus saith the Lord God; I will even gather you from the people, and assemble you out of all countries where ye have been scattered, and I will give you the land of Israel; and they shall come thither, and they shall take away all the detestable things thereof, and all the abominations thereof, from thence; and I will give them one heart, and I will put a new spirit within you; and I will take the stony heart out of their flesh, and will give them a heart of flesh; that they may walk in my statutes, and keep mine ordinances, and do them; and they shall be my people, and I will be their God."

Br. Mason says, "If there is a single prophecy in regard to the Jewish nation that is not involved in the covenant, then that prophecy cannot be conditional,' etc. This statement suggests several things. It seems to imply that the Jews include the whole nation of Israel, which is not the fact; for, they comprehended only the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin, with fragments from the other tribes. The nation of Israel—the "one nation"—became divided in the reign of Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, into two distinct nations, called Judah and Israel; the latter embracing ten tribes, and the former two, with fragments from the others. See 1 Kings xii. Judah, at a later period, was called, indifferently, Judah and Jews. They alone constituted the "Jewish nation," but were only one fifth of the original nation of Israel.

Another point we may notice is this: Israel did not become a nation by the covenant from Mount Sinai. Their nationality commenced long before that. They were such when God took "him a nation from the midst of another nation, by signs and wonders" in Egypt. Deut. iv., 34. There are prophecies, therefore, in relation to the nation of Israel, as a whole, which are not involved in the Sinaic covenant. Such prophecies, then, "cannot be conditional," Br. M. being judge. We might trace these prophecies through God's dealings with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; but we will confine ourself mainly to two, one in the Old, the other in the New Testament.

To a "wicked prince [king] of Israel this language of prophecy is addressed: "Thus saith the Lord God; Remove the diadem and take off the crown:" . . . . "I will overturn, overturn, overturn it; and it shall be no more, until he come whose right it is, and I will give it him." Ezk. xxi., 25–27. Thus "the throne of David," or kingdom of Israel, was to be vacated till Messiah should come; and after that the throne was to be re-established; for God had said to David, "I will raise up of thy seed after thee, which shall be of thy sons" . . . . "I will settle him in my house and in my kingdom forever; and his throne shall be established forevermore." 1 Chron. xvii., 11–14.

Thus we have prophecies concerning David's throne which are not conditional; and the promised Son of David is to reign on that throne; not on some other. If Christ is to reign on that throne, then he must also reign over that nation; not merely over some other nation or nations. Whatever else he reigns over, that nation of Israel must be included, or he does not reign on David's throne, any more than the son of the Queen of England would reign on his mother's throne if he merely ruled over France.

But here we are not left in doubt, and we turn to the New Testament, or "New Covenant," and what do we find? The very first announcement, or prophecy, runs thus: "Fear not, Mary; for thou hast found favor with God: and behold thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a son, and shalt call his name JESUS. He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest; and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David: and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end." Luke i., 30–33.

This is no conditional prophecy, and is brought forward from the old prophets' announcements into the "new covenant" with "the house of Jacob." Mary believed this prophecy; and Elizabeth, "filled with the Holy Ghost, spake out with a loud voice, and said" [to Mary], ... "Blessed is she that believeth; for there shall be a performance of those things which were told her from the Lord." Thus the "Holy Ghost" confirmed the prophecy of the angel Gabriel to Mary; and the two unimpeachable witnesses, viz., Gabriel and the Holy Ghost, make sure this word of prophecy that JESUS shall reign over the house of Jacob, and that, on the throne of his father David; and, it seems to us, we might as well say the whole prophecy was conditional as a part of it. The most improbable part of the whole was the conception itself. If that was literal and unconditional, so is all the rest; and "Blessed is" every one that "believeth" that "there shall be a performance of those things which were told" Mary "from the Lord," and confirmed by the "Holy Ghost."

When God has spoken, it is our part to believe, and not to be speculating how these things can be. Such a state of mind is not like Mary's, who, because she believed, cried out, "My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour." Luke i., 46, 47.

This speculating about the impossibility of a thing being done literally, because we cannot see how it is to be accomplished, brings no rejoicing to the heart. Such examples of unbelief are numerous in the Bible, and we may some time dwell on them, and notice how they contrast with that faith which took God at his word, and "believed in hope against hope."

Let it be kept in mind that JESUS has not yet received "the throne of his father David;" and many professed Christians do not believe he ever will. We, believers in the second advent of JESUS, condemn their unbelief; shall we at the same time disbelieve the prophecy that "He shall reign over the house of Jacob forever?" In that case are we not in the same condemnation? How can we escape it?

"LIGHT" FURNISHED.

BR. STORRS: I noticed in the HERALD of Sept. 23d that "Light is wanted" concerning the relation the Life and Advent Union brethren sustain to the late camp-meeting in Springfield. As one of the camp-meeting Committee I would say that no one, to my knowledge, ever applied to us for the "privilege" of pitching the Mission Tent there; but Br. J. C. Day and myself went to Br. Munger, of the Committee, to ascertain from him where it should be located, he being in charge of that department. Br. Munger aided us in selecting the very pleasant and desirable spot where it was pitched, and generously offered us our choice of any unoccupied place. It should be understood that we were not fully assured that Br. Wolcott's tent could be had until very near the time of the camp-meeting, and all the large tent locations had been selected. But I believe our brethren were well pleased with the spot selected, and would prefer it to either of the others on the ground.

I wish to say, in behalf of the brethren of the Committee, that they have never intimated, directly or indirectly, to my knowledge, that we had not the same rights and privileges on the camp ground that others had; and when they change their position in this respect I shall be among the first to know it, and "will sound the alarm." But it will not come. The "feeling" among brethren is surely becoming modified, and kindness and courtesy will subdue and overcome the opposition to the views we hold. It is only a question of time with every true child of God. They will all, sooner or later, "come to the knowledge of this truth," and rejoice in it as we rejoice. Only let us be patient, "forbearing one another in love."

There is but one sentiment respecting Br. Pratt's remarks at the close of Br. Storrs' discourse, and that is, it was improper, uncourteous, and out of place; but although it was designed to prevent any influence favorable to the doctrine of "Life only through Christ" being accomplished by that sermon, it had directly the opposite effect, for two or more persons, to my knowledge, who had previously doubted the truth of the non-resurrection of the unholy dead, and relied upon John v., 28, 29, for their proof, were convinced by its quotation by Br. Pratt, at the time and place, and with the spirit manifested, that it was not in harmony with the doctrine that "God is love," and therefore could not be the teaching of that passage, and they are now firm believers of "Life only through Christ."

RANDOLPH E. LADD.

SPRINGFIELD, Mass., Oct., 1868.

DYING TWICE.

OUR opponents assert that "all impenitent men who have died, and all who may die before Christ comes, must die again." When we ask for proof, they reply, "All mankind, infants and adults, believers and unbelievers alike die the first death: hence it cannot be the penalty for transgression, but rather a calamity brought upon the entire race through Adam's sin. The wicked must die again for their own sins."

Against this view there are serious objections, some of which are herewith presented. The New Testament records the resurrection of five person from the dead, three of whom we know were believers, the fourth a child, and the fifth the widow's son. Our friends on the other side tell us that "these five persons were brought again to the grave," which would be their second death. This being the case, all these persons have suffered the penalty for sins, as our opponents have it, for they all died twice. But three of the number we know to have been disciples. How can this twice dying on the part of these believers be harmonized with the aforementioned penalty? What did they die the second time for. We might argue that the wicked must die thrice, with as much propriety as we could argue from such premises that they must die twice, because these saints died twice, and the wicked must die once more than they, else the righteous will have suffered as many deaths as the sinner.

If all these five were sinners, having died twice, non-resurrection must be pronounced upon them, else, instead of dying two deaths they will die three, and their punishment will be one death more than all other dead sinners will receive. It would be rather unjust, would it not? And all this because our opponents are so strenuous upon the point that the wicked must endure at least one death more than the good. What a strange theological medley! One would be almost inclined to think that our opposing friends who claim to be Christians, have never been sinners. They are so very careful that justice, strong and free, shall be meted out to the ungodly, that they have forgotten the pit from which they themselves have been dug.

Another assertion is, that "The wages of sin is to be burned up alive; hence the wicked must be made alive from the dead in order to suffer the penalty of the law." Yet, these same friends assure us that "the wicked who may not have experienced the first death at the time Christ is revealed, will have to die but once, and that death will be sudden, by means of fire and brimstone, which is the second death." Here they admit that the second death to that class is not the second in order but in kind.

With our friends we have yet further difficulties. There are the Sodomites and other inhabitants of the Plain who were burned with fire and brimstone. They did not die a natural death, but as we have recorded. Did they die "the second death" in kind? If they did, all infants and little children died the same. Did they die for their sins? You say that "they were not sinners." Did they suffer the vengeance of eternal fire? There is no record that they escaped it. But you say that all will be raised at the last day, when the infants and the children will be saved, while the others will be burned up once more. That does not look like justice. The living wicked at Christ's advent are burned but once, while the inhabitants of the Plain are burned twice. Then that class will suffer no more than the infants of Sodom who were burned once.

Again if the Sodomites are not raised, our friends would say that that would be unjust, for they would then have suffered no more than their infants. But how about the martyrs of Jesus who have been incarcerated in dungeons, who have been imprisoned for years, and suffered terribly, and who finally were burned to death by slow fires? If the living wicked are burned but once, it might be argued that the martyrs suffered as much as the wicked will suffer, therefore in order to equalize matters it would be better to make alive the wicked ones once more, and burn them up again very slowly. Then we could conclude that eternal fire isn't eternal fire after all, as the Sodomites could all come to life again after having suffered the vengeance of eternal fire; then those who are alive when Christ comes could follow the ensample and be burned twice too.

All this comes from the desire to have the wicked made alive again from the dead to die once more for their sins. Strange it is that our forgetful friends show such a spirit toward the wicked. All alike are of the earth, earthy. All were conceived in iniquity. All are by nature the children of wrath. No Christian has more claim upon God's salvation naturally than the worst sinner living. All are alike found guilty and condemned. Pardon and peace are found only in the merits of a Saviour's blood. All have to be divested of their own righteousness before Christ's can be given. None but naked and empty sinners can find peace by faith through a glorious and full Christ. It is the free, unmerited love and favor of God that saves poor sinners. Why should such feel any other spirit than George Whitefield manifested when he espied a drunken man in the gutter? Turning to a friend he said, "There is George Whitefield but by the grace of God." But instead, they bring to my mind very forcibly the parable of the two debtors. They are for seizing the wicked dead by their throats to bring them to life again in order that they may see justice done them by way of having them burned up, some say "at once," others, "slowly." As though these fierce friends were always holy, and just, and good! Lord deliver us from such a wrong spirit, and help us to recollect what we are naturally, and how much has been forgiven us.

Some of these much-to-be-pitied friends think that "the wicked ought to come up and see what they have lost." How they can form an idea of what they never had it would be hard to tell. The Saviour says that "they shall not see life." Is anything to be gained by their coming up to see what you were never worthy of, and which is given through grace by faith. You are fearful that your wicked friends will not suffer more pain than you have or may suffer. Can't you be satisfied with the assurance of eternal life? which you know must be an infinite blessing. The unrepentant will be deprived of that. But you do not merit it any more than they. Let them remain in the congregation of the dead, for "the wrath of God abideth on them." Let them "sleep a perpetual sleep and not awake," for thus saith the Lord.

In conclusion I will submit to our opponents the following propositions for their prayerful study:

1. We are conceived in iniquity.
2. We are by nature the children of wrath.
3. The wages of sin is death.
4. Jesus died for our sins.
5. He was raised for our justification.
6. We are justified by faith.
7. If Christ be not raised—
    1. Our faith is vain.
    2. We are yet in our sins.
    3. Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished.
8. All who do not believe in Christ cannot live again after they die.

All of which are respectfully submitted by your affectionate br. in Christ.

F. H. BURBANK.

NEW YORK, Oct., 1868.

THE "CHRISTIAN" AND THE DEVIL.

"But those men who shine like burning lamps, and preach the living word with the unction of the Holy One, have too much experience with Satan's subtile wiles and fiery darts, to flatter their souls with theories which teach that Satan is a myth, and his angels are but figures of speech."

We do not wish to notice the above, merely for the purpose of advocating any set theory concerning the devil, but to speak particularly of the spirit and import of the paragraph. It has long been a settled principle with us never to censure, far less to unchristian any one barely because he differs from us on a point of doctrine. But to say, as the quotation above cited virtually does say, that the man who does not believe in a personal spirit-devil, cannot preach the living word with the "unction of the Holy One," is making such a test of Christian experience as is to us entirely new. It is inconceivable, to us, how a belief in the existence of a spirit-devil, even if true, can possess such sanctifying power. Under this, the gospel economy, God writes his truth on the hearts of his people by the Holy Spirit, and by being thus written it becomes in us a saving principle of power. But does God at once write all revealed truth on our hearts? In other words, when we are "begotten by the incorruptible seed, the word of God," and thus made to become the sons of God, is there any stipulated amount of truth necessary to be brought to the accomplishment of this work? To say that a certain portion of the truth, or any particular items of truth only are requisite to the accomplishing of the work of salvation, is to make all other portions of the truth of no practical importance.

Again, to say that a perfect knowledge of all the truth is necessary to make us Christians is to assume that those texts that inculcate the duty of a growth in the knowledge of the truth, after we have become Christians, are absolutely meaningless. Is not this then a true statement of the case? It is not the quantity of truth we are able to grasp intellectually, that brings us into a sanctified state of mind; but it is the manner in which we receive what of truth our minds are capable of fathoming? On this principle, is it not possible, after all, for a man who is truly called of God to preach, to do that preaching "with the unction of the Holy One" even though he might be ignorant with regard to the precise nature of the devil's existence? All preachers may not have had at hand the facilities for making themselves acquainted with the deep things and intricate mysteries of the devil as has H., of the Christian. And must they, on that account, be deprived in their ministrations of the "unction of the Holy One?"

Again, there are certain doubts that some of us cannot away with, even if we would, that tend to make our faith in the existence of a personal spirit-devil a very imperfect faith. Among them are the following: If there is a spirit-devil he must be either mortal, or immortal. If he is immortal, he cannot be destroyed, or die, consequently he must exist, duration without end. Such a devil would do very well for a believer in endless torture, but he would be a bad devil to dispose of, by men who like "H." of the "Christian," believe that all wickedness and wicked beings will finally be destroyed. But if he is mortal, how has he managed to live almost six thousand years? Did God fore-determine that he should live thus long, and therefore create him possessed of this predetermined longevity? Or, being mortal, does God keep him alive by a constant display of miraculous, almighty power? Would not either of the above assumptions make God the direct author of all sins committed through the instigation of the devil? On this principle, is not the sentiment advocated by a certain misguided man entirely correct? His view was this: that the devil is just as necessary in God's plan of redemption as Jesus Christ. Consequently, he said, "Before I would vote to have this devil die, I would vote to have another made;" i. e., he would rather have two devils than none at all. And, indeed, if a man that does not believe in, and has not fought hard battles with a personal spirit-devil, cannot have a saving Christian experience, how can we possibly get along without the devil? No wonder that when Paul found himself to be possessed of one of the devil's angels, and prayed earnestly three times to have him cast out, the Lord told him he had best let him stay, for he would keep him humble; i. e., help perfect him in Christian experience. See 2 Cor. xii., 8. But in casting out so many devils, Christ must be working out of harmony with this plan.

Again, it has seemed strange to us how seven personal spirit-devils could take up their abode in one woman. And it is harder for us to solve the problem how a legion of such devils could get into one man. Now, because we are not sufficiently learned in the science of the devil to solve such doubts, must we, as a penalty for our imperfect faith in the true doctrine of devils, be refused "the unction of the Holy One" to assist us in preaching "the living word?"

But does Br. H. make the devil anything more than a myth? He says, in the article from which we have quoted, that these devils "throng the air around us;" that they are "wicked spirits." Now, what does he mean by spirits? If the atmosphere is so filled with these devils, or spirits, please tell us, Br. H., what sort of an existence they hold. Certainly, if they had bodies, we should see them. Has Br. H. seen them? If so, please tell us how they look. It is possible, if this theory is true, that we may have seen them, but did not know that they were devils, for we have in our time seen some singular looking creatures floating in the air. But if Br. H. has not seen them, how does he know that they are there? Where is the text that says the air is full of devils? But he says they are spirits. Does he mean that they are ghosts—phantoms? If they can neither be seen, handled, nor talked to, they are something less than myths, and a faith in them is more than mythical. If a faith in such devils is a pre-requisite to the bestowment of "the unction of the Holy One," God certainly offers His Spirit on exceeding hard conditions. But let me enlighten you, Br. H. Those who deny the existence of personal spirit-devils do not believe that satan is a myth, or that his messengers are figures of speech. No, no. They have learned by "experience" that there is something real in this matter; and when they have been overcome by an adversary, instead of making a scape-goat of a spirit-devil, behind which to hide from personal responsibility, they have believed what James says, viz.: "Every man is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lust and enticed." Believing this, they have sought help of God to enable them to overcome every propensity to sin, and by faith in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, attain unto a future life.

OCEANPORT, N. J., Oct., 1868.

FROM JACOB GRIM.

PHILADELPHIA, Oct. 5, 1868.

BR. STORRS: According to my appointment, on Sunday October 4th, I went to the town of West Chester, and spoke in Horticultural Hall. The audience was not as large as one year ago; owing to a mistake in the printing of the notice for the meeting, was one cause; and another, that the country has run mad on politics. It seems to me that they are doing in a political point of review just what Jesus said the Pharasees were doing in his day, Compassing sea and land to make one proselyte, etc. So it seems in our day. If the children of the kingdom would act as these politicians act, the world would say, They are mad.

But the children of this generation are wiser than the children of light. I think we might all learn a lesson from these men. I was never more forcibly struck with the saying of our Saviour, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness." Now just look at one of these office-seekers, and ask him what he understands by seeking? and he will tell you to look at his actions. He leaves nothing undone that will help him to accomplish his object. And if that is the meaning of our Saviour's words, how few of us are seeking the kingdom of God.

But to my subject. In the afternoon I spoke on the promise of God, that his children were to inherit the earth, and not heaven. I had a good hearing. In the evening my subject was, "The wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life," etc. I showed that God always paid the sinner his wages; and when he was dead God did not owe him anything more; and he had no right to demand it. I gave a number of cases where God had settled with the sinner and paid him off. I have reason to believe that some impression has been made, and hope that it bring forth fruit. I feel that I have been overtaxing myself for the present, and have returned home quite worn out; you will therefore excuse the brevity of my epistle.

FROM WILLIAM H. H. MCALLISTER.

ST. ALBANS, Vt., Oct. 9, 1868.

BR. STORRS: My mind is busy to-day with retrospection. No. 1, Vol. 6, of the HERALD OF LIFE, has come to hand, and its whole past history comes to mind with a singular vividness. For five years it has been a constant visitor. I believe I have seen and read, more or less thoroughly, every number from the very first. I well remember its first appearance, the motives which led to its publication, and the "old chestnut tree" at Wilbraham will ever remain sacredly connected with its incipiency. How I wished it could have been my privilege to have met with that little band of believers in that sacred spot; but not till four years after was that wish gratified, and then it was not the same; additions had been made to our ranks, and the work began in weakness and prosecuted in the face of difficulties had brought forth precious fruit.

I was in the hospital at Burlington when the first number made its appearance. It proved most timely. I was then in the transition state. I was investigating and trying to find the truth, but the work was difficult. I had received some assistance from Br. Green, but difficulty lay piled on difficulty, objection on objection, and darkness brooded over all. I well remember the influence of the first numbers upon my troubled mind. I had not read it long before I saw that order and harmony were being brought out of chaos Light was shed upon dark passages, objections removed, doubts dispelled, and convictions strengthened. In two short months I had made more progress, from the assistance thus received, than in a whole year without it. In that time I was able to say that I fully believed the doctrines it advocates, and, in my feeble manner, I began to defend them.

Then came a long winter of sickness, in which I was brought so near the gates of death that my friends thought my recovery impossible; but a voice within assured me that I should recover, and so I did. During those long, weary, painful weeks, the HERALD OF LIFE made weekly visits to see how I was getting along; and when I was too weak to read it myself, I had others read it to me. Words are feeble to express the consolation I received from divine truth in those trying hours. The 116th Psalm exactly expresses my experience, and the 12th of Hebrews and other passages were a comfort in deep affliction.

After about three months' constant confinement I began to recover, and as soon as I was able, one of the pleasantest occupations I could find was to read over the back numbers of my faithful friend. Many hours of my recovery that would otherwise have been long and dreary have thus been made short and happy, and their sanctifying influence will long remain. It was in those hours that John v., 28, 29, Acts xxiv., 15, and similar passages, came up for thorough investigation; and I must here acknowledge the assistance that I received from the early numbers of our paper.

And thus I might go on, but time would fail me to tell of all my indebtedness in various ways during the five years of its existence. I will only say that I am thankful that it was so opportunely established. I rejoice in its prosperity, and may it continue to dispense the truth as long as such means are needed in the earth.

During these five years some of our co-laborers have fallen asleep in the blessed hope of life, and we miss their words of cheer, but we "sorrow not even as others who have no hope," for we believe that when Jesus comes they will be raised to life eternal and receive their reward. Some of our fellow-laborers have fallen away, but most of them remain as strong in the faith and as active in labor as when first I knew them, and are determined to labor to the end. Besides, each year has witnessed new accessions to our numbers, and new writers have been added to the original few. All these we heartily welcome, and open our arms to receive more.

My own communications during these years have been very few, but I hope to labor more abundantly than hitherto, and thus lighten the labor of our editor, if I do not edify the brethren. I only pray to be led into all truth, and in it to labor to the end.

Yours in the hope of life.

FROM JOHN H. WILSON.

BLOOMINGTON, Ill., Oct. 1, 1868.

BR. STORRS: Although I know of no one, personally, who holds to the views of "No future life except through Christ," yet through your valuable paper I am satisfied that there can be found the seven thousand who do not bow the knee to the Baal of "Inherent Immortality;" and my prayer is, that that number may soon be seventy times seven thousand.

You have much to encourage you. The little cloud no bigger than a man's hand, which appeared unto you years ago, is fast covering all the land; and the occasional drops now falling in scattered places indicate plainly that there will be a gracious rain, in answer to your prayers and labors.

The death and resurrection of our blessed Saviour, when viewed scripturally, have a significance to me that I cannot obtain through the popular idea of death. Could men but be disrobed of that prejudice in which they have been clothed by their early religious education, the light of divine truth would shine luminous and cheeringly in many minds now impervious to the true object of Christ's death, and the necessity of a resurrection before dead men can see life.

Hoping that the HERALD OF LIFE may be published to the end of time, I remain. Yours, in Christ.

SALLY DILLINGHAM, West Brewster, Mass., sends $5 for her paper, and writes: I love the HERALD OF LIFE. It is my delight to read its contents. Almost alone here, but sometimes I meet with one who will own that the Bible teaches, "the dead know not anything." I hope the eyes of the blind will be opened to see the truth. I pray that I may be able to stand firm for the truth until my last expiring breath. I know not how soon I shall be numbered with those who have gone before. You see by my writing I am failing. May the Lord bless you, and continue your life for further usefulness. My brother in Christ, if I should not be able to write again, I hope we shall be raised up to eternal life. "No life out of Christ" is my firm belief. Remember me at the throne of grace. May all our trials in this present time prove blessings in the future. My trials are sore, but I trust to be brought off conqueror through my Saviour. He is my strong tower into which I trust to run and be safe.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—May our aged sister, who has passed through deep waters of affliction, find the grace of God is sufficient for all emergencies, even unto the end, and Jesus returns in His glory to wipe away all tears for ever. That day is near.

ELD. J. PARRY, Sandy Hill, N. Y., writes: The "timests," it seems, have had another break down. Grieved I am that the advent cause should be so sadly wounded in the house of its professed friends, who have placed themselves, by time setting, in the position of the man who was so proverbial for his false statements that he was not credited, even when he spoke the truth. Who is responsible for the odium existing in the world, and in the churches, on the personal reign of Christ on the earth, in the present day? Can they be free from blame who have so often been the cause of reproach on the theme we love? If half the time that has been worse than wasted on the "sliding scale" about time, had been employed in the study of the nature, extent, subjects, and rulers of the coming kingdom of Christ, so fully revealed in the Psalms, the Prophets, and in the New Testament, we should not have quite so much blindness and prejudice on this all-important subject as we now witness, even among Adventists. In grasping at a shadow, they have lost the substance. Yours truly, in the hope of life at the resurrection of the just.

WE have on hand a supply of these three "Campaign Documents," and trust the friends of Life only in Christ will continue the good work of scattering them everywhere; especially the two first named. Those present our advanced ground as Life believers, and set forth the crowning views of the Life theory. Thousands of them have already been sent forth on their mission, and thousands more are to be put in circulation. They are put to purchasers at cost; but many must be given away. To pay for these, we look for donations from such as can help bear the expense.

Those who wish to send these works to their friends or acquaintances, can have the first two sent by mail, postage paid, for ten cents; or the three together for fourteen cents. By the 100 copies, sent by mail, LIFE FROM THE DEAD will be $6 25. THE JUDGMENT, $2 25. DEFENCE OF THE BIBLE, $3 50. If sent by express, or taken at our office, $5 per 100 for the first named; $2 for the second; and $3 for the last. But send for which you choose, and as many as you desire, and we shall send them at the same rate.

Our object is to put the two first named, especially, in circulation as extensively as possible. The other, "A DEFENCE OF THE BIBLE," may or may not go with the two first, as you choose. Yet it may be well to have a few of them for some particular persons.

The Oldest Christian Hymn.

In Paed., Lib. iii., of Clement of Alexandria, is given (in Greek) the most ancient hymn of the Primitive Church. It is there (one hundred and fifty years after the Apostles) asserted to be of much earlier origin. It may have been sung by the "beloved disciple" before he ascended to his reward. The following version will give some imperfect idea of its spirit.

Shepherd of tender youth,
Guiding in love and truth,
Through devious ways;
Christ, our triumphant King!
We come thy name to sing,
And here our children bring,
To shout thy praise.

Thou art our holy Lord!
The all-subduing Word,
Healer of strife!
Thou dist thyself abase,
That from sin's deep disgrace
Thou mightest save our race,
And give us life.

Thou art wisdom's High Priest!
Thou hast prepared the feast
Of holy love!
And in our mortal pain
None calls on thee in vain;
Help thou dost not distain,

Ever be thou our Guide,
Our Shepherd and our pride,
Our staff and song!
Jesus! thou Christ of God!
By the perennial word,
Lead us where thou has trod,
Make our faith strong.

So now, and till we die,
Sound we thy praise on high,
And joyful sing.
Infants, and the glad throng,
Who to thy Church belong,
Unite and swell the song
To Christ our King!

The foregoing hymn we cut from Zion's Herald. It shows that the early Christians understood in what salvation consisted better than modern ones do. See the close of the second stanza. To "give us life" was Christ's grand mission into our world; and in order to this, to deliver us from "sin's deep disgrace." If there is no deliverance from sin, there is no life to be given us. The theology of this hymn harmonizes with ours, and with the Bible.

Our Underground Neighbors.

"Did you ever see a mole
At home in his hole?"

It is a wonderful dwelling-place. It is all underground, and hasn't any outside to it, but it has chambers, passages, and a nursery for the babies. There are regular roads leading to it from all directions, and if you were down there you might mistake it for the grand railway depot of Moledom. You would not fancy it for a residence, the view being rather limited; but Mr. and Mrs. Mole, not being troubled with any eyes that are visible, are not particular about the prospect, and range about in its galleries with entire satisfaction.

Notwithstanding his blindness, the mole is, in his sphere, quite an accomplished little beast. Out of it the least said the better. He can run, fight, swim, pushing his way through the solid ground as if he did not know that any obstruction blocked up his path, and when he is thirsty, he just sinks a well wherever he happens to be. He looks very awkward and clumsy to us; but let him get his foot upon, or rather under his native heath, and he is a new mole altogether.

He is not a dyspeptic—munching a bit of dry toast with half a cup of weak tea for his breakfast. No, indeed. He eats like a famished panther, tearing and crunching his food, hurrying his meals as if he were a rich merchant instead of a poor mole. For dessert, he often swallows a snake twenty feet (not yards) long. Naturalists say that he makes nothing of devouring twenty or thirty serpents in a day. The story is bigger than the mole, but it may be true, notwithstanding. They don't tell us whether he is neat in his home-habits, but he always comes out of his hole with his fur as clean as a new ribbon. If he were not such a fighting character, we should like him better. He is a regular Ishmaelite—pitching into his own relations, killing and being killed from morning till night. That is his way of enjoying life.

We will leave him, and call on his neighbor, the fox. He has stolen his house, being too lazy to dig it out. He moved in one day when the owner was out, and he puts up with many inconveniences in his housekeeping rather than have the bother and fuss of building. The poor little rabbit or badger who was turned out only ventured to construct a tiny, humble home, and so the fox has had to enlarge it and patch it up a good deal—in fact, he has laid out enough on it to have built a new house. The lazy fellow sleeps all day, but at night he is off on a foraging tour, hunting for fat chickens and other dainties. It is pleasant to see him, on a summer evening, enjoying the fresh air with his wife and cubs. The little creatures are very playful, and their mamma plays with them, instead of drawing down her face and screaming: "O Reynard! see how you have soiled your new fur jacket."

Away out West there are large villages underground. They are built by a queer little animal called the prairie-dog. Many thousands of their dwellings are crowded together, and the tunnelled paths and avenues cross each other until the streets of the dog-village are like a great web of network. The inhabitants are very social, and are as inquisitive as human gossips; for, although they pop into their burrows on the least alarm, their heels are scarcely under ground before their bright brown eyes are peering curiously out to see what is going on outside. They seem to be a very hospitable people. The burrowing-owl and the rattlesnake visit them, and stay a year at a time. They make themselves at home, and do not scruple to eat up the tender doggies when they need a stimulant for the appetite. Ah! how grateful should we be that our long-tarrying visitors, self-billeted upon us, do not eat up their hosts!

Have you got a rabbit? Is it a white one or a gray one? Its relations are as social as the prairie-dog, and your rabbit doesn't enjoy a solitary life. He would scamper away to his dear old warren in a hurry if he could. You can't make any nest for him that he will think as nice as his natural home underground. He knows that, although he is helpless in your possession, things are going ahead in Rabbitland. Why, his sister Lightfoot was only a year old last autumn, and she is a grandmother.

But we will leave all the burrowing animals, though there are many more, for I want to tell you a little about the burrowing birds and insects. Perhaps some of you have been to England, and have seen there the sand-martin, with its little spear of a bill, boring its hole in the sandstone. It makes a sloping tunnel, at the end of which is placed its soft bed. There it hides it delicate, pinky-white eggs, and they are as safe as they can be anywhere. Venturesome boys are often in great danger when they try to steal the eggs, but they like the sport all the better for that.

The kingfisher and woodpecker are burrowers, the last boring for his home in decayed trees. You would not like to receive a blow from the ivory-billed woodpecker. Its beak is sharp and strong enough to splinter chips from mahogany.

There is a curious spider in Jamaica called the trap-door spider. It takes its name from the door of its nest. The spider digs a deep round hole in the ground, and fits into it a double silken tube. The trap-door at the top is round in shape, fitting the tube exactly, and is fastened by a hinge on one side. This is level with the surface of the ground, and nobody can find it when it is shut down.

You might be walking out in a meditative mood, and all at once start to see the ground open before you, and a horrible spider looking out at you. You take a step nearer to observe the wonder, and, before you fairly get your eye on him, he has seen you coming; down he goes, the little trap-door claps together after him, and you can't tell where he was. Nor a trace of either spider or door is left behind.

There is a great bee buzzing in the window, He is a humble or a bumble bee, whichever you please. What a racket he makes trying to force his way through the glass! The poor simpleton does not see that the lower sash of the window, where he came in, is still wide open. Grandmother says that his coming is a sure sign of company, and she starts off at once to inspect the jellies and cake. The children look at the great noisy bee with reverence. They don't know how he could have found out the intentions of our unknown visitors. Let us help the poor stupid insect out into the sunshine. His home is in the side of that warm bank of earth.

There is a mud-wasp living not far off. He is handsome, a real beauty of a wasp, but he has an awful sting, and he is as free with it as if it did not cost him a cent. He has been fitting up the hole of a field-mouse for himself; refashioning and refurnishing the whole concern. The papier-mache pillars and the shining cells crowd the house. But we can't stop to admire the work, because of that sting; so we will look at a couple of beetles and go home.

There is the sexton, so called because he buries the dead birds and mice that don't get eaten up. He works mostly at night. His nature is poetical, and the solemn darkness suits him. Before the dead bird is covered up, the sextoness lays some eggs upon the body—a custom borrowed from the Free-Masons, who throw in green twigs instead of eggs.

Most children have curiously watched the black beetle who goes about backward, with its heels against a round ball of earth, which it pushes first one way and then another, without any apparent object in view. But there are few children who know that she has a batch of eggs inside of the ball, and that she turns them over in the sunshine to warm them. She has a hole in the ground all ready for the ball, and she will have it safely buried there before the cool evening approaches.

We have only had a glance at our neighbors who live under the ground; but we will hope that what we have seen will excite a desire to know more of the wonderful works of God.—The Methodist.

A boy eight years old, in one of our public schools, having been told that a "reptile" is an animal that creeps, on being asked to name one on examination day, promptly and triumphantly replied, "baby."

We once heard of a rich man who was injured by being run over. "It isn't the accident," said he, "that I mind; that isn't the thing—but the idea of being run over by an infernal old swill cart, that's what makes me mad."

"Israel's Judicial Blindness."

Such is the title of a pamphlet by Joseph L. Lord, M. A., of the Boston bar; and which I have read with care, in hope of obtaining some new light upon the subject; but I must confess that from my stand-point, and with my understanding of divine revelation, I fail to see any hope for the return of the Jews to Palestine, either before or after the second advent of Jesus Christ.

If you have any light upon this subject, you will confer a favor upon me and some others in this locality, who are seeking after, and trying to obtain the truth, by giving through the Herald of Life your views on the subject.

Much, I am aware, has been said and written upon it years ago, but the subject is not yet exhausted; large fields of truth are yet open to be investigated, and of vast importance to the church.

If there is a promise of the return of the Jews that is valid now, it should to my mind be found in the new covenant. What do you think of that Br. Storrs? for when the Lord made the new covenant, He disannulled the old one, did He not? (Heb. vii., 18; and viii., 8–10.) Did not the old covenant end with Christ? And all the promises of the old covenant were forfeited by the Jews, as a nation, and cannot be obtained, from the fact that the new covenant does not recognize the Jews or Gentiles, as nations, but offers eternal life to all that fear God and work righteousness. No life to Jew or Gentile out of Christ.

If the old covenant is disannulled, as Paul said it was, then all promises to the Jewish nation, as such, have ceased; don't you think so? from the fact that all promises made under that covenant were on conditions, and the time for which the covenant was made has expired; and a new agreement entered into with the house of Israel and Judah.

But before we proceed any further let us examine the covenant from Mount Sinai, its stipulations, and the object to be gained by keeping it.

By referring to Exo. xix., we learn that the Lord called Moses up into Mount Sinai, and there gave him his law. Exo. xix., 5, we find the condition stated upon which Israel can become a peculiar people, and a kingdom of priests, an holy nation.

The conditions are that they obey his voice, and keep his covenant. The Lord's voice is his law, which was given to Moses upon the Mount, which we find recorded in chap. xx., and onward through the book of Exodus, embracing the ten commandments, and the ordinances of the church.

His covenant is what He promises to the people on conditions that they obey his voice, or law. By reading Exo. xxiii., 20–23, we learn that the Lord promised to drive out the nations before them, (Israel) until they inherit the land from the Red Sea even unto the Sea of the Philistines; and from the desert unto the river. In chap. xxiv., 7, 8, we find the following agreement of the people with the Lord, "And he took the book of the covenant, and read in the audience of the people, and they said, All that the Lord hath said that will we do, and be obedient. And Moses took the blood, and sprinkled it on the people, and said, Behold the blood of the covenant, which the Lord hath made with you, concerning all these words."

Paul speaking of this act of Moses, as the dedication of the first covenant, Heb. ix., 19–22. As they journeyed from Sinai to the land promised in the covenant, when they neared the land, Moses was directed to go up into the top of Mount Pisgah, that he might behold the land, but was not permitted to enter it. Deut. iii., 27. After Moses came down from the Mount, Deut. iv., he called the attention of the people to the covenant the Lord made with them at Sinai, and rehearsed it and the Lord's dealings with them from the time they left Sinai, until that time; also repeats the law and the promises or blessings they would obtain by keeping the law. Read Deut. xxviii., and notice that Moses states the conditions, in the first verse, upon which they can have the blessings; and notice, that among all the blessing, there is not one promise of eternal life. From the 14th verse to the end of the chapter, we have the judgments that would be sent upon them, if they did not keep the law.

Having found the covenant from Mount Sinai that gendereth to bondage, I wish to notice a few important points involved in this covenant.

1. This covenant is made with a nation. As a nation they receive the promises; and as a nation they suffer the judgments, "the iniquities of the fathers are visited upon the children, unto the fourth generation." Exo. xx., 5.

2. All promises contained in this covenant are of a temporal nature, and only to be enjoyed while they keep the law. Deut. xxviii., 13.

3. Whenever the nation repented of their transgressions, and kept the law, the promises would hold good, providing it was in their dispensation, or the time for which the law was given; which was until the seed should come. Gal. iii., 19. After the seed (Christ) came, it was impossible for the Jews to return under the promises of the old covenant, unless it can be shown that the same promises are put into the new covenant."

4. All prophecy to the Jewish nation, as such, is based upon the condition given in the covenant. Let it be remembered that all blessings promised in the covenant were on conditions; hence, when the prophets speak of the blessings that shall come upon Israel, it is on condition they repent; and when judgments are spoken of as coming, if they repent, the judgments are turned away. If the Jews had kept the covenant, they should not have been scattered; and then there would have been no necessity of a prophecy of their return. If there are no conditional prophecies, then the Jews can return without repenting. And if the Lord suffers them to return as a nation, without repenting, he breaks the covenant on his part; for he said, If they walked contrary to him he would walk contrary to them.

You will see, Br. Storrs, that I admit their is conditional prophecy. But some say, There is no condition stated by the prophets in many instances. That is true, and there was no necessity of stating conditions, from the fact they were speaking of things that were promised in the covenant, and the conditions were stated there. If there is a single prophecy in regard to the Jewish nation that is not involved in the covenant, then, that prophecy cannot be on conditions; but all predictions of blessings or judgments upon the nation, as long as the covenant is valid, are dependent upon the course the people pursue Read Jer. xviii., 7–10. There we have the conditions of prophecy to nations as such. If the Lord utter his judgments against a nation and that nation repents, the Lord must turn these judgments away, or his words fail. If the Lord has laid down a rule for prophecy under the old covenant, will he not abide by it in every instance? Certainly he will. If the nation is found in a scattered condition, when that covenant ends, must they not remain so, unless some new arrangement is made for their return? Does the new covenant make any provision for the return of the Jews, as a nation? No? From the fact that the covenant does not recognize Jew or Gentile as nations, but offers eternal life to all that believe.

I think I have said enough in regard to conditional prophecy.

Now we will look for a few moments at the law upon which the covenant is based. If the covenant is disannulled, then of course the law of the covenant cannot be in force; and hence the law and covenant from Mount Sinai are ended. Thus ends the old covenant, or agreement, between the people and the lord. It ends with Christ, the promised seed. It has done its work, it has filled its place. "It was added because of transgression, till the seed should come." He has come and nailed the law to the cross by his death. He has risen from the dead with all power in heaven and on earth; and became the "Mediator of a better covenant," which was established upon better promises. Heb. viii., 6.

Letters and Extracts.

From La Fayette Norris.

Campton, Iowa, Sept. 27, 1868.

Br. Storrs: Enclosed please find $9. Four to pay for A. O. Hillstream's paper the coming year; and four to pay for mine; twenty-five cents to pay up for my last volnme. This leaves seventy-five cents, which I want in "Campaign Documents."

Brother and Sister Hillstream are old people, somewhere in their fifties, and they are sick a good share of the time, indeed they suffer a great deal, and are poor; yet they give more than many healthy people, who have more money than they have. My prayer is that they may be spared a good while longer, for they are doing a good work. If you could send them a few campaign documents, I think they would be well circulated.

God has prospered me this summer, notwithstanding my severe loss; and I think I shall be able to do something for the spread of the truth the coming year. I shall get a new subscriber, if I have to pay for the paper myself. If some one of the able preaching brethren will come this way, I will pledge him ten dollars; and if Brother Storrs will come I will double the amount. The live preacher will reach some minds that books cannot. I know of many people that are almost convinced of the Life views, but most of them are unconverted; others are in the different churches. I think a preacher would arouse them to a sense of their duty and danger. What advent preaching we have is so mixed up with fanaticism and mystical interpretations of Scripture, that it does more harm than good, and disgusts many thinking people; that is my opinion.

Br. Storrs, do you think the late earthquake in South America is the one mentioned in Rev. xvi., 18? A political paper called it the greatest earthquake since the Christian era. My love to all the dear brethren. Yours, as ever, desiring to spread the truth of life though Christ alone.

Remarks by the Editor.—We do not regard the earthquake in South America as the one spoken of in Rev. xvi. That is not a literal one, but relates to some political convulsion or revolution, or a series of them, which shall utterly destroy the great city Babylon. The late action of Austria in relation to the old harlot, and the revolution in Spain, shaking papal power to its very centre, and others which may soon follow, it seems to us are more likely to be the great earthquake spoken of Rev. xvi., than any literal one. Yet these literal ones may be, in the designs of God, a part of the "wine cup" of His judgment on the harlot—"the Mother of abominations." If we are not mistaken, most of the places visited hitherto with these literal earthquakes are mainly under the Roman Catholic power; or devotees of Romanism. The day of her perdition is at hand and cannot long be delayed. Let Protestantism be warned that it be not found with the harlot's garments on. "Come out of her, my people," saith the Lord.

From Henry S. Bowman.

Morstown, Vt., Sept. 27, 1868.

Br. Storrs: I had a desire to go to the Springfield camp-meeting, and went, a stranger to all, except a friend and fellow-traveller. Was there the last three days. Found the Life and Advent Mission Tent, and Life believers gathered therein; and for once in a life-time I felt at home. Sweet, sweet home; and more; found harmony, peace, order, Christian-love, smiling and beaming faces that I did not find so fully elsewhere: and I think the remark that I heard from more than one, was true, viz., that a more intelligent company could not be found. I tell you I believe that the doctrine of Life only in Christ, if believed and accepted, makes people intelligent, and beautiful too; takes all the knotty, irritable, revengeful disposition out of people; makes God appear what he is, lovely, just and good. It wins, woos, and draws them nearer to the Father of mercies. Nothing can be more absurd than the talk heard in another quarter, that this doctrine never converts anybody. Every Life believer knows full well that it is the very height and depth of conversion. Why, it seems to me now, that I was not more than half converted till I embraced the good news and doctrine of "Life only in Christ." If the wicked dead are raised, then God appears a revengeful being. If I believed in the resurrection of the wicked now, I should believe in endless torment. If the Almighty has the disposition to raise the wicked dead, to put to death a second time, then He may have the disposition to raise and put to death any number of times, or torment at his pleasure; but He will not do it: and for that reason we can love and praise him for his great goodness and tender mercies.

I often think that if some of our Advent or Christian brethren would accept and believe the Life theme, they would not, as they sometimes do, manifest a revengeful spirit, in wanting the wicked dead raised to be punished, or tormented a little more; and seemingly would even compel God to raise and torment them, if they could. Ah, they need converting. Thank heaven, the truth makes us free from such a disposition. God is goodness in perfection, and never will raise the wicked dead to life: His sympathy for his children is too great to cause them to witness the agony of loved kindred and friends suffering death a second time. I dare not now think of God in that light. And I know of one, at least, that the doctrine of the non-resurrection of the unjust converted, and placed a radiant smile on the face, and who frankly declared that nothing else could or would; and the last I heard from this one, is this sentence, "I am trying to live a Christian."

Wm. H. Simmons, Potter, N. Y., writes: I am a cripple, confined to my room: can't do without the Herald, for it is all the preaching I get except my Bible. I like the paper for the truth it advocates—"Life only in Christ;" and I pray the Lord may spare your life to conduct the paper until He comes. I send $2, for Vol. VI.

Remarks by the Editor.—We have often thought of this excellent Br., at whose house we were entertained several years ago when on a preaching tour in that part of the State. He was, and we know not but he still is, a member of the Baptist church; but he early embraced the Life views, and has steadily supported the Herald of Life, and the Bible Examiner before it. We are sorry to hear of his confinement; but, "All things work together for good to them who love God." So, fear not, Br. Simmons; our warfare will soon end, and we shall have an endless rest, and an "eternal weight of glory." Let us keep our eyes on the things that are unseen except by faith, and soon "we shall see Him as He is, and be like him"—undying, immortal, and filled with unutterable joy.

Eld. J. Lewis, Oconce, Ill., writes: I have had a profitable tour, although a laborious one, having travelled twenty miles a day through Fayette and Clay counties, preaching and scattering the "Campaign Documents," etc. I am quite out of the one-leaf tracts, and wish I had another supply. We feel quite sure good will result, and has already resulted from our labors, and say, Amen, glory to God; but may it never enter our heart or mind to shout "glory to God," and "Amen" at the thought of seeing the wicked dead tortured into life to die again. God is too good for that. We love Him because He has said "Affliction shall not rise up the second time." Nahum i., 9. I pity the ignorance of those who can manifest joy at the idea of the resurrection of the wicked. But we "know that through ignorance they did it." We have received all the packages you have sent us. We respond to the call for help to publish the tract "Living Soul." It is the very thing wanted.

John Marsh, McKean, Pa., writes: Send me more "Campaign Documents." The previous lot you sent me are all out, doing a good work. I was at the Post-office when they arrived, and immediately announced the fact to the people assembled, which gave me an opportunity to distribute them all but one set, requesting them to read and give to others or return to me. May the good seed soon bring forth much fruit, is my prayer. Yours, in hope of a future life.

BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail, the postage has to be pre-paid.

Six Sermons on the Inquiry. Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—" the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the true teachings of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.

ALL NAMES of persons, sent us, should be written plain, so that we shall not have to GUESS them out. Also in ordering, the name of the POST OFFICE, COUNTY, AND STATE must be given, and written plainly; and if a CHANGE is called for, state the Office to which the paper has previously been sent. Unless attention is paid to all these matters confusion and delay are inevitable.

THE LORD'S PRAYER. LUKE XI., 1–13.

[We take the following remarks on this subject from the Sunday Magazine (English.) They are by WM. HANNA.—ED. HER. OF LIFE.]

WITHOUT entering into a minute examination of the separate clauses of this prayer, let me crave your attention to three of the features by which it is pre-eminently distinguished.

1. Its shortness and simplicity. It is very plain; not a part or petition of it which, as soon as it is capable of praying, a child cannot easily understand. It is very brief, occupying but a minute or two in the utterance, so that there is not a season or occasion for prayer in which it might not be employed. There is no ambiguity, no circumlocution, no expansion, no repetition here. It is throughout the direct expression of desire; that desire in each case clothing itself in the simplest, compactest form of speech. In the Sermon on the Mount when Jesus first repeated this prayer, he offered it in contrast with the tedious amplifications and reiterations of which the Jewish and heathen prayers were then ordinarily composed. The Jews, as the heathen of old, as the Mussulmans still, had their set hours throughout the day for prayer; and so fond were they of exhibiting the punctuality and precision and devoutness with which the duty was discharged, that they often arranged it so that the set hour should find them in some public place. Such practice, as altogether contrary to the spirit and object of true devotion, as part of that mere dead formalism which it was the great object of his teaching to unmask, Jesus utterly condemned. "When thou prayest, thou shalt not be as the hypocrites; for they love to pray standing in the synagogues and corners of the streets, that they may be seen of men. Verily, I say unto you, they have their reward. But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut the door, pray to thy Father which is in secret, and thy Father which seeth in secret shall reward thee openly. But when ye pray, use not vain repetitions, as the heathen do; for they think that they shall be heard for their much speaking. Be not ye, therefore, like unto them, for your Father knoweth what things ye have need of before ye ask him. After this manner pray ye." It was as an antidote to the kind of prayers then generally employed, as well as a pattern specimen for after use within the church, that Jesus then proceeded to repeat the prayer which has been called by his name. It was not to lie by or be deposited as a mere standard measure by which other prayers were to be tried. It was to be used—to be repeated. When, many months after its first recital, it was said to Jesus, "Lord, teach us to pray, as John also taught his disciples," he was not satisfied with saying, "Pray generally in such a mode or style as this:" he prescribed the very words—"When ye pray, say," and he repeated the very prayer that he formerly had spoken. Not that he put much or any importance on the exact words to be employed. In three out of the six petitions of which the prayer is made up, there are variations in the words, not enough to make the slightest difference in the meaning, but sufficient to show that it was not simply by a repetition of the words that the prayer was truly said. With rigorous exactness, this prayer might be said over and over again till it became a very vain repetition—all the vainer, perhaps, because of the very excellence of the form that was so abused. But over and over again—day by day—it might be repeated without any such abuse. All depends upon how you use it. Enter into its meaning—put your own soul and their own sense into the words—let it be the true and earnest desires of your heart that you thus breathe into the ear of the Eternal—and you need not fear how often you repeat it, or think that because you say the same words over again you sin. Our Lord himself, within the compass of an hour, repeated the same prayer thrice in the garden. But use it as a mere form, with no other idea than that because it has been "authoritatively prescribed" it ought to be employed, a single such use of it is sin.

2. The order and proportion of the petitions in the Lord's prayer. It naturally divides itself into two equal parts; the one embracing the first three petitions, the other the three remaining ones—these parts palpably distinguished from each other by this, that in the former the petitions all have reference to God, in the latter to man. In the former the thoughts and desires of the petitioner are all engrossed with the name, the kingdom, the will of the great Being addressed; in the latter with his own wants, and sins, and trials. It would be carrying the idea of the Lord's prayer as a pattern, or model, to an illegitimate length, were we to say that because about one half of the prayer is devoted to the first of these objects, and one half to the other, our prayers should be divided equally between them. Yet surely there is something to be learned from the precedence assigned here to the great things which concern the name, and kingdom, and will of our heavenly Father, as well as from the space which these occupy in this prayer. You have but to reflect a moment on the structure and proportion of parts in any of our ordinary prayers, whether in private or in public, and especially on the place and room given in them to petitions touching the coming of God's kingdom, and the doing of his will on earth as it is done in heaven, to be satisfied as to the contrast which in this respect they present to the model laid down by Christ himself. Our prayers, such as they are, with all their weaknesses and imperfections, will not, we are grateful to remember, be cast out because we yield to a strong natural bias, and press into the foreground, and keep prominent throughout, those personal necessities of our nature which primarily urge us to the throne of grace. Our heavenly Father not only knoweth what things we need before we ask them, but he knoweth, too, what the things are, the need of which presses first and heaviest upon our hearts. Nor will he close his ear to any returning, repentant, hungering and thirsting spirit, simply because these are pressed first and most urgently upon his regard. But is it not well, nevertheless, that we should be reminded, as the prayer dictated by our Saviour so emphatically does, that selfishness may and does creep into our very prayers, and that the perfect form of all right approach to, all right address to the Divinity, is that in which the place of supremacy which of right belongs to him is duly and becomingly recognized? More especially should it be so in all prayers that go up from this sinful earth to those pure and holy heavens: for if it be true—as the whole body of the prayer prescribed by Jesus teaches us that it is—that we are living in a world where God's name is not hallowed as it ought, is often dishonored and profaned—in a world where God's kingdom of justice and holiness and love, is not universally established, where another and quite opposite kingdom contests with it for the empire of human souls—in a world where other wills than that of God are busily at work, not always consenting with or working under his, but resisting and opposing it; then surely if the name, the kingdom, the will of our Father which is in heaven were as dear to us as they ought to be, first and above all things beside we should desire that his name should be hallowed, his kingdom should come, his will should be done on earth as it is done in heaven. Let us, then, as often as we use this prayer, receive with meekness the rebuke it casts upon that tendency and habit of our nature which leads us, even in our prayers, to put our own things before the things of our heavenly Father; and let us urge our laggard spirits onward and upward from the sense and sight of our personal necessities, till filled with adoration, and gratitude, and love, before even we make mention before him of a single individual want, we be ready with a true heart to say, "Our Father, which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name; thy kingdom come; thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven."

And while receiving the lesson clearly to be gathered from the place and space occupied by the first three petitions of our Lord's prayer, let its fourth petition, in its sequence, and in its solitariness, and in its narrowness, proclaim to us the place, even among our own things, which earthly and bodily, as compared with spiritual provisions, possessions, enjoyments, ought to have. Is it without a meaning that we are taught to pray first, "Thy will be done," and then, immediately thereafter, "Give us this day our daily bread?" The bread is to be asked that by it the life may be preserved, and the life is to be preserved that it may be consecrated to the doing of God's will. According to the tenor of the prayer and the connection of these two petitions, we are not at liberty to ask for the daily bread irrespective of the object to which the life and strength which it prolongs and imparts are to be devoted. It were a vain and hollow thing in any of us to pray that God's will be done, as in heaven, so on earth, if we do not desire and strive that it should be done as by others so also by ourselves. And it is as those who do thus desire, and are thus striving, that we are alone at all likely to proceed to say, "Give us this day our daily bread." A natural and moderate request, we may be ready to think, which all men will at once be prepared to present to God. Yet not so easy to present in the spirit in which Jesus would have us to offer it. Not so easy to feel our continued and entire dependence on God for those very things that we are most tempted to think we have acquired by our own exertions, and secured to ourselves and our families by our own skill and prudence. Not so easy to pray for a competent portion of the things of this life, only that by the manner of our using and enjoying them the will of our heavenly Father, his own gracious purpose in placing us where we are placed, and in giving us all that we possess, may be carried out. Not so easy to limit thus our desires and efforts in this direction, and to be satisfied with whatever the portion be that God pleases to bestow. Not so easy to renew this petition day by day, as conscious that all which comes each day comes direct from the hand of God—comes to those who have no right or title to claim it as their own—who should ask and receive it continually as a gift. Not so easy to narrow the petition to the day, leaving to-morrow in God's hands. The simplest and easiest, at first, as it seems, of all the six petitions, perhaps this one about our daily bread is one that we less frequently than any other present in the true spirit. It stands there in the very centre of the prayer—the only one bearing upon our earthly condition—preceded and followed by others, with whose spirit it must or ought to be impregnated—from which it cannot be detached. Secular in its first aspect, in this connection how spiritual does it appear!

CHRIST'S COMING TO JUDGMENT.

SEEING I have no news to write at present, I will present this subject, a subject of the greatest importance and interest to all, and a subject of the most delightful nature to contemplate, if we are at ONE with God; but if otherwise, it will be very disagreeable; and if we find it to be so, we may reasonably conclude that we are still rebels to the government of God, which should lead us at once to that "God of Love"—who is "waiting to be gracious"—submit to his conditions, and be at peace with him, so that when we hear Jesus say, "Behold, I come quickly," we will reply with rapturous delight, "Even so, come Lord Jesus."

Since 1840 we have every once in a while been startled with the cry, Jesus comes, but the set times have as repeatedly passed by, and still he tarries. To one party it was a joyful cry, but they are disappointed. To the other party it was a dreadful cry; but they feel relieved, so that they will soon have their nerves braced to scoff at the idea, and hopefully cry out, "Peace and safety;" and tauntingly inquire, "Where is the promise of his coming?" while the other party, crestfallen by their repeated disappointments, are destined, like Gideon's little army, to further trial, which may diminish their number, so that when Jesus does come, the words that he uttered may have a significant meaning—"Nevertheless, when the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?" But those "that endure unto the end" will be purified—purged from the calculations of men, and have their faith to rest upon the "sure word of prophecy," viz., "Watch, for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come"—"of that day and hour knoweth no man." Yet, for the encouragement of those who love his appearing, Jesus gave us signs that we may know "when it is near, even at the doors."

Now, among the many signs given, the fulfilment of which converges into our times, I will notice this one; that is, The disappointments of those who are looking for his coming. About the last time that Jesus left the temple at Jerusalem, his disciples called his attention to that beautiful structure. He informs them of its impending destruction; whereupon they anxiously inquire, "When these things shall be, and what would be the sign of his coming, and of the end of the world?" Among other signs that would precede his coming, he says, "Then," at the time of his coming, "shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins which took their lamps, and went forth to meet the bridegroom."

Now since 1843 to 1868, there has been a people fulfilling this prediction; they took their lamps, what light they had, and went forth to meet the bridegroom, expecting, confidently expecting his coming. Now what does Jesus say about them? Does he say they were all wrong? No; but he says some of them were wise, while some of them were foolish; so that they would still be put on trial, which would clearly determine the one class from the other, for the prediction goes on to say, "While the bridegroom tarried they all slumbered and slept." Now, after this going forth at set times to meet the bridegroom, there would be a tarrying time, during which the foolish virgins would get quite off their time excitement and go to sleep: the wise virgins may also be slumbering, but during this midnight state the cry is made, "Behold, the bridegroom cometh." "What I say unto you I say unto all, Watch." We are now entering upon the midnight time. I think the above sign is clearly defined in the history of our times. May we not be justified in looking upon that display of God's power on the western coast of South America as premonitory—as a prelude to the storm of God's wrath when he will arise "to shake terribly the earth?" During that earthquake, we read of some Indian mummies being cast out of the earth, making a ghastly spectacle; premonitory signs, when "the earth shall reel to and fro like a drunken man"—"when the earth shall cast out the dead." "For behold the LORD cometh out of his place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity." "The earth also shall disclose her blood, and shall no more cover her slain." In the incidents of that late earthquake, we see how the wicked might literally have a resurrection without ever seeing life, while the living and dead could fulfil the conditions of God's word and become "ashes under the soles of the feet" of the redeemed. O, let us see to it that we now live by faith on the Son of God, above the strife, confusion, and allurements of this present time, that we may now lift up our heads in hope and with joy, knowing that our redemption draweth nigh.

ABOUT VOTING.

[The HERALD OF LIFE, as such, sides with no political party. Its business is purely theological. The EDITOR does not determine the duty of others on the question of voting; yet, personally, he feels it his duty to cast his vote for civil rulers under such a form of government as gives the authority to the people to select rulers; and if we are bound to "pray for all in authority," it seems to us, it is a duty to accompany our prayers with our vote. With that view we have voted and shall continue to do so till the righteous Ruler we look for shall take the kingdom. In our paper, for the reason we have assigned, we have nothing to say as to what candidates we shall vote for. Not that we have no preference; for we most certainly have, and shall not belie our antecedents. These remarks have been drawn out by the following communication from one who was a Methodist Preacher years ago when we were connected with that church.—ED]

MARATHON, N. Y., Oct. 11, 1868.

BR. STORRS: Some weeks since the HERALD contained some remarks in reference to those looking for Jesus taking any part in civil government, which I confess appeared more like a sound argument than anything else I had seen bearing in that direction. I have patiently listened to many arguments of the sort, but have no prospect of being convinced of their soundness, until God by his word or Providence, shall call his people to a way of living entirely independent of these governments, as he did the Hebrews on their deliverance from Egypt.

If God should so order, it would seem to me a privilege to obey his order, as a special providence, but it must be His order, and His providence, as it was in the case of the Hebrews, not a case of their own wisdom, or devising, but His specially.

I do not look for any such order or providence previous to the coming of the Son of God; and if a hundred such should be devised by men, I am quite sure God would not adopt any one of them, however well meant by their devisers. Such, I think, was P. D. Armstrong's at Celestia, Pa.

As long as our heavenly Father leaves us so exposed to the governments of this world that our daily bread has to be portioned to us by human standards of reckoning, we are, at best, but sojourners in a strange land, and to a very considerable extent under bondage to the rudiments of this world, and not free, as God means his people shall be free in his exalted kingdom. I know while earthly governments are administered under the dominion of gold, the dead God of this world, its promises will ever be bland and inviting, but its performances will be cold and disappointing; for under its standards the good and true were always persecuted; never, as promised, protected; else the Son of God had not been crucified; yet it belongs to the good and true, according to their Master's word—"Returning good for evil," to push their influence in the direction of truth and sound government, that the condition of the poor and oppressed may at least remain tolerable while they sojourn for a time on this sin-cursed footstool.

Human state laws are confessedly made for the lawless and unruly—for murderers, thieves, and liars; for profane and perjured persons. I ask no pay for any good will I show it; I need no protection, and can endure its abuse if I persistently do well, while I stay here: yet I still find it harmonious with what I think a good conscience to vote with the party now probably in a majority, in the land that most agrees in purpose and practice with the nation's hated minority, you once so faithfully labored and suffered to advance; and I, if not you, so long voted with. The Republican party have much to be ashamed of, much to repent of; its cowardly, cosey compromise with oppression and iniquity, and that it will not repent of; its masses however seem less imbued with race-hating, color-hating, caste-loving mania, than does the party that confronts them for mastery in the political arena of this world representative nation. I therefore co-operate with them; but hope they both will soon have, for their wickedness, to give place to a better—a sinless and endless government, not to be passed away. With much esteem. Yours truly,

L. D. TANNER.

THE authority of Christ alone is to be regarded in everything purely religious, as he is the only judge to whom mankind are accountable.—S. Bradburn.

OUR TIMES.

IT is full of significance to students of the Divine word, who believe that the present dispensation is rapidly nearing its close, to find how clearly the Scriptural accounts of the depravities of the last times are being reflected in the current accounts of the condition and tendencies of modern society. When those who believe as we do, undertake to tell how things are, and to what they are drifting, it is set down to a morbidness of imagination and a morose cynicism, which are supposed to belong to the whole school. And yet, we find preachers, editors and observers of all classes expressing themselves just as strongly, without the slightest reference to the argument which we build upon the facts.

The notorious English divine, Dr. Pusey, has recently preached a sermon on the character of the Pharisee, in which, after remarking that there is not a character in the Bible more generally detested than the Pharisee, he went on to show that said Pharisee was yet greatly superior to the average citizen of our time, and that the world would be greatly better than it is, if that Pharisee were a more frequent type among us. The Pharisee was no adulterer, was ostentatiously charitable, and in every outward respect set a very good example. He might fairly be considered an absolutely model Christian of the nineteenth century; indeed, something rather higher, since he gave a tenth of his substance to God; a proportionate return to the Giver of all things, which would now-a-days be considered very inconvenient. According to Dr. Pusey, the most detestable character in Scripture is a trifle better than our loftiest type of general virtue; and that churchmen generally fall below this Pharisee, retaining all his self-satisfaction without any of his merits. He says, in fact, that it is the peculiarity of our age to unite the wickedness of the Publican to the self-complacency of the Pharisee—to violate all the commandments unblushingly, without ever having it enter our heads to kneel afar off. People thank God that they are not as other men, than whom they are, in many respects, a great deal worse. They pride themselves upon the virtues to which they have not the slightest just pretension, and call themselves a moral people and a domestic nation, when vice stalks unblushingly abroad, and the reciprocal pledges of conjugal life are frequently as lightly broken as they are oft lightly assumed.

The Imperial Review notes these sayings, asks whether the charge is true, and remarks, "In all honest seriousness, we much fear that it is. Still more shameless periods than ours can be pointed to in the history of the world, and epochs can be recalled when the public self-complacency was greater; but we are quite sure that there never was a time in which absence of virtue, and absence of self-reproach, were so completely and amazingly combined as they now are. The whole world sins overtly, and nobody is angry; or, if some individual raises his voice by way of protest, he is considered a very ill bred fellow. We refuse virtue even the homage of hypocrisy, and yet stoutly deny that we are vicious. We have all the shamelessness, without the simplicity of savage life. Our ladies dress indecently, and they know they do, but they go to church with religious regularity. We delight in practical falsehoods, and are never so much pleased with our own ingenuity as when we have invented a transparent cloak for wickedness."

The Christian Intelligencer, of August 6th, under the caption, "What are we coming to?" makes the following reflections touching the ethical and spiritual condition of American society:

"Every one who keeps his eyes open to the signs of the times must be impressed with the fearful tendencies to demoralization that are everywhere manifest. There seems to be a general relaxation of wholesome restraints, a deterioration of manly character, a disposition on all sides to run into almost every form of excess. In the pursuit of wealth, of fashion, of pleasure, of amusement, everywhere except in a strict adherence to the old time-honored principles of Christian virtue and morality, the intemperate spirit of the age is only too clearly seen. The simple integrity, the straightforward, sober industry in one's occupation, the patient waiting for success, and the calm content with the more moderate enjoyments of life, that once characterized our people, seem to have been lost with a generation or two gone by, and in their stead there have come into play a system of sharp practice, a style of fitful and galvanic energy, a feverish eagerness for the sudden acquisition of wealth and distinction in society, and a restless and insatiable craving for new and more costly pleasures, which are as detrimental to long life, true happiness and real dignity, as they are to the preservation of 'a conscience void of offence toward God and toward men.'

"Especially is this true with regard to society as it now exists in this city of New York. It is not only among the lower orders, as they are called, that we find the melancholy evidence of this degeneracy of spirit, and this unscrupulous indifference to the requirements of religion and pure morals. Further up in the social scale, in palatial residences where wealth ministers to the morbid taste for luxury, and surrounds itself with splendors that dazzle the eye, there are scenes and transactions, indulgences and practices, which if they could be uncovered to the sight of men as they are to the sight of God, would make every lover of his country and his race stand ghast with horror."—Prophetic Times.

I CAN TRUST IN GOD.

BY THE REV. J. G. BASS.

IN one of my missionary explorations, I called at a tenement-house, in the back basement of which I found an aged Protestant Irish woman living. The room was but scantily furnished, and the few articles of furniture were of the cheapest kind. Having met the old woman two or three times at prayer-meetings I held in a sick-chamber in her neighborhood, I needed no introduction, but engaged in conversation with her, and found that she had been a widow twelve years; that she had been left to struggle for the support of herself and a son, now twenty-two years of age, and a daughter, now eighteen years of age; that for many years before her husband's death she had been led by the Spirit of God to seek an interest in Christ as her personal Saviour; that her husband had lived a Christian life, and died a peaceful, happy death. Her son was a dutiful, well-disposed young man, on whom she now depended for support; but he was out of employ, and had been so for seven weeks.

On pressing my inquiries, I found that the young man had had a situation as driver or conductor on one of the city railroad cars; but when the Sabbath came, and he was preparing to leave the house for his work, his mother informed him that he must not work on God's holy day, that she would starve before she would eat bread earned by a violation of God's laws. The son endeavored to silence the scruples of his mother, but failed, and he was compelled to give up the situation; and now for seven weeks he was without work, with no income, with no means, with no credit, and want was staring them in the face, hunger was at the door.

I asked: "Under these circumstances, what can you do? What will you do?" The old lady raised her head, and with her eye intently fixed on me, while her countenance showed strong determination, replied:

"I can trust in God, and I will do it."

I felt abashed before this aged Christian whose faith in God was being so severely tried, and after reading and praying with her, handed her a dollar which a Christian lady had that morning put in my hand for the "suffering poor," and I left her.

A week passed away before I could again call at the house; when I did call, joy and gladness were in her countenance, and praise on her lips.

"Did not I tell you I can trust in God?" said she. "Oh! he hears prayer, blessed be his holy name! He heard our prayer that day. That very night a good man came to my door and inquired after my boy and engaged him, and he is now in decent employment, where he don't have to break any of the laws of the good God, and he is getting better pay too, and he is going regularly to church on Sundays, and to meetings at night, and he is trying to be a Christian, and I am so happy! Praise the Lord! Yes, I can trust in God. I will trust in him while I live."

Happy soul, she had found the true riches, the secret of happiness, the victory that overcometh the world—"faith in God." In times of trials and difficulty, are you able to say: "I can trust in God"?—Selected.

THE INDIAN'S TEMPTATION.

AN Indian, visiting his white neighbors, asked for a little tobacco to smoke, and one of them having some loose in his pocket, gave him a handful. The day following, the Indian came back, inquiring for the donor, saying he had found a quarter of a dollar among the tobacco. Being told that, as it was given him, he might as well keep it, he answered, pointing to his breast, "I got a good man and a bad man here; and the good man say, It is not mine, I must return it to the owner; the bad man say, Why, he gave it you, and it is your own now; the good man say, That not right, the tobacco is yours, not the money; the bad man say, Never mind, you got it, go buy something; the good man say, No, no, you must not do so; so I don't know what to do; and I think I go to sleep; but the good man and the bad kept talking all night, and trouble me; and now I bring the money back, I feel good."

On Preaching.

A LETTER TO W. R., OF GROVELAND, MASS.

Dear Brother: Paul tells us to "Covet earnestly the best gifts." Then certainly it is right for us to qualify ourselves to instruct others in the things of God: yes, it shows a healthy state in Christianity to see one anxious to lead others to Christ. God's children are all called to be "living epistles, known and read of all men." But many, perhaps we might say the most, neglect to improve faithfully the gift within them, and thus dwarf themselves as Christians, and fail to accomplish much for the cause of God. Premising you are called to preach, the question arises, What shall we preach? Would it not be safe to take for a rule of conduct in this matter the example of John, Christ, and the apostles? Certainly: as they were measurably the originators and agents in this work, they would give us a correct example of teaching. They taught, and also enjoined others to teach, "All men everywhere to repent." "That repentance and remission of sins should be preached in the name of Jesus." All agree in this. But why preach repentance? Did John, Christ, or the apostles enjoin repentance or any other duty without giving a reason why? "Repent," says John, "for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." "Jesus began to preach and to say, Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." Matt. iv., 17. "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature," says Christ: and that there may be no doubt as to what this gospel comprises, he states it as "This gospel of the kingdom (which) shall be preached in all the world, for a witness, and then shall the end come." "Repent," says Peter, "and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord; and he shall send Jesus Christ which before was preached unto you; whom the heavens must receive (or retain) until the times of restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." Acts. iii., 19–21. "And the times of this ignorance God winked at, but now commandeth all men everywhere to repent: because he hath appointed a day in the which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained: whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead," xvii., 30, 31.

In the above, we have the gospel system, as a whole, but as to its several duties and claims upon us, the word is filled out with these. Therefore, to enforce obedience, or as a regulator of Christian conduct, Paul, in his instructions to Timothy, his son, in the gospel says, "Preach the word:" and again, "Of these things put them in remembrance, charging them before the Lord that they strive not about words to no profit, but to the subverting of the hearers. Study to show thyself approved unto God" (see to it that he approves, not much matter about men, for Paul says, it is a small thing to be judged of men's judgment) "a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth."

Seeing, then that it is God's word, and not Watson's Institutes, or Clarke's Commentary we are to preach, we should be careful in the selection and consultation of our text books; and the safest and best way, we think, is to make out our subject mainly from a good Bible and Concordance. With this help we can gather out of God's storehouse a host of harmonious truth, and then bring it forth to the people in all its native beauty and power; not as our word, but as it is indeed the word of the Lord. Remember, when you thus preach, it is in obedience to God; it is his preaching; but preaching your views is going outside the call. And whereas in presenting God's word you may feel strong in his power, and so present it that others shall also feel. But in presenting your sentiments, you will feel and others will think of them as only men's inventions.

As to success attending the presentation of truth, this depends a good deal on the manner. In this respect, take the same examples as in the doctrines to be taught, viz., Christ and the apostles; they used plain common place things to illustrate truth. Seek simplicity and godly sincerity in all your utterances; and be sure you will always succeed best when you appear the most original. Be yourself: or, in other words, give yourself to to the Lord and the Spirit's influence fully. Be content with the position and use he may make of you. Many have spoiled their usefulness by "appearing to be something, when they were nothing." Let us appear to be just what God makes us; being thankful and content that his will be done in the matter. As clay in the potter's hand is a good illustration of the true position of a gospel minister, so shall you have praise of God, "and doubtlessly will come again bringing your sheaves with you." Yours affectionately,

A. Boynton.

"The Living Soul."—We have been delayed a little in getting out this tract; but it will be ready early next week, we expect. We shall print two thousand to begin with. Send your orders, at once, and all the funds you can to enable us to scatter them by tens of thousands. We have added to it the article by Dr. Bond on "Vain Philosophy," the "Twenty Questions on Immortality," and two other pages. These latter can be separated from the main tract, if you wish it. Let us have your response immediately. The price will be $2 per 100, and postage 26 cts.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 21, 1868.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

The Herald of Life.

Many are the expressions of satisfaction we have received at the appearance of No. 1, of Vol. VI. We cannot but thank the Lord and take courage. We feel assured our brethren and sisters have not prayed in vain for the blessing of God on this periodical. It was born of his providence, without previous calculation or forethought, and of no selfish purposes; but was the spontaneous result from the love of the truth of "Life only in Christ." If any enterprise can claim for its origin an unselfish end or object, and an unlooked-for birth, the Herald of Life can.

The Bible Examiner had struggled through a life of twenty years, with a world of opposition; at times, life itself suspended because the cost of its printing could not be met, and with no compensation to its Editor. But, at last, in 1863, God raised up men who had hearts and means to say, the Bible Examiner (a monthly magazine) must not only live, but it must be exchanged for a weekly paper. This was an event unlooked for and unthought of by its Editor; and he confesses he was startled by the boldness of the attempt and the response the enterprise received. It came into life in the "open field," under a solitary "chestnut tree" in Wilbraham, Mass., in August, 1863. It was truly an infant then; nor has it grown like some precocious children; but has advanced slowly, yet fast enough for a healthy development, which gives signs of maturing into manhood with a voice which, through Divine inspiration, shall be heard, till the pillars of the heathen-born doctrine of inherent immortality and a future life of torment, shall fall, like Dagon before the Ark of God, and the moral Philistines shall do homage to the glorious truth of "Life future and eternal ONLY in and through Jesus Christ our Lord and Life-giver." Again, we "thank God and take courage."

While we thus speak, we do not forget, and may none of us ever forget, that all our success has been from the hand of God, to whom our friends have looked with much prayer; and the Editor feels, to-day, that his life has been prolonged, his health preserved, and his peace of mind continued and increased, in answer to the many prayers of his friends in Christ; and he rejoices to serve them and the cause of our common Lord with his lengthened out days. He has still need of their prayers, that his last efforts may be such as to help mature all who peruse the columns of this paper, for that life which will soon be given to all who love God and his Son Jesus Christ in truth, sincerely. "Without holiness no man shall see the Lord." Holiness is harmony with the Divine will. Let this be our constant object and aim. This is the secret of all true peace of mind. Let us trust in God in and for all things; and quietly, yea, joyfully, submit to him and his direction in all things.

Br. Burbank's residence, for the present, is in this city. He is at liberty to go to any place, within a day's journey, to preach on the Sabbath, if he is invited; but it will be expected those who invite him will see that his travelling expensive are met. He asks nothing for his preaching, but he is not in circumstances to pay his own travelling expenses. We have said thus much without his knowledge or request.

Take Courage.

We are not a little encouraged by the efforts of our well-meaning, but mistaken opponents to put down what they regard as heresy. As long as men are indifferent to a theme, or think it unworthy their notice, there is little hope of making advances; but when they become earnest in their opposition, there is hope of the advance of truth. Saul breathing out threatening and slaughter is quite as likely to be brought to the truth as an easy, care-nothing-about-it man. Indifference is to be feared more than strong opposition.

These remarks have been drawn out by a slip sent us by Dr. Buxton, of Worcester, Mass., cut from the Spy of that city. It is an account of a "Methodist Preachers' Meeting" in that place. Among other things, it speaks of a sermon or essay in the evening by Rev. N. D. George, on the "Annihilation of the Wicked." It speaks of his presenting "the views" of several of us who hold views opposed to his own; "and then," says the Spy, he "proceeded to annihilate their peculiar views by blow after blow, from reason as well as revelation." That sounds well; and it seems some things can be "annihilated." But as it is some fifteen years since our "Rev." Br. "N. D. George" first commenced the operation of attempting to "annihilate" our "peculiar views," by the use of Zion's Herald, the Christian Advocate, and then the "Book Concern of the Methodist E. Church," by a Tract against them, and they still live and spread, even in his own church, we rather think he may yet learn there is so much "eternal life" in our views, that himself, together with the help of the powerful church, of which he is a worthy minister, will find work enough to do for a long time to come to stay their onward progress. They are too deep rooted in "reason as well as revelation" to be annihilated by such logic as the Spy says he employed. It informs us that—

> He proves that the phrase "destruction by fire" cannot mean annihilation, but "a continuance of punishment," "an irresistible overthrow of the wicked by perpetual suffering."

Surely there must be a large amount of "reason" in such a position! or a man must possess the bumps of credulity, and marvellousness largely developed to swallow such statements, so easily as the Spy seems to have done. If our old friend "Rev. N. D. George" had said that fire could not burn, and that ice was hot enough to melt iron, his proposition would have been as true as that which the Spy tells us he put forth.

The Spy seems to have been carried away almost into ecstasies by the Rev. N. D. George's essay. It says, "He shows . . . that if the righteous exist forever, so must the wicked." We would like to see the logic by which that point was shown. Did he show that the wicked "dead are raised incorruptible?" If so, by what texts of "revelation?" Did he give chapter and verse for such an assumption? Will the Spy be kind enough to give us some of "the great number of texts" the essayist produced in proof of the immortality of the wicked, and that they will live forever "if the righteous" do? Because we are after the truth, and we have never been able to find any such texts in the Bible. Perhaps the Spy mistook quotations from heathen authors for Bible.

We are sure our old friend, Rev. N. D. George, did not mean to mislead the Spy; he is too good a man for that. We knew him well when he first started in his religious life. We know he was a student of the Bible; we have seen it lying by his side while working at his trade as a shoemaker, in 1830, when we were preaching on Great Fall's Station, N. H. An excellent and studious brother he was: yea, we had the honor of officiating at his wedding. We were then a believer in the same views now promulgated by him. He has remained where we were, but we have been striving to "forget the things behind," and press forward, to "grow in the knowledge of our Lord and Life-giver, Jesus Christ," as well as "in grace;" and we are enabled to rejoice in a more clear view of God's blessed character and government, and of the fountain of life and immortality, Christ Jesus; and we now give glory to "God and the Lamb" that the time is coming, and not far off, when "every creature in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them" shall be "heard saying, Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever." Rev. v., 11–13.

We rather guess that when that time comes Br. Nathan D. George and his associates will find some of their ideas are annihilated, and all the wicked also, or else they must all have been converted; for their theological hell has disappeared, and the place thereof, if it ever had a place, is vocal with songs of praise to God and the Lamb. "Nathan" will join in praise as loud as the loudest to find he was mistaken in his views of God and his government of the souls He had made; and the Spy-man will wish N. D. G. had never read that "essay" in Worcester. The Spy concludes by saying,

> The essay ought to be read to be appreciated, and at the present time we think there is special demand for just such an essay or volume in print.

That is encouraging. The Spy spies a cloud rising that increases so rapidly the Ahabs must drive "furiously" or they will be overtaken with a Noachic flood, which will sweep away all their long-cherished nations of inherent immortality and eternal torments. Would not that be dreadful? How miserable the poor saints in heaven must feel not to have some of their children, husbands, wives, fathers, mothers, or old acquaintances in a hell of eternal torture, that they may look on them once in a while by way of contrast, and so kindle up anew their hallelujahs, which might die away but for this beautiful view, now and then, of the torments of the reprobates! "Reason as well as revelation" condemns such a heresy as Rev. N. D. George is said to advocate; and we envy no man his reason or knowledge of revelation who can persist, in these days, in attempting to uphold such offsprings of barbarism and papal superstitions. But we take courage by the sight of these death struggles of the dying monster. Let the "essay" be put in a "volume" and sent broadcast through the land. Such documents help us in our work, by way of contrast.

True Interpretation.

Phrases used by our Lord and his apostles on the end of the wicked are: 1st, Literal: Such as die—death—perish—destroy—destroyed, etc. Second, Figurative: Such as, the worm dieth not; the fire is not quenched, etc. These are always to be explained by the literal, and not the literal by the figurative. The literal are plain and positive; not preservation in any condition, but destruction, death, etc; see Matth. x., 28.

The same remarks will apply to the reward of the righteous and their state. Life—Eternal Life—Put on Immortaltiy—Put on Incorruption, etc., are the literal phrases used to express their condition and reward.

Immortal-soul-theorists reverse this order, and explain away the literal to make room for the figurative, because only by such substitution of the figurative for the literal can they give even a plausible appearance to their theory. Their course leads straight down the road to mysticism, and every fanciful interpretation and delusion, and results in a discredit of the Bible as a revelation from God. This course of theirs we firmly believe, is the cause of the deadness now pervading nearly all the churches in Christendom, and is opening wide the door for every species of unbelief. It shakes all confidence in testimony, so that professors of Christianity receive no quickening from promises, and the openly wicked have ceased to regard threatenings which they do not believe to be real. All this results from a departure from the literal principle of interpreting the words of promise and threatening.

Served Him Right.

Under date of Oct. 9th, A. G. Hudson, Lake City, Minn., writes, sending us an item which he cut from the Winona Republican of the 7th inst. It is as follows:

> Rev. Mr. Collins, M. E. minister, located last year at Monticello, this State, was suspended from the ministry during the sitting of Conference at St. Anthony last week, for believing and feeling constrained to teach that the wicked will be annihilated after death, instead of being endlessly miserable.

Some may fret and scold because the Methodist E. Conference "suspended from the ministry" Mr. Collins; but we say they "served him right." Why should Mr. C. be retained in the ministry of that church after he ceased to preach the doctrines of said church? If a man takes on himself the office of a minister in a man-made church, and is accepted by it to preach its doctrines, he should be faithful to it, or withdraw. If his mind has undergone a change, and he cannot preach as he agreed to when he entered that church, let him calmly tell the church so, stating his change, and then withdraw.

We are not sorry that Mr. Collins is out of the Methodist ministry, but we do regret that he should wait for the Conference to suspend him. If he is possessed of a good moral character, we hope he will now consider himself a member of the Church of Christ, and ask only the Head of that church what he shall preach; and let him beware of being "again entangled in a yoke of bondage" by a union with some other human organization, even though it should call itself an "Advent church." Let him keep himself the "Lord's free man," and preach the Lord's free gospel. We trust Br. Hudson will put himself in communication with him and encourage him—not to fight the Methodists, but to preach Christ as the Life-giver, and show the dying men that "God is Love;" so shall he win men to life eternal.

Inconsistency of Error.

Dr. Edwards, in opposing Dr. Taylor, says:

> "If Adam, by his persevering obedience, was to have had everlasting life and happiness in perfect holiness, union with his Maker and enjoyment of his favor, and this was the life which was to be confirmed by the tree of life; then, doubtless, the death threatened in case of disobedience, which stands in direct opposition to this, was an exposure to everlasting wickedness and misery, in separation from God, and in enduring his wrath."

Here is an attempt to force into the argument what does not belong to it. Life and Death were set before man. Life, as a matter of course, involved holiness, happiness, the favor of God and union with him; for, if man lost either of these, he must have lost it by sin; and sin is followed with death—eternal death is preceded by loss of holiness, happiness, the favor God, and union with him; but the loss of either of these, or all of them, is not death; it would be but the forerunner of death, which would be the result. To attempt to drag in, then, holiness, happiness, the favor of God, and union with him, as being the life that was to be the reward of man, if obedient, we conceive, is to confound ideas, and has no warrant from the Scriptures. Life and happiness are two entirely distinct things, though the latter cannot exist without the former The Scriptures uniformly make "eternal life" to stand without any qualifying term connected with it.

When Dr. Edwards had thus confounded something else with eternal life, he tells us, "the death which stands in direct opposition to this, was an exposure to everlasting wickedness and misery," etc. What an idea of death! The punishment of wickedness is "everlasting wickedness," etc. Pray, will the Doctor tell us what is the punishment for "everlasting wickedness?" After all, the Doctor makes the threatened death only an "exposure" to "everlasting wickedness," etc. Inspiration tells us, "the wages of sin is death;" i. e., says our author, "exposure" to everlasting life in "everlasting wickedness and misery, in separation from God, and in enduring his wrath"—which, of course, "is eternally satisfying, but never satisfied!" Our "bump of marvellousness" is large, but not large enough to credit such palpable contradictions as that.

Theology to be Revolutionized.

A Methodist wrote us, among other matters, as follows:

> "The questions you are discussing are of no trifling importance. The conclusions to which you have arrived, if true, will not merely modify, they revolutionize the theology of the age. If not true, the sooner they are scanned and exploded the better for the peace and safety of all concerned. "H."

We fully understand that the questions we "are discussing are not of trifling importance;" and also, that they "will not merely modify, but revolutionize the theology of the age." Surely the theology of the age needs revolutionizing; it grew out of the ignorance, superstition and despotism of past centuries, when men were kept in awe by terror and force, and civil and ecclesiastical despots found it necessary to convert their God into a fiend, like themselves, lest the people should throw off their government. But such despotism was not destined to last always, and the good providence of God has been steadiy pushing forward to the overthrow of such savagism, and the day of those tyrants is drawing to an end, and with their fall ends the savage character so long and so ignorantly, if not wickedly, attributed to the God of love. The day has already opened when every man's work is to be tried by fire, of what sort it is.

The fire of discussion will try it, and the free use of the Bible as the standard of appeal, will manifest the wood, hay, and stubble, that all sorts of despots have employed, while seeking their "own, and not the things which are Jesus Christ's." Many will suffer loss, even the loss of all their labor in building with perishable materials—"the doctrines and commandments of men," which are not of God, and hence will be consumed. Such theorists tremble to see their long-cherished theories and their labor to sustain them going into one common fire—a fire which shall not be quenched, but will utterly consume all that rubbish of human invention and tradition which has so long hidden the glory of the face of our gracious and loving God, and our blessed Life-giver, the grand characteristic of whom is, the apostolic truth, "God is Love." O, how has he been dishonored, belied, and his Spirit grieved by the false and erroneous theories of men!

In the burning process now going on, let us beware, lest by an obstinate adherence to the "wood, hay, and stubble" of human theories and traditions, we are not ourselves consumed in the fire of this burning day; remembering the words of Jesus, "If I had not come and spoken unto them, they had not had sin; but now they have no cloak for their sin." While the word of truth was locked up by Popish decrees and in an unknown tongue, and while, after its translation, men could not read it for the lack of learning to read, comparatively, there was "no sin" in receiving the God-dishonoring representations of man and his destiny which were imposed on us by the despots of earth. But those days have passed; and now God calls all men—saints and sinners—to put away their false theories and receive his love as manifested in his Son for life to the dying. Will we heed this call of the providence of God, and so escape the fiery judgment which is to consume error and its obstinate adherents? There is no time for delay. "That thou doest, do quickly," is an exhortation to which all will do well to take heed, "If the Lord be God, serve him:" let us neither serve Baal nor Moloch any more. Too long has the Christian world "sacrificed to demons." Let it cease, lest now we be, chargeable with the sin of the ancient Jews of whom Jehovah said—"They have built the high places of Tophet, which is in the valley of the son of Hinnom, to burn their sons and their daughters in the fire, which I commanded them not, neither came it into my heart.' Jer. vii., 31. The Christian church has invented or accepted a worse "Tophet;" where, for centuries, they have, in theory, burned their sons and their daughters to a Moloch god worse than that of the Jews whom God condemned. How long, O Lord, our Redeemer, shall this "abomination" be suffered to blaspheme thy name?

This Day and To-day.

BY CLERICUS.

1. "Then spake the chief butler unto Pharaoh, saying, I do remember my faults this day." Gen. xli., 9.
2. "All the commandments which I command thee this day, shall ye observe to do." Deut. viii., 1.
3. "If you shall diligently hearken unto my commandments which I command you this day, to love the Lord your God." Deut. xi., 13.
4. "But turn aside out of the way which I command you this day, to go after other Gods." Deut. xiii., 28.
5. "His commandments which I command thee this day, to do that which is right." Deut. xiii., 18
6. "When ye be gone over Jordan, ye shall set up these stones, which I command you this day, in Mount Ebal." Deut. xxvii., 4.
7. "See, I have set before thee this day life and good and death and evil." Deut. xxx., 15.
8. "I have peace-offerings with me; this day have payed my vows." Prov. vii.., 14.
9. "Turn ye to the strong-hold, ye prisoners of hope; even to-day do I declare that I will render double unto thee." Zech. ix., 12.
10. "Therefore I command thee this thing to-day.' Deut. xv., 15.
11. "And he began to say unto them, this day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears." Luke iv., 21.
12. "And Jesus said unto him, Verily I say unto thee, (semeron) to-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise." Luke xxiii., 43.

The attention of the reader is called to the foregoing passages; the last one quoted being popularly supposed to teach that on that exact Jewish day, at some time between twelve at noon and sunset or even, the spirit or soul of our Lord and the spirit or soul of the penitent thief were to be together in what was vulgarly called Paradise, i. e., the elysian portion of hades, the under-world. It is claimed by critics and theologians that the comma must of necessity be placed after "thee" instead of after—"to-day," and that words of Christ will admit of no other interpretation than that the spirits of the two were to be in a disembodied, conscious condition as soon as they died. And that the adverb "to-day" cannot by any means qualify "I say," but must of real necessity qualify "thou shalt be," hence that very twenty-four hours, Paradise, already come, should by then be entered and occupied. Now touching this passage and the others quoted, we observe—

1. In the words of Dr. N. Webster, "The ancients were unacquainted with punctuation; they wrote without any distinction of members, periods, or words."

2. Appleton's Cyclopedia informs us that the modern points such as the comma, semicolon, colon, and period "came into use very gradually after the invention of printing," which the same authority affirms was in A. D. 1423.

3. Every speaker, composer, and writer knows that punctuating is a natural work of of the mind and voice, and that a written composition is to be punctuated or marked off into sentences with pauses, according to the sense of the passage. The punctuation does not determine the sense so much as the sense determines the punctuation.

4. If we had heard our Lord utter the words recorded in Luke, and distinctly noted a natural pause after "thee," and marked an emphasis on "to-day," then might we yield the argument to our opponents. But no man this side the cross listened to the sacred promise to the thief. Luke, and he only, recorded the sentence of the bleeding King. It is written—and the whole Bible must interpret it, aided by common sense applied to a correct division of his words.

5. Explained by the usus loquendi, or general usage of the word in Scripture, we know that Paradise, in the only passage that localizes it at all, is not in the bowels of the earth, but (is in or) is the New Jerusalem which is above, and is to come down on the New Earth. 2 Cor. xii., 4; Rev. ii., 7; Rev, xxii., 2, and xxi., 2, 3.

6. Explained by the thief's request, "Lord remember me when thou comest into thy Kingdom," this Paradise, where the poor penitent will forever behold his King, is not to be given to the saints until Christ comes the second time.

7. Explained in the light of historical fact, it is very doubtful if Christ and the thief died on the same current Jewish day. Their day ended and began at "even," which was sunset. Christ died at three o'clock in the afternoon, but the two thieves lived till even, and consequently till that day ended, and the Jews were obliged to break their legs to hasten their death, as malefactors often lived on the cross several days, unless dispatched by violence.

8. The sentence, punctuated and interpreted in the light of the eleven texts that lead off this article, need not of necessity teach the old Jewish notion of dying and going at once to an underground Paradise. If it was proper and grammatical for the butler to say that he remembered his faults that day he spoke, when every body knows he did not mean the day before or the day after—if it was proper for the greatest of the Hebrew Legislators to declare that he commanded a thing "this day,' when all know he meant no other day save the one on which he spoke—if it was proper for God to say "even to-day do I declare" a matter, which thing or matter related to the future, and all men knowing that God understood himself in the language used—then we do no violence to the words of the Redeemer when we make his "to-day" qualify and describe and determine his saying, instead of qualifying, describing, and determining the time when the two should together reach Paradise.

10. Let it also be observed that there is no difference between "to-day" and "this-day," for the Greek word semeron found forty-one times in the New Testament, is in nineteen places rendered "to-day," and in twenty-two places is translated "this day;" so that to-day and this day are equal, one form of the adverb being no stronger or more definite than the other. Hence nothing is gained by playing fast or loose on "to-day."

11. And let no one fail to remember that the location of the Greek words that form the passage makes them read in successive order and with literal exactness: "AMEN I SAY TO THEE TO-DAY WITH ME THOU SHALT BE IN THE PARADISE," which read with the punctuating pause after "to-day," and with an emphasis on Paradise making it (not any body's Paradise but) "The Paradise," that is, "The Paradise of God, and we have the Lord's promise in perfect harmony with the thief's prayer; i. e., "Thy Kingdom"—"The Paradise," at His "Coming." There is nothing strained or forced in this view, neither does it compel us to wrest the Scriptures to favor a theory. On the contrary, it presents a natural, easy, consistent interpretation, one that long since compelled us to abandon the notion of our Lord's here teaching man's immortality in death. The Paradise is yet to come—is coming soon.

THE NEW COVENANT.
NOT MADE BY MOSES.

STRANGE does it seem that such a heading of such a subject should be needful among a Bible people. But as my letters to the authors and advertisers are ignored, I feel constrained to call public attention to it.

"The Plan of Redemption" by Messrs. Welcome and Goud, and advertised in The World's Crisis, as gospel truth, does make Moses the Mediator of "The New Covenant!" Of course it makes Moses to supersede the Messiah, as this connection with this covenant! See "Plan of Redemption," ch. 9.

They seem to have NO place for Christ's "everlasting covenant" Heb. xiii., 20; no "TIMES of Restitution," Acts iii., 21; no occasion for any more than this gospel age, with its gracious ministries. In other words, no time or opportunity for Christ's meditation of "the new, the better, the second covenant" as set forth Heb. vii., 22; viii., 6, 12; ix., 6; x., 1-16; Rom. xi., 27; Jer. xxxi., 31; Isa. lv., 3-5; Psa. lxxxix., 34-36; Luke i., 72. By consequence, they need some device to get rid of all such scriptures as teach us that Christ is the Mediator of this "New covenant!"

They have no place for "Israel or Judah," as parties to this covenant; of course they need to put Christ aside as "the Mediator and surety" of such a covenant.

Moses must be the sole Mediator of both covenants—the new and the old; the first and the second; and thus "the covenant of promise," confirmed by God's oath, is reduced down small enough to suit themselves—leaving Israel, the nations and Christ himself, so far, out of it all! But they fail to see that, "When the foundations are destroyed, what can the righteous do?"

"Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a New Covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah." These days were to come in the future. They were to come "after" in the days of Paul. But these authors and their advertisers concur to make them past! Nay, they make both the old and the new covenant to have been made by Moses, in the SAME "days!"

Their argument in proof ignores prophecy, history, and chronology, and the laws of language alike. I can scarce conceive a greater error, a wilder theory, or more delusive course. It is so far removed from all ground common to intelligent men, that I feel restrained in my attempt to refute it. A notice seems all that the case allows.

However it should be noted that this attempt to clear the field of argument, as to Israel and Judah, and Christ and David's throne, and "the one thousand years" and "Day of the Lord," and the Church, the Bride with Christ reigning, to fill out the promise of "God's Covenant in Christ," is most consistent with the position assumed!

If true, it would be very opportune. But its utter UN-truth needs only to be stated to be seen and rejected by all believers not mislead.

THAT SINGING.

"WHEN they had sung a hymn they went out unto the Mount of Olives."—Mark xiv., 26.

Methinks I listen to that band of singers and hear the plaintive melody of their sad hearts. An undefinable foreboding possessed the minds of the disciples, and their voices were tremulous with emotion. They were one in spirit; for had not Jesus a short time before prayed to his Father that they might be one with him, as he and the Father were one? How sad must have been their feelings while mingling in the last song before the dreadful conflict? How could Jesus sing? Emotion, we may well suppose would have choked his utterance. Keenly alive to all the sensibilities of our nature—with love for those disciples surpassing the love of a mother for her children. What but love nerved him in this hour, so that he could sing, with the scoffs and derision of the multitude, the scourging of Pilate, the agony of the cross, the Roman spear, the Father's withdrawal in full view? How could the disciples with heavy hearts sing? I listen to those pathetic strains of harmony—would that I knew the tune, the measure and the verse. The sentiment, I doubt not, was in harmony with the heavenly host, ascribing glory to God, peace on earth and good will to men, even while nearing the dark valley and passing the hour of the power of darkness. The voice in imagination is that of my Beloved; yet not now leaping upon the mountains, and skipping upon the hills, that is a song of conquest and victory. In sadness it now rings out upon the night air, soon to be followed by the touching exclamation, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death." The disciples but faintly understood their position, or what was before them. Sorrow had filled their hearts because Jesus had said he must leave them and go away. They had seen so much of his power, and the prophetic Scriptures so fully proclaimed his triumph and endless glory, that they overlooked the fact that he was to be a Man of sorrow, and be led as a lamb to the slaughter. Not, I conceive, as the teaching of the present day affirms, that the disciples were so mistaken when they inquired of Jesus if he would at that time restore again the kingdom to Israel; that his kingdom was a "sky kingdom," while they looked for earthly rule. Jesus had told them, they should sit upon twelve thrones, judging the tribes of Israel. How could they otherwise understand him? Such, I understand to be the truth, if there is any meaning in the prophetic utterances.

What union and harmony in the voices and hearts of that choir of singers! They had not a thought they would leave Jesus and flee: yet he knew it, and it lent bitterness to that sad hour. Peter had never thought of denying him: so intense was his devotion that he would go to prison and to death. Jesus knew his weakness, and prayed that his faith might not fail. Faith in what? Not in himself. He doubtless had less faith in himself from that hour. But an increase of faith in the power and love of Jesus. Suppose you, he ever forgot Jesus' melting look? or, did not the tender interrogation, thrice repeated, "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me?" act as a talisman in scourgings, imprisonment, and death? When suffering the cruel agony of the cross, like his Master, but with his head downward, what look or words so strengthening, elevating, and inspiring?

So, also, the broken bread, an emblem of the broken body—the flowing wine, pointing to the shed blood, the thrilling tones and sentiment of the closing hymn—to the sensitive heart, what thrilling recollections, long remembered, cluster around the last farewell, the last look or words! So, also, the last hymn of praise; they, doubtless, were a motive-power ever afterward in the minds of the disciples, and have come down to us through all these eighteen centuries with a quickening and binding force. May our faith be strengthened, our love rise to an intenser flame every time we are favored with the privilege of uniting in the songs of redeeming love. We are nearing the time when a new song will be sung before the throne, in which none can join but those who are redeemed from the earth.

Jesus, we may suppose, looked forward to this scene as he led that small band of singers as they went to the Mount of Olives. The joy set before him was the motive power. He will see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied. Glory to God. Amen.

LUCRETIA B. LAMB.

ST. PAUL, MINN., Oct., 1868.

WHY MEN RATHER THAN ANGELS.

WE have somewhere read of a traveller who stood one day beside the cages of some birds that, exposed for sale, ruffled their sunny plumage on the wires, and struggled to be free. A way-worn and sun-browned man, like one returned from foreign lands, looked wistfully and sadly on these captives till tears started in his eyes, and turning round on their owner, he asked the price of one, paid it in strange gold, and opened the door and set the prisoner free; and thus he did with captive after captive, till every bird was away, soaring to the skies and singing on the wings of liberty. The crowd stared and stood amazed; they thought him mad, till to the questions of their curiosity, he replied, "I was once myself a captive; I know the sweets of liberty." And so they who have experience of guilt, have felt the serpent's bite, the burning poison in the veins, who on the one hand have the sting of conscience, and on the other the peace of faith, the joys of hope, the love, the light, the liberty, the life, that are found in Jesus—they, not excepting heaven's highest angels, are the fittest to preach a Saviour, to plead with man for God, or plead with God for man. Each Sabbath morning the gates of heaven might have been opened—and, sent by God on a mission worthy of seraphic fire, an angel might have lighted down upon this sanctuary, and flying into the pulpit when he had folded his wings, and used them to veil his glory, he might have taken up the wondrous theme of salvation and the cross. No angel would leave heaven to be a king and fill a throne; but I believe, were it God's will, there is no angel there but would hold himself honored to be a preacher and fill a pulpit. Another and very different messenger appears—a frail, dying, sinful man—one who is bone of your bone and flesh of your flesh; and if his humanity made Jesus the better Saviour, it makes his servants the better embassadors, that they also are touched with their people's infirmities, and are made in all points like as they are, and especially in this point, that we cannot add, "yet without sin."—Dr. Guthrie.

FROM N. PUTNAM.

SALEM, MASS., Oct 14, 1868.

BR. STORRS: I have enclosed $4 for HERALD OF LIFE, Vol. VI., $1 20 for LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST and postage. I now have the above as printed in pamphlet form, but I want the whole in one vol. Also $1 for printing the tract on the subject of Living Soul. That, if circulated, read, and well understood, will as much disturb the dogma of inherent immortality in man as any argument that can be offered, and should be read by those who are not afraid to read, by those who will receive truth wherever they can find it, and who will not make their belief of any doctrine the effect of choice. The great majority of persons, more especially in cities, are averse to reading what are commonly called advent books, lest they be furnished with proof that they are in error, or that, being ignorant of the truth, they deem such books heretical. The same influence by which a sinner is brought to Christ is necessary to dispose the mind to distinguish between truth and error. If a divine influence be resisted by men, those doctrines sustaining any relation to their future, will be modified after the prevailing fashion. They may be moral, and even godly in their lives, but it will be through the belief of doctrines not taught by the Bible, and which move only to fear. I am heartily glad that the HERALD OF LIFE is to be continued. And in order to its continuance with effect, I pray that the health and life of its editor may be preserved until his work is accomplished. I believe that the truths therein inculcated are to be more extensively made known, and that the time will come when they will savingly affect the minds of thousands of believers in the traditions of men. The declaration of truth, in order to be effective, must be frequent. Many may be satisfied for a time with a monthly, of a good character, but if it shall have produced the desired effect, a weekly will be much more preferable to them. The appetite being sharpened, food should be frequently supplied.

FROM D. M. MILLER.

ADELL, WIS., Oct., 1868.

BR. STORRS: I have lent and scattered those pamphlets you sent me. I attended an association some time since, by invitation of an old friend that I was acquainted with in New York State. I gave him one of your papers and sermons to read. After he had read them I asked him what he thought of the matter. He said the sermon was good for Christians. I said, Then it ought to be good for sinners. I told him our belief about the doom of the wicked. He replied, If that is all it is no punishment. I said, show me a man that thinks death eternal is no punishment, and I will show you a great sinner. I said, here is a line; you stand on one side with millions more: you come to know if you remain there you will go down in death and remain eternally in the congregation of the dead; but by changing to the other side of the line, you would secure a revival from the dead, and hear the Saviour say, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit my kingdom," how would that thought affect you? He seemed amazed, but made no reply. He is a close communion Baptist.

I noticed the case of a brother in the HERALD, last March, who had used tobacco from sixteen years old to forty, and then broke off by degrees, and told how much better he was after he was fairly weaned. I thought I would try it. I had used tobacco forty-seven years, chewing it. I found it a filthy practice. When I read the statement of that brother I thought I would beat him, and immediately cleaned my mouth of tobacco. I had a a new box in my pocket, full of fine-cut. I kept it with me two days, and did not open it or use any of the weed. Then I took the box, and put it in the desk, and have not used it since, by the help of God. I am thankful to him for it, hoping he may ever give me sufficient of his Spirit to enable me to abstain from that slavish habit of using that poisonous weed. O, to be able to forsake all sins.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—We are glad, Br. Miller, that you have put away that "devil;" but you had better cast him into a lake of fire at once, and not keep him locked up in your desk, for he may break out some day and look so "fine" that you may mistake him for "an angel of light." Cast him in the lake of fire bodily; no fear but that his burning will make "brimstone" enough. By thus doing you will get that "devil" out of your house and have your "box" for some useful purpose. Such a filthy devil is not fit to be kept in a coffin, and especially in a gentleman's desk. We congratulate you on your escape, so far. It is a happy deliverance; but do not forget that this kind of devil sometimes goes and takes with him seven other spirits more wicked than himself, and comes back again. Take care that you do not let him "enter in." Stand firm against him; watch him well; give him no quarter. Now you have cast him out, if you stand fast you will soon be warned of his approach, if he comes near you; he will carry his brimstone odor along with him. His slaves are insensible to this trait of his majesty. Poor victims! how we pity them. What will they do for tobacco when they get into the kingdom? It will never be tolerated there.

J. HAMILTON, Fredonia, N. Y., under date of Oct. 10th, writes: I have had a feast to-day reading the first No. of Vol. VI., of the HERALD OF LIFE. It is well filled with interesting matter, which is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for instruction in righteousness. 2 Timo. iii., 16. The truth now, as ever, is unpopular; but, thank the Lord, that does not cause me to love it any the less, but the more; for the blessed Saviour prayed, "Sanctify them through thy truth; thy word is truth."

FROM J. W. McCAGG.

WARSAW, N. Y., Oct. 5, 1868.

BR. STORRS: Oh, that you may be kept by God many years is my prayer, the harvest is so great and the laborers so few. How I would love to fully engage in the preaching of the gospel; but it seems that I am so hedged in that I cannot as yet see the way. The last day of March, 1867, I lost my wife with consumption, leaving me with three little children—Georgie, six years old; Harry, four years; and my little Lizzie, 20 months. Oh, what an affliction. At that time I had but just commenced in the advent faith, and I really think nothing short of the grace of God kept me from sinking under it. But, blessed be His great and holy name, He fully sustained me. What a friend is the God of heaven. Before my wife died I calculated to arrange my matters and engage fully in presenting the plain truths of the Gospel to a dying world. Now I am alone in this town, my children at my father's house, and he opposed to my faith, believing honestly that I am led away by the evil one. I am willing to sacrifice myself fully for God's blessed truth, and am determined, by His assisting grace, to stand by His truth, though all the world should leave me. I am fully resolved that while my heavenly Father is true to me, I will try and be true to Him. I know I shall be tried. I am tried, and for the last year have had the sympathies of the Congregational church, to which I belong; they saying I was right at heart, but it was a failing of the head. Bless God for such a failing. I truly feel I am a pilgrim and a stranger, as I have no society—am looked upon as an infidel and dangerous to society. I am trying, in my feeble way, to gain eternal life. I may never see your face here, but I do expect to meet you when Jesus comes; and O, what a glorious time that will be for all who are so fortunate as to be welcomed by Him. Dear Brother, you have been long in the way; I have but just started, and I pray I may be as true as I believe you have been to the trust God has committed to your care. Be faithful a few days more and our blessed Jesus will come and save us. I am looking for Jesus every day, every week, and every year; and shall continue to look while I live; and if I shall be laid quietly away before He comes, I hope he will claim me when he comes. We must suffer persecution, if needs be, in this life. I sometimes think I could suffer death easier than to deny this blessed faith. I mean to be faithful a little longer, but how glad I would be to have a little band with the faith of Jesus. All I have, except enough to take care of my children, I cheerfully give to the Lord. I ask nothing but a comfortable living and plain clothing; all the rest I freely give to the cause of Christ.

God knows I do not mean to be bigoted or prejudiced; and I mean to love my brethren if we do not agree; but God has led me into the truth of No life from the grave but immortal life. At the time I saw it, I was among numerous ones of Br. Grant's belief, and by accident picked up one of your old HERALDS. I was interested immediately, and could not help it. I saw the whole race doomed to eternal death unless God provided some way to bring them from the grave. He did so, and made it conditional; all who conform to those conditions will see life. No others. Some passages of the New Testament seemed to contradict this view; but I can't forget Adam's condition, and must believe the Old Testament record.

Your brother, looking for Jesus, and hoping we may then meet, if not before.

LEVI BOUGHTON, Victor, N. Y., writes: I should be very much lost without the HERALD OF LIFE. There is no paper, that I know of, which could fill its place, as I read the Bible. Life only through Christ is the great crowning truth of Scripture. "No life out of Christ." All Protestants, and Catholics also, seem to think it spoils God's government and His character, if the great mass of humanity do not suffer endlessly; and they make death to mean dying but never dead; so the wages of sin, which is death, are never received. I am happy to think that the glorious truth is gaining ground everywhere it is promulgated.

A Druggist, in Vicksburg, Miss., writes: The works you sent me have been devoured, and I am constrained to beg you to continue to send me as many and as often as you can spare them. Some you sent are now being read with good interest; not only here, but in adjacent counties. I will continue to distribute them, God being my helper, as I have a splendid chance, when I send off bundles of medicine from store, to slip in some of those little whisperers. They want more, and ask when I am going to send for them. So it is. My Methodist brethren have got hold of them.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We have sent you a large lot more, and some dozen HERALDS, No 1, Vol. VI. Please see if you cannot get some subscribers. We will help you all we can with tracts. Will not our friends, here at the North, help us to fill this opening.

WM. B. DAVIS, Rochester, N. Y., writes: How good it is to know the Lord, and to be known of Him; and thus in Him to know ourselves; then by Him know all others. How good thus to be, thus to live, and thus to wait His coming: also, to have each member of our family in the Lord, enjoying his favor and approbation, and knowing none but in the Lord. Thus living by faith in God through Jesus Christ our LIFE-GIVER. To be more Godlike; to live near to Him, how sweet. To be Christlike, no evil thoughts, no surmising; to be an heir of all things, in Christ. Lord help us to be perfectly conformed to thy will in all our ways; so that, after we are tried and made perfect, we may be accepted of Thee for eternal life. Brethren and Sisters, let us be humble, holy, watchful, patient, prayerful, and all to please and honor God. Then will He honor us; for, "Him that serveth me, saith the LORD, him will I honor."

NATHAN CALL, Dunham, P. Q., Canada, writes: I do not know how to do without the HERALD OF LIFE, for it is all the preaching I get. The same stiff opposition prevails in this vicinity that has for years, the blind leading the blind; but I rejoice that the Lord is prospering the work in other places, and that you are having new subscribers. My prayer is that your health and strength may be equal to your day, and for all the loved ones. May the Lord prosper His work, and so the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.

CHAS. E. PHILLIPS, North Hermon, Me., writes: I cannot do without the HERALD OF LIFE. I am blessed in its visits. It points to the foundation on which to build. Since I embraced the heavenly truth of "No life out of Christ" mine eyes have been opened so that I have been delivered from vain traditions. I often think, Lord how have we lived so long without this precious truth? But it has come, and I bless God with all my heart that I have been so favored as to receive it.

EDWIN LYMAN, Northfield, Mass., writes: I have received the HERALD OF LIFE since camp-meeting, and like it very much; have lent it to my neighbors, and by so doing have got three subscribers for it. I find a great deal of opposition to the Life views from old '44 Adventists; but how plain and positive the words of our blessed Saviour, "He that believeth not the son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him." But such positive sayings are passed by, and inferences taken from such texts of scripture as John v., 28, 29; but, blessed be the name of the Lord, the truth shines bright, and many are seeing and embracing it. I believe soon the LIFE-GIVER will come and give reward to all his waiting ones. May God bless you, and enable you so to conduct the HERALD that many may be led to embrace the truth and be saved in God's kingdom, is the prayer of your Br. in Christ.

"THE LIVING SOUL."

[The Author of the above named article has addressed the following letter to D. B. Salter, in whose house the article was originally written.—ED.]

ASHTABULA, OHIO, Oct. 5, 1868.

DEAR BR. SALTER: "One born in my house is mine heir." Abram. Gen. xv., 3. Abram complained to the Lord that he had no heir, and said unto him in the language of my text! "One born in my house is my heir." Now the "Living Soul," which Br. Storrs proposes to publish in a tract, was written in your house: it was, therefore, born in your house, and is your heir according to the faithful patriarch, whom we, that are in Christ, claim as father. You will not therefore disinherit your own heir, but give it something to enable it to live; for although it is a "living soul," it is a mortal soul, and will "surely die" without money to keep it alive. Br. Storrs says, it will take about forty dollars to immortalize it; and the last I heard of it, only about ten were raised.

Perhaps you will say, "Abram turned Ishmael and his mother into the wilderness without a penny." But it was not until Isaac was born, who was an heir of his own body. Now I do not see that you write any at all for the paper, and until you do, I see no prospect of your having an Isaac in your family; so, Abram like, you will not refuse to support Ishmael, or write something yourself, and let us hear a good word from you occasionally. Certainly you ought not to bury your talents in the earth. I know you have been very liberal in donating to the good HERALD OF LIFE; and I know, too, the Lord has bountifully bestowed upon you the means, and the will to do it; and great will be your reward; but you, as a Christian, know very well that your reward is not in this world, but in the world to come.

I have made myself acquainted among the Campbellites here abouts. They are generally very fair reasoners. Some of them have no belief in the immortality of the soul, but the greater part have; but still admit that the Bible does not affirm it: but they reason Platonically that the soul is immortal. But a short time since, one came to our school-house, and preached a whole sermon on the immortality of the soul; but gave us not one text from the Bible; but abundant quotations from Socrates and Plato. I want the "Living Soul" tract to scatter among them. On reading it, I think they will find more immortal soul than all the heathen philosophers ever dreamed of; if immortal it is; for the "Living Soul" finds it in man, beast, bird, fish, and insects; in plants and minerals, even in old hens and hop-vines. It should be stereotyped, published and scattered abroad in our benighted and Pagan United States. Every Platonic preacher ought to have one. Think of it, dear brother, and act according to your judgment; and do write to me once in a while. Yours, in Christ, the LIFE-GIVER.

Z. CAMPBELL.

FROM ELD. J. LEWIS.

OCONEE, ILL., Oct. 13, 1868.

BR. STORRS: I have just got the dear HERALD OF LIFE, of October 7th, and truly it has been meat in due season. The sermon on "God is Love" is worth bags of gold; and if I was able I would have one hundred thousand of it in a tract, together with the "Living Soul," and "Can you Believe?" all in one tract. The dear brethren and sisters have done well, as the contributions show, for the cause of truth; and we trust they will continue to cast their bread upon the waters, so they may find it after many days. Yes through all the endless ages. Keep good courage, brethren, and hold up the hands of our dearly beloved Br. Storrs in his labor.

Our opposers are fairly cornered, and condemned out of their own mouths in that article about killing twice; for "God don't kill men twice;" therefore the wicked dead will never see life. Amen, bless the Lord, O my soul. Amen and amen. Yes, their ammunition is all gone, and the splinters have recoiled upon their own fortifications, and fall they must, and fall they shall. Amen.

NOTICE.

PROVIDENCE permitting, the adjourned meeting of the believers in the speedy coming of the Lord, which was held at Enfield on September 24th, will meet at Paradise Hall in Bristol, Ct., on Thursday, November 5th, at seven o'clock P. M. and continue over the following Sunday.

APPOINTMENTS.

I AM to preach in WILMINGTON, Del., Sunday, October 25th.
In PHILADELPHIA, Sunday, Nov. 1st.
ALBANY, N. Y., Sunday, Nov. 8th.
SALTERSVILLE, N. J., Sunday, Nov. 15th.
I will preach evenings at any places between these appointments, if brethren will notify me in season. S. W. BISHOP.
OCEANPORT, N. J.

THE American Church Review, for July, says: "No thoughtful man can behold without solicitude the low grade of domestic morals which seems to prevail to a large extent in our New England families. The general decay of public sentiment in respect to family religion, the parents' neglect of rudeness and arrogance of boys and girls, the great prevalence of untruth among the young, the license and familiarity of intercourse which is allowed between the growing youth of different sexes, the murder of living but unborn children, the number of illegitimate births—all these are sufficient to fill one with consternation."

COMMERCIAL MORALITY.

THE commercial morality of this nation is corrupted to a fearful extent. If I make any allusion to this melancholy fact, people say: "Oh! you do not understand business." Now, if business were a correct thing, I think I could understand it, if it were conducted upon perfectly honest and straightforward principles. I am not such a simpleton as not to be able to see when a thing is honest or dishonest; and if there be a mode of conducting business which is so intricate, shuffling, and complex, that I cannot understand it, and that no minister can understand whether it is honest or not, then, I say, it is something which needs looking into and requires alteration. When a common-sense Christian man cannot understand business, it is time that business should know that it has no business to be such business as it is.—Spurgeon.

Look to Jesus.

Jesus, Saviour, oh, my friend,
Still protect, and still defend;
Save from sin's enticing snare,
Save from every slavish fear.

Purify this sinful heart;
And thy saving grace impart;
In this hour of my distress
May I firmly on Thee rest.

Foes I have on every side,
Fears, and doubts, and sinful pride;
Let me triumph o'er them all,
Save me, Jesus, lest I fall.

In thine own appointed way
Lead my footsteps day by day;
In thine own appointed time
Let thy light within me shine.

Such a friend I have, indeed,
Who'll supply my every need.
In my hours of deep distress
I will firmly on Him rest.

A Story of Rabat Joie.

Le Petit Journal has curious stories. This is one:

"Lately, a traveller passed in a carriage along the Avenue de Neuilly; the night was dark; all at once the horse stopped, and the traveller saw that the animal had met an obstacle. At the same moment a man raised himself from before the horse, uttering a cry. 'Why don't you take care?' said the traveller. 'Ah,' cried the man, 'you would do better, instead of hallooing, to lend me your lantern.' 'What for?' 'I had three hundred francs in gold on my person; my pocket has broken, and all is fallen on the street. It is a commission with which my master has intrusted me. If I do not find the money I am a ruined man.' 'It is not easy to find the pieces on such a night; have you none left?' 'Yes, I have one.' 'Give it to me.' The man hesitated. 'Give it to me, as a means of procuring the others.' The poor devil gave him his last coin. The traveller whistled; a magnificent Danish dog began to leap around him. 'Here,' said the traveller, putting the coin to the nose of the dog, 'look.' The intelligent creature sniffed a moment at the money, and then began to run about the road. Every minute he returned leaping, and deposited in the hand of his master a Napoleon. In about twenty minutes the whole sum was recovered. The poor fellow who had just got his money back turned full of thanks toward the traveller, who had now got into his carriage. 'Ah, you are my preserver,' said he; 'tell me at least your name.' 'I have done nothing,' said the traveller. 'Your preserver is my dog; his name is Rabat Joie.' And then, whipping his horse, he disappeared in the darkness."

Be Tidy.—"Now, my son," said a kind mother to her boy, "be tidy, fold up your night gown again; I must have it done neatly."

That little boy has grown up to be a man. A friend said to him one day—

"How is it you get through so much work as you do?

"Method, method," was the reply. "I am now reaping the fruits of my mother's lessons—Be tidy!"

Willie's Signal for Jesus.

The following touching incident is related by a lady in the East, in a letter to her brother, who is an esteemed minister in Illinois, and to whose kindness The Little Corporal is indebted for the use of it. It is copied word for word from her letter.

"I heard such a beautiful story, the other day, about a little child, that I must tell it to you. He was sick in St. Luke's Hospital, in New York, and the lady who told me the story was there.

"One day this child, about seven years old, was brought into the children's ward; he had been picked up in the street, where he had fallen from some building. His little leg was broken in two places, his head cut dreadfully, and his backbone so broken that it came through the flesh. He lay about a week between life and death, a fearful sufferer: but at the end of that time he began to mend, so that in a few days more his physicians concluded he could recover, but that if he lived they would have to cut off the splinters from his backbone.

"Well, they performed the operation, and the child lived and grew better. About a week afterward, the doctors found there would have to be another operation. So they told the nurse that she must tell little Willie that the next morning they would have to do it. The nurse was a noble Christian woman, and she talked to the little fellow, sitting by his bedside. She said: 'Willie, I have told you what the doctors think, and I want you to try and be a little man, and bear it as well as you can. It is hard for you, I know, and it is hard for me to see you suffer so much, and it makes my heart ache day after day to see all you dear little children suffer so, but it is God's will, my child,' she said, 'and he and his dear Son Jesus will help you through.'

"This was in the evening, and she left him till the morning, going from one little sufferer to another till her time was up. After she had gone, the little boy pulled the sheet up over his head, and began to cry as if his heart would break. In the little bed next to his was a little girl, and as she saw and heard him cry, she said:

"'Willie, what makes you cry so? Don't you know that Jesus can help you? This is his ward, they say, and he loves us all very much; don't cry any more, but let's pray to Jesus to take your pain away.'

"He then said: 'I have been praying, Susie, and I have been asking Christ to take me, for do you know they say that every night Jesus walks through our ward and takes one or two of us little children away with him—those that love him and want to go with him; and I have been telling him how much I want to go with him, and that I can't bear to think of all the pain I will have to-morrow if he don't take me. And I will tell you, Susie, what I am going to do, for fear I should be asleep when Jesus comes. I am going to hold my hand up so (and he held one hand by the wrist, just above the bed-clothes), so that when Jesus walks through our room to-night he will see it, and know I want him to take me, and he will see my hand and know I am the one that wants so much to go with him. I have told him I would, and he will look for me,' and the children went to sleep. And early next morning, when the nurse went to look at all the children, there she saw little Willie stiff and cold in death, with his hand just above the bed-clothes, held up by the other, as he had told Jesus he would find him."

Consistency.

It is an old adage that consistency is a jewel. One of the correspondents of the Herald of Life has, however, improved this saying by adding the word "ancient." If we adopt his improvement, the adage will read, Consistency is an ancient jewel. Judging from some things we see in print, we are led to conclude that, with some Adventists, this is their view of this matter.

Some two or three years ago, an article appeared in the Voice of the West, over the name of W. Sheldon, asserting, in very positive language, his belief that Christ, our Life-giver, would come the second time in the year of our Lord 1868. It seems, however, from articles of a more recent date, that on this particular point his faith begins to flag. Still, in this matter, it seems to us that consistency would require a square acknowledgment of his doubts, with the reasons why, without an attempt to make patch-work of his theory. He says now that "We claim all the time till 1875." But we modestly ask this champion of "Adventism" on what ground he sets up this claim? The argument on which he predicated his faith that the event would take place in the year 1868, was this: That the 1,335 years of Dan. xii., 12, do positively reach from a given event to the resurrection from the dead; that the given event is the setting up of the abomination of desolation, Dan. xii., 11; that the above-named power was set up by the letter of Justinian constituting the Pope of Rome sole and universal head of the church, and the only lawful corrector of heretics. That this letter was written in A. D. 533, every historian, who has ever said anything about it, positively asserts.

To this, Eld. Sheldon has always assented. Now, if this argument is good for anything in proving the definite time of the second advent, it cannot possibly be stretched beyond the present year. To make this arrangement of the period more clearly correct, it was urged by the same writer and his associates, that 1,260 of these years terminated at the point where infidel France made war on the two witnesses (Old and New Testaments) overcame them and killed them. All expositors who take this view of the prophecy, Eld. Sheldon among them, say that the witnesses were slain during the French revolution, in 1793; and that the three days and a half, each day for a year, during which these witnesses were to lie dead in the street of the great city, were fulfilled from November, 1793, to June 1797. This position being correct, no one can, with any show of consistency, attempt to extend the 1,260 years beyond November, 1793.

As the difference between 1,335, and 1,260 is only 75, it inevitably follows, that this calculation of the periods cannot possibly carry their ending beyond November, 1868. Now if Eld. Sheldon has any confidence in his own argument, why does he not squarely state his belief that the great consummation will take place at no point of time beyond next November? And if has abandoned this argument, why does he not say so plainly? Mark, this 1,335 years is the only prophetic period in the Bible that Eld. Sheldon believes ends at the resurrection. Whether Eld. S. and his associates admit it or not, the month of November, 1868, will test all the strength of this argument. If this argument brings the Lord from heaven, he will come before December. Eld. Sheldon and his associates see this just as plainly as we do. If they have any confidence in their own arrangement, why do they not talk it as they see it? Let consistency be a modern jewel. Then, if disappointed, own up like honest men. Indiarubber will do very well in its appropriate place, but it makes a very bad show in a religious faith. S. W. Bishop.

Night Musings.

BY POLLY G. PITTS.

When sleep fled my eyes, I mused on the time when, a little child, I stood and viewed the beautiful meadow on whose bosom stood the dwelling of my father. Under that peaceful roof I first drew the breath of life. Musing in the mornings when my busy feet ran through the tangled grass, wet with the dews of heaven, sent in mercy, and gathered my apron full of roses. Of all the meadows that I ever stood in to muse, this is the best; and the reason is, that I seem when there, in the vigor of life, though I am more than three score and ten years. I mused on the surrounding hills, and thought of the goodness of him who had weighed those hills in a balance. Then I mused on the lofty mountains, scattered over the earth, and thought of the Almighty power of the God of love that weighed the mountains in scales. O, what is man! These musings brought to my mind the saying of a man who stood on one of the great safety-valves of the earth—Mount Vesuvius—and with his glass he drew, or seemed to draw, the surrounding country to his feet, and its rivers seemed like silver threads thrown down at random, and its mighty forests reaching as it were to the boundless horizon; then looking at himself he exclaimed, "Pompous littleness."

Still my musing ran on to God's great measure in the which the dust of the whole earth was comprehended. Then came up for contemplation the mighty oceans, the great seas, the broad flowing rivers, the lakes, the brooks, the springs, whose every drop was measured in the hollow of the hand of its Creator, and he meted out heaven with a span. (O who would not be swallowed up in the contemplation of such a Being? O who would not be revived when they would say, "This God is mine?")

Next I mused on the Brothers Thorne of New York. I thought they had given liberally to support the Herald of Life, and God had blessed them much; then I said, It was "God that worked in them to will and to do of his own good pleasure, as he did in the poor widow who gave more than they.

I mused on the long useful life of our sleeping Br. Jonathan Wilson. How many times my heart had been cheered by his stirring communications. I mused on the mercy of God in lengthening out the lives of many of those that are looking for the coming of Jesus as nigh.

Then my thoughts turned on Br. Storrs, how God had used him as an instrument in his hand to fight the powers of darkness with; then came into my mind the sword of "Great Heart," in Bunyan's Pilgrim; how he fought the enemies of God till his sword grew to his hand. Thus may Br. S. be so united to the hand of God that one spirit may run through the whole body, and that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate him, or any of the elect, from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.

O how I mused on the inconsistency of the orthodox view of the penalty of God's law, eternal life in misery, though they call it death. O think of numbering every leaf of the forest that has grown since creation; every spear of grass that ever grew, and every drop of water on this globe; then call each of these a million of years, and when all these years have passed away, the penalty has only begun to be executed. Then to think of such men as H. W. Beecher, and other great men, or so styled, that preach from week to week such a penalty! O, for a while my muse was dumb; then I exclaimed, something like the man on Vesuvius, "O pompous nothing!" for such preaching is worse than nothing. O to think how they exaggerate God's wrath and vengeance, and his great love and mercy to a dying world is never magnified by them; they seem afraid to tell the sinner that God loves him.

Last I mused on myself, and the judgment day, or great assize, as held by the orthodox. I counted off from my life, thirty-seven years, for infancy, early childhood, my sleeping hours; and then there remained almost thirty-seven years, filled up, yes crowded to overflowing with words, deeds, and thoughts, and I said, It will take thirty-seven years to give an account for all these things, therefore I shall hold the attention of the assembled world thirty-seven years, if orthodoxy is right. And what shall I do till my turn comes, if almost all others are judged before me? The morning dawned, the musing ended for the time.

I now say, "O God give me wisdom to cease from man, whose breath is in his nostrils, for what is he to be accounted of? Thy word is truth.

Fredericksburg, Iowa, Oct., 1868.

Retrospection.

After a few weeks of recreation—attending camp-meeting, travelling, and visiting, I find myself at home once more, and somewhat benefitted by the change. Again I resume my cares and take up life's duties, looking for wisdom and help to Him whose promises are sure, and who hath said, "As thy day so shall thy strength be."

As I find time for quiet reflection, my mind turns back very often to the meeting at Springfield, to the pleasant and precious seasons of communion with the dear people of God, whose cheering and encouraging testimonies seem even now to be sounding in my ears. It was a time of deep interest and profit to me, and I doubt not to many others also. I am satisfied that much good will result from the meeting, that the truth will be honored and spread abroad and prejudice removed from many minds. We can see that considerable progress has been made during the past year, and to-day we certainly stand on advance ground. To use a very common expression, "The battle goes well." The seed long ago sown in tears and with many prayers, is springing up, and there is promise of a rich harvest. It is just like the working of truth always. The Lord be praised. It only needs faithful sowing and patient waiting to assure us that our "labor is not in vain in the Lord."

Yes, it was good to meet with the dear children of God—to look into the faces and feel the warm pressure of the hands of those whose hearts we know beat in unison with our own, and whose writings we have become familiar with through our much loved paper. It will repay one for the trouble and expense of attending such a meeting. And then, the home-feeling one experienced under our Life Tent. And this reminds me of the wish expressed by some of the sisters who found a home under its friendly shelter, that Br. Wolcott might be informed of the gratitude they felt to him and the Lord for such a provision. Although he was not able to be with us, which we all regretted, yet I know that many a blessing was invoked to rest upon him.

The tent was just the thing needful for the meeting. In it we listened to interesting and instructive sermons from ten of our preaching brethren, holding the Life views; who thus had opportunity to let shine the light of truth without restraint or hindrance, besides the excellent practical discourse of Br. Grant, which, under the circumstances, told upon the large number who gathered to hear it.

I did not intend to write a report of the meeting, but I wish to refer to the public sermon of Br. Storrs at the stand, which has before been noticed in the Herald of Life. I am satisfied that every heart that enjoyed the love of God, could but respond to the sentiment presented; and as far as my acquaintance and observation extended, I know this to be true. What if some, with minds perhaps contracted and crusted over a little under the influence of prejudice, should be stirred somewhat, and imagine they saw something to be feared! There is nothing but that the Lord can over-rule for good to His cause and truth; for He can make the wrath of man to praise Him, or restrain it as He will. Let us therefore wait and trust. The Lord imbue us with His blessed Spirit, so that if reviled, we may not revile again; and then if any of the household share the same fate as did the Master of the house, we shall not be disturbed, but rejoice that we are worthy to have fellowship with Christ in His sufferings, knowing that when His glory shall be revealed we shall also share in that.

My heart was made glad by the readiness manifested by the friends of the Herald of Life to make provision for its continuance. The Lord speed it on its mission of love to a dying world. Louisa J. Beach.

The Devil and His Use.

[The following story shows the importance of a spirit-devil for some "brother minister;" especially for such as have not enough love for God and men to perform their duty from that heaven-born principle. If any prefer "Beelzebub" and "Pandemonium" to the school of Christ to be stimulated to duty, the following story is just the thing.]

A Shot From A Long-Bow.

Chritmas Evans, the famous Welsh preacher, toward the end of his days, labored to advance the temperance reformation. A brother minister who "condemned not himself in the things which he allowed," could not be brought over to the total-abstinence system. Christmas polished an arrow, and put it in his quiver ready for use. He was appointed to preach; and as usual there were gatherings from far and near to hear him. Mr. W———, of A———, the minister alluded to, was there also; but, as if in anticipation of an attack, he at first said he should not be present while Evans preached, yet such was the fascination that he could not stay away. By-and-by he crept up into the gallery, where the preacher's eye—for he had but one—which had been long searching for him, at length discovered him. All went on "as usual" until the time came when the arrow might be drawn, which was done slyly and unperceived.

"I had a strange dream the other night," said the preacher. "I dreamed that I was in Pandemonium, the council-chamber of Hades. How I got there I know not; but there I was. I had not been there long before there came a thundering rap at the gates.

"'Beelzebub, Beelzebub! You must come to earth directly.'

"'Why, what's the matter now?'

"'Oh! they are sending our missionaries to preach to the heathen.'

"'Are they? Bad news this. I'll be there presently.'

"Beelzebub came, and hastened to the place of embarkation, where he saw the missionaries, their wives, and a few boxes of Bibles and tracts, but on turning round, he saw rows of casks piled up, and labelled Gin, Rum, Brandy, etc.

"'That will do,' said he; 'no fear yet. These casks will do more harm than the boxes can do good. So saying he stretched his wings for hell again.

"After a time there came another loud call.

"'Beelzebub, they are forming Bible societies.'

"'Are they? Then I must go.' He went, and found two ladies going from house to house, distributing the Word of God.

"'This won't do,' thought he; 'but I will watch the result.' The ladies visited an aged female, who received a Bible with much reverence and many thanks. Satan loitered about, and when the ladies were gone saw the old woman come to her door and look around to assure herself that she was unobserved. She then put on her bonnet, and with a small parcel under her apron, hastened to the next public-house, where she pawned her new Bible for a bottle of gin.

"'That will do,' said Beelzebub; 'no fear yet.' And back he flew to his own place.

"Again came a loud knock, and a hasty summons:

"'They are forming temperance societies.'

"'Temperance societies! What's that? I'll come and see.' He came and saw; and again flew back muttering:

"'This won't do much harm to me or my subjects. They are forbidding the use of ardent spirits; but they have left my poor people all the ale and porter, and the rich all the wines. No fear yet.'

"Again came a louder rap, and a more urgent call.

"'Beelzebub! you must come now, or all is lost. They are forming teetotal societies.'

"'Teetotal! What, in the name of all my imps, is that?"

"'To drink no intoxicating liquors whatever. The sole beverage is water.'

"'Indeed! that is bad news. I must see after this.'

"And he did; but went back again to satisfy the anxious inquiries of his legions, who were all qui vive about the matter.

"'Oh!' said he, 'don't be alarmed. True it's an awkward affair; but it won't spread much yet, for all the parsons are against it, and Mr. W———, of A——— (sending up an eagle glance of his eye at him), is at the head of them.'"

"But I won't be at the head of them any longer," cried out Mr. W———. And walking calmly down out of the gallery, entered the table pew, and signed the pledge.—Baptist Reporter.

From Helen Robertson.

Hartford, Conn., Oct. 7, 1868.

Br. Storrs: Last issue of "our paper" informs the readers that the next will be the commencement of Vol. VI. It leads my thoughts back to five years ago, when we, a feeble little band, met under the "Chestnut Tree," and there concluded to issue a weekly paper. Since then many changes have taken place. A very few have gone out to walk no more with us, while hundreds have joined the ranks. The Lord, even our dear heavenly Father, has truly owned the work, and we praise his holy name for it. When a work is of man it comes to naught. When of God it cannot be overthrown. O that we may have grace always to be workers together with God; then we shall have works that shall stand the fire which will try every man's work of what sort it is. Just think of a man spending his lifetime erecting a building, and fixing it all up to look as beautiful as possible, and after it is finished, looking on it with admiration, thinking it just right, and then when it is tested, going all to ruin, and nothing left of it.

Thus will go the theology of many; yet if they are the Lord's honest, loving children, they themselves will be saved as by fire. The Lord help us to build on the foundation, gold, silver, and precious stones.

I send you two new subscribers from this city. One of them has been in the light, walking in it for over a year, and has steadfastly set his face Zionward. The other was undecided till last camp-meeting, still looking into the subject. Then I gave him Bible vs. Tradition, and some other pamphlets. The first of these decided him, and now he sees the light clearly, and subscribes for the Herald of Life. I trust many more new subscribers will soon be added, for the light of life is so precious.

My prayer is that our Father may long spare your life to spread the precious truth; and may his blessing rest on the tried but faithful few.

Your sister, in the hope that when Christ, who is our life shall appear, she, with all the redeemed, may appear with him in glory.

Eld. Henry Perkins, Plymouth, Me., writes: I send $2 for the Herald of Life, and would gladly send more. My health is poor and my means limited. The truth is gaining ground slowly in this region; but the influences are strong against it. Spiritism and other false isms operate to hinder its progress. But the truth is mighty and must triumph ultimately. May the Lord bless and strengthen you, and give wisdom that you may give the household meat in due season. Blessed is that servant whom his Lord shall find so doing. I believe He is soon coming to the Marriage Supper of the Lamb, which I think is not a literal supper, but a message of truth to prepare and strengthen the household for the trial they have yet to endure before deliverance comes. May the Lord bless all the dear saints is my prayer.

Mary Woodward, Albanville, Wis., writes: Gladly do I receive the weekly visits of the Herald of Life. It comes laden with precious fruit that feeds the hungry soul. I might have remained in darkness concerning the wicked dead had it not been for the Herald which was presented to me by Eld. H. Harris of Mt. Tabor. I believe it to contain the true gospel of the kingdom. I feel truly thankful to God for the blessed truths it contains. I meet with much opposition; still I feel encouraged, for I know what our Saviour has said, and He will perform these precious promises. How cheering to the lonely traveller. I wish to do all I can to spread the truth, and am willing to sit at Jesus' feet; and accept that good part that Mary chose, that I may have a welcome entrance into the everlasting kingdom. Yours in the hope of eternal life.

BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail, the postage has to be pre-paid.

Six Sermons on the Inquiry. Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the true teachings of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.

No. 1. Earth, not Heaven, is to be the inheritance of the saints. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 4. The Soul Saved or Lost. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 5. Moral Depravity; by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 7. Doom of the Ungodly: or The Wicked Dead remain eternally under death's dominion. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 8. The Wages of Sin; by a Presbyterian Clergyman. Price, 5 cents.

No. 10. Letters to a Clergyman; or Life only through Christ not a heresy; by Dr. J. K. Finley, Pittsburg, Pa. Price 5 cents.

The foregoing tracts are 16 pages octavo. They will be sold at $3 per 100, or, fifty cents per dozen, free of postage.

No. 9. The Essential Baptism; by the Editor of the Bible Examiner, 32 pages. Price 7 cents.

Man's Nature and Destiny; or the Animal Man and the Spiritual Man. A Sermon by Geo Storrs. Price 5 cents.

The Atonement, by Geo. Storrs, and The Gospel Hope, by the same; both works now printed in one Tract. Price 5 cents.

THE FIFTH KINGDOM.

ALL religionists who take any interest whatever in the study of prophecy agree that Daniel, in his interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's dream of the image, Dan. ii., brings to view the setting up of a universal kingdom by the "God of heaven," but differ widely as to its nature, whether already established as a human government, or whether yet to be established as a purely divine one. Most of onr readers are familiar with the prophecies respecting this and certain preceding kingdoms; but as some may not be, let us briefly examine the prophecy.

Nebuchadnezzar saw in a dream the image of a man. "This image's head was of fine gold, his breast and his arms of silver, his belly and his thighs of brass; his legs of iron his feet part of iron and part of clay." Dan. ii., 32, 33.

Corresponding to this dream, was a vision of Daniel, had some years later, in which he saw four great beasts, denoting, as declared by the heavenly messenger, "four kings which shall arise out of the earth." "Thus he said, the fourth beast shall be the fourth kingdom upon the earth, which shall be diverse from all kingdoms, and shall devour the whole earth, and shall tread it down, and break it in pieces. And the ten horns out of this kingdom are ten kings that shall arise: and another shall rise after them." Dan. vii., 23, 24. In his interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's dream, Daniel declared to the king, "thou art this head of gold. And after thee shall arise another kingdom inferior to thee, and another third kingdom of brass, which shall bear rule over all the earth." And the fourth kingdom shall be strong as iron: forasmuch as iron breaketh in pieces and subdueth all things . . . "And whereas thou sawest the feet and toes part of potters clay and part of iron, the kingdom shall be divided . . . And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed: and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever." Dan. ii., 38, 44.

The expression, "thou art this head of gold," fixes it beyond cavil that the Chaldean or Babylonian was the first of the line of kingdoms represented by the image. A part of the hand writing which Belshazzar saw was thus explained: "Thy kingdom is divided and given to the Medes and Persians." Add to this the affirmation of history that the Medo-Persian empire succeeded the Babylonian, and it is settled that the second power represented by the image was Medo-Persia. We come, then, to the "third kingdom of brass." What was it?

The Greek empire was founded by Alexander the Great. He conquered Greece, went into Asia, took Tyre, subdued Egypt, and finally overthrew Darius Codomannus at Arbela, 331 B. C. Thus terminated the Persian monarchy, and upon its ruins the Greek, or Macedonian empire became fully established. Alexander afterward subdued Hyrcania, penetrated India as far as the Ganges, and conquered all the countries that lay between that river and the Adriatic Sea. After his death, the empire was divided among his four great generals. Cassander had Macedon and Greece; Lysimachus had Thrace, and the portions of Asia which lay on the Hellespont and Bosphorus; Ptolemy had Egypt, Lybia, Arabia, Palestine, and Cœlosyria; Seleucus took Babylon, Media, Susiana, Persia, Assyria, Bactria, Hyrcania, and other provinces reaching to the Ganges; and thus the empire was said to have "rule over all the earth."

But are we dependent upon history for light in identifying the "third kingdom?" Years after Nebuchadnezzar's dream of the image, Daniel had a vision in which he saw a ram pushing westward, and northward, and southward. While he was considering the ram he beheld a he-goat, having a notable horn between his eyes, come from the west to the ram "and break his two horns" and "cast him down to the ground." Therefore the he-goat waxed very great and when he was strong, the great horn was broken; and for it came up four notable ones toward the four winds of heaven." Dan. viii., 8. From an angel, Daniel received this interpretation of his vision. "The ram which thou sawest having two horns are the kings of Media and Persia. And the rough goat is the king of Grecia." Dan. viii., 21, 22. Revelation and history harmonize, then, in pointing out the Greek empire as the "third kingdom of brass."

Although revelation does not furnish the name of the fourth monarchy, certain considerations enable us to fix it with a degree of certainty little less than positive. It was to follow immediately the downfall of the third, the Grecian power. No power was to intervene between Greece and itself. Rome is generally supposed to have been founded by Romulus about 750 B. C. It seems to have matured about the time the Grecian monarchy terminated. Octavius, afterward called Augustus, subdued Egypt, about 30 B. C., an event which finished the Grecian empire, Egypt being the last of its four divisions, denoted by the four horns of the "rough goat.' No power, therefore, could have possibly existed between the downfall of the one and the rise of the other. The fourth kingdom, of the image, was to be "strong as iron: forasmuch as iron breaketh in pieces and subdueth all things;" and as the "fourth beast," it was to devour the whole earth, and "tread it down, and break it in pieces." How true was this of the Roman empire is evidenced by the fact that at the time at which Gibbon dates the commencement of its decline it consisted of Italy, Spain, Gaul, Britain, Rhætia, Noricum and Pannonia, Dalmatia, Dacia, Thrace, Macedonia, and Greece; Asia, Syria, Phœnicia and Palestine; Egypt, Africa, and the Mediterranean with its island. These facts, in connection with other well known ones which we have here neither time nor space to consider, leave no doubt as to the Roman being the fourth power represented by the image, the two legs of which fitly denoted the eastern and western divisions of the empire.

We come now to the last division of the image, the feet and toes. That they correspond to the ten horns, the ten kings that should arise out of the "exceeding dreadful" fourth beast is apparent. Bible students may differ as to what powers are denoted by these last symbols of the image, and the ten horns of the fourth beast, but they are generally agreed in this that whatever they are they exist in some form at the present time. This must be so, since it is conclusive that the iron kingdom of the image—the fourth beast of Daniel's vision—is the Roman empire. What follows then? Why, that we are living in the time when the everlasting kingdom is to be established; for the prophecy is "in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom."

Here let us consider the view, obtaining somewhat among students of various sects, that this power is already established, it being no other than the United States, in which we live. What are named as some of the characteristics of the kingdom which God shall set up? Purity is one. It "shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High." Was this country given to the saints? Yes, is the reply, our Puritan fathers sought here the enjoyment of that freedom in the worship of God which was denied them at home. True, but they established no government, being still ruled by Great Britian, a power claimed by some to be one of the ten horns of the fourth beast; one of the toes of the image. But it may be urged, they threw off the yoke of that despotism and established a free government, thus securing justice and equal rights to all men. Did they? When they declared themselves free from monarchical rule they proclaimed the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness inalienable to all. On that basis they struggled and prayed for freedom; on that basis God granted it. They gained the priceless boon, but were recreant to the righteous principle in the name of which they sought it. They were free but they drew tighter the chains of human bondage. Professing to offer an asylum to the oppressed of all lands, strong as death they riveted the yoke of one of the most terrible species of slavery the world ever saw, upon the necks of millions of fellow-mortals whom they had acknowledged before God as endowed with the inalienable right to liberty. The pure and perfect kingdom of our God foster for more than three quarters of a century such stupendous fraud, and strive to hide behind the flimsy plea of authority such deeds of shame and infamy as were all that while enacted under cover of law? Perish the wretched thought. Aside from this dark, accursed blot, had our government some semblance of purity in its youth? Alas, how quickly it became whelmed in corruption! We need not trace its course. What is its present condition. Who need be told that every legislative assembly from the lowest in city or county to the highest council of the nation is polluted by fraud, perjury, and theft; that over the entrance to almost every office in the land is written "pollution." Very many of our law-makers are notorious law-breakers; something falsely labelled justice is an article of almost public purchase and sale in our courts; not a few of the custodians of public property are plunderers known to be allied with thieving hordes; while scarcely a God-fearing man can be found occupying a position of public trust in any department of the government. Wickedness is exalted, and before iniquity men bow down.

As to the origin of our government, go ask them who through the bitter sufferings of terrible war struggled for their Independence? Vividly remembering all their keen sorrows; with fainting hearts, battle-scarred breasts, toilings hands, and bleeding feet they pursued through long years the object of their fond desire; they would, were they living, send back the answer, "Not 'without hands' was our government cut out."

Perfect purity will characterize the kingdom which shall "be given to the people of the saints of the Most High;" but our government has little claim to that quality.

Another characteristic of the fifth power is perpetuity. "It shall stand forever." What element of perpetuity has our government? Does it consist in its republican form? Since it is a fact that men are waxing "worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived," totally unfit to govern themselves, as individuals, no evidence of perpetuity can that principle furnish to a government. Is it said to be the best that ever existed? In some respects it is, but show us a civilized monarchy which has, in the same time treated millions of its people with greater lawlessness and barbarity than has our so-called "government of the people." Have they not been deprived of every right; crushed beneath such an appalling load of persecution and suffering that the universal cry wrung from them has been "How long, O Lord, how long?" In a simple monarchy, one man rules all others; in ours a part rules the other part. No evidence of perpetuity here. A government steeped in crime, administered by workers of iniquity, and utterly incapable of regulating or punishing certain enormities, will not escape when the final judgments of God shall rest upon the nations. It shall not "stand forever."

Our Saviour is elsewhere represented by a stone; but a form of human government is not thus represented. Upon what are all human governments founded and sustained? Upon the sword; force of arms. This is no less true of ours than of others, else would it ere this have been severed. Christ will smite them all at their very foundation, and establish one upon the new basis of perfect justice, love, and peace. Our last, best form of government has failed, the cup of the iniquity of the nations is about full, and very soon that glorious Fifth Monarchy will be established. Jesus is to be its king, and it will not be set up until he comes; for "I will overturn, overturn, overturn it; and it shall be no more until he come whose right it is, and I will give it him." That government shall be a just one; for upon the throne of his father David shall he order it, and "establish it with judgment and with justice."

It shall be a peaceful one. No clanging of arms and clashing of steel no strife and tumult of war; none of the confused noise of battle, "and garments rolled in blood," but of the "increase of his government and peace there shall be no end." "Righteousness shall be the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness the girdle of his reins. The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them. The cow and the bear shall feed; their young ones shall lie down together; and the lion shall eat straw like the ox. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain: for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea," saith the Lord of Hosts.

Let not our minds be turned away by any foolish claims of men; but with the eye of faith firmly fixed on Zion's King, labor with all diligence so that when he shall come, as soon he will (for the kings in the days of which he shall come and set up his throne are in existence) we shall be able to say, "Lo, this is our God; we have waited for him, and he will save us: This is our Lord; we have waited for him; we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation." THE LORD'S PRAYER. LUKE XI., 1–13.

[Concluded.]

3. THE fulness, condensedness, comprehensiveness, universality of the prayer. Of course it never was intended to confine within the limits of its few sentences the free spirit of prayer. The example of Lord himself, of the apostles of the church in all ages, has taught us how full and varied are the utterances of the human heart, when it breathes itself out unrestrainedly unto God in prayer. Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty—ample the freedom and wide the range that the Holy Spirit takes when it throws the human spirit into the attitude, and sustains it in the exercise of prayer—prompting those yearnings which cannot be uttered, those desires and affections which words multiplied to the uttermost fail adequately to express. In the past history, in the existing condition of every human soul, there is an infinitude of individual peculiarities. To forbid all references to these, all manifestations of these in prayer—to tie every one down at every season to pray as every one else—to allow no minute confession of particular transgressions, no recital of the circumstances in which they were committed, aggravations by which they were accompanied, no acknowledgment of special mercies, nor glad and grateful recounting how singularly appropriate and satisfying they had been—to cramp down within one dry and narrow mould all the plaints of sorrow, the moanings of penitence, the aspirations of desire, the beatings of gratitude, the breathings of love, the exultations of joy and hope, which fill the human heart, and which, in moments of filial trust, it would pour out into the ear of the Eternal: this were indeed to lay the axe at the root of all devotion. But while pleading for the very fullest liberty of prayer, let us not be insensible of the great benefit there is in ever and anon stepping out of that circle in which our own personal and particular sorrows and sins shape and intensify our prayers, into that upper and wider region in which, laying all those specialties for the time aside, we join the great company of the prayerful in all ages, in those few and simple, yet all-embracing petitions, which they and we, and all that have gone before, and all that shall come after, unite in presenting to the Hearer and Answerer of prayer. And this is what we do in repeating the Lord's Prayer. In it we have, stripped of all secondary or adventitious elements, the concentrated spirit and essence of prayer—a brief epitome of all the topics that prayer should embrace—a condensed expression of all those desires of the heart that should go up to God in prayer. It is not a prayer this for any one period of life—for any one kind of character—for any one outward or inward condition of things—for any one country, for any one age. The child may lisp its simple sentences as soon as it knows how to pray; it comes with no less fitness from the wrinkled lips of age. The penitent in the first hour of his return to God, the struggler in the thick of the spiritual conflict, the believer in the highest soarings of his faith and love, may take up and use alike this prayer. The youngest, the oldest, the simplest, the wisest, the most sin-stained, the most saintly, can find nothing here unsuitable, unseasonable. It gathers up into one what they all can and should unite in saying as they bend in supplication before God. And from the day when first it was published on the Mount, as our Lord's own directory for prayer, down through all these eighteen centuries, it has been the single golden link running through the ages that has bound together in one the whole vast company of the prayerful. Is there a single Christian now living upon earth—is there one among the multitude of the redeemed, who never prayed this prayer? I believe not one. It is not, then, as isolated spirits, alone in our communion with God, it is as units in that unnumbered congregation of those who have bent, are bending, will bend, before the throne, that we are to take up and to use this prayer. Not "my Father," but "our Father," is its key-note. Let it calm and soothe, and elevate our spirits, as, leaving all that belongs to our own little separate circle of thoughts, and doubts, and fears, and hopes, and joys, behind, we rise to take our place in this vast company, and to mingle our prayers with theirs.

And to what is it that the Lord's Prayer owes especially the universality of its embrace—the omnipotence of its power? To the special character in which it presents God to all—the peculiar standing before him into which it invites all to enter. It is not to him as the great I Am, the Omnipotent, the Omnipresent Creator, and Lord of all; it is not to him as dwelling in the light that no man can approach to, as clothed with all the attributes of majesty and power and justice and truth and holiness—the moral Governor of the universe, that it invites us to come. No, but to him as our Father in heaven, a Father regarding us with infinite pity, loving us with an everlasting love, willing and waiting to bestow, able and ready to help us. It is to him who taught us this prayer that we owe the revelation of God to us as such a Father. More than that, it is to Christ we owe the establishment of that close and endearing connection of sonship to the Father—a connection which it remains alone for us to recognize, so as to enter into possession of all its privileges and joys. He who taught this prayer to his disciples, taught them, too, that no man can come unto the Father but through him. It was a great injustice to him, if, because he has not named his own name in this prayer, we should forget that it is he who, by his incarnation and atonement has so linked God and man, earth and heaven, together, that all those sentiments of filial trust and confidence which this prayer expresses, may and should be cherished by every individual member of our race. There is not a living man who may not use this prayer; for while it is true that no man cometh to the Father but through Christ, it is equally true—indeed the one truth is involved in the other—that all men, every man, may now so come; not waiting till he is sure that he is a child of God, has such faith in God, or gratitude to God, or willingness to serve God as he knows a child should cherish; not grounding his assurance of God's Fatherhood to him on his sonship to God—no, but welcoming the assurance given to him in and by Jesus Christ. . . . . He added, "I say unto you, Ask, and it shall be given; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you. For every one that asketh"—asks as I have told you he should, or for what I have told you he should—"every one that asketh, receiveth; and he that seeketh, findeth; and to him that knocketh it shall be opened. If a son ask bread of any of you that is a father, will he give him a stone? or if he ask for a fish, will he give him a serpent? . . . . If ye, then, being evil, know how to give good gifts to your children how much more will your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him?"

MILTONIAN THEOLOGY.

WE have lately had a grand entertainment in the form of a tableau illustration of Milton's great poem, "Paradise Lost." These tableaux were sixty-three in number, representing the principal scenes of that poem. The scenes were judiciously chosen, and the paintings were fine, and unquestionably deserve a high rank as a work of scenic art. Those views representing the Creation in the order of days, and Adam and Eve in Paradise, were the more pleasing as coming within the limits of the natural and the known. Those which attempt to portray scenes in heaven and hell, angels, archangels, devils, and wars, certainly seem to exceed the proper limits of pictorial art, and border on the sacrilegious. I could not repress the feeling, that there was an attempt to unveil the secrets of the Most High, and portray scenes forbidden to mortal gaze. But it may be said, that the tableaux merely aim to transfer to canvas a faithful representation of the conceptions of the poet, and the poem itself is justly chargeable with the fault.

While Paradise Lost is a poem of great merit, sublime in its conception, grand in its diction and daring in its imaginative flights, equalling if not surpassing all other efforts of unaided human genius, it has also great faults. I have long been of the opinion that its great fault is that it attempts to penetrate things forbidden to man, and so discolors truth and weaves it with fancy that it has deceived many by its very speciousness. But I do not thiuk Milton is so much to be blamed for this. I do not suppose for a moment that it ever entered his thoughts that he was imposing on the credulity of weak minded and bigoted men; that his poetic conception of Satan aud hell and conscious torment would ever be considered better authority than the Bible. He was writing a grand epic poem to rank with the sublime efforts of Homer and Virgil in all coming time, and he little thought that there would ever be any man or class of men so credulous as to believe his poem fact and not fancy. Had it been his intention to have written a theological work, his views of divine truth, so fearlessly expressed and ably defended, leave no doubt as to its tenor upon these points. What shall I think, then, of the man who last fast-day preached in this place a sermon in which the Miltonic view of Satan as a fallen angel was presented in its strongest light, and Paradise Lost was quoted in the pulpit to add to the force and validity of the argument? And he is not alone, for this is the general opinion of the religious world. Would that men might see that the trnth of God is better than the inventions of men.

STRICTURES BY ELD. J. S. WHITE.

REV. Wm Sheldon has put forth to the world a book with this title. I should be very much surprised at this work bearing this name if we had not had so many strange things among us as a people. If Br. Sheldon had said that his book was his Adventism, it would have been more tolerable, But even then, it would be calculated to deceive those who are not acquainted with us; for they would naturally suppose that he had expressed what the Advent body believe in common. As it now is, one would suppose that, to be an Adventist, a person must endorse that book as a whole. And if it be not so, then the title of the book is false. I must say that a great portion of that book I never believed. Thousands of others can say the same, who at the same time believe that Christ is soon to come the second time, raise his people from the dead, give them immortality, set up his kingdom on the earth and reign forever.

I do not believe that one-half of the Advent believers in the world believe in the unconscious state of the dead, and the final extinction of the wicked. Bro. Sheldon has taken up quite a large portion of his book to show to the world that this is "Adventism."

Many of our brethren believe that the wicked will not be raised from the dead. A large class believe in probation after the Advent; special favors to be shown to the Jews in what is termed the "Age to come," as Bro. Sheldon formerly believed, I am told. Some believe that the thousand years in Rev. xxth, are in the past. Others believe that they are in the future, who do not believe in probation during that time. If a person holding any one of these views differing from Bro. Sheldon should write a book, and largely dwell on what he believed which others did not believe, and call it "Adventism," how could they endorse it? If Br. Storrs should put "Adventism" at the head of his work, "NO LIFE OUT OF CHRIST," it would either be true, that Br. Sheldon is not an Adventist, or that Br. Storrs had stated what was not true. Would Br. Sheldon endorse such a work as Adventism? Or should Br. Litch write a work which should contain in full, say twenty or thirty pages, his views of that state of the dead, and send it out into the world as an exponent of Adventism, would not Br. Sheldon look upon it as a libel? Brand is as unfair, unjust, and false? Whether the dead are asleep or awake, has nothing to do with Adventism. And so it is with many things in Br. Sheldon's book; a person may believe them or not believe them, and at the same time be an Adventist, holding such views as would make him an Adventist. No views should be called Adventism which can be left out and still the person be an Advent believer. What adds to the unfairness of Br. Sheldon's book is, that he does not tell the reader that large classes of Adventists do not endorse his views, but leaves him to infer that all Advent believers believe as he does.

While some, no doubt, do believe all that is in that work, I do not think that one in ten throughout the land believe it. Neither do I think that one-half of the Advent body endorse a large portion of that work; that is, I think that a large portion of his book they do not believe.

If a Baptist or a Methodist preacher holding views not in common with the faith of the body, should publish them as the faith of the church to which he belonged he would be a proper subject of discipline by the body to which he belonged; and justice to him, to themselves, and to the world, would require a severe censure for having slandered his denomination. I do, therefore, protest against Br. Sheldon's book being palmed off upon the Advent body and upon the world, as "Adventism," J. S. WHITE.

CHRIST AT THE DOOR.

CHRIST pictures himself before the sinner in many attitudes. He sits by his side conversing, he stands before him instructing, he kneels at his feet entreating, he hangs above him dying, he appears in the heavens judging. This presentation of him is especially affecting. In the dark night air, he stands at the barred door sadly knocking. Does the inmate hear? Will he respond? Why does he not hasten to admit him? Why at least will he not see who it is? Did he ever treat any other one so ill? Does he sit still in his house while persons are knocking quietly and entreatingly, and never respond to their appeal? Why does he, then, this petition of Christ's? Every one hears this call. The agitation of the world concerning him is a confession to this universal recognition. At the scholar's heart he knocks, and that scholar, Strauss, Colenso, Renan, Emerson, hears the sound thereof and knows whence it cometh, and what it requireth; knows it is the Lord, his Lord. He knocks at the scoffer's heart, and he hears it in the midst of his blasphemous ribaldry. He sends its ringing appeal through the depths of that lost soul sunken in sensuality, an open and awful profligate, and he recognizes the sacred summons. All attest his sad, sweet, solemn presence.

How do you treat this invitation? Some, instead of letting him in, proceed to discourse about his character and claims, with great show of learning, but with the uttermost ignorance of real knowledge. Let him in first, and then you can intelligently speak of him. Others come to the window and bow and smirk to him with great condescension, call him all sorts of pretty names, but are careful not to let him in. Others say, "wait till I have made this trade, played this game, indulged in this debauch, and I will get up and invite you to enter." Others get so besotted in their sin that they only grow the more furious at every reverberation of that invitation through their hearts, and fiercely seek to drive him from their door. Thus they gnash on his ministers, thus on him. How is it with you, sinner? In whichever class you are, it is all the same, if you do not admit him. That is what he wishes; that is all in all. Say not "to-morrow I'll open the door, when I am older, richer, sicker, at camp-meetings, next winter, any time but now." Behold NOW is the accepted time. Now is the day of salvation. Christ supplicates you. Christ, your Lord and your God, Christ who left the glory which he had with the Father before the world was, has come to your door. Hasten to invite him to open. You cannot open it yourself. It is too closely barred, too much bolted, too greatly overgrown with briers and thorns. Beg him to unlock the bolts, unloose the bars, cut away the matted abattis and come in. Throw away your pursuits, drop your sinful, or merely unsightly vocations, which by the pre-eminence, you give them become sin to you; hurl from you that skeptical book, fly from that anti-gospel preacher, implore Him to come and save you. Your heart, now the habitation of errors and sins, in which you grope blindly and vainly for the truth, in which you dwell carnally and darkly amid your own lusts, that wicked heart of unbelief he will illumine, cleanse, sweeten, and take his abode in. Hear him knocking; now, this night, this day, this hour, hear and respond. If you will not, you will soon cease to hear.

Grieved away, the Saviour goeth,
Death breaks in at last.

ANOTHER EARTHQUAKE.

DISPATCHES from San Francisco contain accounts of an earthquake of considerable severity in California, resulting in the destruction of much property, but fortunately few lives have been lost. The shocks seem to have been most severe inland. A number of towns have suffered from loss of property. Among these are Alameda, Brooklyn, Oakland, San Jose, Redwood City, Peteluma, Healdsburgh Santa Rosa, Vallejo and Martinez. Near the village of San Leandro, which was nearly ruined, there are numerous fissures in the earth, from some of which issued clouds of dust, and from others volumes of water. San Leandro Creek, which has been dry for months (as is usual at this season of the year) is now a rapidly running stream. In some places the earth emitted hot water and steam. The loss of property in San Francisco is thus far variously estimated at from 500,000 to 2,000,000 dollars. The principal shock was followed by another a number of hours later, by which some additional damage was done.

This is the third earthquake of some note that has occurred so far north in this continent within the present century, the second one having taken place in California in 1865 and was much inferior to that of the 21st inst. The first occurred in the vicinity of New Madrid, Mo., in 1811. Humboldt says of this that "it presents one of the few examples of the incessant quaking of the ground for several months, far from any volcano. Over an extent of country 300 miles in length, from the mouth of the Ohio to that of the St. Francis, the ground rose and sank in great undulations, and lakes were formed and were again drained." The surface in many places burst open in fissures, from which mud and water were thrown as high as the tops of the trees. "Flint, the geographer, observed hundreds of these chasms seven years after this catastrophe; and Lyell, who visited the same region in 1846, noticed many which might be traced for more than half a mile."

While these convulsions continued, the inhabitants claim to have distinguished two classes of earthquakes, those in which the movement was vertical, and those in which it was horizontal; the latter being regarded as far more powerful and destructive than the former. It is a very curious fact that these continued with greater or less frequency, until March 26, 1812, when the internal commotion, gathering force, culminated in the destruction of Caracas, Venezuela, when the whole city, with its splendid edifices, was in an instant a heap of ruins, under which, as has already been noticed in a previous article, about 12,000 of its inhabitants perished. These desolating phenomena have been of frequent occurrence during the past few years and seem to be greatly on the increase.

Said Jesus, Luke xxi., 10, 11, "Nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom: and great earthquakes shall be in divers places." Was this ever more true than of these our times? L. C. T.

New York, Oct., 1868.

JOHN SNYDER, Avalanche, Wis., writes: Let me tell you the reception our tracts received at a Grove-meeting, last June. Br. Turner had tracts that he recommended very highly; then taking ours, he said, "Here is another lot that Br. Snyder brought here; but it is believed by most all the Advent brethren that Br. Storrs and a few others have fallen into a great error, on the subject of the resurrection of the dead." He then read their one text, John v., 28, 29. But that text really belongs to us, for the hour or time of hearing had then commenced, and would not apply to a resurrection of dead men at the end of this age.

We have meetings every Sabbath; but we seldom say anything on the views we hold; but when asked a question by any one, we are always ready to give a reason of the hope we have, with meekness and fear, by showing the relation we sustain to the first Adam, that by it we are landed in the grave, or dust from whence we came; and without a connection with the second Adam we have no power to revive from the dead, but are helpless and perish forever, because we had "judged ourselves unworthy of everlasting life;" and by our actions and transactions condemned ourselves, and by the judge of all are condemned to "remain in the congregation of the dead;" so that "death shall feed sweetly upon" us; but "the upright shall have dominion over us in the morning;" for, to such as "fear God, in the morning it shall be light."

S. S. CALL, Newport Centre, Vt., informs us he is about to remove to Canton, Minn. He says the people are getting their eyes open on the doctrine of Life only in Christ, and it will be pretty hard to deceive them again to make them believe the doctrine of inherent immortality. Some are so blinded that the light seems only to make them shut their eyes, as we often see people do whose eyes are too weak to bear the light. But, thank the Lord, they cannot stop the light from shining; and it will shine more and more until the perfect day.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

TRUTH SHALL TRIUMPH.

IT has been our fortune—some may call it *mis*fortune—ever since we "came to years," or about "forty"—the time Moses "refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter"—to be on the unpopular side, theologically; but hitherto the LORD hath sustained us. It is of no consequence whether few or many be with a lover of truth: his business is to seek for it, and when found, not hide it under a bushel. He is not to shrink from its promulgation for fear of any sacrifice, whether of reputation, place, friends, or pecuniary support. The one question to be asked is, Is it truth? God's truth? and does his providence open the way to proclaim it? Not, can I do it and save reputation, friends, etc., but, can I do it at all? Is there any door open to promulgate it anywhere? If so, begin. It may be a small beginning—there may be many discouragements—many to cry, "you are too fast—have gone too far," etc. Still, let the lover of truth remember that there is a vital power in truth, and God is ever on its side; and if he be for us, sooner or later that truth will triumph. We may not live to see it; yet the day will come. The instruments God employs are often weak in themselves; but truth is none the less powerful on that account, and is more likely to work its own way by its divine power to a substantial lodgment and a genuine reformation, than if promulgated by a more conspicuous and powerful instrument; as the multitude follow great names, when the truth itself may have no permanent hold on the heart.

A theological change in respect to the character and government of God, must and will, sooner or later, be accomplished, viz., the uprooting of the doctrine of future, hopeless torment for sinners, whether that torment be temporary or eternal. The principle is the same in either case—it means no benefit for the tormented, or to the saved; it is alike without object for good to the saved or lost; it is alike in opposition to the known and revealed perfections of God, and is hostile to his loving heart, which was manifested when his glorious Representative beheld the coming judgment on "Jerusalem and wept over it." Can any sane man still believe that a scene is to be enacted by the resurrection of unnumbered millions from the dead to be tormented with horrors, before which Jerusalem's judgment will sink in eternal shade! Perish such a thought! The idea is not true, and has no support in the words of God, unless those words are perverted through the force of a false theology which was born in the dark ages of the church, when ignorance and superstition, helped on by a selfish and morose priesthood, held sway over the minds of men, and a revengeful spirit ruled the hour. That hour has passed away—that "darkness is past, and the true light now shineth." "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should NOT PERISH, but have everlasting life." The world was perishing—going out of life without hope of a future one; in that condition the love of God triumphed to open a door into an endless life. Christ is that door, and faith is the act by which we enter. In no other way can a future life be entered. He who will not come to Christ that he may have life, will perish as if this LIFE-GIVER had never come. No man's end is made worse by Christ's having come in the flesh; but by neglecting Christ—being "condemned already"—"the wrath of God abideth on him;" such "shall not see life."

May heaven speed the triumph of these glorious truths, and take away the reproach from off God's people of having sustained the God-dishonoring doctrine of a hopeless torment in a life beyond the grave. That time will surely come. But will the church wait for this triumph of truth over lies till God's just judgment overtakes it for having so long profaned his name by the horrible doctrine of future, hopeless, and useless torment for the creatures he has made? Must the church be aroused to its sin in this matter by the blasphemy of "spiritualism," and its kindred doctrines, the inevitable result of the theological teachings, for centuries past, of man's nature and destiny? Shall that blasphemy be the developed rebellion against God whereby the church is to be led to open her eyes to see the sin of teaching inherent immortality, or a future hopeless torture of the dying children of any of Adam's race? It may be so: but the church has been warned. The truth will advance, and the torment theory of a life hereafter to be one of hopeless torture or misery will be wiped "from off the face of all the earth," as effectually as the old world was swept away with the flood. Let all believers in this fact work while we may, and we will not labor in vain—it is in the hands of God, and he will see that no labor is lost, put forth to this end.

WE had not intended to speak again of the work under the above title, issued in the West by Wm. Sheldon, published at the office of the Voice of the West, and highly commended by the conductors of the paper and its correspondents, as well as by the editor of the World's Crisis, in Boston. Our attention and that of our readers is called to the work by an article from Eld. J. S. White, found on the first page of this paper. Br. White's condemnation of the work is based on its claim to be an exponent of Adventism, showing the absurdity of such claim and the falsity of it. We perfectly agree with him in this view.

If the work had been christened properly it would have read, "The Adventism of Mortal Resurrectionists:" or, "The Exponent of the views of Elders Sheldon, Himes, and Grant; teaching a simultaneous resurrection of all Adam's race in a mortal state, both saints and sinners, and judgment after; at the close of which, whether fifty thousand or a million years, the saints are to be changed to immortality, and the wicked are to be burned up."

Such is the theology of "Adventism;" and according to the work, thus palmed off on the world, none are adventists who do not tally with this boasted production; this "youngest daughter of the Mother of Harlots," as Eld. Himes said, twenty-five years ago, advent believers would be "if we ever become a sect." According to this "Adventism" book, Eld. Himes himself was not then an Adventist, nor did he become so till about the time he started the Voice of the West, some five years since.

This work called "Adventism" in its relation to Theology," or "Part I," is in perfect opposition to adventism as held by William Miller, Elders Joshua V. Himes, Josiah Litch, and others of like faith, in 1843 and onward, for twenty years after. At length Eld. Himes abandoned his old co-laborers, Eld. Litch and others of like faith, and went over to those advent believers in the West who held views adverse to inherent immortality, but maintained a resurrection of all the dead, both saints and sinners, but who still held, the saints would be raised immortal and a thousand years before the wicked dead.

The doctrine of the resurrection of the righteous only, and that the wicked would "remain in the congregation of the dead" eternally, had now made strong and rapid progress in the Eastern States, and was advancing Westward. What was to be done to arrest it? Eld. Wm. Sheldon led off, and Eld. Himes followed by publishing Sheldon's "Adventism," and other leading spirits with them indorsed it. Was its abandonment of the resurrection of the saints a thousand years before that of the wicked frankly avowed? Was the advocacy of a universal mortal resurrection honestly and openly stated? No; neither of these inroads on their previous views were advocated frankly and openly, but covertly. They had not yet the courage to say they had departed from their previous faith; but took advantage of the hostility of Western and Eastern advent believers to the growing view of "No future life out of Christ," to spring the net of "Adventism," with all its abondonments of which we have spoken, over their minds, and got them fast into the snare, praising and indorsing their bondage to the new invention of a simultaneous mortal resurrection!

But the snare is broken; and none but willing slaves will again indorse the deceitful "Theology" of "Adventism." Its character is now well known and understood. It is the offspring of a desperate effort and a last resort to prevent the onward march of the irresistible truth that "Life future and eternal is only by a living union with Christ, the LIFE-GIVER.

"LIVING SOUL."

THIS tract is now ready to send off in any quantity, having printed two thousand, and we can multiply them at short notice to a hundred thousand. The amount necessary to pay the first cost has not yet been received; but we trust it soon will be. Send all you can to help this work; and for all you can scatter to advantage. Price $2 per 100, and postage to be added—about 30 cents, if sent by mail.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN AND METHODISM.

Zion's Herald makes the following statement and reflections in its issue of Oct. 22d:

Benjamin Franklin is the first American Methodist publisher. In Rev. Dr. Warren's Essay before the Convention he gave a fact that adds new laurels to this famous American. In 1740, fifty years before the Book Concern was born in the mind and for a long time carried in the will of James Dickens; before Embury and Barbara Heck had begun there organizing church work; when New England was formally a unit on the doctrines of Calvin, Benjamin Franklin sent forth edition after edition of John Wesley's sermon on Free Grace. Had he received the experience of the grace as he did the theory of its freedom, he would have been the father of American Methodism. As it is, he is a sort of father. The church will be glad to learn that he stands in this relation. It only shows how deep was the "felt want" of the world for Methodism when the young Boston printer caught at the words of the young Oxford preacher, and scattered them broadcast over a community that held Episcopacy and Arminianism in equal contempt and horror; and when that demand exhausted edition after edition, it also showed that not his far-seeing mind alone detected the need, but many Bostonians and New Englanders shared his sentiments. Had not the New England ministry of that time ceaselessly branded Arminianism as a false and anti-Christian heresy, the heresy of Unitarianism would have never become so powerfully rooted in our soil. They abjured the truth, and stoned with hard words those who offered it, and thus drove the men who saw the falsehood and horribleness of unconditional election and reprobation into the counter falsehood of unconditional salvation. The attempt to deprive men of all power of choice resulted in the dogma of his natural ability; and the limitation of Christ's office work to a selected few, caused his rejection as essential to the salvation of any. Let us honor the founder of the Methodist American publishing house by erecting suitable buildings in the city where John Wesley was first printed this side the ocean, and thus join Wesley, Franklin and Boston in a fitting memorial.

We have copied the foregoing, first, because it is an interesting item in the history of Methodism in this country; but mainly for the concluding remarks it contains:

"The 'felt want' of the world" was not "for Methodism," but for that advanced state of theological truth which that people, under the lead of the Wesleys and Fletcher, brought to light, viz., "Free Grace"—that is, free for all men. That doctrine is a grand and glorious truth, and an inevitable result from the equally or more glorious truth, "GOD IS LOVE." These truths stand or fall together. To separate them is to weaken each or destroy both. That the "New England ministry of that time" should "ceaselessly brand" the doctrine of "free grace," as promulgated by Wesley and Fletcher, as false and anti-Christian heresy, was no more strange than that Methodist ministers in these days should brand the doctrine of "Life future and eternal only in Christ, and by a resurrection or translation" as "false and an anti-Christian heresy," as many of them do.

On this question, the Methodist ministry and others are acting the same unwise part that the New England ministry did, of which Zion's Herald speaks. Did that ministry "abjure the truth and stone with hard words those who offered it?" Have not Methodist and Calvinistic ministers done the same thing to those who have brought out the Bible doctrine of "Life only in Christ?" Most undeniably they have.

"But the cases are not parallel," it may be urged. Why are they not? Wesley, Fletcher and their helpers used Bible arguments to overturn a system of bound-will and restricted grace. Calvinistic ministers honestly believed these new teachers were perverters of the words of God, and "branded" such views as "anti-Christian heresy." Are not the appeals of Life believers to the Bible as the standard of all faith, and as the only authoritative standard? Creeds, confessions of faith, and traditions of men weigh nothing in the scales with God's word. "To the law and to the estimony: if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them." Isa. viii., 20. This is our motto. Let the word of God decide, untrammelled by traditions.

Life believers reject the doctrine of inherent immortality, as Wesley and Fletcher rejected "unconditional election and reprobation;" and for the very same reasons, viz., it cannot be found in the Bible, and its "falsehood and horribleness" are to us as apparent as that of "unconditional election and reprobation" was to Wesley, Fletcher and their helpers. If the opposition of the New England ministry to their views led many into Unitarianism, and made it powerful in and about Boston, so has the opposition by Methodist and other ministers to the view that a future life and immortality are conditional, "branding" "Life only in Christ" "as a false and anti-Christian heresy," made "the heresy of" Spiritism to "become powerfully rooted in our soil." That Spiritism has its roots in the theological notion of inherent immortality is a fact so palpable that few men will hazard their reputation so much as to deny it.

But though we thus speak, we trust a better time will come when our opposers will yield to the grandest and most glorious of all truths, viz., "Christ the LIFE-GIVER," and "No future life except in union with him, and a resurrection from the dead at the last day, or a translation" if alive and remaining unto that day when "the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we who are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them, to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall we be ever with the Lord." 1 Thess. iv., 16, 17.

This is our hope; and we believe it to be the only gospel hope. May the Spirit of God guide us into all truth, and preserve us unto his eternal kingdom and glory.

"A BITTER RESURRECTION:" HEB. xi., 35.

THE above text of Scripture has often been used by our opponents in proof of the resurrection of the wicked dead, implying, as they would have it, that some (viz., the righteous) will have a better resurrection than others; that is, than the wicked. The context shows that the expression is not used in any such sense. The apostle had spoken of "women" who had "received their dead raised to life again," through faith; and adds, "Others were tortured, not accepting deliverance, that they might obtain a better resurrection." "Better" than whose? Clearly, better than the restoration "to life again" of those of which he had just spoken, whom the "women" had received, restored to them in times previously referred to. No idea of the revival into life of the wicked dead is contained in the text.

The following illustration of the text we cut from "The Preacher and United Presbyterian. It says,

We have, in Hebrews xi., 35, plainly a reference to the history in the Second Book of Maccabees: "And others were tortured, not accepting deliverance; that they might obtain a better resurrection." We know of no portion of Old Testament history to which this so fully applies as to the following, taken from 2 Maccabees, chap. vii.: "It came to pass also, that seven brethren with their mother were taken, and were compelled by the king, against the law, to taste swine's flesh, and were tormented with scourges and whips. But one of them that spake first, said thus. What wouldst thou ask or learn of us? We are ready to die rather than to transgress the laws of our fathers. Then the king, being in a rage, commanded pans and caldrons to be made hot; which forthwith being heated, he commanded to cut out the tongue of him that spake first, and to cut off the utmost parts of his body, the rest of his brethren and his mother looking on. Now, when he was thus maimed in all his members, he commanded him, being yet alive, to be brought to the fire, and to be fried in the pan; and as the vapor of the pan was for a good ways dispersed, they exhorted one another with the mother to die manfully, saying thus: The Lord God looketh upon us, and in truth hath comfort in us." "So when the first was dead after this manner, they brought the second to make him a mocking stock; and when they had pulled off the skin of his head with the hair, they asked him, Wilt thou eat before thou be punished throughout every member of thy body? But he answered in his own language, and said, No. Wherefore he also received the next torment in order as the former did. And when he was at the last gasp, he said, Thou like a fury takest us out of this present life, but the King of the world shall raise us up, who die for His laws, unto everlasting life. After him was the third made a mocking stock; and when he was required, he put out his tongue, holding forth his hands manfully, and said courageously, These I have from heaven, and for His laws I despise them, and from him I hope to receive them again. The fourth, when he was ready to die, said thus, "It is good being put to death by men, to look for hope from God, to be raised again by him: as for thee, thou shalt have no resurrection to life." To her only surviving son the mother said, "Doubtless, the Creator of the world, who formed the generation of man, and found out the beginning of all things, will also, of his own mercy, give you breath and life again, as ye now regard not your own selves for His law's sake. Fear not this tormentor, but being worthy of thy brethren, take thy death, that I may receive thee again in mercy with thy brethren." And this son died, professing, "Our brethren, who now have suffered a short pain, are dead under God's covenant of everlasting life; but thou, through the judgment of God, shalt receive just punishment for thy pride."

The allusion of the Apostle being, as we think, obviously to this scene of torture, the "better resurrection" of which he speaks, is the resurrection to everlasting life, in hope of which these Maccabean martyrs died, the hope only of the righteous and faithful, and from which all persecutors, and all apostates from the covenant of God would be excluded. This sweeps away the gloss of the Universalists on this passage. The doctrine of the resurrection from the dead, in which the body should live again, in which the "hands" should be "restored" was believed among the ancient Jews. Where did they learn it? Certainly not from the heathen. Where else but from their Scriptures—the law and the prophets."

NOTE BY THE ED. HER. OF LIFE.—"This sweeps away the gloss of" all immortal-soulists, as well as "Universalists," The resurrection from the dead is the only hope of a future life the Bible gives us; and this revival into life is conditional. The ungodly and unholy have no part in it. Their death is final and eternal. Life future is only in and by Christ, the LIFE-GIVER.

WHAT IS THE SECOND DEATH?

MUCH is said by mortal resurrectionists about "the second death," as if it proved the sinner must have a revival into life to experience it. The phrase is found nowhere in the Bible, except in the symbolical Book of Revelation. As the phrase was in use among the Jews, we will notice their ideas. We extract from Prof. Hudson's "Debt and Grace" several examples which show how they understood it.

"We learn from this place (Num. xiv., 37) that they died the second death."

"They shall die the second death, and shall not live in the world to come."

"They shall die the second death, so as not to enter into the world to come."

"Every idolater, who says that there is another God besides me, I will slay with the second death, from which no man can come to life again."

Hudson also gives the "statement of Julius Africanus (A. D. 221) that 'Adam being one hundred and thirty years old begat Seth: and living thereafter eight hundred years, he died, to wit, the second death.'"

He says the Jews "understood by this death, exclusion from life." He quotes Hammond's remark on the phrase. "It seems to be taken from the Jews, who use it proverbially for final, utter, irreversible destruction. It seems to denote such a death from which there is no release."

And yet Adam "DIED" this death. The sinners spoken of, Num. xiv., 37, "DIED" this death. And those who die this death "shall not enter the world to come." We think if they live one minute after the establishment of Christ's kingdom they will have entered the world to come. How much more if they a thousands years after? Jesus said, "Except a man be begotten from above, he cannot see the kingdom of God."

The difference of circumstances between the righteous and the wicked, warrants the observance of a distinction with regard to their death. The righteous do not die as the wicked die. Jesus expressly recognizes this fact. In His great Life Discourse (John vi.) He says, "Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness and are dead. This is the bread which cometh down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof, and not die." Did He mean by this last assertion, that the believer would not die in any sense? Certainly not. Did he mean that those who believed would not die a natural death? Certainly not. He meant that they should not die as the fathers in the wilderness did. Dr. Clarke says on this passage "It was an opinion of the Jews themselves, that their fathers who perished in the wilderness should never have a resurrection."

Jesus, talking to the Jews of a class of persons, whom they did not believe would have any future life, says, "Your fathers . . . ARE DEAD." But if you eat of this bread you shall "NOT DIE."

Again, 53d verse. "Then Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you." Did He mean that they were not alive as they stood before Him. Certainly not. He meant, they had no future life in them—they had no life-principle by which they could be quickened from the dead. His succeeding remarks strengthen this view. "Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life;" hath the life-principle, "the Spirit that quickeneth;" and the next words nail the conclusion; "and I will raise him up at the last day." "He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me, and I in him. As the living Father hath sent me, and I live by the Father; so he that eateth me, even he shall live by me. This is the bread which came down from heaven: not as your fathers did eat manna, and are dead: he that eateth of this bread shall live forever." Says Paul, Rom. viii., 10, 11; "If Christ be in you, the body" (the animal nature) "is dead" (your present life is mortal and will soon be gone past recovery) "because of sin;" (Christ has "condemned sin in the flesh;") "But the Spirit is life because of righteousness. But if the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by" (or because of—see margin) "His Spirit that dwelleth in you." "For if ye live after the flesh ye shall die:" (as the fathers did. 'He that soweth to the flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption;') "but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body ye shall live." "I will raise him up at the last day." "He that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting."

Is it any wonder, then, that Jesus says, (John viii., 51) "Verily, verily, I say unto you, If a man keep my saying he shall never see death." Those whom God will raise from the dead are not accounted as dead, "For he is not a God of the dead, but of the living." Hence when He calls himself "the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob," those very expressions prove that they are not accounted as dead, inasmuch as He "will raise them up at the last day. And this was the great argument of Jesus against the Sadducees. Observe, Jesus only upheld the resurrection of the righteous in that argument. (See Luke xx.) Hence, the righteous, in the New Testament, are said to be "asleep in Christ;" ("in Christ shall all be made alive;" but the wicked "as natural brute beasts, made to be taken and destroyed" are said to "utterly perish in their own corruption." The righteous are "sown in corruption," to be "raised in incorruption;" but the wicked "utterly perish" in corruption. They "of the flesh reap corruption." That is all they can get from the flesh. Life is obtained from the Spirit. "It is the Spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing."

Understanding the phrase "second death" to imply a death of utter destruction, (in which we are fully borne out by the Jewish examples already referred to,) we see the propriety of applying it to the case of those who die out of Christ. We conclude in the words of another,* "The phrase is fairly interpreted, to say that a death with a resurrection is the first death: a death without a resurrection is the second death: not a dying twice. But as one dies with a certainty to live again, and the other 'without hope' of life again, so one may fitly be called the first, and the other the second death. Not because the subject dies twice; but because there is such a difference between the two classes that the first does not die in the sense that the other does. Thus there are two deaths in fact—one for the righteous, and another for the wicked. . . . The wicked are utterly destroyed by their death; while the righteous, by theirs, only 'sleep in Jesus' to wake again at His voice, when he shall return from heaven."

HOMO.

"PATRON SAINT."

A WHAT, do you ask? Why, a "patron saint." You have not lived so long among worshippers of the famous (or perhaps infamous) claimant to "apostolic succession" without hearing all about patron saints. A morning journal says:

> We have from Valparaiso an account of the election of a patron saint to one of the churches there, which was concluded on the 6th of September. The Mercurio says the favorite candidate was "the Adorable Saviour of the World," who polled 19,946 votes; "the Most Holy Virgin followed with 4,132; sundry odd saints put in a poor show, polling in the aggregate 384 votes. After the election a Te Deum was sung and a sermon pronounced in celebration of the joyful event.

A doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church, according to the definition of the Council of Trent, is as follows: "That the saints reigning together with Christ offer their prayers to God for man and that it is good and useful devoutly to invoke them, and to resort to their prayers, aid and assistance for the purpose of obtaining benefits from God through his Son Jesus Christ."

In accordance with this declaration, it has become an established custom in the church to place towns, countries, orders, associations, etc., under the special patronage of saints who are asked to use their influence with God to induce him to grant peculiar favors. We presume the selection of these saints is generally effected in a quiet way, but the recent earthquake, or something else, seems to have shaken up the ideas of the Chilians to such an extent that they have conceived a plan of making choice which for fairness, if fairly conducted, must commend itself to both saint and sinner. "All men are immortal; saints reign with Christ;" so the papal sons of Valparaiso, being in want of a "patron saint," have no inclination to permit priest or other ecclesiastical dignitary to choose for them; not they; they hold an election and secure one upon true republican principles. Then, too, see the wisdom of their choice. Paul, any of the apostles, any of the host of saints represented in the Romish church literature as being proper subject of invocation, are well enough in their way, and may have great favor in the sight of God, but then they might sometimes have to go to Peter, who is entrusted with the keys, he to "the most holy Virgin," she in turn to Jesus, and he to God. Such circuity might result in a degree of neglect, or failure, quite subversive to certain important interests, so a "patron" whose character and position preclude all fears of such difficulties or delays is selected and triumphantly elected, even "the adorable Saviour of the world."

Now all this seems blasphemous; and truly it is so; but if inherent immortality is true, why shouldn't people invoke the saints? They dwell with God; they are in constant personal communication with our exalted Lord; and is it therefore very unreasonable to suppose that they as glorified intelligences enjoy privileges which may be exercised to the advantage of helpless mortals, and win from them the title of "patron saints?" It is true Jesus instructed his disciples to pray in his name, assuring them that whatever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son. John xiv., 13. True, too, Paul says, we know not what we should pray for as we ought; but the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered. Rom. viii., 26; but these are trifling difficulties compared with what have to be met by advocates of the doctrine of consciousness in death; that saints are alive. Ah, Protestant believers in inherent immortality, when you attempt to denounce Roman Catholicism in the terms it justly deserves, please remember its awful delusions are a "pit whence ye are" not quite "digged." Heaven grant you soon may be entirely digged from it. Thus freed from such errors as eternal torment, spiritism, with its species of invocation of saints, and other absurd notions which spring from that of natural immortality, you will have such a comprehension of God's goodness and love as you never before experienced, and never will while your eyes are closed to the truth respecting your own nature. Better believe the simple truths of God's word, notwithstanding your system of theology would thus be undermined and subverted, and when you have believed have the courage to speak. L. C. T.

THE most powerful way of teaching truth, is to show what it has done for you.

Letters and Extracts.

FROM CHARLES H. SUTTON.

MANAYUNK, PA., Oct. 19, 1868.

BR. STORRS: The HERALD OF LIFE comes laden with precious truths. I prize it more than ever; especially as I am alone in this place on the Life views; but I have great cause for thankfulness for the privilege of meeting with the brethren in Philadelphia.

You are aware that those who hold to the Life views are looked upon as semi-infidels by the Orthodox (so called). That stigma, so far as myself has been concerned is removed as follows. There was a protracted meeting held here last winter, in the M. E. Church of which I was formerly a member. My daughter and eldest son, and some of their associates, went forward to the "mourner's bench." When I heard of it, I was desirous to ascertain if they were sincere, therefore visited the meeting. When the prayer-meeting commenced my two children went deliberately forward to be prayed for. I felt and prayed as a father only could feel and pray that his children might view Christ in the proper light. While looking on and praying for them, the pastor of the church came up and very cordially invited me to assist in praying and instructing penitents the way to Christ. The invitation was gladly accepted for two reasons. First, I did not wish my children to be carried away with undue excitement. I wanted them to know what they were doing; what they desired, and the Bible way to obtain it. Second, it was a public acknowledgment of my Christian character, and not the infidel, some asserted me to be. To God be all the praise!

What a sensation there was in the church when I took my old place among the official members, the first time in eleven years. I was requested by them to unite again with them in church-fellowship, "our views would be no obstacle;" but, Br. Storrs, I could not do it. I have a liberty they know not of. I wished to know if could preach what I believed the Bible taught as regards man's nature and destiny, and other kindred views. That was asking too much. If I preach anywhere it must be untrammelled, "Life through Christ for the righteous only," to be conferred at his coming again (without a sin offering) unto eternal life. I will make no compromise with orthodoxy. Yours in the hope of the gospel of Christ, which is true liberty.

FROM A MOTHER IN ISRAEL.

BR. STORRS: I am more and more astonished from day to day while reading the communications of many of those who profess to be looking for the coming and kingdom of God, and our Lord Jesus Christ. Reading to-day in the Hope of Israel a communication from the Herald of the Kingdom on the resurrection of the unjust, I desired of the Lord that He would give me the spirit of forbearance, of long suffering, of gentleness, of brotherly kindness; yes, that charity that thinketh no evil; rejoiceth not in an iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth. Passing over most of the article which has been answered many times with ability and truth, I will notice two remarks, viz.,

Hence the great plea of love and justice which our non-resurrection friends make in behalf of the wicked dead is all uncalled for; it is a great ado about nothing. Why do they not suffer fools gladly, and let us alone? Why do they bring into requisition all the wisdom of their wise ones, and all the arguments from scripture to prove us in the error about nothing?

The other remark is this.

"He that overcometh," says Jesus, "shall not be hurt of the second death." But suppose we do not overcome, what follows? If they who overcome are not hurt of the second death, does it not as a natural and logical sequence follow that those who do not overcome, shall be hurt of the second death?

I will ask you a question. "They that shall be counted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from among dead ones, etc., neither can they die any more, for they are equal unto the angels, and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." But suppose we are not worthy, what follows? does it not as a natural and logical sequence follow, that those that are unworthy will not attain that world, and the resurrection from the dead? It seems to us that every reflecting mind must be able to see the force of this language of Jesus. Again it says, "But if there was no text in the Bible that alluded to the second death, it would still follow as a natural result, that the unjust being restored to life and that life a mortal one"—Stop, my friend, prove that the unjust are restored to life. There is not a passage in the Bible to prove that the wicked are raised to life, not one. You assume it.

I received a Gospel Banner the other day, containing an article by one signing himself "More Anon." I pray God to forgive the brother or sister who sent it, for they know not what they do, if they suppose such reasoning would convince me of error. The writer of the article brings up the case of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the angels that kept not their first estate, then he quotes this passage, "The Lord knoweth how to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished." So he says the angels and the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah are not yet punished; but are reserved, etc. Now Jeremiah the prophet says in his Lamentations, chap. iv., 6, "For the punishment of the iniquity of the daughter of my people, is greater than the punishment of the sin of Sodom, that was overthrown in a moment and no hands stayed on her." Now which shall we believe? I wish "More Anon" would read Lamentations through and see if judgment did not come on that generation to the uttermost, and all the things that were written. What things were written? Please read Deuteronomy chap. xxviii., and see if all the things that were written were not fulfilled? No, their judgment and condemnation did not linger, but came on them in its perfection.

Again they speak of 2 Peter ii., of the deliverance of Noah and Lot, and reserving the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished. Now, Peter says, the condemnation or punishment of Sodom and Gomorrah was an overthrow; and the prophet says, it came in a moment, and no hands stayed on her. Peter says God making them an ensample unto those that after should live ungodly. But chiefly them that walk after the flesh in the lusts of uncleanness, and despise governments. Presumptuous are they, selfwilled; they are not afraid to speak evil of dignities, etc. But these as natural brute beasts made to be taken and destroyed, speak evil of the things they understand not; and shall utterly perish in their own corruption. Yes, in their own corruption; in their corrupt body wherein they have sown to the flesh, not a corrupt body that God shall raise up, as they say. They quote Job xxi., 30, that the wicked is reserved to the day of destruction, they shall be brought to the day of wrath. This they quote to prove their resurrection. Why do they not quote the next two verses? Who shall declare his way to his face? etc.: Yet shall he be brought to the grave, and shall remain in the tomb. Again Job says, "Drought and heat consume the snow waters; so doth the grave those that have sinned." Solomon says, "The man that wandereth out of the way of understanding, shall remain in the congregation of the dead."

I have hardly known where to begin, there is so much proof that the wicked shall not see life, but will utterly perish; and I surely do not know where to stop, unless I wrote the whole Bible; for it is one unbroken chain of evidence that man is dying, mortal, of the dust, and no strength in himself, and under condemnation of the law, for the sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law, and no name given under heaven whereby we can get the victory over death, and have eternal life, but in and through our Lord Jesus Christ, and that by a resurrection from among dead ones.

I was reading in 1 Samuel to-day, Hannah's song. How light, or full of light her song is of the resurrection. She says, "The Lord killeth and maketh alive: he bringeth down to the grave, and bringeth up. The Lord maketh poor, and maketh rich: he bringeth low, and lifteth up. He raiseth up the poor out of the dust, and lifteth up the beggar from the dunghill, to set them among princes, and make them inherit the throne of glory: (O bless the Lord, they will sit down with Jesus in his throne) He will keep the feet of his saints, and the wicked will be silent in darkness."

I feel to-day the same as Luther felt when dwelling on those ecstatic words of Mary the mother of Jesus: "My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour. For He that is mighty hath done to me great things; and holy is his name. He hath showed strength with his arm. He hath put down the mighty from their seats, and exalted them of low degree." No wonder Luther exclaimed, "Oh what boldness of speech in this young virgin! By a single word she brands all the strong with weakness; all the mighty with faintness, all the wise with folly; all those whose name is glorious on earth with disgrace, and casts all strength, all might, all wisdom, all glory, at the feet of God alone. His arm, she says, again—signifying the power by which He acts of himself, without the aid of any of his creatures; that mysterious power which operates in secret and in silence until it has accomplished all his will. Destruction comes when none has marked its approach; deliverance comes when none has dared to look for it. He leaves his children in oppression and misery, so that every one says within himself, they are past all hope: But even then he is strongest; for when man's strength ends, God's strength begins. Only let faith wait upon him. And at another time he suffers his enemies to exalt themselves in pomp and vainglory. He withdraws from them the succor of his strength, and leaves them to be puffed up with their own. He empties them of His own eternal wisdom, and permits them to be inflated with their own wisdom, which is but for a day; and then, when the eyes of their fellow men are dazzled with their greatness, God's arm is lifted up, and lo! the fabric they have been rearing disappears in a moment, like a bubble bursting in the air!"

O my brethren, let us take unto us the whole armor of God, that we may be enabled to stand in this evil day, and though we may be troubled on account of the wickedness of the wicked, yet it is said in God's word, "To you that are troubled rest with us, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with His mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ: who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power; when he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe in that day." "Now may the God of peace, who brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus Christ, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make you perfect, to do His will; working in you that which is well pleasing in His sight; to whom be glory and honor, forever and ever. Amen.

FREDERICKSBURG, IOWA, Oct., 1868.

FROM AN OLD FRIEND.

IOWA, Oct. 16, 1868.

BR. STORRS: I am indeed glad to see how nobly the HERALD has been sustained; and I pray God that its Editor may be spared to us until our King comes. I am nearly sixty-three years old. In 1843 I chanced to get a pamphlet called the Bible Examiner; in which were published Six Sermons by GEO. STORRS. I was at that time almost an infidel; but those sermons opened my eyes, so that I soon began to see men as trees walking. Since then the Bible, and it alone, has been my preacher. In 1862, I think it was, I received a letter from my sister in Pennsylvania, in which she enquired if I took the Bible Examiner. I immediately wrote to her to send me your address. She did so, and I enclosed one dollar for a year's subscription; but instead of the Examiner I received the HERALD OF LIFE; and since that time I have had two preachers of the Gospel of the kingdom of God; in which I hope soon to meet and talk with you face to face.

FROM ELD. W. S. CAMPBELL.

LA CROSSE, WIS., Oct., 18, 1868.

BR. STORRS: We arrived here last night, in a snow storm—having none of "like precious faith" to call upon, that we knew of, we put up at a hotel. As we found "the whole city given to idolatry," we soon found our "spirit stirred within us" to speak the words of eternal life; but the severe storm of wind and snow continuing, it was very difficult to be out, and impossible to obtain a hearing out of doors, as we had hoped. After some fruitless efforts to obtain a place to speak, in the evening we concluded, after the storm abated, to go about in the streets with publications, with which I was well supplied, through your kindness, and into the places which we should find open, that thus we might bear our testimony, and to a degree, at least, discharge our duty to a people with whom providence had ordered thatwe should pass the Lord's day.

We, at first, began in the parlor of the hotel. One Methodist lady, very gladly received the tracts which we offered, for herself, and took some for her neighbors when she should arrive at her destination in Minnesota. She seemed very much interested. Another one, also, very willingly consented to take some, for she had some interest in the subject. Next, we talked with various persons in the saloon of the place, giving them some reading matter, which we believed would be serviceable, and hoped the Lord would bless. From this, we went on: first, into the office of a stable where a gentleman became very much interested in our remarks and took some of the tracts, with seeming concern. He wanted them to read and study at home. The other man was also glad to obtain some written arguments stating the views that we presented.

Well, the next instance of importance was the office of the Northern Packet Line. The gentlemanly agent was happy to see us and talk with us. He wanted the very things that we had, as did another who was in the office. We supplied them. They said that they had been brought up "Hard-shell Baptists," (Who knows, really, what that is?) which we concluded should refer to the doctrine of eternal torment, for they told us that they had renounced that doctrine, and neither of them advocated the Universalist ground. In fact, I concluded that they had known more of our special view than any one would find without questioning. The agent said, he had heard Br. Storrs, and liked the sermon that he delivered, very much. He believed him to be doing a good and noble work. At a later point of time, we returned and visited with him still farther. Then we went to the saloons and places where men were gathered, some being apparently glad to get a tract, while others would ridicule and swear. One man, who came to the door of his place as we passed, said he wanted some of every kind for his children to read; and he remarked that he did not always keep open on Sunday, but had a large family to support, in that way, and felt obliged to sometimes. Even n the miserable condition of a seller of intoxicating liquors he seemed to have a respect for humanity and Christianity, which was certainly a redeeming feature in him. I do not know how many more saloons could have been kept open on Sunday, but there were certainly many.

There were two young men standing by one of the doors who in a very kindly and gentlemanly way talked with us, and wished some of our books. One said he was going back to his home in the country, a few miles off, and would take our publications for his folks and neighbors. The other was manifestly sick of Sunday in that ungodly place.

Now, this expression would sound harshly with many people, no doubt, for this same place is supplied with churches, and people stop their talking upon money and land long enough to attend service once a week.

But the great trouble is the preaching which they have! If the gospel could be given in its purity, men might be led to Christ in truth and be saved.

I have given you a simple story of a poor effort to "redeem the time" that not a fragment of opportunity should be lost.

I feel the preciousness of Christ, and the truth as it is in him.

FROM MARIA MATHEWS WEAVER

DEAR PILGRIMS: We are made glad by the coming of our loved HERALD. I was particularly pleased and edified by reading from Sr. Polly G. Pitts in No. 3. I love to look back to the past and remember God's mercies to me. And when I consider the relationship one human being sustains to another, I feel like saying,

> "How careful, then, ought we to live,
> With what religious fear."

It is a solemn thing to live. It is also a great responsibility for one person to assume the position of TEACHER. How wise such ones need to be—not in this world's wisdom in particular—but in that wisdom which God giveth liberally to all that ask it.

And though we in our ignorance may sometimes teach wrong, yet inquiring multitudes constantly seek instruction as they pass through this strange life and world. And we all are pupils and teachers in our turn. We may not all be public teachers; but we that have little inquisitive souls growing up in our own homes find that it is our place to teach. And how much I fear my teaching may not be correct when any little boy asks about God and his doings. That never neglected "What for, mamma?" often makes me cautious how I teach young minds about the future of humanity.

By the way, my little pupil is exercising on such questions as these, "Who is the devil? Where is he, mamma?" He has heard visitors discussing the question, for although I believe there is a "father" of all devils, yet I have never seen him, and trust I never may.

As to where he is, I cannot tell. If I use my poor weak reason I cannot account for his birth or parentage. And to follow on, I might, by the same kind of reasoning, doubt the existence of God, and settle in the doctrine of "devil" meaning "evil," and "God" meaning "Good," and conclude, hence, all evil is devil, and all good is God. But I let the subject pass as beyond my power of thought, and confess myself unable to tell just when his majesty was born, where he was brought up, or how and where he is spending his latter days. One thing is certain, he cannot live forever, or have a resurrection after death.

We are having meetings again. Have been made glad by the expected removal of Br. Jenks from Florida to Westfield. We bid him welcome, and trust we may all be blessed in our commingling. May we all be kept to the perfect day. Amen.

Westfield, Mass., Oct. 23, 1868.

FROM JAMES AND REBECCA A. HERBERT.

BEAVERDAM, N. J., Oct. 9, 1868.

BR. STORRS: Grace, mercy, and peace be with you, from God the Father and from Christ Jesus our Lord.

May wisdom and strength be given you to guide and sustain you through your cares and trials. We would suggest that you have help; the thing is too heavy for you to bear, because of the infirmities of age. We pray that though you are now so aged, your eye may not be dim, nor your natural force abated, when our Lord shall appear, and yourself be able to say, "Thy pound hath gained ten pounds." We would like to communicate something for your comfort; but feel our inability. We pray you may be spared to us to the end. That your work is among the noblest of earth we know. We see truth advancing all over the world. We know you have been, and still are, very instrumental in spreading it. We praise the Lord. We have good reason to hope we may live to see our LIFE-GIVER appear, with the reward of every one. We sometimes think can we, do we realize fully—that the glorious day of redemption is at hand? and would we be all ready to hail with joy the coming King? Do pray for grace, to divest us of every sinful thing. We look to God, feeling and knowing that all blessings come from him, through Jesus Christ, our LIFE-GIVER; and He will withhold no good thing from them that love him. Praise his dear name. Your brother and sister in hope of immortality.

JACOB HALLMAN, Smyrna, Del., writes: I have distributed all the tracts I received to the best of my judgment: some in this State and some in Maryland. I find the people near all dead to God and alive to this world. As light has no communion with darkness, they seem not to desire the knowledge of God. They rather desire to be led by tradition, the commandments of men. By their traditions they make the word of God of none effect. According to the light God has given me, the world is in an awful condition, in darkness and death. The professed worshipping societies are relapsing into antichristian measures, and there are none who are willing to hear of the coming of Christ as near the door. Our Lord told his followers, when certain signs appeared, "know it is nigh;" then "be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh."

THE NEW WIFE.

MR. —— was a professor of religion and was considered quite a good man. He had the misfortune to lose his wife, who was also pious. Having a large family of children, he found it necessary to marry a second wife. He chose one that had moved in high life, but nearly all of whose relatives rejected the doctrines of evangelical religion.

He did not mean to be irreligious, but he thought too much religion would not please his wife or her friends, and for that reason he neglected family worship and other Christian duties.

A short time after their marriage she said to him: "I thought when I married you, I was marrying a Christian."

"Why, my dear wife, do you doubt my being a Christian?"

"Yes, sir; I do."

"Why, what reason have you to do so?"

"Because, sir, a Christian prays with his family, and you do not."

His reply was: "I thought that the reading of the Bible and prayer would be unpleasant and irksome to one that has been reared under such influences and moved in such a circle as you have."

"Sir, you have nothing to do with all that. Your business is to do your duty as a Christian. It is true, I have moved in such a circle as you have described; but I have been influenced by a different one. I do believe in religion, and I do love to see its professors faithful and consistent."

Her husband said to her: "As it is your wish, I will erect a family altar to-morrow morning."

"Will you wait until morning? We may both of us be in hell before that time."

"Why, my dear wife, are you willing to rise to read the Bible and pray?"

"Certainly I am."

Accordingly they rose and dressed, the husband read a portion of God's word, and knelt in prayer; and when he had prayed, his wife was ready to pray.

The minister was afterward inquiring of this brother how he got along with the family altar. His reply was: "By the grace of God, it has never gone down since my wife and I erected it that night."

"THE LITTLE CORPORAL."

THIS is "an Original Magazine for Boys and Girls, and for older people who have young hearts." "Edited by Alfred L. Sewell and Emily Huntington Miller." "Published by Alfred L. Sewell, Chicago, Ill. Terms $2 per year. Single copy ten cents."

We have received the November number of this magazine. It has been much enlarged. It is neatly executed, and well calculated to interest the young. The Publisher offers the November and December numbers free to those who send $1 for 1869. If you wish such a magazine for your children it is worth while to give it a trial. We have not examined it sufficiently to judge of its theology; but suspect, from a glance over it, that it will be as free from things objectionable as any other like magazine. Its morals, so far as we see, are unexceptional.

Poetry.

Lines on the death of my sister Mrs. F. C. Northrup, who fell asleep in Jesus, September 23, 1868.

By Mrs. E. B., Jamestown, Iowa.

[Sister Northrup was engaged in the mission among the Freed men, in Memphis, Tenn.—Ed.]

She faded with the forest leaves,
She died with summer flowers,
Was garnered ere Autumnal fruits
Were garnered from the bowers.

Dear sister, must I yield to Death
Thy love so fond and true;
Sundered must be as tender ties
As friendship ever knew?

The needy, must they yield her toil
Beneficence and care,
Who now, like her shall cheer their hearts
With counsel kind and prayer?

We stagger at the heavy blow
And vainly look around,
For the blest Father's loving smile
To light the gloom profound.

We upward gaze, till one by one
Each star of hope appears,
Till heavenly beams form rainbow tints
Upon our falling tears.

We sorrowing weep, yet murmur not,
Nor question God's behest,
Though this dear laborer lieth down
Under the elms* to rest.

The mysteries of this providence
We may not now explain,
We know our Father holds the rod
And will not smite in vain.

Since all prophetic rays converge
Into our setting sun,
Well may we for the master toil
Till all His work is done.

Death's conqueror will "quickly come"
And rend the waiting skies,
Watch we and pray, till his glad voice
Shall bid his saints arise.

Children's Department.

A Lesson in Contentment.

"Mamma," whined Lizzie Mills, very fretfully, one hot summer afternoon, "what can I do to amuse myself?"

"Don't you want to take your story books and read a little while?"

"No, indeed, I've read them all over and over."

"Get your paint-box, then, and paint some pictures?"

"O, I'm so sick of my paints. I want some body to play with. Mayn't I take my doll and go to spend the afternoon with Carrie Holt?"

"No, my dear, the sun is too hot, and you were complaining of the headache. I can't let you go visiting."

"You never let me do anything I want to," cried Lizzie, more crossly than ever; "I don't want to stay at home. There's nothing I can do that is pleasant. I think it is real mean that I can't just go across the street to Carrie's house."

"Lizzie, you are in a very bad humor," said her mother. "You must leave the room till you are better natured. Take a book and go to your own room, or into the garden, if you like. But you must not go outside the gate. and you need not return to me till you can speak more pleasantly."

Lizzie left the room very reluctantly, pouting her lips and shrugging her shoulders in a very disagreeable manner. She muttered to herself as she went out of the sitting room that she thought her mother was cross; that nobody cared to amuse her when she was tired, and that this hot weather was hateful anyhow, of all which naughty talk her patient mamma took no notice.

She carried a book with her, but threw it petulantly on the ground, and then sat down on a little seat in the summer-house.

As soon as she was seated her ear caught the sound of a child's voice close by, and she looked up and down the garden walk to see who was talking. There was no one to be seen in the garden, so she concluded it must be some one in the lane. The lane was a pleasant path, which had once been a road, but was no longer used except for foot travel, which ran along at the back of the garden. Instead of a fence there was a thick green hedge which divided the garden from the lane. Two or three fruit trees which stood near the hedge threw a pleasant shade over the grassy lane.

Lizzie got up on the seat of the summer-house and peeped over the hedge. On the other side sat a little girl who looked very hot and tired. She had been carrying a fat baby, which was almost half as large as herself, and had just put him down on the grass and seated herself beside him to rest.

"Is that your little brother?" asked Lizzie, looking down on her.

The little girl looked up to see where the question came from. When she saw Lizzie, she smiled and nodded. "Yes, my baby brother. He can't walk yet."

"Did you carry him here yourself," asked Lizzie.

"O, yes, I take all the care of him. My mother takes in washing, and she is busy all day. The ironing is dreadful hot work this weather. We live only a little way back here, and I brought Johnny out here under the trees where it is cooler, to see if I could not keep him from fretting."

"Is he cross?"

"O no, only when he's not well. I take good care to keep him good tempered. And my mother says if I am good I shall have a new dress, so that I can go to school when the summer is over."

Lizzie looked at the little girl's dress and saw it was a very old patched calico, and that she was barefooted.

"Have you ever been to school?" she asked.

"A part of one term. I couldn't go steadily, because I was needed so much at home. But my mother has taught me some, and I can read now in easy reading. I'm only eight."

"That's just as old as I am," exclaimed Lizzie. "I'm eight, and I've read all my books through. I can read in very long words. I have plenty of books too. Maybe you would like one of them. I have a primer with easy words in it, and if my mother will let me I will give it to you. You wait here while ask her."

Lizzie ran in with a brightened face from which all the wrinkles had disappeared.

"O mamma," she cried, "there is a little girl out in the lane just as old as I. She can only read a little, and she can't go to school till her mother can buy her a dress. May I give her my primer with pictures in it? I don't want it any more. And if you were willing I should like to give her one of my dresses. Hers is all patched and faded out. Please come out and see her, mamma."

Lizzie's mother followed her eager little girl to the garden hedge, and there she found Lizzie's new acquaintance waiting her return.

Mrs. Mills was so pleased with her simple and truthful manners that, going into the house, she made up a nice little bundle for Lizzie to take out to her. There was not only the primer, but a good calico frock of Lizzie's, some shoes, and several other comforable articles.

The child was so delighted that she scarcely knew whether to laugh or cry when Lizzie showed her what she had brought. Lizzie felt no more ill humor that day. She had done a good deed, and made some one happy, so she felt happy and glad herself.

When she kneeled down to pray that night at bed time, her mamma did not fail to remind her how wrong it was for a little girl who had nice books and clothes, and plenty to eat, and kind parents to provide all these things, to scold and fret and complain of her lot. And Lizzie resolved that the contentment and sweet temper of the little girl who was wearily carrying her little baby brother in the warm summer days, should be a lesson to her.—Congregationalist.

"Death is no Punishment."

Often we hear this; and from those even who profess religion, "If death is all the punishment there is, who would serve God?" But such persons, I apprehend, have not learned the first principles of Christianity; have not "tasted of the good word of life, and the powers of the world to come;" do not know what the Gospel is, or what it designs to do for man.

But we inquire, What is death? To this we answer, It is the opposite of life. In life we have thought; in death the thoughts perish. In life we have knowledge and understanding; in death "there is no knowledge or wisdom or device;" "the dead know not anything." In life there is remembrance, there is love, and joy; in death the five senses cease their functions, there is no remembrance, love, joy, or envy; "a land of darkness, a land of forgetfulness." Death, in its primary and abstract meaning, is being cut off from life, blotted out, exterpated, come to nothing, to be as though we had not been. Is this no punishment, to be deprived of all which God has promised, of everlasting life in his kingdom, when the earth is filled with his glory, where there are pleasures forevermore, when there shall be no more pain, or sorrow, or crying; exempt from the liability to die?

But some say, "There must be conscious suffering, or there is no punishment." We ask, Is suffering the punishment of God's moral law? We know that pain attends the violation of the physical laws of our being, and conscience may trouble us, while in this life, when we violate His moral law; but that is often "seared as with a hot iron," and so the sentence is out, "The wages of sin is death;" "sin when it is finished bringeth forth death."

Again, "Do not the righteous die as well as the wicked?" not in the sense the wicked die, if I rightly understand the scriptures. Let us read a little. "When a wicked man dieth, his expectation shall perish; and the hope of unjust men perisheth." "The hope of the righteous shall be gladness; but the expectation of the wicked shall perish." "The wicked are driven away in their wickedness; but the righteous hath hope in his death." "To him that is joined to all the living there is hope." "Blessed is the man that trusteh in the Lord, and whose hope the Lord is."

Our Lord Jesus Christ hath said, "I am the way, the truth, and the life." "I am he that liveth and was dead, and behold I am alive for ever more." He then is the true and living vine, to whom if we be joined (joined to all the living) we have "hope." The wicked man not being united to this vine, in death his hope and expectations perish. He must be in the same condition as if there had been no Christ; and if Christ has not been raised from the dead our faith is vain; we are in our sins; and they which are fallen asleep in Christ are also perished. Jesus saith, "Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness, and are dead. This is the bread which cometh down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof and not die."

How not die? Why, not as your fathers in the wilderness are dead. "God is not the God of the dead;" but, He is the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; therefore Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob must live again. "He is not the God of the dead who never live again;" a very different relation. The Sadducees understood this, and "durst not ask him any questions at all." He says again, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, if a man keep my sayings he shall never see death." This must be taken in its literal, abstract meaning; not that the saint will not sleep in death; for death when applied to the rihgteous is termed a sleep, and thus our Saviour used it when he he said "Lazarus sleepeth;" and after says, "plainly Laazarus is dead." Also, "The maid is not dead, but sleepeth; and they laughed him to scorn, knowing that she was dead." Many do the same now when we tell them that death to the righteous is but a sleep. The believer's "life is hid with Christ in God." The unbeliever has no life hid with Christ. Sleep, when applied to the wicked has qualifications; thus: "Sleep a perpetual sleep, and not awake, saith the Lord."

Here let me present a few notes from the Cottage Bible on 1 Thess. iv., 13–18, showing what was the mind of this writer, that death to the righteous is but a sleep. He says, "The apostle meets an objection which seems to have troubled the weaker brethren, who indulged excessive grief, like the heathen, for some of their deceased friends. Death must be terrible indeed to those who have no hope beyond the grave. Well might they wail and howl over their departed friends. But with the disciples of Jesus the case is far otherwise. Those who die in Jesus do but sleep; and when he returns in glory, he will bring his departed saints with him; for he shall descend from heaven in great and awful glory, and a voice no less powerful than that which said, Let there be light, and light was, shall command the dead to rise. But the dead in Christ (we are told) shall rise first, and then those who believe in him on earth shall be changed and their rarified bodies (so to speak) shall be caught up to meet their descending Saviour; and so shall they be 'forever with the Lord." Well is it added "Comfort one another with these words." He then quotes from Watts:

"Yes, faith shall triumph o'er the grave,
And trample on the tombs:
My Jesus, my Redeemer lives;
My God, my Saviour comes!"

Yes, faith in Jesus Christ is our only hope. Death without this hope must be the greatest punishment that can be inflicted. To a thinking mind it is most awful. Blotted out; lost, lost; eternally no more.

I cannot close without referring again to the hope. A ransom has been made; God's love has been extended; His only begotten Son has been manifested; whosoever believeth in him shall not perish." "Because I live ye shall live also." "I will not leave you comfortless, but I will come again." With this hope who can say, Death is no punishment?

Two Thousand Three Hundred Days: Dan. viii., 14.

It has been attempted by several writers among Adventists to show the ending of the above-named period in A. D. 1875. The entire argument, so far as its validity is concerned, depends on whether these men have got the starting point right. They say that this period starts with the pushing of the ram, as brought to view verse 4. The event designated by this pushing, it is claimed, transpired at a point before our A. D., which they definitely state. But is their data reliable? This depends, in a measure, at least, upon how they obtain it. What is their means of getting at this date? First, they attempt to show by an astronomical calculation that the long reverenced Canon of Ptolemy is not only unreliable, but entirely fictitious, in its attempt to fix dates.

When we look over the list of very learned and pious men in the past who have relied with implicit confidence on the above-named canon, we must say that on this point we are compelled to look with large suspicion upon the deductions of these modern astronomers. (?) But again: the date which they give for the commencement of this long period depends absolutely and entirely on the above-named astronomical calculation. The strong argument which they urge in proof that the definite time for the ending of the prophetic periods given in Daniel and elsewhere, is to be known by the church is this, "The wise shall understand." Dan. xii., 10. It strikes us very forcibly that if the only means by which the church of this day is to know the definite time for the ending of these periods is the above cited astronomical calculation, or any other arrangement of astronomical events, the number of "the wise" will be almost indefinitely small. Neither the members of the Advent church, nor any other church, are astronomers in any sense whatever. This view of the subject, alone, is sufficient to condemn the whole system. But again, let us look at the view taken of "the pushing" of this ram. These men say that this prophecy was fulfilled when, at the instigation of Haman the Agagite, King Ahasueras decreed the death of all the Jews in the Medo-Persian empire. Is this position tenable?

First. The ram was to push westward, northward, and southward. Second, No beast was to stand before him. Third, Neither was there any that could deliver out of his hand.

Fourth, He did according to his will.

Fifth, Therefore, in consequence of all that is named above, the Ram became great. Not one of the above named features of the prophecy was fulfilled by the decree against the Jews. First, It was the ram that was to push. The ram, so the angel says, is the kingdom of Media and Persia. The pushing must therefore necessarily be against something outside of this empire. The Jews were not only all in the empire, but a part of the empire. And indeed some of the most important offices of empire were held by the Jews. If this was the only fault with this exposition, this is fatal to its correctness. But, second, as the result of its pushing, no beast was to stand before him. Now if by some curious exposition, more ingenious than wise, beast here is made to mean the Jews, it does not help this theory in the least. The Jews did stand before him, and not one of them was harmed by this decree in the smallest degree. Third, Neither was there any that could deliver out of his hand. Every Jew in the empire was delivered out of his hand with not one exception, through the intercession of Esther, the Jewish queen. Fourth, He did according to his will. In his attempt on the life of the Jews, the ram positively did not do according to his will. His purpose was absolutely defeated. Fifth, Therefore he became great. Instead of the empire being increased in greatness by this affair, it was greatly humiliated. See the account in the Book of Esther. It seems to us that a starting point builded on so flimsy a basis as the above, is too weak to at all interest men who possess "the spirit of a sound mind." If this is all that is left of the time argument of these men, we think the wisest course would be to give it up.

Christian Fruitfulness.

The whole force of the allegory of the Vine and the Branches is fruit. The vine is planted for this; for this only it is watered, nourished, and pruned. If the want were shade, strength, or beauty, then the tree, the shrub, or the flower would be chosen, but this is selected for the rich clusters of luscious, life giving, life-cheering grapes which it bears. Hence, if there be no fruit, there is no use and but little beauty, and the branch—for it cannot be spared for what slight grace it possesses—is cut off and withered, and is burned. Such is the use of the Christian, that he may bring forth "the peaceable fruits of righteousness." He is God's workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works. Not to philosophy, systems of politics or physics—not to ideas whether in prose or poetry, except subordinately—is he called; but to holiness, the possession and manifestation of the power of the Gospel in holy tempers and acts.

If the Gospel is offered to the world as the highest exhibition of the wisdom, love, and power of God, its claim to be thus regarded in the estimation of mankind must rest upon its effects as seen in its adherents. Fruit is the test of systems. This is the law of modern experimental philosophy; the mind is educated to it, and can accept no other. Honor can be conceded to Christianity, and, through it, to the infinite Father who originated it, only as it renders believers morally and spiritually better than unbelievers. For believers in Christ to increase in intellectual acquirements, to grow in worldly acquisitions, to advance in the multiplication of their social and political rights, is well, but not enough. In all these respects, men have grown and may grow again without Christianity; they must be "rich in good works," in those dispositions and deeds which spring distinctively from the Spirit of Christ, and overtop in their sweep and majesty all the creations of natural impulse. The fruit which the Gospel produces, while much of it will resemble the products of natural goodness, must yet be marked in most of its attributes as essentially Christian in origin; and its tendency must be to direct the mind of the beholder exclusively to God as its author. Thus, the appreciation of the fruit will reflect upon the husbandman, and God will be glorified. The gardener does not point to the thickness of the vine and the luxuriance of the branches as the vindication of his skill and care, but to the quantity and quality of the fruit.

In addition to the evidence which a large spiritual fruitfulness affords to the real discipleship of a Christian, it should not be forgotten that a constant growth is necessary to establish the believer. He will be confirmed in discipleship in proportion as he finds in himself the proper fruits of the new life. The apostles wrought miracles by faith, and then believed all the more firmly because of the miracles. The reflex influence of the productive working of any principle upon itself is one of the clearest laws of God. Life is nourished by the very activities to which it instinctively leads. "Seest thou how faith wrought with his works, and by works was faith made perfect?" A Christian can have entire confidence either in his own experience or in the Gospel, only as he possesses the fruit of the Spirit in his heart and life. And as he finds the virtues of the Spirit enlarging will he be confirmed in the verity of both. Prayer, for example, is a fruit of the Holy Ghost, as no man can truly pray who does not do so in the Spirit. "For we know not what to pray for as we ought, but the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered." When one prays, and the answer is given in the sweet assurance of divine acceptance, in an abiding sense of free and joyous moral power, in an additional readiness and unction in talking of the things of God and working for his glory, how the faith is quickened! Consequently where a man of prayer is found, there is invariably to be seen a Christian who neither questions his own discipleship nor the reality of the Master whom he follows.

He, then, is most the disciple of Jesus, both for others and himself, who is the best and does the best. Doing good out of a full and a loving heart is the measure of a Christian. To gauge the discipleship of any believer, it is not so necessary to inquire for his creed or his church as to ask if he bring forth much fruit. If the life be holy and increasingly useful, he is abiding in Christ and going on to perfection! he a true branch as certainly as Christ is the true Vine. This is all that need concern the believer—to be growing in fruitfulness. No man would take care of his health by dropping his hands and nursing his his heart. The Christian will promote his vital power, not by manipulating his faith, but by the obedience to which it impels.—The Methodist.

Br. Storrs: I still hold on to the truth of No life out of Christ, and no future life but by a resurrection of the body in the likeness of Christ. I acknowledge I have made slow progress to arive at this blessed truth; but it more than pays for all my past fears. I can now see such beauty and sublimity in the word of God that I feel like standing on a rock. How plain and clear many passages of Scripture now appear which once were dark and perplexing. I have just obtained a copy of "Barns on the Psalms," which I have perused with some interest, and I find although he is firmly wedded to the doctrine of the soul's existence separate from the body, yet he gives us, in his remarks, what has been the opinion of good men, in past ages in many points, so we can gather much valuable information by a study of his book. I notice in the first Psalm where the contrast between the righteous and the wicked is so boldly drawn by the sacred writer, the one "his inheritance shall be forever," the other shall perish; in his comments on verse 5, he tells us, the Septuagint and Vulgate render it, the wicked "shall not rise in the judgment, nor sinners in the congregation of the righteous." I see my copy of the Douay Bible so renders it. He also says the Chaldia Paraphrase renders it, "in the great day;" "understanding the day of judgment; and most Jewish interpreters understood in that manner." How plain and beautiful is the word when stripped of human tradition. On Psa. ix., 17, his comments are very good. "The wicked shall be turned back to hell with all the nations that forget God."

I will relate a little incident that occurred several years ago. Mr. Wise, a learned Jewish Rabbi, lived in this city. I visited him to get some information on the Scriptures. He told me that a few days previous he was called on by Allen Steel, a prominent preacher among the Methodists, and wished the Rabbi to give him a literal translation of verse 17 Psalm ix. It appeared that the preacher had got into a controversy with a Mr. Britton, a Universalist preacher holding forth in Green street. Mr. Steel being hard pressed by Mr. B. sought knowledge of Mr. Wise. He told Mr. Steel that his English version did not convey the correct meaning. It should be rendered "the wicked shall return to hell with all the nations that forget God;" as if, said Mr. Wise, he should come out of that door, walk around, return and shut the door; pointing to the door of a dwelling across the street. This happened while I believed in the conscious state of the dead and eternal torment of the wicked. I went home thoughtful. I trust the good Methodist Elder did.

Now, in the light of other Scriptures, how plain that they never shall see life. Psalms xvi., 9, 10. Barnes, in his comments, tells us on the word "my flesh also shall rest in hope; for thou wilt not leave my soul in hell," etc., Peter refers it to Christ, and no doubt justly. Mr. Barnes says, it is equivalent to saying "When I die I shall lie down in the grave in hope or confidence, not of despair; I shall expect to rise and live again." He says, language of this kind occurs elsewhere in the Old Testament, showing that the doctrine of the resurrection of the body was one to which the sacred writers were not strangers. I consider the testimony coming from such a source as Mr. Barnes of the greatest importance at this time, when that great crowning truth of the gospel, the light from God's word is so covered up with the doctrines of men. On Psa. xvii., 15, "As for me I will behold thy face in righteousness; I shall be satisfied when I awake with thy likeness," he says, "This is language which would be employed only by one who believed in the resurrection of the dead, and who was accustomed to speak of death as a sleep—a calm repose in the hope of awakening to a new life."

I pass over some interesting texts till we come to Psalm xxiii., "That nightingale of all the Psalms;" "The Lord is my shepherd," etc., on verse 3, "He restoreth my soul," literally "He causes my life to return." In view of this fact, we can see clearly what made the writer of this beautiful Psalm have such confidence while surrounded by, and in the presence of, his enemies. It was that "his life would be restored" though he walked through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me. Thou preparest a table for me in the presence of mine enemies; thou annointest my head with oil, my cup runneth over. Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life, and I will dwell in the house of the Lord forever.

To me these words are unutterably precious when I reflect that the people of God were animated and cheered while on their pilgrimage with the same blessed hope of a resurrection of the body, a "giving me back my life," although we are called to pass through the valley of death's shadow, yet we have this strong confidence, we shall yet dwell in the house of the Lord forever.

BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail, the postage has to be pre-paid.

Six Sermons on the Inquiry. Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the true teachings of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an in valuable help to understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.

No. 1. Earth, not Heaven, is to be the inheritance of the saints. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 4. The Soul Saved or Lost. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 5. Moral Depravity; by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 7. Doom of the Ungodly; or The Wicked Dead remain eternally under death's dominion. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 8. The Wages of Sin; by a Presbyterian Clergy man. Price, 5 cents.

No. 10. Letters to a Clergyman; or Life only through Christ not a heresy; by Dr. J. K. Finley, Pittsburg, Pa. Price 5 cents.

The foregoing tracts are 16 pages octavo. They will be sold at $3 per 100, or, fifty cents per dozen, free of postage.

No. 9. The Essential Baptism; by the Editor of the Bible Examiner, 32 pages. Price 7 cents.

Man's Nature and Destiny; or the Animal Man and the Spiritual Man. A Sermon by Geo Storrs. Price 5 cents.

The Atonement, by Geo. Storrs, and The Gospel Hope, by the same; both works now printed in one Tract. Price 5 cents.

IS PROPHECY CONDITIONAL?

BY SAMUEL MASON.

BR. STORRS: I agree with you in saying, that it would be best to say little on this question, if there is a possibility of its causing division. If some of our brethren that are strong and have got the spirit of Jesus, will take hold and discuss the question, the object to elicit truth, I should be very much pleased to see the question thoroughly investigated. As to myself I don't feel competent to the task. Have we not some with us that are capable? I believe that we have many. Then let it be done in the spirit of Jesus.

Allow me to say a little more before I leave the question to better pens than my own. Am I to understand you to say that there is no such thing as conditional prophecy? "Prophecy," you say, "is history foreseen; and is just as true of the future as the history of the past." That I allow to a certain extent, "Prophecy foretold of Babylon's overthrow centuries before the event. The event was just as certain when the prophecy was uttered as it is to-day." But what if Babylon had repented? Hark! the Lord speaketh by Jeremiah, "At what instant I shall speak concerning a nation, and concerning a kingdom, to pluck up, and to pull down, and to destroy it, if that nation against whom I have pronounced, turn from their evil, I will repent of the evil that I thought to do unto them." Jer. xviii., 7. 8.

Again, "the word of the Lord came unto Jonah" and bid him "go to Nineveh that great city, and cry against it, for their wickedness is come up before me." Jonah refused to go knowing that the Lord was merciful, and if the Ninevites repented and turned from their evil, that the Lord would repent of the evil that he thought to do unto them. The Lord called Jonah the second time. He obeyed this time, and when he began to enter into the city he cried, and said, "Yet forty days and Nineveh shall be overthrown." No condition mentioned. "So the people of Nineveh believed God, and proclaimed a fast and put on sackcloth, from the greatest of them even to the least of them." "And God saw their works, that they turned from their evil ways, and God repented of the evil that he had said that he would do unto them, and he did it not." Would he not have spared Babylon had she repented as Nineveh? Yea, verily.

Now let me call your attention to another prophecy, which is conditional, but the condition is not mentioned, and show that the prophecy was not fulfilled. "Therefore shall Zion for your sake be ploughed as a field, and Jerusalem shall become heaps, and the mountain of the house as the high place of the forest." Micah iii., 12. Now turn to Jer. xxvi., 18, and we see that the same prophecy is spoken of, and ver. 19 it is stated that the Lord repented of the evil because the king repented. If this is not conditional prophecy then I fail to understand what can be conditional.

I must come to the conclusion that all God's promises of favor are conditional, being made primarily to character, and in the absolute sense to character alone. So far as persons are concerned, they are all conditioned upon the continued maintenance of the specified character to which the promise is made. This is expressly testified by Jehovah himself. Were it otherwise God would be a respecter of persons, and not of character, contrary to his own most explicit and repeated declarations. And even if the scripture testimony were not as pointed on this subject as it is, it would follow necessarily from the fact that God is the moral governor of the universe; and that as such he is compelled by the very perfections of his nature to treat moral agents in harmony with their moral character.

The Jews very generally misinterpreted God's promises in this respect. They interpreted them all as being made unconditionally to Abraham, and to his fleshly seed. Hence when they were threatened with the wrath of God for their sins, their ready reply was that God's promises could not fail, and they themselves were the special heirs of those promises. To correct this delusion Jehovah sent them message after message by the prophets. Witness the passage in Ezek. xxxiii., 13, also the parable of the potter, Jer. xviii., 1–10, explained by Jehovah himself in direct disproval of unconditional election, and to convince the Jews that if they did not obey his voice he would withhold the promised blessings.

In order to see the faithfulness of God, we have only to cast our eyes to the history of the Jews, a history which shows how the Lord has rewarded both the obedience of his friends and the disobedience of his enemies.

In the Pentateuch, in which we have the history of the Israelites from their descent into Egypt to the death of Moses, we learn that when the time of the promise drew nigh, when God was to deliver his people from servitude, that he sent Moses to lead his people out of Egypt.

Moses encouraged them with the fact that God was about to give them the land of Canaan, "the lot of their inheritance." They came out of Egypt according to the promise which God made to Abraham, with "a mighty hand and an outstretched arm," all in expectation and joy. But what a sequel!

Those very persons who had seen the wonders which were wrought by the power of God, and had received the promise of entering the land of Canaan, were called upon to listen to the awful declaration of Jehovah, "Your carcasses shall fall in the wilderness; and all that were numbered of you, according to your whole number, from twenty years old and upward, which have murmured against me, doubtless ye shall not come into the land concerning which I sware to make you dwell therein, save Caleb the son of Jephunneh, and Joshua the son of Nun."

The apostle, in his comment on this, gives us the reason why the Lord deprived them of going into the land, he says, "So we see they could not enter in because of unbelief."

This teaches us that the fact of their being the natural descendants of Abraham was not a sufficient title to the land of promise. Faith, the great characteristic, was wanting, hence their expectations were blasted.

After the death of the great multitude, Joshua brought the remnant of the Israelites into the land, drove out the nations in part, and gave directions in relation to the division of the land among the tribes. Just before his death he charged them to serve the Lord faithfully, for on the conditions, viz., faith and obedience, depended their prosperity, but if they forsook the Lord and served strange gods, then, said he, will the Lord "turn and do you hurt and consume you after that he hath done you good."

In the subsequent history of this people we have a verification of the words of Joshua. We read in Judges that "the children of Israel did evil in the sight of the Lord, and he sold them into the hand of the King of Mesopotamia and they served him eight years.

But the Lord, who is as faithful in fulfilling his promises as his threatenings, did, when they repented and "cried unto the Lord," send a deliverer. Again they sinned, and he gave them unto the hand of the King of Moab for eighteen years; then they repented, and he delivered them again.

Thus during the Judges the Israelites were in servitude to the surrounding nations no less than six times. This evil was brought upon them because they sinned against the Lord and broke the covenant; and in no instance did the Lord ever deliver them until they heartily repented and confessed their sins.

The above is respectfully submitted by your Br. in Christ.

"THIS DAY AND TO-DAY."

BR. STORRS: Reading the article "This Day and To-day," in HERALD, 21st October, suggests the following quotation from Judge Halsted's "Theology of the Bible." W. S. O.

In Luke xxiii., 43, we have, Gr., And said to him Jesus: Verily, I say to thee, this day with me thou wilt be in to paradeiso, in garden [without our article]: Lat., in paradiso, garden: Douay, in paradise; Ital., in paradiso; E. V., in paradise. The Ital., the Douay, and E. V. give their respective words, in paradiso [in garden,] in paradise, without the article. This is right, for garden is here used in an abstract sense, not of any particular garden: so when Jesus saith, "thou wilt be be with me in garden," it means, with me in burial; i. e., in a grave from which thou wilt be raised to life again; from which thou wilt be made a partaker of resurrection, equivalent to "the bosom of Abraham" in another place, meaning the same thing, a grave from which there will be a resurrection. . . . .

We have seen the Heb. gn, for which Gr. gives, sometimes paradeisos and sometimes kepos, used in connection with burial, as in 2 Kings, xxi., 18 and 26. And in John xix., 41, we are told, Gr., There was, however, without topos, space, region, tract of country, where he was crucified (a) kepos, and in that kepos (a) mnemeion, new, etc., v. 42. There, therefore, on account of the preparation of the Jews, because close by was that mnemeion, they put, or laid Jesus.

We thus see that among the Jews it was customary to bury in paradeisois, paradises, to use our Anglo-Greek word, i. e., in gardens. Observe in "the Union Bible Dictionary, prepared for the American Sunday School Union," these remarks: "Certain places were appropriated by the Jews for the purpose of burying the dead. They were usually in gardens," citing the verses above given from 2 Kings, and John.

We now see that Jesus' words to the thief on the cross, "with me thou wilt be in paradeisois," garden, means with me thou wilt be in burial; in contradistinction to what is said of the wicked in Job xxvii., 15; Heb. . . . . in death hrb, shall be dried up, wasted: Gr., in death telentesousi, shall be ended, concluded, finished: Lat., shall be buried in interitu, extinction: Ital., shall be buried in death itself; Douay and E. V., shall be buried in death. . . . .

Any one who has gone through with the word gn, the word always used in the Hebrew Scriptures, and the different words given for it in the Gr., Lat. Douay, Ital. and E. V., respectively, cannot fail to see how simple and rational is the phrase, "in garden with me."

HARTFORD, CONN.

DIALOGUE ON HEZEKIAH'S SICKNESS.

ISAIAH XXXVIII.

D.—Let us read the thirty-eighth chapter of Isaiah. . . . Do you think, cousin, that Hezekiah was a good and pious man.

O.—Oh yes, doubtless! but why do you ask such a question?

D.—We will come to that presently. Do you think this good man would have gone to heaven if he had died in his sickness?

O.—Yes, of course; all good people go to heaven when they die.

D.—Then can you tell me why he felt so bad, and made such a blubbering, when told by the Prophet he would die, and not live?

O.—I do not know—I suppose many good people are afraid of death; it is natural for us all to cling to life, and shudder at the thought of death; especially when we think he is near at hand.

D.—But suppose Hezekiah has given us a reason why he wished to live a little longer—would not this remove any doubt on the subject? do you think it would clear up the matter a little?

O.—I suppose so—but I do not recollect that he has given any particular reason for his wishing to live.

D.—Has he not done so in verses 18 and 19, where he expresses a wish to praise God, and more than implies that the dead cannot do this? If he was going to heaven, could he not praise God better than ever he could by remaining on earth?

O.—There is something about this, I confess, I cannot understand, and I never met with any one who could explain it to my satisfaction. But I have always been taught, from infancy, that good people go to heaven when they die, and there unite in immortal songs of praise and thanksgiving to him who had given them the victory. The immortal soul, freed from its cumbrous tenement of clay can then praise God without satiety or need of rest.

D.—You and your teachers, my good cousin, strangely differ with King Hezekiah on this important subject, the very foundation of the believer's hope. He praised God for saving his soul from the pit of corruption (the grave), v. 17; and declares that death cannot celebrate His praise—that they that go down to the pit cannot ever hope for thy truth. In short, as the Psalmist says, "in that very day" (the day of death) "their thoughts perish." How can you reconcile such passages of scripture as these with your too fondly cherished theory, of "death being the gate to endless joy? Is not this giving death the glory due only to Christ, the giver of life?

O.—It is, to me, a very gloomy idea, the unconscious state of the dead, that you hold. It would be hard to convince me of its truth. Death has terrors enough for me, without adding tenfold to their number. He would then be indeed "the king of terrors," instead of the messenger of peace. I would rather not have my mind disturbed on this subject, if you please we will drop it, as I do not consider it of importance enough to occupy so much time and attention.

D.—Well, as you will, cousin, I am sorry you feel as you do, but it is useless to try to convince any one against his will. I will only add, that the death penalty of sin was never meant to be pleasant or agreeable. In spite of all creeds, he is "the king of terrors" still. And you, I doubt not, with all your hopes of heaven at death, will keep him at bay as long as you can; and will willingly swallow the most noxious medicines, and pay the doctors all that you have, to keep you out of heaven a little longer. So that in practice, though not in theory, you will be like the good old king. For my part, my only hope of a future life is by a resurrection from the dead, when Christ shall come to conquer the last enemy, and give his people immortal life in his kingdom yet to come, for which we daily pray. JOSEPH PARRY.

SANDY HILL, N. Y., Oct., 1868.

DUBUQUE, IOWA, OCT. 23, 1868.

BR. STORRS: Finding difficulties in the way of going up the river, and having no time for delay, I concluded to visit this place, and if any possible opening should arise, do something on the great theme of Life only in Christ. I have not been able to speak in any place as yet, but have been doing something in the way of talking and giving some of the precious light by way of our publications. Many people seem glad to talk with me, and if I had means to go forward and obtain a place to hold meetings in, I should doubtless obtain a good hearing in public.

The truth is good, and I feel that with our view of the power and position of Christ in our salvation, it is complete. People may talk about the "plan of redemption" as much as they will, giving Christ a mere secondary place, as they do when they claim that he only brought man back to the life that Adam lost, this being supposed the "justification of life," as taught by Paul; yet with me the case stands in altogether a different light. Adam, first in time, can never be first in position. Man can never save himself from his moral degradation. Mere repentance will not do it. Believing in Christ brings the life of Christ to us, and within us, if it does any good for the future; then we have another life from that which Adam had; a life by Christ. Then it is not Adam's life. So that Christ will either do all for us, so far as the living in the future is concerned, or he will do nothing. He will not take one to help him, and that one a creature in whom there is no help. He will not divide the labor, for it is divine, and the effect is one and divine. God laid help on one. He is mighty! He will prove abundantly equal to the task of bringing out the life of the gospel for man.

Thus the gospel is a saviuor of life unto life or of death unto death. If man is brought back to life by the simple justice of God, and then must take care of himself, how does he secure, by the grace of God, eternal life, in the Son? but by the justice of God rather, he would secure it in Adam.

But Christ is the Author and the finisher of our faith; and so while Abraham is the father of the faithful, he is not at all the father of faith. Christ is different from Abraham by just so much that he was in righteousness that he might exhibit faith, become the author of it. Abraham was in faith (the gift of God) that he might be righteous; so his faith was counted for righteousness. But Christ's righteousness produced faith. Adam had neither. And because he had lost his righteousness and faith, could not come. Till the righteousness of another was revealed, he had no life or ground of life. Will the second Adam merely act for the first to do what he should have done? and bring the results that should have appeared in and through him, still failing to bring out the "power of an endless life," which the Father hath given him, and which, as our high priest, he is to demonstrate?

The word makes Adam of the earth, earthly. A mortal man. His life a mortal life. The second Adam is the Lord from heaven, heavenly. The life, then, must be a heavenly life; not a mortal one. Now it is said that Christ brings back the life which Adam lost. That would be to make men like the first Adam. Adam was given to do that. He begat a Son in his own likeness, and only in that. Christ will make men like himself, if they are born of him and by him. As is the second Adam, so must they be who are born of him. He was given for that. The earthly, the mortal is in the first. The heavenly, the immortal in the second, but whose position is before all things. Hence, the life which he gives is as far above that which Adam was to give as immortality is beyond mortality—or, as eternity transcends time. IT IS LIFE.

MY FIRST ACQUAINTANCE WITH HIM.

I WAS soundly sleeping in a tavern at Tom's River when I was suddenly awaked, before daylight, to take the stage to Manchester, from thence, the cars to New York, and on to Newark. I immediately arose; crossed the street and entered the stage-tavern and took my ticket to New York. The inn-keeper asked if I would take breakfast, and, answering in the affirmative, I was shown into the dining-room, where I found a table bountifully supplied, at one side of which I was soon seated, exactly opposite to a gentleman stranger. He enquired how far I was journeying. I told him, to Newark. "Ah," he said, "I belong to Newark, and am going directly home, and shall be glad of your company." I also expressed my pleasure in having his company on the way; for I had, almost at sight, taken him to be a minister, (orthodox of course) and intended to give him battle on the way, upon the immortality of the soul. But I was anxious to know first whether he was a minister or not. And soon, in our conversation, a favorable opportunity presented itself, which I improved by saying, you are a clergyman, then, I suppose, are you not?

I shall never forget that easy and affable smile of queer delight that played upon his countenance, as he looked up and said, "No, sir. What makes you take me for a clergyman?" A little embarrassed, I replied, merely from your appearance, sir; but he continued, "I am not a clergyman, but I took you to be a clergyman as soon as you entered the room: are you not one, or am I also mistaken?" To this I replied, I do indeed frequently officiate as such in the room of a better one: and then added; though you are not a clergyman I suppose you have your opinion of religion. "Certainly," said he, "religion itself is good, but dreadfully corrupted by the opinions of men. It is all plain, and easily understood, if we only begin right. If we set out from the right starting point, and start right, we shall go right all the way through. But if we start wrong we shall go wrong all the way." On hearing this; the reader way better judge of my surprise than I can express it: for it is precisely the same sentiment I advanced in nearly the same words, in my dialogue, "The Narrow Escape," and my first impression was, that he borrowed it from that work; (but I presume not,) which locates the starting point in Eden, and what the serpent said to the woman; but still thought he did not intend to start from that point himself; so I said to him, Where and what do you think that starting point is? He readily replied, "O, back in Eden. The Lord God said to the human pair, if they eat of the forbidden tree, they should 'surely die.' But the serpent said, they should not surely die. And most clergymen tell us, man has an immortal soul that never dies. And now if we take this position, the whole theory of religion goes wrong."

Surprised and delighted, I exclaimed, that is just my opinion, sir: and what I have been preaching for years. "Why, really," said he, "then we are of one mind on the subject!" yes, and we were no longer strangers to each other.

This superseded the necessity of having any controvercy on the way, and, to tell the truth, I was not sorry; for I perceived that he was none of the underbrush; and if I pitched into him, as I certainly should, I was afraid I should find him a hard customer to deal with, though I should have the right, side of the question; so I had moored up my little horns for a sharp conflict: but thank the Lord, it was all over before it began. But a pleasant conversation was kept up between us from that table until we parted in Broad street, in Newark, but which I shall not attempt to lay before the reader. Suffice it to say, that instead of my having an orthodox ape to lead into the truth, as I expected, I soon found that I, myself, was but an ape in his hands, to be lead further into the truth than I ever was before.

In the course of our journey, he informed me of a work on theology, at that time an unfinished manuscript, intended for publication; and he asked me if I thought any editor of our persuasion would advertise it. I told him, I thought any of them would; and referred him to Br. Geo. Storrs.

The work has since been published, bearing the title, "THE THEOLOGY OF THE BIBLE," and is before the public doing much good. May the blessings of God follow it wherever it goes, and may it go to the ends of the earth. And my travelling companion, whom I first met at the breakfast table, and took to be a hard shelled orthodox, turned out to be its very able author, the Hon. O. S. HALSTED. May the blessings of God rest upon him, enabling him to live to do good until the LIFE-GIVER comes to reward him with eternal life and glory. Z. CAMPBELL.

TAKE AWAY THE STONE.

JUST where divine agency and human agency meet, in the individual life and in the life of the world, we may not know. That they have beautiful correlation in all right activity, is out of doubt. They go together.

God is, indeed, the source of all power as of all life. But in the work of the world, man is to be recognized as, in a sense, a force by himself, with power of choice not only, but of achievement.

Man's power is limited. God's is unlimited. Yet infinite as the power of God is, He consents to circumscribe its use. His concession of power to man is a kind of limitation upon himself. The sphere of human agency is sacred to humanity. God does not, will not, enter the realm where His creatures have work to do and are delegated with power to it, and perform that work himself. His almightiness supplements our agency, never takes its place.

Do Christians understand this? Does the Church understand it? Work out your own salvation, for it is God that worketh in you. We know something of that. Work out your brother's salvation; for it is God that worketh with you. Do we know just the reach and significance of that?

"Take ye away the stone," said Jesus, at the grave of Lazarus. Why? Was the stone in his way? Could not a word of his have jostled it out of its place? Could not his potent voice have summoned Lazarus through that ribbed rock as easily as through the open door? Yes. But human agency could take away that stone. It needed divine, to raise the dead. So man must open the sepulchre. God emptied it.

The world is full of sepulchres. And the dead are there. Oh! the dead! the dead! they are on every side of us. They are in our homes, at our places of business, in our circles of friendship and acquaintance. The spiritually dead—the dead in trespasses and sins—dead souls. Who doubts that Christ, by his omnific word, could raise these dead, and give them deed of resurrection and life, without wish or will or deed of ours. Yet who believes he ever will!

We must send urgent message to him, and put our hearts in it, as Mary and Martha did. We must tell him our Lazarus dead. Unless he come, in answer to our loving and trustful solicitation, and stand at the door of these sepulchres, the dead will never come forth.

Is he not here? Is he not walking in the midst of the golden candlesticks to-day? Do not the churches hear the foot-fall of the Redeemer, come in the greatness of his strength, mighty to save? Many a home-garden has still a sepulchre in it. No Sabbath School is without its dead. In every congregation there are souls that have never yet been called to life. Multitudes have been in their graves, lo! these many years. Parent, pastor, Sabbath school teacher, have you taken away the stone?

To take away the stone, is to do all that work which is possible to human agency, in securing the salvation of those about us. Simply to pray, and to be content with that, while there is something else that can be done, and that needs to be done, and that therefore ought to be done, is to keep the supulchres shut. The impenitent must be reached by personal effort; must be brought to the house of God and the place of prayer; must be confronted directly with the truth; must be talked with and prayed with, as well as preached to and prayed for. They must be made to feel that there is a personal and special interest in their welfare—that somebody cares for their souls.

Our faith may be equal to prayer, when it is not equal to effort. Martha's prayer, in behalf of Lazarus, breathed all trustfulness. But when the Master came and said, "Take away the stone," her faith staggered. "What use Lord? He has been dead four days!" So, and how often, do we, too, doubt; withholding our word and deed after we have sent up our prayer. Our shameful and criminal unbelief suggests and urges difficulties in the case, both with reference to human agency and the power of God. Who of us is not rebuked by Christ's reproof of Martha's want of faith; "Said I not, that, if thou wouldest believe, thou shouldest see the glory of God?"

Work, Christians, is the duty of the hour. Work possible to us all, and to which we shall go, in faith that it will be supplemented by work possible only to God. Special, personal, spiritual work—work for souls. Preparation work, preceding and correlating God's work. Until this is done, we shall see no resurrections. We must go and do what was done there, by human hands, at the grave of Lazarus, if we would have the dead in trespasses and sins made alive in Christ Jesus. We must open the sepulchres. We must take away the stone.

This done—done faithfully and believingly, with trust in God—and the voice that woke the dead on Olivet will speak again; multitudes of souls shall have glorious resurrection, and the dead shall live. H. J.

MAN IN DEATH.

PAUL once stood upon an island, allegorically representing truth, and shook a viper from his hand. While standing upon such a foundation, no error could hurt him. Our modern Pauls stand upon a continent of error. How shall they free themselves from the viper, Spiritualism, that has fastened upon them? Yea, they stand upon the very corner-stone and foundation upon which it is built, viz., that the soul is immortal, and has conscious existence separate from the body. Hence the danger; if Spiritualism falls, their own structure will come tumbling about their heads. Once get the Bible idea of no future life out of Christ, and without the resurrection, fully established, and where is Spiritualism? At a spiritual circle in the city of Washington, in 1853, the following question was asked: "What good can result from these manifestations?" "It is to draw mankind together in harmony, and convince skeptics of the immortality of the soul." So said John C. Calhoun. The same question being put to what purported to be the spirit of W. E. Channing, the same answer was returned as before.

Now tell me candid reader, is not this the foundation on which they are built and by which they have succeeded? And yet these sticklers for man's natural immortality deny the divine authenticity of most of the Bible. And why? Because, forsooth, it does not teach the doctrine they wish, but instead, bases all hopes of a future life upon Christ and the resurrection."—Selected.

Annihilation in Church.

The New York Independent of Oct. 22d, referring to the suspension of Rev. Mr. Collins by the Minnesota M. E. Conference, an action already noticed by our Editor in the Herald of Oct. 21st, says "Rev. L. C. Collins was suspended from the ministry, at the recent session of the Minnesota M. E. Conference, for holding the doctrine of the annihilation of the wicked. Mr. Collin is a most amiable man; and the vote was reluctantly passed at the last moment, not more than a tithe of the Conference voting, and a part of those in the negative.

If Bro. C. preached the destruction of the wicked his suspension from the ministry could not have been unanticipated. His conference, in the present dark state of its theology, could not well be expected to do otherwise. If he is secure in Christ; if he has recieved the truth in the love of it; if he has taught it in humility and godly fear, his experience outside the ministry of that church will be likely to much more fully promote his own spiritual welfare and that of others. But what an unenviable position does the Methodist Church occupy before the world. Others, of course, not less so, but of that one the above mentioned circumstance leads us to speak. What is the professed belief of the church respecting the future of the lost? Why, that all who die in their sins will be tormented throughout the endless age of eternity, no ray of hope even being permitted to reach them. Do they preach it? The fact that they do not now, to any considerable extent, is so notorious as to awaken some concern in their ranks. A D. D. among them recently said, "The doctrine of future retribution, above all others, has been permitted to fall out of notice; so much so that a Universalist might be a constant hearer in almost any of our evangelical churches, and very seldom find his notions interfered with from the pulpit."

Their only conception of a "future retribution" is conscious existence in misery. This they do not dare preach; for well they know the people will not hear it. Like certain chief priests and elders whom our Lord encountered at Jerusalem, they "fear the people." They are afraid to preach their views on the state of the damned, and so they permit the whole subject of "future retribution" to "fall out of notice." When one of their number holds views on the subject which he dare preach, and which the people eagerly hear, he is "cast out of the synagogue." They thus practically say to all others, "we believe your hearers are hanging on the verge of hell, standing on the very brink of endless woe, of dark despair, and they ought to be warned of their danger. You may keep silent, however, and say nothing to them on the subject, but do not, under penalty of suspension from the ministry, speak of their being in any danger unless you tell them all we believe about it. We know that death was stated as the penalty for violation of the edenic law; we know God has said 'the soul that sinneth, it shall die'; we know, too, that the 'wages of sin is death,' but although God says 'death' he does not mean it, and we, therefore, charge you never to preach death as the penalty for sin; the doom of the ungodly, without insisting upon our interpretation of it, which, being just the opposite of its meaning when used in any other book, must commend itself to the mind of every intelligent person."

Brethren of the Methodist, and of all churches which hold to the torment theory, if you believe the doctrine you ought to preach it; if you do not believe it, you ought to renounce it. You cannot refuse to do either without incurring divine displeasure and bringing down upon you the judgment of God. As christian brethren, we exhort you to faithfulness in this matter. What sort of watchmen are you on "the walls of Zion?" How can you, day after day, go to God in prayer, asking forgiveness while ever renewedly guilty of that awful sin of omission, which surely rests upon you, if, believing some of your fellow men are daily passing into everlasting torture, you fail to constantly raise a warning voice? How can you stand before your people and, and believing them exposed to such a future, fail to urge it upon their consideration more earnestly and persistently than all things else combined? You may say they already know it. We reply, ordinary minds cannot comprehend it, and your superior abilities in that direction are constantly required to assist them.

If, on the other hand, you do not believe it, you surely must regard it a libel upon the character of God, in which case how can you, in the name of Him who in boundless love was given, invoke divine favor while before the world you countenance and support the libel? In either case, your error is not simply error; it is a deep, dark sin. The time is not far distant, if time much longer lasts, when regard for the life and vitality of your institutions will prompt you to seek the aid of all consistent teachers of the Bible doctrine of man's nature and destiny. While, however, in the mean time, you pursue your disassociating policy, pray do it so heartily that it cannot be said, "the vote was reluctantly passed at the last moment, not more than a tithe of the Conference voting, and a part of those in the negetive." THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 4, 1868.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

To Subscribers.

If any of our subscribers have failed to receive either of the previous numbers of the present volume, please inform us, and we will supply them. We hope none will fail of informing us immediately. We have had some complaints of failures. It is our opinion that these occur from carelessness, or some other cause, at the Post office of the subscriber. We do not say that none of them occur in our office; yet, with the care exercised here it is not likely many can. But whatever the cause is, we are glad to supply missing numbers when we have the means.

Will Br. Chase of Dover, N. J., inform us if No. 2 has yet been received? If not, will he call at our office and get a supply?

The Lord's Supper.

A brother in Massachusetts writes us, asking if we can furnish him with the Herald containing our main argument on the above subject, and says, "I have seen but little advocating the yearly observance of it, but much against it, and in favor of the weekly observance. I cannot see why we should choose that season, the day of the resurrection, when the supper is to show forth the Lord's death until he comes. If to be observed on the first day of the week, why did he not institute it after his resurrection?" etc.

We have not a spare copy of the paper containing our argument on the question, but we may by-and-by, reprint it, if there is interest enough the subject to warrant it. Truly it is a strange affair to have the memorial of an event celebrated fifty times a year; and doubtful then if one of the fifty times should happen on the anniversary. But we have no wish to press this question. Our own mind has long been settled that the annual recurrence of the time is the time, and the only time, for the observance or commemoration of our Lord's death; all other times are mere fancy, or from the traditions of men. So it seems to us: for if we may celebrate it as often as we please, then if a man pleases to do it once in ten years, or twice in his life, he is just as correct in his practice as others who do it as "oft" as they please. These haphazard rites and ceremonies we have no faith in; they are of man's invention, and of no binding obligation or utility.

A Word to Life Lovers.

These are days in which minds are stirred, and we shall all be carried some where: there is no avoiding it. Let us then examine well and thoroughly the way we travel, and see that we are on the right track. Old stereotyped theological dogmas, forced on our minds in childhood, have now to pass a fiery trial. If they are "gold" they will stand the test; if "wood and stubble" they will be burned up. He that is afraid, or shrinks from having his theological views tried, gives sad evidence that he loves ease more than truth. One thing we are perfectly assured of, that the old "theological hell," of endless sin and suffering, is destined to go to the "moles and to the bats." But what is coming in its place? To those who still maintain that man has an immortal soul, final restoration is the inevitable substitute. We have facts on that point that assure us we are not mistaken in the tendency of "orthodox" preachers to restorationism. They cannot longer make themselves nor others believe that there is any possible way to reconcile endless sin and suffering with the attributes of God; but holding still to the immortality of a soul in man—they are falling into the wake of the German divines, and that of Bishop Newton, who in his "Dissertation," "On the final state and condition of men," after a labored effort to show that "everlasting" means only as long as their wicked character should continue, says:

"Repentance, therefore, is not impossible in hell: but yet you may ask—What reason is there to think it possible? and I answer—Because it is impossible for any creature to live in eternal torments. Who among us can dwell with the devouring fire? who among us can dwell with everlasting burnings? Nothing can be more contrary to the divine nature and attributes than for a God all-wise, all-powerful, all-good, all-perfect, to bestow existence on any beings, whose destiny, he foresees and foreknows, must terminate in wretchedness and misery, without recovery or remedy, without respite or end. 'God is love,' and he would rather have not given life, than render that life a torment and curse to all eternity. Imagine a creature, nay, imagine numberless creatures, produced out of nothing, delivered over to torments of endless ages, without the least hope or possibility of relaxation or redemption. Imagine if you may, but you can never seriously believe it, nor reconcile it to God and goodness. God could never make any [creature] whose end he foreknew would be misery everlasting. The letter of Scripture may indeed sound forth everlasting punishments, but the spirit of Scripture intimates the contrary."

Satisfy these men that there is no immortality in man; and that it can only be realized as a gift of God, through Jesus Christ, and by the resurrection at the last day, and they will discover that the clear and full testimony of the Scriptures to the utter destruction of the wicked needs no theological twattle to do away its plain utterance on the question—"All the wicked will God destroy." "The enemies of the Lord shall be as the fat of lambs: they shall consume, into smoke shall they consume away." Psalm xxxvii, 20; and cxlv., 20. Also Psalm ci., 8, "I will early annihilate all the wicked of the land; that I may annihilate all wicked doers from the city of the Lord." In this last text we have given the literal translation of the original word according to Professor Pick, in his "Bible Student's Concordance." No truth is more clearly stated, in the Bible, than the total, entire, and "everlasting destruction" of the enemies of God: and nothing hinders any man from seeing it so except the tradition of an immortal soul in man. We say "tradition," because there is not one solitary text, from Genesis to Revelation, that affirms any such doctrine. Let those find it who suppose it is there, if they can.

But while we avoid the miry pit of inherent immortality and endless torture, let us beware that we do not fall into the half-way slough of a mortal resurrection and future hopeless torment for the creatures to whom God gave life here that they might, if they would, obtain that other life which is eternal. Failing to secure that life, which is only through a resurrection at the last day, if dead; or a change to immortality, if alive at that day when the Lord Jesus shall descend from heaven with a shout, and the voice of the archangel and the trump of God; then, will the sinners against God's love and grace, "remain in the congregation of the dead," and "not see life." Such is the divine purpose, to give life future and eternal to all who submit to the divine plan of redemption by the promised and given Life-giver. There is no hopeless torture in a future life in the plan of God; infinite love forbids it and infinite power will forever prevent it.

These grand, glorious, God-honoring truths have been committed to us, Life believers, to proclaim and publish abroad through the land. Never since the days of the apostles was there a more glorious work committed to the hands of "earthen vessels." Luther and the other reformers had a magnificent work to perform; but it was left unfinished, and the corrupt stream of inherent immortality and future hopeless torture has continued to flow, to the dishonor of God and corruption of Christianity, till there has become a stagnant ocean of "spiritism" into which men and women flow, as dying fish flow to the ocean from the living streams above, having been poisoned and stupefied by the drug of inherent immortality and going to heaven or hell at death, "Spiritism" is the natural landing place of that theory; and the vital piety of those who have been made partakers of the divine nature is all that saves the entire body of professors of religion, in these last days, from plunging in one vast body into the corruption of "Spiritism's" ocean of moral death and rejection of the God of the Bible.

Let none fancy that this long raging disease of inherent immortality and future hopeless woe is to be purged out of Christianity by parleying with it, and proffering it the half loaf of a future life of torment for a time. No, that is just as ruinous to the truth as endless torture itself, and on no better principle can it be defended. Christianity must be purged of the whole scheme of a life of hopeless torture in the future, and life and death be made to stand out, as they do in the word of God, in such bold relief that no soul of man can mistake the fact that our present life is one of mortality and trial, to end in death, from which there is no deliverance except by the Spirit of God that raised up Jesus our Lord and Life-giver from the dead. This is our only hope for a future life, and Christ is the only way into it. He that refuses this open door of God's appointment, perishes forever "in his own corruption."

Now, friends, shall we labor with new zeal to forward the building up and spreading abroad this glorious truth of "Life future and eternal only in Christ?" Can we be guiltless if we are contented to be comforted ourselves with it while multitudes of both saints and sinners are overwhelmed in darkness, often bordering on despair, for the want of the light God has given us? O for a more deep spirit of consecration and self-sacrifice in the work God has put into our hands. Where shall we appear if we do not all that is in our power to scatter the light abroad? There are those who are willing to scatter the truth in tracts and pamphlets, and other ways, if they can be furnished to their hands. See the call of two poor sisters in Albany, N. Y., on the last page of this paper. Shall such not have the means to do the work God has put into their hearts to perform? Many more are like-minded.

A few months past have witnessed the scattering of tens of thousands of pamphlets and tracts from this office. Shall we not have the means to continue and increase this work? The calls for more continue to come; and the seed must be furnished. The time is short—the work is great—men are groping in darkness and ready to perish for the light we have to give. Shall they not have it? Speak one and all, and say, "The work must and shall be done. The Lord help us to do it.

A Great Discovery.

He showed "If the righteous exist forever, so must the wicked."—Worcester Spy's report of Rev. N. D. George's attempt to "annihilate" annihilation.

We regret that the Spy did not furnish us with the argument to sustain that proposition. We think it would be the greatest theological curiosity of this or any previous age. It supposes that the statement of life future and eternal is as clearly taught in the Bible in relation to the wicked as of the righteous. Did the Rev. Mr. George produce any text that states how the wicked are to "exist forever?" Did he among his "great number of texts" produce one that saith "the soul is immortal?" If so, it must have been Gen. iii., 4, "Ye shall not surely die." Did he produce a text that saith the sinner, as such, shall ever "put on immortality?" If so, where did he find it? We know he did not find it in the Bible. Did he, among the "great number of texts," you say he produced, bring one that saith a wicked dead man shall ever be revived into life? If so, where is the text? We want none of his or your inferences, because the testimony is to be as clear concerning the wicked dead's existing forever as it is that the righteous will, or else the Rev. Mr. George's proposition is not accurate—it is a mistake.

We might ask a great many more questions, but the foregoing are quite sufficient. Our Lord saith, "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life, and I will raise him up at the last day." This language He repeats four times in John vi. Paul saith of the sleepers in Jesus, "The dead shall be raised incorruptible," and "this mortal shall put on immortality," 1 Cor., xv. Where did he or our Lord use any such language concerning the wicked dead? Nowhere. And yet the Spy tells us his Rev. friend affirms "If the righteous exist forever so must the wicked!" Why "must the wicked exist forever, if the righteous" do? We see no necessary connection in the case; and he might as well have said, "If an immortal being exists forever so must a mortal one." The one proposition is no more unscriptural or absurd than the other.

"This is the record," that God hath caused to be made, "that He hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in His Son; he that hath the Son hath life," (of course, must have a living existence) "and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life," (of course, has no living existence.) Such is the contrast that God has made; and John saith, "He that believeth not God, hath made Him a liar; because he believeth not the record God gave of his Son." The "record" clearly shows that the believer is to have an eternal living existence; and just as clearly shows that the unbeliever shall not have such existence. See 1 John v., 11–13. We rather think it is quite as safe to believe the "record of God" as that of the Rev. friend of the Worcester Spy. At any rate, we accept the former and reject the latter; or prefer God's to man's.

Response to Samuel Mason.

Br. Mason, we think, falls into the error of confounding threatenings with prophecies. Prophecy is "A declaration of something to come." It could not be a prophecy from God if it never will happen. The Lord said, by Moses, "If thou say in thine heart, How shall we know the word which the Lord hath spoken? When a prophet speaketh in the name of the Lord, if the thing follow not, nor come to pass, that is the thing which the Lord hath not spoken." Deut. xviii., 21, 22. Any prophecy which does not come to pass is not of God.

But the matter is entirely different with threatenings. The very idea of threatening is that of an effort to prevent something being done—to alarm, to warn of impending danger. When God threatens individuals or nations it is the design to influence their course, and the threat is addressed directly to the parties to be influenced. Such threats are always conditional, whether the condition is expressed or not. Jonah's mission to Ninevah was not to prophesy; it was with a threatening which Jonah knew was conditional before he went with the message, as is evident from his language in chap. iv., 2. But the prophecy concerning Babylon was not addressed to that city at all. No messenger was sent to warn that city of its coming doom. It was God's statement to his people of what he would do to that city, and the event was just as certain the day the prophecy was uttered as it is today. To ask us, if Babylon had repented, would it have been overthrown? is the same as to ask us if God had any foresight? If he knew that under some administration he might institute—say by threating it directly by a prophet—it would repent, then the prophecy would never have been uttered: any professed prophet that made such a prophecy would have proved "the Lord did not speak by him."

When God speaks to "a nation" or "a kingdom" with a threatening to pluck it up or pull it down, that is not a prophecy, in the sense of foretelling events, but a warning for it to repent: then, of course, the thing threatened is conditional, and may be avoided. For example: While Jesus was in the performance of his personal ministry, the Jews might have repented and saved their nationality. Said he, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem . . . how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!" Their national salvation, or preservation as a nation, was conditional up to a certain point. But when Jesus prophesied, saying, "There shall be great distress in the land, and wrath upon this people: and they shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations," etc., no conditions were expressed or implied: he spoke of a fact which was then just as certain to take place as it is now certain that it has taken place. To deny this destroys all confidence in prophetic declarations. The prophecy was not uttered till our Lord saw the certain impenitence of the nation as such. So it is with all prophecy of Scripture; for "holy men of old spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost," and hence the thing was certain to come to pass, and could no more fail, by any contingency, than God could fail of infinite knowledge.

We confess surprise that Br. Mason should say the prophecy of Micah iii., 12, "was not fulfilled." Because it did not take place in the days of Hezekiah. Because it had not an immediate fulfilment, has it not, therefore, been fulfilled? Surely, there is hardly a prophecy in the Bible that has had so literal a fulfilment as this very prophecy which Br. M. says "was not fulfilled." We can by no means admit such a construction of prophecy; it unsettles everything: we can never know that a prophecy will have a fulfilment till after it has actually been accomplished; and so we do not know the Lord Jesus will return from heaven unless the event should happen to prove it; it may be all a "conditional" matter.

In general, we admit "God's promises of favor are conditional," as Br. M. says; but even here we think he is by far too sweeping in his remarks. Was God's promise of his Son's coming into the world conditional? Were all the promises relating to Christ's work in the world conditional? Is the promise to give unto his Son the throne of his father David conditional? Is the promise of his return from heaven conditional? and of a thousand other promises we might ask the same question.

But there is one prophecy and promise combined we wish to call special attention to, viz., this, "For unto us a child is born, unto us a Son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder. . . . . Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth even forever. The zeal of the Lord of hosts will perform this." Isa. ix., 6, 7.

Here is a prophecy that is not conditional: it involves the simple question, Will God do as he says? He has given this Son. That part of the promise and prophecy had no conditions, so far as men were concerned. What right has any one to assume that the remainder is conditional? God is pledged to the fulfilment of it all; it is he alone that is concerned to see it accomplished; and no intervention of men, pro or con., can turn it to the right hand or the left; and Gabriel and the Holy Ghost confirmed these promises and this prophecy to their fullest extent. See Luke i., 31–33, 41–45.

This prophecy embraces all the others relating to the two kingdoms of Israel to be united again in one nation, and Christ's reign on the throne of David. Take away the certainty of that event, and the prophecies of the Bible are as uncertain as the heathen oracles, and as worthless.

But "so far as persons are concerned," Br. M. says, "they (the promises) are all conditional." This again is too sweeping; for, if true, it would exclude the outpouring of the Spirit, altogether. Then what? Why, salvation by works, which is the same thing as no salvation at all. Was the manifestation of the Holy Spirit in its "reproof of the world", a conditional event? Christ promised it should do that work, and God promised to "pour out his Spirit upon all flesh." Has he done it, and will he do it as an unconditional matter, or is he to wait till all flesh first perform some condition? We are not now speaking of the continued work of the Spirit, but of its incipient work.

But our controversy in this matter is not about promises, as such, but about prophecies; they are not to be confounded. If all promises could be proved conditional (which they are not), that would not prove the prophecies were also.

Our brother's contemplation of Israel's history, from Egypt onward, is rather a concession than otherwise that though promises may be conditional, prophecy is not; for though multitudes of Israel were cut off, so as not personally to enter the land of Canaan, the prophecy of Abraham's literal posterity being delivered out of Egyptian bondage, and being brought into that land, was fulfilled; the particular persons who should come into the land did depend on conditions; but the coming in of the nation was a matter of prophecy, and no conditions were expressed or implied; the prophecy was fulfilled to the letter.

The prophecy Ezk. xxxvii., that God will bring the "two nations"—Judah and Israel—into the land "wherein your fathers have dwelt" [which was not the new earth], and "make them one nation in the land, upon the mountains of Israel," will as surely come to pass, as that God planted the one nation there which he brought out of the Egyptian bondage. Multitudes of those two nations will perish or be cut off for their sins before the reunion on "the mountains of Israel," but the prophecy cannot and will not fail of being accomplished. Say, if you will, it will not be till there is a national repentance; and then we reply, the repentance itself is a matter of prophecy, and is therefore certain to take place.

But we do not wish to press this subject, as we said in our previous reply to Br. Mason. We think we can each hold our different views in charity. We did hope the subject might be held in reserve till we had all made farther advances in the Life theme, which we view of far more importance at present. But we have no desire to exclude the question, if there is anything like a general wish for its discussion.

The Succession of Ages.

The ages are God's great divisions of time. The passing one is the only one of which evil is predicated. It commenced soon after the creation of Adam, and has emphatically been an evil age. The word of God also shows us, that beyond the present there will be an endless succession of ages—that they will be God's grand divisions of eternity. Of the coming one we wish to say a little.

With reference to the future ages, the word of God says but little, but that little is enchanting. It is calculated to draw our hearts away from earth, and lead us most ardently to desire and seek to attain to the coming age. All the revelations of the future are dark, but in them we can see glimmerings of such glories as eye has never seen, ear never heard, nor heart conceived—godlike glories. Either to be the kings or to be natural born subjects and citizens of that age will truly be glorious.

Perhaps the fullest descriptions of the next age are to be found in the twenty-first and twenty-second chapters of Revelation. And, yet it may be more proper to say, they give us descriptions of the capital, the metropolis, the city of our God, the city of the age, than of the age itself. They tell us more of the glories of those who have been redeemed out of the present age, than of the restored human race, the natural-born citizens of the next. Other portions of the word of God tell us very little of the glories of that age; and that little is inferential rather than direct. The blessed Book teaches us rather what we must be, in order to attain that age, than what the restored earth, and our restored race will be—what we must do to be saved, than what the second Adam will do in the great restitution. The great lessons of the Bible are for the present, now, to-day rather than to-morrow, or the great future.

And yet the thought occurs to me that as Peter informs us, Acts iii., 19–21, that all the holy prophets, since the commencement of this age, have spoken of the restitution, it must have had a wonderful importance in their estimation; and if all have spoken of it, why may not most of them have written of it? Perhaps the great difficulty lies in our ignorance of what they have written. Our greatest difficulty may arise from the want of a careful, prayerful examination of what God has given us on this subject. The revelations of the great unfulfilled future, to be understood, need to be very carefully and prayerfully studied—more so than we are in the habit of giving the Book of books. For wise reasons, the great future is darkly revealed, often enigmatically. Scripture must be compared with scripture, and the great Father must teach us, or its truths will escape our notice. The careless reader may see that the present is to be succeeded not only by a coming age, but by ages of ages—an endless succession of ages; but he can see but little in them. Perhaps they are a blank to him.

It is reasonable to suppose that each succeeding age will transcend the preceding one. Indeed I know not why from age to age, there may not be a rapid and eternal increase in glory—that in every sense there may be an eternal increase. What then will the distant ages of eternity be? How indescribably glorious! How worthy of Him all of whose attributes are perfect and infinite.

The next age is spoken of in the word of of God, as the coming age, the future age, etc. Sometimes by way of contrast with the past it is emphatically termed the age, and the age of the ages. Compared with the past, it will be an age of ages—incomparably the best of all.

This age has had an intelligent, moral head: but, ah, sin has made him an immoral head. Sin has made him a tyrant, and if not a brute, brutal, one who has spread misery, misrule and ruin before him. It has therefore been an age in which there has been a fearful prevalence of evil. Hence inspiration has emphatically called it an evil age. Its influences are spoken of as evil, and we are forbidden to love it.

With this age evil shall cease to exist on the earth. Evil will only be a thing of the past. Everything in, and connected with the coming ages, will be worthy of Him, who is infinitely good. God's oath by Moses will be fulfilled, "As truly as I live, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord." Num. xiv., 21.

The next being a restored age, there will be no more the curse. In consequence of the curse man has known what fatigue is, and often has known want and famine. Then, though there will be no more idleness, there will be no fatigue—no labor with weariness. His subsistence will not then be gained by the sweat of his brow. His food and earthly necessities will cease to be precarious. There will be luxury in providing, as well as in enjoying that that is provided. As it was in Paradise, labor and everything else will be sweet. Then no sweet will have a snare, no honey a sting, no rose a thorn, no pleasure dashed with bitter bowls. Hence we may call it a restored age. If man had not sinned, we know of no possible reason, why there would not have been a succession of generations beyond the present age; and if the restitution is truly a restitution, I know no reason why there should not be restored to the race all that had been lost by the fall—that the second Adam should repair the ruins of the first. Anything short of that would not be restitution. If so, in it the race will be put upon its primeval footing, never to fall again.

Scott says of the original word rendered restitution, that it means the restoring of a thing again to the state from which it had fallen. Greenfield renders it, "A restoration of anything to its former state." To know what the restitution will be, we only need to know what all things were, when they came forth from the hands of their Creator; and then consider what prophets say shall be restored. All that prophets say shall be, will be restored to their orginal state. A careful examination of their writings will show that there are comparatively few things that will not be restored.

It is in view of the restitution, that creation travails in pain, with outstretched heads (apokaradokia) awaiting the redemption of the body, and the revelation of the sons of God. Rom. viii., 19–21. When the restitution shall have taken place, creation with few exceptions, will be as it was before the blight of sin was felt. The restitution, doubtless refers to races and not to individuals.

As was the human race when they came forth from the hands of their Creator, so shall they be on the morning of the coming age. All will again be Edenic, pure, holy, worthy of God. Again there will be nothing to hurt nor destroy; and the earth itself shall be as when sin had not blighted it. I do not say they will remain so, no, far from it, for the great Creator says "Behold I create all things new."

To say the restitution is something that is to be fulfilled to any individuals of past generations, is not correct. Upon past generations of brutes, we have reason to believe the oblivion of the grave will forever rest. To past generations of men, it cannot apply, for a portion of them will be forever lost—not restored, but lost; and another portion will be more than restored. To say of a man who will be resurrected, glorified and angelized, that he will be restored to the unfallen, the Adamic state, is far from being true. Oh, that will fall far short of the glorious, blessed, eternal truth. An exaltation awaits those who have been redeemed out of this age, far above anything to which creature has yet been raised. To the redeemed from among men of this age awaits the nearest approach to the divine. "To him that overcometh, will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne." Rev. iii., 21. "And the glory which thou gavest me, I have given them." John xvii., 22, et al. No unfallen being ever has been, or ever will know, what it is to be exalted to a copartnership with Christ on his throne, and to a coheirship with him in his dominion. Ah, it is more than a restored right of the race, it is a blood-bought right of the redeemed—a peculiarity of the redeemed and not something which they may enjoy in common with the unfallen and the restored. Oh, if blood-bought rights are so peculiar, so glorious and so God-like, what must their loss be?

The race being restored, there will be a succession of generations, just as there would have been if man had not sinned. This would seem to be a natural and necessary consequent of the restitution.

The first thing that arrested our attention and caused us to think of the possibility of a succession of generations beyond the present age, was the language of the apostle Paul, Eph. iii., 21, "Unto him be glory in the church by Christ Jesus (eis pasas tas geneas tou aionos ton aionon), for all the generations of the age of the ages." It is a mystery why our translators should have rendered genea, age, for certainly it never means it, nor anything like it; but always generation or some kindred idea. The very derivation of the word is sufficient to show that. The word is very frequently used in the Greek New Testament, and our translators have not in a single instance rendered it age, except in this place, and in the fifth verse of this chapter. Like other translators, they have almost universally rendered it generation.

If then the apostle meant what he says, there must be a succession of generations. Though the idea at first staggered us, it was so different from anything we had ever been taught, and we could not understand it, yet yet we could not—dared not doubt. We also found other passages, which could not be explained on any other principle of interpretation.

The idea may be repulsive to some, but why may not that which was appropriate to Paradise before the fall, be to Paradise restored? Had it not been for sin, there would have been no thoughts connected with the idea, but such as are proper to the most exalted state of holiness. But mark you, I am not now speaking of a single one of the redeemed out of this age, but of the restored race—of humanity restored—of humanity as it was before the fall, and will be again. It can be no more gross, carnel, sensual and improper for one holy world, than for another—for a restored, than for an unfallen race.

The restored race will enjoy the rights and privileges of the age by natural generation. They will be born into it, as we have been born into, and enjoy the rights and privileges of this century, or as we are born into this age and suffer all the consequences of it. But for us, who have been born into this age, to enter into, and enjoy the coming one, we must attain it through grace. We have no birthright inheritance to it; but if through the blood of the Lamb, we attain to it ours will be most glorious inheritance and privilege. Therefore to us, the all-important question is, Have we accepted of the grace brought to us by the revelation of Jesus Christ? Is Jesus Christ all our trust, and all our hope? Or are we, for the sake of enjoying this evil, this transient age, neglecting and rejecting the whole purchase of the Saviour's death?

As the next will be a restored age, sin and all its effects will be forever removed. Sin removed, the great source of sorrow and suffering, will be gone. One of the consequences will be, earth will cease to be a vale of tears the abode of suffering, the land of death. All will agian be Paradisiacol. God's will will be done on earth as it is in heaven. The earth will be full of the glory of God. Amid the perfecting and the creations of the next genesic day, may we not say more full of God's glory than ever it has been. Earth was once a loyal member of the great family of the heavens—a loyal province of the one great kingdom of God. By a sad revolt, it hai seceded, but when the rebellion will be perfectly quelled, it will again be restored to that great brotherhood, so that it will as really be heavenly as any other world.

That the curse and all the effects of sin will be effectually and forever removed from the earth, is evident from many passages of the word of God. Indeed few truths are more plainly taught. It will be as it was, and all that is upon it, will be as they were before the blight of sin was felt. I do not say it will remain so; no, far from it, for progression is the order of the universe—the order of God, and we know not why it may not be so forever. It is hard to comprehend the idea of eternal progression. So almost everything is incomprehensible to the finite. The finite is utterly incapable of comprehending the Infinite One, and his works are almost as incomprehensible as Himself.

There are many other things on which we might dwell which will be characteristics of that glorious age, but we are incapable of doing justice to the subject now. The field is large and suggestive, and it is pleasant and profitable, but we must forbear.—Selected.

Remarks by the Editor.

The foregoing thoughts we have extracted from an article in the Prophetic Times, signed "J. B." We have taken only so much from his article as we could indorse. The writer has taken nearly the same view of Eph. iii., 21, that we embraced twenty-five years ago. From that day to this we have never had a doubt but there would be an "endless succession of ages." So Macknight translates the text. We abandoned the idea of the literal burning of this globe at the time we saw the force of that text and the harmony of the general tenor of the Scriptures with it. The wild extravagancies of some who embraced what was called "The Age to Come," led us to hold that whole question in reserve, to a great extent, till future developments should open a more favorable opportunity for a calm discussion of the subject. Another reason why we have said no more on the question has been, that many believers in the Advent and Life views have had such an aversion to the ideas we held on the coming ages that we judged best not to press the subject hitherto. But if the subject of unfulfilled prophecy being conditional is to be urged on our attention, it will be impossible to prevent the question of the future ages also from coming forward for contemplation.

The views presented in the foregoing extracts are our views; and have been, as we said, for twenty-five years past; and to our mind they belong especially to our ideas of God's government, and the grand fact, "God is Love." The "burning world" theory belongs, properly, to the immortal soul and eternal torment theory; also to the "mortal resurrection" theory, to torment and kill again. But none of these have any harmony with the Life views of the Bible. We are as far removed from the "burning world" theory as we are from the future torment theories in a life beyond the grave, or after a resurrection from the dead. The grave holds all the wicked dead eternally, and the incorrigibly wicked living, at Christ's coming from heaven, will "be punished with everlasting destruction." 2 Thess. i., 9.

Then will the righteous dead be raised immortal and incorruptible; and the living righteous be changed to the same condition, "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye." Then will King Jesus organize his perfect government; and the nation or kingdom that will not serve and obey him and his subordinate rulers will be utterly wasted or dashed in pieces like a potter's vessel; and the King of kings will have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river Euphrates to the ends of the earth; yea, "all people, nations and languages" "shall serve and obey him." "His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom shall not be destroyed." See Psa. ii., throughout. Psa. lxxii.; Dan. vii., 13, 14, 27; Zech. ix., 9, 10, and a multitude of like testimonies.

We shall have to see something more weighty than we have ever yet seen to make us believe all these propheceis are conditional, or of doubtful meaning or fulfilment. "My ways are not your ways, nor my thoughts your thoughts, saith the Lord" . . . . "For as the rain cometh down from heaven and returneth not thither, but watereth the earth, and maketh it bring forth and bud, that it may give seed to the sower and bread to the eater; so shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth; it shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper whereto I sent it," etc. Isa. lv., 8–13. "I am God, and there is none else. I am God, and there is none like me, declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet done, saying, My counsel shall stand, I will do all my pleasure." Isa. xlvi., 9, 10.

"All the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the Lord; all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before thee; for the kingdom is the Lord's; and he is the Governor among the nations. . . . A seed shall serve him; it shall be accounted to the Lord for a generation: they shall come, and shall declare his righteousness unto a people that shall be born, that he hath done this." Psa. xxii., 27–31.

When those who had gotten the victory over the beast, etc., stand on the sea of glass, they say, "Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints. Who shall not fear thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name? for thou only art holy; for all nations shall come and worship before thee; for thy judgments are made manifest." Rev. xv., 2–4.

But it is not necessary now to extend our remarks; and we leave our readers to ponder on these things, and see if, while the view holds out no encouragement to sinners of this age to continue in sin, it does not harmonize with the character of God, and the views we have taken of his government (by our rejection of inherent immortality and future hopeless torture), in a manner well calculated to exalt God and inspire our own hearts with a rapturous view of the glory of the coming ages, which none of the other theories of the future ever have done, or ever can do.

An Inquiry.

I would like to hear your opinion on John x., 18. How had Christ power when he was dead to raise himself? and if this was not the power, what was it?

The original word here translated power is exousian. It has the sense not only of power, but of authority, right, liberty, privilege, etc. Thus John i., 12, "But to as many as received him, to them gave he power [the right, or privilege] to become the sons of God," etc. Again, Heb. xiii., 10, "We have an altar, whereof they have no right—exousian—to eat," etc. Christ received power, right, authority, privilege, to lay down his life and to take it again, from his Father; and the uniform testimony of all the apostles is, that "God raised up Christ from the dead." Christ voluntarily laid down his life: God had promised to raise him up, and to do it early, before corruption should set in. In view of that promise, Christ, when expiring, committed his life to his Father, and his Father restored him to life the third day. There is nothing in the Bible to warrant the idea that Christ raised himself from the dead. Such a view is a virtual denial of his death.

A Dialogue.

J.—Good morning Br. Grim. I am glad to see you. I wish to ask your opinion on a question that has been troubling my mind for some time.

G.—I shall be glad if I can render you any assistence or help you out of any difficulty. Pray what might your trouble be?

J.—I have been seriously exercised about myself and children for some time. And that is in relation to my standing in the church. Do you think that an individual holding the truth as we maintain it, can conscientiously hold fellowship with one of the popular churches.

G.—You ask me a question that I do not like to answer for another, and would rather leave every one to settle that question for themselves.

J.—But I merely wanted your opinion, in hopes that it might throw some light upon my own mind.

G.—I have no objection to give you my opinion and my experience. In the first place, I wish to ask you a few questions. What is the foundation upon which the whole system of church theology is built? Is it the doctrine of the "immortality of the soul?" or, in other words, a man contains a principle or entity within himself, planted there by his Creator, deathless in its nature and will live by virtue of such nature.

J.—I do not fully comprehend your question.

G.—If you take away the doctrine of the immortality of the soul from all the sects, would it not revolutionize the whole system.

J.—It would; and I think would put an end to them.

G.—The question then is a vital one, and affects the whole system of theology; and if we have the truth, as I believe we have, it is our duty to maintain it.

J.—But cannot we maintain our principles and hold our connection with the church? and are we not setting an example to our children?

G.—You are most undoubtedly setting an example to your children; but what is the example? Is it for good or evil?

J.—Do you not believe the church holds some truths? and do you not believe there are many good people in the church?

G.—You have changed your question entirely from what you started with. The question is not, does the church hold some truth, and are there not some good people in it? But what is our duty, holding the advanced views that we believe, in relation to ourselves, our children, and the church? Can we hold our views and belong to any so-called orthodox church?

J.—Yes, I can: the church to which I belong—have not dealt with me; indeed they do not say anything to me about the doctrines which I believe.

G.—That may all be very true. But I will ask you another question. Jesus said, "Ye are the light of the world. A city that is set on an hill cannot be hid. Neither do men light a candle and put it under a bushel, but on a candlestick: and it giveth light unto all that are in the house. Let your light shine before men, that they may see your good works and glorify your Father which is in heaven." Matt. v., 15, 16. The question I wish to ask is contained in the words of our Saviour. Can you let your light shine on these truths in the church? will they tolerate them?

J.—Well, they say I may hold my views if I do not make them public; or, in other words, make a disturbance in the church.

G.—Just as I expected. The church with which I held my membership, told me, twenty-four years ago, I might still continue my fellowship, if I kept my views to myself. But I believed God had given me light, and I chose to put my light on a candlestick, and have been trying to let it shine, that it might give some light. My experience has been, from what I have seen of those who staid in the church to convert the church, that the church has succeeded in converting them. When we came out from the church there were a goodly number in it who believed with us; and many of them staid behind to labor with the church; and like as the song says, There are none remains: they have all been swallowed up. But, on the other hand, I can count many among the living, who came out when we did, who are true to their calling, and some have fallen asleep.

J.—But do you not think we can do some good laboring in the church and Sabbath School?

G.—I have heard that question so often that I will answer it by a text of scripture. When Paul had been enlightened and came out from Judaism, and Peter was for continuing in the old forms like some of our brethren, Paul said "For if I build again the things I destroyed, I make myself a transgressor." Gal. ii., 18. Here Paul makes this confession so far as he was concerned. Believing as he did that circumcision, and all the Jewish rites were closed and accomplished, he labored for their overthrow. If he again aided to build them up, he became a transgressor. Now, so far as I am individually concerned, I believe, having received the truth in all its advanced features, for me to go and connect myself with one of these modern theological establishments, I should jeopardize my salvation.

J.—But do you think every one does?

G.—I have answered for myself, as I told you I was willing to give you my opinion and experience.

J.—But I have known many, good brethren and sisters who still hold their fellowship in the churches, who believe our views and still go there.

G.—And so do I. They profess to believe our views; that is they assent to them; have a kind of speculative belief in them; that is, they hold seats, pay rent, help support an orthodox minister, and contribute to circulate what they believe to be a lie, and thereby dishonor God, and help forward evil, that which is adverse to God and his truth.

J.—But Br. G. I think you are very hard, and I do not think you are justifiable in using such hard language.

G.—Well it may be so, but John says, "And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath life. He that hath not the Son of God hath not life." Now then, "He that believeth not this record, maketh God a liar." Now we do not want to aid in sustaining a system that makes God a liar. Nay, not only this, but there are hundreds in this city who hold our views, and go to these popular churches, and leave the cause of truth, which they profess to believe, to die out for want of attendence and support. In our next we will give some experience of the example and influence upon our children.

From Clamor Franke.

Cincinnati, Ohio, Oct., 23, 1868.

Br. Storrs: I send you enclosed twenty-five dollars to redeem my pledge of twenty-dollars to the Herald, and of five dollars to the Tract fund for the issue of the tract on the Living Soul.

I am fully resolved to storm the enemies' works of inherrent immortality with all the weapons of truth I can get to bear on them. How thankful I am that we have them furnished to hand by the noble efforts of our dear brethren. So nobly have they responded to calls for re-enforcements that we now have not only our precious Herald established upon a sound and healthy basis, but, in addition to it we have also our Campaign Documents, together with all our other publications to make an assault upon our enemies' strongholds. And no sooner is the word given out that we need additional help, and forthwith the response comes. That has in it the true ring. And further calls will no more be abortive than previous ones.

To bear me out, that I have not mistaken the liberality of our dear friends for the cause of truth, I suggest that we make another effort, and that is, to publish in tract form the Editor's Sermon, "God is Love." I will head the list with five dollars for the publication of this tract. So mighty a weapon as this is, is certain to produce stunning blows upon the endless misery and hell-fire doctrine, and must not be suffered to lie idle for a day. I am persuaded our friends think as I do upon this subject, and that they will lose no time to give the word, "Go ahead with it," to our beloved Editor.

Although I have not seen any immediate fruits from my labors, which have solely been confined to the distribution of tracts, I am not discouraged. It is for us to do our duty and God will take care of the consequences. Yours in Christ.

From Elder W. S. Campbell.

Chicago, Ill., Oct. 28, 1868.

Br. Storrs: I find in this city some, as you well know, who believe in the glorious crowning truth of the gospel, which is so dear and precious to those believers in the Advent system, who are willing to break from the trammels of party and prejudice, and take the simple and plain testimony of the word of God. It may be also said of the legitimate action of the plan of interpretation, which this people have adopted, that they should all believe in "No Life for men in the future" out of Christ, since they will now mostly admit that there is no immortality, nor any ground of it aside from Him. A few who take the Herald of Life, and while they entertain sound views of the coming of Christ and his kingdom, exalt the Son of God, by making Him the true prince, and author of life for the future—Life in its entirety—the whole complete condition, its being or fact, as well as its grand development, the making a man live, as well as the continuing his being. It is everlasting life if it continues. It cannot continue if it does not begin. It will not begin unless Christ gives it! There is no power in the Adamic principle of being to restore itself from dissolution. Then there is certainly wanting the element of continuance. There is equally no principle in the Christ-power of life to interfere with its continuance when once established. Now, admitting that Christ could raise some who might die afterward, (while this state of mortality continues) he could not restore and establish the principle of dying, (involved in the Adamic life-principle) after it had been abolished by his own exhibition of endless life power, in the resurrection. The two, as to the principle and the fruit (life here for one, and in the future for the other) are entirely distinct. Adam can give no life beyond the present. Christ can bring no death in the future. These life believers are engaged in the work going on under the Advent labors in Chicago

From Elvira H. Jillson.

Manchester, N. H., Oct. 25, 1868.

Br. Storrs: I am once more in Manchester, and wish to trouble you again to send the Herald of Life here. I requested you to send it to Williamstown, Vt., so I have failed to receive it, in fact have seen but one number since the Springfield camp-meeting. I think I have not failed to read every number since the first was issued until the past two months; have felt the loss, often desiring to hear from "those who have obtained like precious faith." Still I have many rich blessings. Our Lord and Life-giver, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever; an ever present help in every time of need.

Sometimes, with a smile, my friends approve,
Sometimes, with a frown, upbraid me;
Upbraid, or praise, the same to me,
If Jesus only loves me.

Though now He sits on Father's throne,
In heaven far above me:
Yet his sweet Spirit whispers oft,
I love thee, yes, I love thee.

Oh, how comforting the thought that nothing can separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus.

How precious this assurance as we gazed on the lifeless form of our dear sister Holt, "death cannot separate us from the love of God." She sweetly sleeps. We wait a little longer. God help us to watch and pray. Yours, looking for Jesus.

Rev. W. H. Barnes, Hamburg, Iowa, writes: I will try to pay $5 for the present volume of the Herald; and I will try to send something for the "Campaign Documents," as I think they are abler speakers than I am, and can be heard many times when other preachers would fail of an audience. We are glad to learn that the Herald of Life still lives, and is likely to survive though surrounded with enemies. We believe truth will triumph in this theological struggle, and we would be glad to do more for its promotion, if we were able; but we are poor, feeble, and alone, as it were, in Western Iowa.

Edward Kelly, Hinesburg, Vt., writes: I hope to do more for our much-prized paper. I want the Herald of Life to live till He, the Prince of Life, shall come; and my prayer daily is, that I may ever so live that when he does come I may be ready to meet Him, and with all his saints, who love Jesus, sit down in the kingdom of God. Love to all the dear friends in Christ.

John Eakeley, Morristown, N. J., writes: I am firmly fixed in the gospel you preach. It is the true gospel of our Saviour. I did not get a chance to hear but three times when the mission tent was here, but I must say that it awakened a feeling in my breast which I shall never forget. It clearly told me where I was. After hearing I went to reading my Bible, and I can see no other way under heaven whereby man can be saved. As for my part, I have taken it for my course, and I beg an interest in all your prayers that I may ever be found faithful serving my blessed Lord and Saviour.

Dr. H. W. Buxton, Worcester, Mass., writes: The Herald of Life of Oct. 21 is at hand. Many thanks for this live sheet and for your remarks upon "annihilation," etc. By reference to the slip from the Spy, we see the "Methodist Preacher's meeting" was in Webster, instead of this city; and that the initials are Rev. W. D. George. Whether it is really your old friend Nathan I cannot tell. The Lord bless you, and guide us all in the path of life.

Note by the Editor.—We have no doubt but that the initial "W.", in the Spy, was a typographical error, and that we are correct in taking it to be our old friend Nathan D. George.

Poetry.

The African's Reminiscence and Prayer.

By Julia A. Pearce.

Under the shadow of palm trees tall,
Near where the Niger rolls along,
Where dark-browed heathen, great and small,
Welcome each night with dance and song.

There 'neath the boughs where the little ape swings
And the rosy flamingo walks in pride,
With her beautiful scarlet, satin plumed wings
Folded demurely close to her side;

Dozily dreaming the life-long day;
Screen'd from the rays of the burning sun;
We lazily slept the time away,
Till the fervid hours of the day were done.

Then we roused us up as the sun went down,
And wandered forth to gather our food:
Bread-fruit, banana, and cocoanuts brown
Grew in abundance, for God is good.

As twilight deepened, the fires blazed high
And the trump blew loud and our dance began:
All joined in the revel with thoughtless joy;
Mother and children, and sire and son.

The flames leaped up from our many fires,
Casting dark shadows along the ground;
Reminding of banshees seen by our sires,
And of goblins weird in the darkness around.

So we drowned all thought in our music loud;
And we danced and we laughed as though all were well
But we dared not wander away from the crowd;
Nor list to the voice of the wild beast's yell.

Oh Africa! darkest of all dark lands;
With a moral pall is thy sky o'erhung.
When shall Ethiopia stretch forth her hands
To God as the ancient prophets sung?

May the Son of Righteousness shed his beams
On that sunny land of dance and song.
May the dark-browed Afric be favored with gleams
Of light divine, and that ere long.

O thou whose voice can but speak the word,
"Let there be light" and light shall be;
May a son of Africa's prayer be heard
For his fatherland, I entreat of thee.

O, hasten the time, when the King of kings,
His glorious reign on earth begun,
Shall shed fresh life from His healing wings
On every land beneath the sun.

Children's Department.

Selfish Tom, the Boy-Tyrant.

By Mrs. H. C. Gardner.

At school Master Tom was under the care of a teacher who believed that submission to rightful authority was the first lesson to be taught, and that a love of teasing and tormenting others was the lowest vice in a boy's catalogue of faults. There were rules in regard to everything connected with the school, and rules that regulated all the sports of the the playground. If the pupils chose to behave well they were treated like young ladies and gentlemen; if they were clownish and disobedient, they were classed with those of their own grade in behavior. There was very little whipping done there; but the teacher had various little methods of his own contriving for the punishing of offenders, which were more dreaded than the rod. Tom, without being a particularly good scholar, managed to steer clear of those flagrant offences which demanded especial notice, though it must be owned that he was equally free of all tokens of approval.

It was about two months after he received his first home whipping that his teacher was quietly enjoying a walk after school, when his attention was attracted by stifled sounds of distress which seemed to come from a thicket near the road. He approached the spot as quietly as he could, and peeping through the bushes, saw a little boy lying on the grass and crying bitterly.

"What is the matter?" he asked kindly. The boy sprang to his feet with a scream of terror, and the teacher saw that he had a handkerchief tied over his eyes.

"O Tom!" said the boy, "I haven't looked once, indeed I haven't. Now, do let me go home. I am afraid to stay here alone. There's snakes here, Tom—I heard them."

"It isn't Tom," said the teacher, "it is me, Mr. Stirling. Let me unbind your eyes.

"No, no; Tom will be angry. Besides, I promised not to let you know," said the child.

"But I do know, you see, Harry. It's little Harry Maitland, is it not?" asked the teacher, as he resolutely unbound the handkerchief.

"Yes, sir."

"Well, I am going by your mother's and I will take you home. Come."

The little boy looked up wistfully into the kind face. "Oh! I can't go; I don't know what Tom will do to me and sister Emmie, if I do."

"I will take care of that. He shall not trouble you. You can trust me, can't you?"

"Oh! yes, sir."

"Well, tell me now if there are any others in the school who are afraid of Tom. Come, we will talk as we go home.

"Do you mean besides me and Emmie?"

"Yes."

"There's Billy Curtis, and Bessy Sprague, and Alice Bowler and Jimmy. We all have to mind him. Billy's father makes candy, and he has to bring Tom some, and Bessie brings him all the nice peaches and apples that her father gives her for herself, and Alice always has some nice cake for her dinner, or something else that he wants. Me and Emmie carries his books and things."

"Ah! and that is Emmie watching for you by the gate and wondering why you are so late. Run in and tell her I will see to Tom. Good-by, little Harry."

The teacher bent his steps directly to the office of Tom's father. Fortunately, he was at leisure. He listened to Mr. Sterling's story with as much surprise as sorrow. He had laughed many a time at Tom's roguish tricks, but he was astonished and distressed beyond measure to find him capable of such meanness and cruelty. He was ready to adopt any means of reforming the boy-tyrant which the teacher should suggest.

The next morning Tom was a little surprised by being told to wait until fifteen minutes after the ringing of the school-bell before he started for school.

"I shall get a tardy mark," he remonstrated.

"Of course you will," said his father.

When the time arrived for the morning recess Mr. Sterling said: "All the scholars, excepting Thomas Allen, may have a recess of ten minutes."

Tom began to open his eyes and study the new arrangement, but he said nothing. A guilty sense of its cause kept him silent. When the school was dismissed, he was again detained until the other pupils had time to get out of his reach.

Tom bore this very well for a day or two. He was sure that both the teacher and his father began to understand him pretty well, and he could not meet the keen glance of either. But when day after day passed, and even weeks began to succeed each other without any change; and when he saw the significant and provoking looks which were exchanged by his old playmates, his nature began to rebel against the restraint he experienced. The happy looks of the little boys and girls who fearlessly enjoyed themselves in the playground, and made his mouth water over the dainties that he could not touch, were especially irritating. So at last he very humbly asked the teacher to restore his old liberty.

"I am sorry to refuse you, my dear boy," said Mr. Stirling, "but it is necessary to do so."

"Why?"

"Because the little ones cannot come to school in peace if you are at large. Their parents do not wish you to eat up the good things that they provide for them, neither are they willing to have them blindfolded and left alone in the damp woods if they forget to carry a lazy boy's big satchel. Do you understand?"

Tom's face showed that he understood.

"I will never do it again," he said presently.

"So I think."

"When shall I go with the rest?"

"I cannot tell. Perhaps you may by the next term."

"The next term! Why Mr. Stirling, there are seven weeks more of this!"

"Yes, I believe there are," was the indifferent reply.

I wish I could write that Tom sorrowed for his sins, but he only regretted the unpleasant results. We cannot tell what his future course may be. He is still a boy, and his selfish will may yet be thoroughly subdued by the power of God's grace. Aside from that his case is a hopeless one, O, dear children! learn well the sweet golden rule of Christ, to "do unto others as you wish them to do unto you." So will you win the love of all who know you, and, what is better still, you will secure the loving favor of God.—The Methodist.

From Emeline Wood.

Br. Storrs: I send you $2 for a new subscriber. How my heart did leap for joy when she said she would like to take such a paper. Do you not think I did rejoice? I cannot describe the feelings I had to think one more was to be added to the list of subscribers. God grant there may be many more. Sister Earl and myself wish for some tracts. We intend to go from house to house with them. I am anxious to spread this blessed and glorious truth. I feel that I want Albany to have it. If I had the means to buy, I would get many tracts. But I must do what I can for the Lord and his cause. I have never distributed tracts, but I will make the trial. I desire the prayers of all that hold the Life views. My faith is strong that God will prosper me in the work. Jesus has promised to be with me in all I do, if faithful, and I mean to be, with his help. I do thank and praise his holy name for what he is doing for me. I am growing in the knowledge of his blessed word, and in grace. I feel like the blessed Saviour, to bear reproach for his name's sake. I want to work for the cause of truth as we hold it. I search the blessed word for myself, and it says, If any man lacketh wisdom let him ask God who giveth liberally to all who ask in sincerity and truth.

I have had such a longing since I was at the camp-meeting to do some good to others, and have been enabled to do a little, and am gaining strength to go forward in the name of Jesus. How I pity them who are in the dark on the blessed Word that is promised to enlighten every man that cometh into the world. How he has shed the light on dear Sister Earl. I could not believe it if I had not heard and seen it Thomas like, how slow to believe; but my faith is increasing in his word. I feel as if had been waked out of sleep, and Jesus says, Arise and I will give thee light; put on the beautiful garments; not of self-righteousness. When we come to Him in meekness he will teach us, for the Spirit helpeth our infirmities. His promises are all sure. How my heart goes out in behalf of all the scattered ones through the land. O, let your light shine, and speak a word for Jesus at every opportunity, and he will water the seed as we cast it abroad, and it will be made manifest by-and-by.

From Mrs S. M. Earl.

Albany, N. Y., Oct. 26, 1868.

Br. Storrs: I would like to tell you what God is doing for me. I feel that He has done much. But the light I have received seems but a drop of the ocean, compared to what others have. Yet I do rejoice in a Saviour's love. It is a little more than a year since I gave my heart to God, and up to the second of September I made but little progress. At that time I received the blessing of "perfect love," and God gave me great light on the Scriptures. I now understand it to teach the views you promulgate, viz., "No life out of Christ, and no future life for the wicked:" and how I do rejoice; and by the help of God I can speak of it in my class-meeting, in my daily business, and wherever I meet my friends. I desire to be a shining light. I am going with Sister Wood to distribute tracts, and see if we cannot get the light before the people. I desire them to see the word, so precious as it is to me. I expect a share in the kingdom with all the dear ones. O, the thought, when the Life-giver comes to be made like Him; for we shall see Him as He is. How blessed to convert a sinner from the error of his ways, and thus save a soul from death. Jesus loved them so much as to die for them. So ought we to love them and try to pluck them as brands from the burning. May God make me an instrument of turning some to righteousness, and lead and guide me in the way He would have me to go. I believe the Lord brought me into the house with Sister Wood to give me the truth. I wish I could tell you how good she is to me. She has let me read the Herald of Life. How my soul does feed upon it. I have learned much from it. But words fail to express what I feel. Yours, in hope of Life.

Remarks by the Editor.—Sisters Wood and Earl, both now live in one house, in humble poverty; the latter a widow; both seem to be rich in faith and have "a mind to work," like Nehemiah's men when the walls of Jerusalem were to be rebuilt. Shall they not be furnished with tracts? Who will give funds to supply such noble-minded women with the means of scattering the Life views among the people? If the Lord is stirring up laborers, let us give them the documents to scatter. They must have them. We need a thousand dollars to continue this work of scattering "Campaign Documents." "The Living Soul" has been added as one of those documents, and it has been suggested to add the sermon "God is Love." Shall it be done? and shall we continue to print and scatter these works? Give us the funds; and the Lord helping, it shall be done.

Living Water.

By Rev. Daniel March, D. D.

In a retired country town, far away to the North, bordering upon the Canada line, I have recently witnessed the gathering of the rich and suffering around the healing springs which the hills pour forth. Multitudes had travelled long journeys, and incurred great expense and self-denial, that they might find their way to that wild hill-town, and try the efficacy of cooling draughts prepared of old in the deep laboratory of the earth with a skill surpassing the chemist's art. The houses of the town were all full of guests; the dusty highways were thronged with carriages coming and going; the ordinary occupations of the people had given place to the entertainment of strangers.

There was an old man passing my window every morning, travelling three miles every day on foot in the hottest of the hot summer to bring water from the spring. He was lodging in an unfurnished garret, and he was boarding at the cheapest possible rate, that he might take the last chance of adding a little to the long measure of his days. There was an aged pair who had sold the little homestead and the last cow to raise money for the long journey, and they had both come with the fond hope of arresting the stroke of disease which had fallen upon one, that the two, who had travelled forty years together in the same path, might have the privilege of keeping each other company a little longer in the last stage of life's journey.

There was a physician who had left home, renounced a large practice and all professional engagements in a distant city, that he might accompany his wife to these fountains of health, and give her every possible assistance in trying the efficacy of the healing waters. There was the honored and beloved pastor of a city church, who had left the pressing responsibilities of his sacred charge for the whole season, that he might bring the partner of his joys and sorrows to that Bethesda among the hills, in the hope that she might there receive strength to shake off the fell grasp of disease that was upon her. There was a young American who had become rich in the brilliant capital of France, and had acquired the courtliness and vivacity of Parisian manners, but had become prematurely old, and had suddenly felt a dead weight pulling the half of his living frame down into the grave, while the other half was as much alive as ever to struggle and to suffer. And he had come that way in search of the lost fountain of youth, seeking to recover the capacity to enjoy what he had given the best years of his life to gain.

There was a millionaire with his two sons, from his splendid mansion in New York, accupying, all summer, small-rooms with meagre accommodations, in a hot, thin, frame house, walking half a mile through dust and heat for every meal, travelling six times as far as the springs every day, and all to secure for those two sons, such benefit as the waters could give.

There was a young man who had crossed all the oceans and trodden all the continents, and experienced all the extremes of climate on the face of the globe, and he was expecting soon to start upon a three years' expedition in search of the North Pole, and he was there to gain strength and endurance to meet the icy rigors of the arctic zone. There was a widowed mother, who had expended all her living to reach the town with her only son. And she was a working as a servant for board in a private family, that her poor boy might drink the waters and live. There was a brave officer of the army who had passed through the fires of many a battle, and borne the fatigues of many campaigns, and come home from the four year's toil unable to rest. And he had travelled away northward hundreds of miles to that retired spot, in the hope that the peaceful hills and the healthful fountains might calm the tempest which the wild whirlwind of war had excited in his ardent mind and suffering nerves.

There were some who had exhausted the utmost resources of the healing art in the Old World, and they had crossed the ocean to seek relief from these healing springs among the hills of Vermont. There was a letter from Bismark, the iron-framed and iron-souled Prussian Minister of State, acknowledging himself indebted to these waters for the strength that enabled him to bear the terrible and crushing responsibilities of his post. There were the dark-browed children of the sun, who had left their genial home in the palmy isles of southern seas, that they might drink from these fountains of life and health among the rude and rocky hills of the North.

And all this gathering of old and young, rich and poor, from near and far, had been drawn together by the rumor that healing fountains had been found among these hills, and the diseased and suffering had only to drink and live. All this cost and toil and travel and deprivation had been cheerfully borne, in the hope of lengthening out lives that in any case must have much of weariness and pain. All this had been done to put off if possible a little longer a dreadful conflict which must inevitably come to all at last.

And when I saw all this eagerness to drink from earthly springs to prolong a life that may at any time become a burden, I said in my heart, "Oh that men were as much in earnest to drink of the water of life, to gain an everlasting residence in that land, where there shall be no more pain, and death itself shall die." These afflicted ones put forth great exertions, they travelled hundreds and thousands of miles, they made a free expenditure of time and money; in some instances they sacrificed all their possessions, they persevered under great discouragements, they even resisted remonstrance and ridicule that they might try the virtues of the healing waters for themselves. And they did all that, with the bare hope of checking for a time the inroad of disease upon bodies that must inevitably suffer, and in the end will certainly die. How much more reasonably may we put forth and incur every needed sacrifice to preserve the health and soundness of souls that may live in immortal youth, and enjoy the blessedness of an intelligent and perfect life for endless ages.—*Am. Reconciliation of Faith and Reason.

Among the faculties of the mind, faith indeed is to rule supreme, but not as a despot or a tyrant. It is by the help and with the consent of all the others, not by crushing and outlawing them, that faith would establish its dominion. It is not faith, but its troubled caricature, superstition, that regards philosophy as its enemy, that tramples upon science, and that persecutes those who establish the great and startling facts and laws of the material and the mental world.

There is a wide difference between beyond, and contrary to; if faith is beyond reason, by that very fact reason is unable to prove it either contradictory or accordant; it may just as easily be one as the other; and if reason's self assertion is so absolute as to declare that the idea of anything beyond its reach is contradictory and absurd, it reveals its own unreason and becomes presumption and folly. In denying religion, it makes a religion, and sets itself up as a god to be worshipped.

Reason itself, so far from excluding such a thing, ever points to something beyond itself. There are barriers to speculation which cannot be passed. There are some most common questions which the very childhood of each succeeding generation is able to ask, but which it baffles each succeeding generation of philosophers to answer. Reason is confessedly unable to solve just those problems which are of the highest practical value and interest to man. If a man die, shall he live again? How shall man be just with God? These are questions asked four thousand years ago, questions that men have asked ever since, and will continue to ask, and which it is not in the province of reason to answer; and yet men feel more deeply their need of an answer to them, than their need of the most brilliant results of mathematical or chemical or metaphysical analysis. In this sphere, reason herself is a beggar for light, and can do nothing but wait upon faith; can but point from her own bulky, but unsatisfying tomes, to the word of God as Urim and Thummim; and to the word made flesh, as the true light that lighted every man that cometh into the world.

The region of faith is thus beyond reason, and must in many respects be a surprise and an astonishment to reason; yet never could a reconciliation between the two be thought of, if it were admitted that the clearly understood objects of faith could be in open antagonism to the simple axioms of reason. It is in fact just here that reason can perform the most valuable and necessary service for faith; without which faith could have no criterion of the correctness of its own particular objects, and would be a mere vague instinct or appetite, or undeveloped capacity, or be subject to all the extravagances of an unbridled imagination. Reason may go hand in hand with these great, supreme instincts of our nature; may shelter them from imposture; may interpose its veto to prevent gross and palpable absurdities from being accepted as the most sublime realities. This service to faith is its highest function. It cannot indeed find the true God, but in feeling after Him, it can judge among the false ones, and when He is revealed it can recognize Him, and surrender all its faculties to be swallowed up in the glory of His attributes. It cannot originate the true system of theology, but discarding the false, it can arrange, methodize, develop and vindicate the facts divinely acquired by faith. It has no revelation of its own, but heeding faith's longing and faith's assurance that such there is in the world, reason examines the claims of various works of man to such a character, and thus guides faith to the veritable word of God, and helps to unfold the great decisive proofs that it is the Book of books. Reason alone suggests to us no miracles, rather the reverse; but guided by the unalterable instinct of faith, which in every age and nationality has affirmed and accepted them, reason discriminates the true from the false, and saves religion from becoming a mere mythology.

It is the business of reason to recognize the true relation of the faculties. It is in the exercise of reason, and not in its overthrow, that we fully discover and vindicate the supremacy of faith.

And who can but pity the mere reason that is determined to be satisfied with itself; that coldly dooms the spirit of man to the narrowness and the twilight of its own operations forever; that in divorcing itself as a Sadducee from spirit, indentifies itself with brute matter; and that raises darker and more awful problems in giving us man without a God, a world without a Creator, a conscience without an atonement, a sufferer without a consoler, infinite longings without infinite supplies, than any of the mysteries in religion at which it stumbles; who does not feel, that by the side of such direful perplexities, miracles, prayer, sovereignty and free-will are radiant with divine light and beauty?

Before the reason of the believer, how grand and inspiring is the prospect, when, in that wonderful transformation which makes even the body spiritual, the mind shall doubtless obtain a proportionate elevation above its former self, and when the objects of faith which now surpass its comprehension, shall be easily within its reach! Now they are like far-off hints, to the mere beginner, of the studies of the most advanced classes; then, the graduated soul shall have made them thoroughly its own. Now, we see through a glass darkly; but then face to face. Now, we know in part; but then we shall know even as we are known. It is only faith's triumph here that insures reason's triumph hereafter.—Am. Presbyterian.

Charity.

Charity represents love and is the harbinger of good to all who exercise it. Not alone to the receiver, but to the giver.

Charity is from the Lord, and represents that which in the hearts of men, is loving one another and doing good for the sake of the Master.

Without charity no sympathy would exist in the human race,

Society without it would be selfish and brutal. Each living for self without thought of one another.

Charity toward all is a kind and good rule to follow in life, looking for the good and noble, not the evil deeds of men.

Charity is exemplified by our Saviour in sacrificing himself for the sins of the world, i. e., He had charity and love for his people.

Charity is the watchword of love, reclaiming the intemperate and fallen from the curse that has control of them.

St. Paul says "follow after charity," and with this divine command sounding in our ears let us ever follow the angel of charity, loving and helping our fellow beings in the battle of life. Living not as selfishness would direct, but as the Lord commands.—Temperance Journal and Home Visitor.

A Bayonet Charge.

The Universalist well says: "For brevity point, comprehensiveness and appropriateness, the following excels any charge made to the people that we ever heard, or heard of. It was made by Rev. H. I. Campbell at the installation of Rev. E. Evans, over the Baptist Church in Barnston. P. Q. We find it in the Christian Era. Dear Brethren: I suggest that you pray for your minister daily; guard his reputation carefully; hear him preach weekly; listen to the word wakefully; treasure it up joyfully; practice it faithfully; labor with him sympathetically, both individually and collectively; attend the prayer and conference meeting constantly; support the Sabbath school heartily; subscribe for him liberally; pay him promptly; give him a bit of meat and a ball of butter occasionally; call on him frequently, but tarry briefly; greet him cordially but not rudely—and may the God of all grace bless you abundantly and add unto you daily such as shall be saved eternally. Amen."

Six Sermons on the Inquiry. Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the true teachings of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.

No. 1. Earth, not Heaven, is to be the inheritance of the saints. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 4. The Soul Saved or Lost. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 5. Moral Depravity; by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 7. Doom of the Ungodly: or The Wicked Dead remain eternally under Death's Dominion. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 8. The Wages of Sin; by a Presbyterian Clergyman. Price, 5 cents.

No. 10. Letters to a Clergyman; or Life only through Christ not a heresy; by Dr. J. K. Finley, Pittsburg, Pa. Price 5 cents.

The foregoing tracts are 16 pages octavo. They will be sold at $3 per 100, or, fifty cents per dozen, free of postage.

No. 9. The Essential Baptism; by the Editor of the Bible Examiner, 32 pages. Price 7 cents.

The following are 12mo Tracts, of 24 pages each

Man's Nature and Destiny; or the Animal Man and the Spiritual Man. A Sermon by Geo Storrs. Price 5 cents.

The Atonement, by Geo. Storrs, and The Gospel Hope, by the same; both works now printed in one Tract. Price 5 cents.

The postage to Canada and the British Provinces is also 20 cents a year, and must be prepaid in New York; for such papers, therefore, the price will be $2 20 a year or $1 10 for six months.

We can not undertake to prepay postage upon newspapers, except where the law obliges us to do so; that is, anywhere out of the United States.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ALL LETTERS relating to the HERALD OF LIFE, whether on business or other matter, must invariably be addressed:

GEO. STORRS, Box 4,658.
NEW YORK

ALL NAMES of persons, sent us, should be written plain, so that we shall not have to GUESS them out. Also in ordering, the name of the POST OFFICE, COUNTY, AND STATE must be given, and written plainly; and if a CHANGE is called for, state the Office to which the paper has previously been sent. Unless attention is paid to all these matters confusion and delay are inevitable.

TORMENT—ELECTION.

A SPECIAL correspondent of one of our New York dailies, making a visit to that richest and most beautiful of all spots in New England, the Connecticut River Valley, gives a graphic description of it, and especially that part lying in and immediately about Northampton. Entering somewhat largely upon the early history of that place, he remarks as follows concerning its primitive religious character.

That part of their theology which gave vitality, and which has impressed itself upon whatever remains valuable in the religions of our time, taught that the heavenly inheritance is to be secured by passing through the valley of humiliation; that tears are more joyful than laughter, and that a broken spirit is strong. In this is a profound philosophy, having analogies deep in the constitution of nature, and it is yet to be studied by the help of what light science and the highest civilization can give. The other part of their theology seemed not founded upon any principles to which either the natural or the cultivated mind could give assent, although it was taught with persistency and power. To doze under the drone of a single preacher for half a century; to be taught that the many are foreordained to eternal damnation, that the few are elected to unending bliss; that the human heart is so utterly depraved as to be like a nest filled with a foul brood, over which God holds his hand; that when the unbaptized infant dies, its little spirit is plunged into never-ending torment, as a consequence of Adam's fall, and to reject every new idea as a fatal heresy is to bind with shackles which the natural mind abhors. Still, these doctrines were received with scarcely a dissent, scarcely a murmur, such was the vigor and solemnity with which they were taught, and the manner of teaching spread from Northampton, as from a centre, to all parts of the country. The agony which young and inquiring minds have endured under this preaching was almost insupportable, and many must have gone mad. With wondering eyes a child beheld a good and honest man walk the house for hours, the sweat drops falling, while a preacher sat by the fire urging him to give his heart away. He was willing, but the great question was unanswered; not till the last scenes and the grave were passed could it be answered, "was he of the elect?" For if he were not of the elect, his giving of his heart away, his claim, even his hope of belonging to the happy throng would plunge him deeper still in misery to which he was foreordained. Years passed, the question was unanswered, prayers, agonies, and fears filled the life; finally the grave opened, but a hope never came.

It was proper that when a day of deliverance from these doctrines should come, it should appear in New England. This event was of such importance that it is deserving of a particular history; but it has not yet been written. Unitarianism was an indignant, a manly, and a defiant protest, but following this, as the Northampton theologians had prophesied, came infidelity, skepticism, fine arts, bad English and French infamies. Then, for the first time, a new church was established in Northampton taking the name of the Edwards Church; but such was the might of those old Presbyterians, that to-day their church is spoken of as the Orthodox, and it is more popular than any other. It is singular, however, that they call themselves "Congregationalists," but this they do in acknowledgment of the power of the Reformation.

As this part of New England was many years the home, and the seat of nearly all the religious labors of Jonathan Edwards, let us, in connection with the above, read a description, by that celebrated divine, of what was then believed to be the condition of the finally impenitent.

"But to help your conception, imagine yourselves to be cast into a fiery oven, all of a glowing heat, or into the midst of a glowing brick-kiln, or of a great furnace; imagine, also, that your body was to be there for a quarter of an hour, full of fire, as full within and without as a bright coal of fire, all the while full of quick sense; how long would that quarter of an hour seem to you? . . . . But what would be the effect on your soul, if you knew you must endure the torment twenty-four hours? How much greater if for a year! for a thousand years! O, then, how would your heart sink if you knew you must endure it forever and ever! that after millions of millions of ages your torment would be no nearer an end than when it began! But your torments in hell will be immensely greater than this illustration represents!!"

And the doctor further said on this subject, "The woes of sinners in hell will not be a cause of grief to saints in heaven, but of rejoicing. This rejoicing will be the fruit of an amiable disposition, and a perfect holiness and conformity to Christ. . . . After your godly parents shall have seen you lie in hell millions of ages, in torment day and night, they will not begin to pity you then; they will praise God that his justice appears in the eternity of your misery."

So conspicuously do these blasphemous doctrines present self-condemnation that comment is really unnecessary. Mankind, said the theology most prevalent in New England in that day, are divided into two classes; one being predetermined by God to eternal life, and to that end are given grace in such measure that they cannot fail of it; the other predetermined to such a condition of endless suffering as Edwards pictured, and though they receive a gift of grace it is insufficient to enable them to escape that incomprehensibly awful doom. What a position. A burning hell awaiting, into the scorching depths of which infants were every moment being thrust; while the minds of the most devoted Christians could never for one waking hour be free from the harrowing thought that after all their strifes and self-denying struggles, after all their prayers and groans and tears, they might find themselves consigned to it as their eternally ordained home!

How eminently meet is it that they who attempt to maintain the application of such principles to divine government should deeply suffer these distractions that must inevitably result to thinking minds. True to the life, and oft in life portrayed must have been the picture of a child beholding with wondering eyes "a good and honest man walk the house for hours, the sweat drops falling, while a preacher sat by urging him to give his heart away." As doubts of his election throng on him and, mingling with questionings of divine goodness and justice, present a barrier to his enlistment under the banner of Christ, all unmindful of the reason why, the preacher presses, with increased fervor and vigor, the revolting point.

To what could these doctrines lead but Universalism in all its phases? "Unitarianism" in its most ultra forms? "Skepticism" and "infidelity." No such fruitful sources of infidelity ever existed as those God-defaming doctrines, unconditional election and reprobation, and eternal torment. They have driven their tens of thousands into the "outer darkness" of eternal death. Though they are yet professedly held by not a few, the increasing light of truth has almost silenced the preaching of them. Fast falling are they into such deep dishonor that their very existence will ere long be remembered only with shame, save gratitude for their overthrow.

No doctrine can be found in God's word not based on principles to which, when understood, the mind cannot give unqualified "assent." The great principle underlying and overlying all others is love; universal, unrestricted love. Disconnect from this the worse than human vindictiveness of aimless punishment and both "the natural" and "the cultivated mind" will not only give "assent," but will cheerfully consent to yield to its ennobling and sanctifying power.

NEW YORK, November, 1868.

"PREPARE WAR."

BR. STORRS: Will you insert the following from the Philadelphia Inquirer, with my remarks? W. S. CAMPBELL.

PEACE BY READINESS FOR WAR.

A curious point in European politics is, that those nations which protess to have the most ardent desire for peace, are preparing for war, and that to such an immense extent as to exceed anything heretofore known in national experience. The "Empire is peace," says Napoleon, and he goes on raising his conscripts by thousands, preparing prodigious numbers of Chassepot rifles, cannon, sabres, shell, shot, ball and gunpowder until France is a vast arsenal. This is all done in the interest of peace. Prussia keeps a little ahead of France in her military operations, but Prussia protests that she means nothing but peace. Austria was believed, after the disaster of Sadowa, and the avowal of her determination to cultivate the good feeling of her own population, to be out of the sphere of great military ambition. She had determined to mind her own business, and it was believed that she might reduce her armies with safety. But Austria has suddenly become infected with the prevalent mania. It has been determined to increase her army very materially, and to the unwilling Reichsrath, Baron VON BEUST imparted a secret, which had the effect to secure to him the necessary authority. The increase of the army was voted, and this being a matter which was sure to attract the attention and excite the apprehension of other nations, it is declared that "the policy of Austria is peace." Thirty thousand men are to be added to the standing army, which will increase it to eight hundred thousand, and this number of men, it is said, constitutes the army "on a peace footing." It is a very heavy sacrifice, made to peace which keeps this number of men out of the workshops and the fields; but as long as the Continent of Europe is ruled by monarchs, nothing else can be expected. Standing armies are necessary to keep them upon their thrones, to restrain the liberties of their subjects, and to protect them from the ambitious schemes of rival monarchs. When Europe becomes republican, the peoples of adjoining nations will be willing to trust each other, without the necessity of keeping up vast armies to maintain the peace. But monarchs dare not rely on the honor of each other or upon the submission of their subjects, and, hence, the military affliction which the whole Continent of Europe suffers is, and must continue to be, a necessity.

The nations of the European Continent, here referred to, seem to stand in the light where the Scripture has placed them; for they say "Peace, peace; when there is no peace." There can be none in the nature of the case. The whole condition now is merely a restraint upon war. And the jealousy of the powers is so great that this restraint cannot long last.

The Continent of Europe is "ruled by monarchs," and by whom else can it be ruled while time shall last? Hence, we do not see that the prospect of permanent peace is flattering at all. If peace cannot be, war must come.

If it takes such immense armies and armaments to preserve the peace of Europe, then the spirit of war must be right, and nothing is wanting but some fancied or real cause of contention to set the whole in a flame; or some one of these mighty Gladiators, who may number up his standing army by the million—"a peace footing" designed to show his neighbors that he will do very much "after his own will" and waiting to "begin the fray"—sees a favorable opportunity to enlarge his dominion, or increase the influence of his government, and the final great battle is begun! For what else could it be, were a general war to begin in Europe now? At this time, in the prophetic time, what should come but that? When the Emperor Napoleon III. says the Empire is peace, the world has good reason to believe that he lies to conceal his real designs. And so with the others. There is no peace in their hearts; none in their plans.

It is only in their words, which may be the oily syllables of peace, but their whole intent is to fight. When men therefore cry, "peace and safety," as they do, what, in all the plans of the rulers of the world, looks like it? Is there not a fearful reason to believe that the judgment upon the nations is soon to be more fully manifested? God has a controversy with them; and they will, by the very weight and immense extent of their preparations for war in the time of peace, become prepared to overwhelm each other in ruin. There is nothing now to hinder Napoleon from proceeding to any extent in preparation for war, and they are not all to be wasted without an effort. The same may be said of Prussia and of Austria; the latter a poor government in its finances, and yet able to keep up a standing army of eight hundred thousand men. God said "Prepare war. Wake up the mighty men." Just what they do! and yet they say, "peace." The great fact that the governments of the old world are oppressive, and have been so for ages, in whatever form of administration, calls for their overthrow; but while the masses call for amelioration and reform they do not seem to be ready to govern themselves. The hope is not in the establishment of Republican liberty; but in the coming of the King who is to occupy the Throne of David in its restored glory. They who hope to hold the world in chains, and they who hope for the blessings of a free government all over the Continent of Europe, equally deceive themselves.

I noticed that the Church party in Spain was with the Queen. This is simply to say, that the Pope and Priests were for her. I see that the Jesuits have been expelled from Spain. What of it? They will return, as in other instances, when they will. They are not even known to be driven out. The Pope has offered the exiled Queen an asylum in one of his palaces, Fit resort of Isabella to Rome. But Spain will have a King.

FUGITIVE THOUGHTS.

ACCORDING to the usus loquendi it may be said, there are legions of spirits in man, corresponding in character each to the number of the lusts of the flesh. Without naming each one separately, let it suffice to mention a few. Prominent among them is the spirit of avarice, or the love of money. This unquestionably is the master spirit, the root of all evil, the spirit-devil, that leads men to destruction and perdition. Take the spirit of pride, and vain glory, a haughty spirit, spirit of ambition—an egotistical spirit, a spirit of envy, a spirit of hatred, a spirit of anger, a spirit of revenge, a spirit of enmity, a spirit of malice, a vindictive spirit, a spirit of self-conceit, the love of flattery or fulsome adulation, and to each of the lusts of the flesh, prefix the word spirit, and how plainly may be seen what a legion of evil spirits, or devil-spirits, (no myths,) are really in the heart of man, which is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked.

"Vide—audi—tace." It is good to see the truth, to hear it—believe it. There is a refined delicacy, I perhaps might have said, a reluctancy in most preachers to speak of those fashionable amusements so fraught with evil tendencies and repugnant to the purity and delicacy of a chaste and virtuous person, so contrary to the spirit of Jesus Christ. But Paul, the inspired writers, did not withhold any thing profitable, and yet felt no indelicacy in painting vice in all its odious forms, and exposing the lusts of the flesh. And a few faithful watchmen, this day, paint alarmingly the prevalence of vice in the Northern States. "It seems," say they, "as if the laxity and rapidly spreading immorality of modern life were beginning to make boast of its unhallowed influence among the people. Indecent personal exposure in society, immoral exhibitions and dances at the theatres, obscene illustrations in papers at the street newsstands, columns of wicked temptations to abortion and disgusting details of diseased immorality advertised in the public journals, the miserable catalogue grows too degrading for rehearsal, but it is a startling and terrible reality none the less.

The methodist Protestant says: "The above reminds us of a large colored show-bill, that was posted in various places about our city—not many days ago. The prominent figure consisted of a female equestrian, whose scant garments exposed her person in a manner revolting to decency. What was this but an intimation to sensual men that their prurient curiosity might be gratified by the payment of fifty cents? And yet we heard of no action taken by our city authorities to abate the nuisance. We saw nothing in the daily papers condemnatory of the abomination. On the contrary the circus was puffed by the newspapers and patronized by the public. More than this, we will venture to say that among the crowds that thronged the circus were not a few women, witnessing—we hope not applauding—the spectacle of female degradation. And this circus . . . . will go through the land, numbering among its patrons, not only the immoral and abandoned, but even professors of religion!! Shame on the church members that will so dishonor Christ!"

Here is but an imperfect picture of wickedness for the labor or instruction of any man, who, in his own conceit, thinks he can photograph a spirit devil outside of the man or woman carried away by the lusts of the flesh. What unclean spirits! devils—ye shall know them by their fruits—the works of the flesh "earthly, sensual, devilish."

"But the wisdom that is from above is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits." What a lovely picture, the emanation of love, the gift of God, who is Love. O sacred, heavenly love! how dear, how delightful are thy enjoyments! Contentment crowns thy table (godliness with contentment)—affection glads thy fireside, the modest but intense, the chaste but ardent passion sighs on thy couch, the atmosphere of heaven, and sheds even upon the dwelling of calamity the radiance of its benign and lovely consolation. It is full of mercy and good fruits. It has no disguises or deceits. It is without hypocrisy. It works no evil. It is a living principle that leads its possessor to abhor evil, to abhor flattery, fulsome adulation, and will expel all unclean, unholy spirits. It is the spirit of Christ, shining brightly in the conduct and heart of every true believer. Sincere, open, steady, uniform and consistent with itself; sowing the fruits of righteousness in peace, its end will be honor, glory, immortality, Eternal Life. Amen.

"Ye adulterers, and adulteresses; know ye not that the friendship of the world is enmity with God? Whom therefore will be a friend of the world, is a enemy of God." The Holy Scriptures give us such a description of the natural man, animal, sufficient surety to lead every candid inquirer after truth to know, that all the evil and wickedness manifest in the world may be found in the hearts of men and women, evil, only evil and that continually. The natural corruption of the human heart shows itself so plainly, that it is surprising men should lose sight of it, and wander in the regions of fancy to find out a spirit-devil—the origin of all evil, and make a belief in him essential to orthodoxy. "The love of money is the root of all evil." It answereth all things—and when obtained by the natural man it is consumed on his lusts and leads him to destruction and perdition.

I cannot help, in the conclusion of these fugitive thought to recommend all men, whether preachers or worldly wise, who believe in a spirit-devil, to search the Scriptures—to read and study carefully the word of God, descriptive of fallen man and his destiny—and as no small aid, to study the "Theology of the Bible, by O. S. Halstead"—"Bible vs. Tradition,"—and "Life only in Christ," by George Storrs—together with his sermon on "The natural man and the spiritual man." There are, no doubt, some who have acquired a knowledge of the truth, some truths, through his writings, and may now fancy they know more than their instructor. But a little modesty, a small sprinkling of humility, might no doubt cure them of tnat egotism and vanity, and even the love of flattery, whose ear marks are so conspicuous in some of their acts. May God incline us all to be humble, teachable, and save us from self conceit. May he aid us to do his will, that we may be transformed in the renewing of our minds, and conformed to the image of His Son, Jesus Christ. Amen. Your brother in Christ, etc.

JESUS' WORDS OF ENCOURAGEMENT.

"Jesus said, a woman hath sorrow because her hour is come; but when she is delivered of the child, she remembers no more the anguish for joy that a man is born into the world."

WHO that has experienced the sufferings of maternity and the consequent joy, especially a Christian mother, but realizes in some measure the force of this illustration of the Saviour when he coupled this with his second coming, saying, "Ye now have sorrow, but I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice, and your joy no man taketh from you." They sorrowed then most of all that the beloved object on whom their hopes and expectations centred had told them that he was about to leave them. They had heard him request the Father not to take them away, but keep them from the evil of the world. Jesus foresaw the conflicts that awaited them; that they would indeed drink of his cup and be baptized with his baptism. He also well understood the sufferings that would overtake his members throughout that dispensation for his body's sake, which is his church; yet, as an antidote for all this, I will see you again. How much of peace and pure joy is embodied in these few words, or, if I go away I will come again. They had listened to his request that the Father would suffer them to be where he was that they might behold his glory. How immensely rich with consolation were these promises and intimations in sorrow's dark night. When he blessed them and from Olivet ascended, as they watched his receding form until a cloud intercepted their vision, the glad tidings announced by the angels that he would come again in like manner, so electrified them that with light hearts and buoyant steps they returned to the city, and were with one accord in one place, praising God. We learn from the writings of the apostles that this glorious anticipation nerved them in all their conflicts; prison walls resounded with their melody when they remembered that he would come again. Paul said, a crown awaited him; also all that loved his appearing. Peter said, they followed no cunningly devised fable when they made known the power and coming of the Lord Jesus. He rested with confidence in his promise to create a new heaven and a new earth wherein would dwell righteousness. Jude corroborates the above testimony, saying that all the prophets from Enoch had foretold the same. John unites in the same rich theme. The last words of Jesus, through him, that have echoed down the corridors of time are, "Behold I come quickly;" to which he joyfully responded, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus." What is to be the result of seeing him again? "Your heart shall rejoice." O, what joy! The corner stone, elect, precious, come to dwell with men; come to feast the eyes of every believing heart. While the enemies of Jesus would weep and lament, they would rejoice. While some would cry for sorrow of heart, and howl for vexation of Spirit, they will rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory. The exceeding weight of glory now appears. Yet to be augmented as age after age rolls over the believers, without diminution or decay. Imagine it, ye who can; the human intellect is insufficient to grasp the mighty thought. The Infinite, who weighs the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance, can comprehend the magnitude of his promises or the results of his love.

"Your joy no man taketh from you." Gone forever the tongue of slander, the false accuser, the boasting hypocrite, the proud Pharisee and persecutor, the scoffer and blasphemer perished—made like ashes under the soles of the feet—gone pain, sickness, sorrow, temptation, sin and death; they shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more, neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat, but the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne, shall lead them unto living fountains, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; one universal pean of praise, honor and thanksgiving shall mingle in delightful harmony from all intelligences to him that sitteth upon the throne and the Lamb. With such prospects in view, beloved brothers and sisters in Jesus Christ, we can well afford to wait and watch, labor and suffer, if need be, that our Master may be honored by us. Let us, then, put our hands to the work of scattering the light of truth without faltering—seeking not our own, but the things that are Jesus Christ's, esteeming reproach for Christ greater riches than the treasures of earth. LUCRETIA B. LAMB.

ST. PAUL, MINN., Oct., 1868.

LOVE TO THE CREATOR.

THIS feeling, which lies at the foundation of all religion, may exist in two forms, as a sentiment and as a principle. When any impulse arises in the mind, the will must take action upon it; if it approves, and resolves to encourage it, and act according to its promptings, it then becomes a principle. But if the impulse be slighted, or indulged as a mere feeling, and not suffered to work itself out into action, then it dies out, or exists only as a vague and dreamy sentiment. Thus, we often find persons who intellectually appear to possess this sentiment of love to the Creator, without its exhibiting any active power; and there are those who can speak touching and sublime expressions on the subject, while indulging in the most unworthy conduct. Just as in nature, though no rose could blossom without the vital energy that only the Author of creation can impart, yet no garden can thoroughly please the eye without the care of man to dress and to keep it; so the feeling of love to God implanted in the hearts must be nourished, it influence is to be maintained. The feeling of love within us is only available when used by our own free choice and will and determined energy of action. Socrates asked an atheistic friend if he had not observed that man is never so well disposed to serve the Deity as in that part of life when reason bears the greatest sway, and the judgment is in its full strength and maturity, and that those kingdoms and commonwealths most renowned for their wisdom and antiquity are those whose piety and devotion have been the most observable. Every man must have some ruling principle; every character some ruling force. Goodness can never be negative, or simply innocent. It must be positive and earnest. We love innocence in a child, but strong, active, living virtue is necessary to goodness in a man, and this can only be obtained by the careful cultivation of the living principle of love to the Creator. It is this vital force that gives courage, wisdom and strength; that lightens the most wearisome duties and soothes the saddest sorrows. There are people rigid in battling against heresy, and denouncing opinions different from their own, who are yet utterly lacking in the deep foundation principle from which all such opinions ought to spring. The honorable lawyer ever keeps in view the fundamental principles of legal morality, in all his argument and practice, while the mere pettifogger will quibble about petty technicalities, mistaking them for the essence of the law. Many persons mistake the love of a sect for the love of God. But far above all sects, and all parties, is the love of truth, to which our allegiance should even be supreme. To cultivate most successfully this principle we must cease to cherish whatever is inconsistent with it. It is a law of our physical nature that the vital force directed to one function is by so much absorbed from the others. The supreme love of business or pleasure, or honor, will be sufficient of itself to stifle and eradicate this principle, which if cherished and trained, will rise above all other affections, and develop the entire charecter. The careful regulation of the body, the training of the mind, and the discipline of the moral faculties, all conduce to this end. The power of habit cannot be overrated, and religious habits are, like the pressure of the atmosphere, silent and uniform, but all-pervading. This love of the Creator, cherished and cultivated as the supreme and ruling principle of life, is the secret of all true happiness. He who possesses it need not fear calamities or reverses, for they will come to him as the wise dispensation of a kind and loving Father, who cannot err; and all his joys will be enhanced by the filial gratitude that will pervade his breast.

YE SHALL SEE THE SON OF MAN.

THE following was published some time ago in the HERALD OF LIFE, but I have been requested to send it again for the benefit of some who are seeking for light. LOUISA J. BEACH.

Jesus said to the high priest, "Hereafter shall ye see the son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven." Matt. xxvi., 64.

There is no proof here that the high priest, to whom this language was spoken, will be alive when the Lord comes, or that he in person will ever see the Lord. This passage fails to show that there will ever be a resurrection from the dead of either good or bad. All through the Bible we find the second person used to designate a class. See the 27th, 28th, 29th, 30th chapters of Deut. "When ye shall pass over Jordan." Then Moses goes on to tell them what they should do after they should come into the land, using the words thee, thou ye, and you, extending them on for nearly two thousand years. Not you individuals who hear me speak to-day, but ye or you—the Jews. So in the New Testament. Matt. xxiv., 33, "So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near." 44th verse, "Therefore be ye also ready." Matth. xxviii., 20, "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." Luke xxi., 31, "So likewise ye, when ye see things come to pass, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand." 1 Thess., v., 4, "But ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief." That is, ye or you, brethren, who may be alive at that time. So Christ spoke to the high priest as a Jew, "Hereafter shall ye—Jews—my persecutors, see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven." This passage will be strictly fulfilled though that priest should never have a resurrection.

Rev. i., 17, Behold, he cometh with clouds; and every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him." This also will be strictly fulfilled, though that one soldier who pierced Christ should never live again. The Jews as a people pierced Christ, and as a people will be here, as they ever have been, when Christ comes, and of course will see him coming: For, this generation is not to pass away till all these things are fulfilled.

J. S. WHITE, in Crisis.

The Soul a Germ.

We find the following in a work entitled "Class Book of Botany," by Alphonso Wood, A. M.

"Entering life as a mere germ, the soul expands into intelligence and virtue, through teaching of surrounding objects and influences."

There is no doubt but the author of the above work means by soul, the human mind. But the thing that is strange in this paragraph is that the same author believes the soul, or mind of man is immortal. Being immortal, how can it increase in virtue? Can an immortal being be anything but virtuous? Immortality is an essential attribute of Deity. Being such it follows that our immortality comes to us by divine bestowment only. When, therefore, a being becomes immortal, whether by creation or otherwise, that immortality makes him to be possessed of the nature of God. Just so far, then, as an individual is possessed of the God nature he is in possession of a nature whose only promptings are to perfected holiness. If man is immortal, his immortal mind or soul is the overruling motive power of every action. All his emotions must be biased, and absolutely governed by this immortal entity. How, then, is it possible for that mind or soul to be anything but unerringly virtuous by its own inherent nature? How, then, can it "expand into virtue" by being instructed by its surroundings? Everything with which we are surrounded that belongs to this world, is very imperfect. How can the study or contemplation of objects that are certainly more or less imperfect cause an entity in man whose impulses, aspirations and motives are perfection itself to "expand into virtue?" Does not the very language of this quotation assert, virtually, that the soul when it enters life is absolutely destitute of virtue? Mark, the learned author does not say the soul expands in virtue, but it expands into virtue, and that through a knowledge of surrounding objects and influences. Now to say that a soul, which in its inherent nature is immortal can be educated into a condition of virtue by such instrumentalities, is simply absurd. From what source comes this muddle? We answer, every man acquainted with the laws of our being, as they exist in fact, is compelled to see as Mr. Wood does, that the human mind at the first is "a mere germ." In fact, that at the first it possesses no more than the mere animal instincts common to all animals. That for the possession of knowledge on all subjects the child, the man is dependent on instruction. No more conclusive argument than this could possibly be urged in proof that Adam's race is wholly and unconditionally mortal.

S. W. Bishop.

Distinctions in the Gospels.

It is no accident that the New Testament contains four gospels instead of one. There are important differences in them, which are thus brought out by an English Bishop in a lecture on the life of Christ:

"1. In regard to their external features and characteristics:

"The point of view of the first gospel is mainly Israelite; of the second, Gentile; of the third, Universal; of the fourth, Christian.

"The general aspect, and, so to speak, physiognomy of the first, namely, is Oriental; of the second, Roman; of the third, Greek; of the fourth, Spiritual.

"The style of the first is stately and rhythmtical; of the second, terse and precise; of the third, calm and copious; of the fourth, artless and colloquial.

"The most striking characteristic of the first is symmetry; of the second compression; of the third, order; of the fourth, system.

"The thought and language of the first are both Hebraistic; of the third, both Hellenistic, while in the second thought is often Occidental, though the language is Hebraistic; and in the fourth the language is Hellenistic, but the thought Hebraistic.

"2. In respect to their subject matter and contents:

"In the first gospel we have narrative; in the second memoirs; in the third, history; in the fourth, dramatic portraiture.

"In the first we often have the record of events in their accomplishments; in the second, events in detail; in the third, events in their connection; in the fourth, events in relation to the teaching springing from them.

"Thus in the first we often meet with the notice of impressions; in the second of facts; in the third of motives; in the fourth of words spoken.

"And, lastly, the record of the first is mainly collective, and often antithetical; of the second, graphic and circumstantial; of the third, didactic and reflective; of the fourth, selective and supplemental.

"3. In respect to their portraiture of our Lord:

"The first presents Him to us merely as the Messiah; the second mainly as the God-man; the third as the Redeemer; the fourth, as the only-begotten Son of God."

A Quiet Life—For my part, seeing the victims of fast life falling around me, I have willingly abandoned the apparent advantages of such a life and preferred less popularity, less gains, and the enjoyment of a sound mind in a sound body, the blessings of a quiet domestic life, and a more restricted, but not a less enjoyable circle of society. I am now approaching my seventy-fifth year. I cannot, indeed say, vigorous as I am, that I have reached this age without the assistance of doctors, for I have had constant attendance of those four famous ones—temperance, exercise, good air, and good hours.—Wm. Howitt.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

Orthodox "Damnation."

We find an article in The Advance on the subject "A Truth to be Preached," by "Wm. Patton, D. D., New Haven, Ct." The author seems in earnest to enforce the obligation of ministers to preach, "He that believeth not shall be damned." He would have this point enforced. The commission of Christ to his disciples "places salvation and damnation as the opposites of each other," he says. We agree with him in this statement; the only question is, What is the damnation? We trust he has made a statement by which he and his co-religionists will be willing to abide in the following remarks. He says,

It is a perversion of language to speak of salvation where there is no danger. All men instinctively know that the greatness of the salvation is measured by the greatness of the peril. Hence there can be no meaning or significance in the gospel of peace and salvation unless those for whom it is designed are in a state of enmity and condemnation. Punishment for disobedience equally with reward for obedience is designed, in the moral government of God, for good. That the motive for obedience might be the strongest possible, the reward is eternal life; and that the motive to dissuade from sin might be the strongest possible, the penalty is eternal damnation. Benevolence as well as equity demand that these fundamental principles in the moral government of God should be unalterable. Hence the great commission presents these same intensest motives for faith, and against unbelief. To the believer it is salvation, eternal life; and to the unbeliever it is damnation, eternal death. The punishment is as enduring as the reward, as each is made applicable to the same person according to his character.

In the sentiments thus expressed we most fully agree with our orthodox brother—"eternal damnation" is condemnation to "eternal death." That is his definition; in it we are at perfect agreement with him. Dr. Patton goes on to say,

There is in the commission no foundation for the sentiment, quite too common at the present time, that the question of eternal damnation is one of minor importance, and should not be made prominent or obligatory as an article of faith or of preaching, but that all prominence should be given to the salvation by Christ.

Thus he seems somewhat alarmed that "eternal damnation" is not "at the present time" made as "prominent" as it should be. We will suggest to him the reason why it is not. The general orthodox idea that eternal damnation means eternal torments is so abhorrent to the human mind, and so opposed to the revealed character of a just, holy, almighty and loving God, that it has become unpopular to preach such a doctrine "at the present time," when men dare to think for themselves, and act upon the Protestant principle that "The Bible is the only authoritative rule of faith and practice." They will not allow those who profess to be ministers to construe the language of the Bible in such manner as to contradict the general tenor of that book and all the known perfections of God.

That orthodoxy has done this, in times past, in relation to the punishment of the sinner, men begin to see so clearly that it takes more courage to continue such representations than most ministers, in "the present time," are in possession of; and we are glad to see that Dr. Patton has had the boldness to define the punishment to be "eternal death." If he and his fellow ministers will stand to that definition of the term damnation, he may soon see the doctrine of the eternal punishment of the impenitent and unbelieving wicked held up as prominent as salvation or "eternal life" itself.

The Doctor deprecates the seeming neglect of the pulpit to preach on the damnation of the wicked in the following language:

It is a question of serious moment, whether the pulpit has not, for the past twenty years, allowed this great revealed truth that eternal punishment is the inevitable portion of all who die impenitent and unbelieving, measurably to drop out of sight? Not that it is rejected, but that it has not held that prominence which Christ has given to it in the great commission to preach the gospel. By reason of this comparative silence an uninstructed generation has grown up, easily accessible to the wiles of the adversary. Because this one revealed truth has such feeble hold of the convictions of professing Christians, we find that worldliness sweeps unrestrained through many so-called orthodox churches.

Thus it becomes evident that orthodox notions about eternal punishment being eternal torture, have ceased to be preached as they were more than "twenty years" since. A revolution is going on in the minds of multitudes of the ministers of orthodox churches, but alas, its progress is so slow for fear of the Sanhedrims of those churches, that there is danger of the people being led into Universalism, Restorationism, or Spiritism; for the ministers of orthodoxy cannot force themselves to preach eternal torments any longer; and before they are ready to venture to incur the church's censure for preaching that "the wages of sin is death," yes, "eternal death," their flocks may get "swept" away by "worldliness," into the pool of indifference as to a future life.

Let, then, this "one revealed truth," that "the wages of sin is death"—a death that is eternal to all unbelievers, be preached; and that unless a union is now formed with Christ, the Life-giver, they will "remain in the congregation of the dead" eternally, and we think the "so-called orthodox churches" will see a revival more glorious than they have ever yet witnessed.

By the foregoing remarks we do not wish to create the impression that Dr. Patton has abandoned the idea that damnation means eternal torment; though he does not use any such expression in the article before us, yet he employs the term damnation so frequently, that one might be led to suppose he still adheres to the old orthodox meaning of the term; but, as he has not here given any other definition of it than "eternal death," we are led to desire that he may stand by that without counting it a figurative expression. If he really means death by the phrase "eternal death," then we heartily join with him in his concluding remarks, as follows:

As they [professing Christians], have no clear convictions of the teachings of the Bible on this subject, they do not recognize any obligation, on their part, personally to labor for the salvation of their fellow men. As they view their impenitent children around their table, they do not think of them as now under condemnation and needing salvation But let this conviction take firm hold of them, and how altered would be their conduct. How earnest they would be, not for the worldly show and parade of their children in the giddy whirl of fashionable life, but for the spiritual welfare of their families. And this same conviction would wake up benevolent, Christ-like effort for the salvation of others beyond the home circle—would crowd the meetings for prayer, would sustain all well directed efforts, and thus fill to repletion all houses of worship.

Let me affectionately and earnestly speak a word to my younger brethren. I have found, in a ministry of fifty years, that giving proper prominence to that portion of the great commission which tells of certain eternal damnation to the unbelieving, has always been an element of great power. This truth, solemn beyond all human conception, must not be presented in a harsh and denunciatory manner, as though we rejoiced in their doom, but in tenderness and love, with the spirit with which Christ wept over Jerusalem. Oh, fill your hearts with the fearful intensity of this revealed truth—fill your hearts with the tender love of Christ, and then tell your people with humility and tenderness and tears that there is no other alternative, that every person must believe on Christ or be eternally lost. It is the firm conviction of this ruin that gives life, and power, and glory, and success to the gospel of salvation. Try it, brethren; for the love of Christ and souls try it.

Torment Theories make Void Atonement.

1. Life from the dead to torment and kill again is a heresy, because it makes void the atonement by Christ.

If a resurrection from the dead with torment after and dying a second time "is the wages of sin," or the penalty of the law, then how is an atonement to be made? Did Christ die twice? Did He rise from the dead and suffer torment for awhile and then die again? If not, how are his sufferings and death once an atonement for sin? or how did he vindicate the claims of the law, seeing he did not come under its penalty at all? Surely, this new invention of penalty strikes down the atonement, as Christ did not come under any such "curse of the law." In this sense of the penalty, he was not "made a curse for us." But the apostle affirms, "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us." Gal. iii., 13.

Here, then, we plant ourself—Christ has not "redeemed us" at all—as he did not suffer such "a curse" as that of life from the dead to be tormented and die again—or the penalty for sin was to die "once," and not two deaths, as maintained by the advocates of a future life to the wicked, with torment and another death. Such a doctrine is a virtual denial of the atonement and "Christ is become of no effect" for salvation "from the curse of the law," according to that theory. But "Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him." "He died unto sin once"—"Christ was once offered for sin." Rom. vi, 9, 10. Heb. ix., 28. If once in death is not "the wages of sin," we repeat it, no atonement is made, and there is no deliverance for any child of man from the curse of the law.

To our mind it is a self-evident truth that no wicked man dying in his sins, will ever live again; his death is final and eternal; he is "holden with the cords of his sins," and "utterly perishes in his own corruption." Prov. v., 22. 2 Pet. ii., 12.

2. The doctrine of eternal hell torments is a heresy, because it utterly ignores the atonement.

Neither this theory nor the previous one rejects the atonement professionally, but they both do in fact. The advocates of this last named doctrine clearly deny the atonement.

Zion's Herald of the 5th instant, in its first article, "The Only Way," says,

It was not possible that any greater means for our redemption should have been devised. To substitute the divine Son for the guilty, hell-deserving criminal, is the costliest price that heaven could have paid. The eternal Father could not have made a more valuable sacrifice, nor the eternal Son a more meritorious offering. When the "True God" received in his own person the death-penalty for man's transgressions, divine power and divine love were exhausted.

Thus, then, "the eternal Son," yea, the 'True God' received in his own person the death-penalty for man's transgressions;" He became, says Zion's Herald, the "substitute for the guilty, hell-deserving criminal." If the Son became a "substitute," and "received in his own person the death-penalty for man," etc., then no atonement is yet made if eternal torment is the "death-penalty," because there is no end to such torment, and the Son of God or the "True God," is suffering still, and will be eternally if eternal torment is the penalty and "the divine Son" is the "substitute." Surely no sinner can be so bold as to claim the benefit of an atonement where the "substitute" has failed to "receive in his own person" the penalty of sin. And the Son has utterly failed, and must eternally fail to make an atonement, if the orthodox theory of the death-penalty is true; the doctrine of atonement is ignored by it.

It is true Zion's Herald does not say that eternal torture is the "penalty for man's transgressions;" and we have a hope that our respected brethren of the Methodist E. Church are beginning to "see men as trees walking," and that another touch of the divine Son's finger of truth will enable them to see clearly that the penalty is a "death-penalty" truly, and not a figure of speech. Perhaps our respected Br. of Zion's Herald does see it already, but thinks his weaker brethren "are not able to bear it now."

"The death-penalty for man's transgressions" the Son did receive "in his own person; that is "the Son of man," Christ Jesus, who had become bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh; or, had taken "flesh and blood;" and thus clothed with perfect manhood, though he knew no sin, suffered "the death-penalty;" not as a "substitute" for sinners, as Zion's Herald saith, but to vindicate the claim of the divine law in taking the life of all men for sin. To do this he shed his "blood, which is the life of the flesh," (see Lev. xvi., 14), and thus laid down the life by blood, never to resume it—it was a final and eternal sacrifice of that principle of life; and being thus "put to death in the flesh" He was "quickened, [made alive from the dead] by the Spirit." 1 Pet. iii., 18.

If Christ had died as a "substitute," no man could now die, and no sinner could perish or be lost; because "Jesus, by the grace of God, tasted death for every man." See Heb. ii., 9. But he did die to vindicate the law which condemned to death the entire race of Adam (the animal man) and so Himself, by His resurrection from the dead became the head of a new creation, or believing sinners made spiritual and immortal by a resurrection from the dead at the last day, raised up by the same Spirit of God that raised up Christ from the dead. See Rom. viii., 11.

The Adamic life was laid down by Christ to be resumed no more; and the Adamic life of all men the law claims and will take, never to be restored; but "when Christ who is our life" [the life of believers] "shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory:" the Spirit of God having raised us up, and "quickened us together with Christ," we shall be "the children of God, being the children of the resurrection:" then we "cannot die any more"—death will have no more dominion over us, because possessed of the divine life. See Rom. vi., 9, 23; Col. iii., 4; Luke xx., 35, 36.

It is at this point the atonement, the at-one-ment, the perfect reunion of God and man (believing man) is completed and perfected through Christ Jesus and by the gift of God in Him and to Him.

Those who have rejected Christ, dying in unreconciliation—not being brought into agreement with God in his choice that Jesus Christ should be the resurrection and the life to all who should be delivered from death, they "remain in the congregation of the dead" eternally. That is their "eternal damnation;" condemned never again to see life, because they would not come unto Christ that they "might have life." See Prov. xxi., 16; John iii., 36, and v., 39, 40; also vi., 27 to 68.

"The wages of sin is death." That is what justice demands, viz., the life of "sinful flesh," which "is the blood thereof," Lev. xvii., 14. Christ was made "in the likeness of sinful flesh;" Rom. viii., 3: and though the law had no claim on his life, because "he knew no sin," yet if he will give divine life to sinners, it was necessary that he should confirm or vindicate the claim of the law on the life of the fleshly man by suffering that death, which he could only do—by a voluntary act of his own. If this had been refused, and he had attempted to deliver the guilty from death, it would have been to call in question the justice of the "death-penalty;" but by dying himself justice was vindicated, its claim fully acknowledged, and God could now "be just, and yet the Justifier of him that believeth in Jesus" as the Life-giver, and receive life from him as a free gift of God in him. The life is not by works of righteousness which we have done, but of God's mercy and grace given us in Christ Jesus. See Titus iii., 5, 6.

If torment in a future life, whether limited or eternal, is the penalty of sin, no atonement has been made; for Christ has not suffered any such torment and never can suffer death a second time; because "being raised from the dead, he dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him;" Rom. vi., 9; of course he cannot suffer any more, and the idea of torment and dying a second time, and eternal torments are both heresies, for both make void the atonement, and make salvation or a future life impossible.

But thanks be to God, Christ has abolished death's dominion to all who believe in him, and brought life and immortality to light. See 2 Tim. i., 10. He went down under death, because the race he came to redeem are by the death-penalty found there. He came up from the dead because death could not hold him. Thus he obtained victory over death, and holds "the keys" thereof, and has pledged himself to deliver from death all who exercise faith in Him. None who reject Him can live again.

Questions.

Is the reign of Christ a spiritual or a temporal one? and is it in the future or the past?

L. S.

Christ's reign, as King, is to be "upon the throne of David," which throne was a literal one. He has never yet received that throne, and therefore His reign thereon is in the future. At His first advent, "He came to his own (people, the people of Israel) and his own received Him not." John i., 11. They said, "We will not have this man to reign over us." Luke xix., 14. They caused Him to be put to death. But "God raised him up," and "exalted him," and said, "Sit thou at my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool." Acts ii., 24, 32, 33, and Psa. cx., 1, and parallel texts.

God's purpose to give his Son David's throne has not changed, and cannot be changed by any possible circumstances; because all possible circumstances were foreseen; and in view of them all, "The Lord hath sworn in truth unto David; He will not turn from it: of the fruit of thy body will I sit upon thy throne." Psa. cxxxii., 11. This oath and promise is so often referred to and spoken of by the prophets, by Christ and the Apostles, that to doubt of its literal fulfilment is virtually to charge God with false swearing, in one of the most important of all His promises and prophecies; it is to unsettle all faith, and to launch out into the wild fields of conjecture, and become the sport of every pretender and fanatic, from Swedenburg to Andrew Jackson Davis.

On this point, of the literal reign of Jesus, the Christ, on the throne of David, there is to be no doubting, unless we would hazard a total shipwreck of all gospel faith. This is the rock on which we can stand and bid defiance to every species of fanaticism from saint or sinner. A literal King, on the literal throne of David, to rule over the literal "house of Jacob forever" is a bulwark of defence against every species of wild-fire and delusion from whatever quarter it may come. That a "spiritual" influence has been and will be used in preparing subordinate rulers, to "sit with Christ on his throne," is an undoubted truth; and that He now rules in their hearts, during their time of preparation, is also true; but that the reign proper is future, literal, and eternal, is as certain as the promise and oath of God can make it.

More Questions.

Was the seventh day a type of the reign of Christ? If so, will a type be done away before the antitype comes? and if not, did not Christ commence his reign when he was invested with all power?

L. S.

We know of no evidence that the seventh day was a type of the reign of Christ. If a type at all, it was of the rest of the gospel; so Paul saith "We which have believed do enter into rest" . . . . "For he spake in a certain place of the seventh day in this wise, And God did rest the seventh day from all his works." . . . "For he that is entered into his rest, he also hath ceased from his own works as God hid from his." Heb. iii., 3, 4, 10.

The seventh day rest, if typical, was so of the rest received by believing in Christ, who is "the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth." Rom. x., 4. Under the laws men labored hard for justification but found no rest, no real Sabbath; for the term sabbath signifieth rest. Israel, under the law, were to keep a Sabbath, which, if typical, pointed to a rest in justification by faith in the promised Messiah; and Paul, as we have seen, saith, "We which have believed do enter into rest." How? By "ceasing from our own works" (which were by the law) "for justification;" and, embracing Christ, find the true sabbatical rest, and have peace in believing.

The seventh day Sabbath belonged to law dispensation given by Moses, and was a sign to that people during that dispensation, pointing to the rest which the Messiah, the Christ, would give to those who would believe on his name; for "the law was added because of transgressions, till the Seed should come to whom the promise was made." Gal. iii., 19. When that Seed came he brought the thing signified by the law Sabbath; namely, Rest from our own works, which were by the law, and fruitless to give rest; but by believing in Jesus we enter into rest—the keeping of a true Sabbath—a rest from all "our own works" as a ground of justification; Christ giveth us rest.

We trust we have sufficiently answered the questions of "L. S." He will see that we do not regard the seventh day as a type of the literal reign of Christ on David's throne. If typical, it is so of the rest of believers from their own works, or works of the law, for justification; for, "by the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified in His sight." Rom. iii., 20. The law gives "the knowledge of sin," but can give no rest from its power; its Sabbath points to that rest obtained by faith in Christ; there the law work ends; as we have before said, "Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth."

If the seventh day was a type, the antitype comes to every believer in Jesus the moment he ceases from his "own works," "as God did from his" when he rested the seventh day. To such a deliverer "every day is alike." All are devoted to God in Christ; and his whole life is a rest—a Sabbath—in Him. Christ is our rest, our peace, our hope, our all, and in all them that truly believe. They "enter into rest." Blessed rest.

Infants.

The opponents of the doctrine that a resurrection life belongs only to believers, among their devices to frighten people from accepting this view, proclaim where they go that we exclude infants from salvation. This device may answer their purpose with such as are as unscrupulous of truth as themselves. Do they not see that to infer the non salvation of infants from our language, that "a resurrection belongs only to believers," will lead them into the same ditch they fancy we are in? Jesus saith, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved. He that believeth not shall be damned." Now, our accusers will not pretend that infants are believers; and they utterly reject the idea of infant-baptism. Pray, does not their view damn all infants? Please cast the beam out of your own eyes before you talk of the mote in ours.

When we talk of a resurrection life belonging only to believers, we speak of them only in contrast with unbelievers—those who are capable of faith but refuse or neglect to exercise it when Christ is proclaimed to them. As to infants or those incapable of faith, or who never had Christ proclaimed to them for an exercise of faith, we leave all such for God to dispose of, and have no fear or concern but that He, who "is love," will make a kind and wise disposal of them; and whatever that may be, we have no doubt it will be seen to be the very best that Infinite wisdom and love could devise.

If our opponents are wiser than God, the Maker of all, and have more love in their hearts than He has, then let them give counsel to the Infinite, lest He should err for lack of the wisdom and love they possess! We leave such murmurers to the disposal of their Judge, and shall keep right on our way proclaiming "Life future and eternal only in Christ."

W. C. Stone, Boston, Mass., writes: The topic here of discussion generally is, the non-resurrection of the wicked; and such strange things are brought out as go to make up some of the curiosities that will do to hold up to view, such as the mortal resurrection of all, by Hiram Munger, who to-day, Nov. 3, took the ground that if all do not come up from the dead, mortal, then the non-resurrection of the wicked is true, or Universalism is true, and there is no escape from this conclusion. He also took the position that Jesus was raised mortal, and not changed until he was glorified; then He rose up on high, so will all his saints when they get changed (that is, after the judgment) rise to meet Him in the air. This view he has held many months, and it was not new to me, but the conclusion was new. I hope they may be crowded on this point. Munger also ignored the thousand years to the resurrection of the wicked. Well he might, for his judgment of mortals would not be in good shape to look plausible. I told him Miles Grant took that ground, and I did not see judgment day of a thousand years long, or two judgment days a thousand years apart. I tell you they have got things mixed up among them, and the more they talk the more they get confused.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—There is nothing but confusion in their theory; it is a mere dying struggle to avoid the inevitable conclusion that the wicked dead "shall not see life," but shall "remain in the congregation of the dead." Let them fight on; the harder the better; the sooner the sincere inquirers after truth will have their eyes open to the shocking and unscriptural position they occupy. These opposers of God's truth, that "The dead are raised incorruptible," may put out their own eyes, but others will sooner see the truth of Life only in Christ by the "mix ed up" and "confused" exhibition they make of both the resurrection and judgment. To avoid the doctrine of no future life out of Christ, they have invented not only a baseless theory, but one so unharmonious with the general tenor of the Bible, that they must, ere long, abandon it or be abandoned of thinking people.

DEVOTION TO TRUTH INSURES TRIUMPH.

IN the view of reason there is nothing which succeeds but righteousness: there is nothing sure but justice; there is nothing triumphant but truth; and therefore it is only the simplest form of uttering a necessary truth or reason, to say with Solomon: "There shall no evil happen to the just;" and "He that walketh uprightly walketh surely." There can be, therefore, no truer or more adequate statement of the actual experience of every man who has cast his soul upon God, and seeks his only blessedness in communion with his truth and conformity to his will, than this of the prophet: "The work of righteousness is peace, and the effect of righteousness, quietness and assurance for ever."

This is success worthy of a man. This is a victory of the rational spirit worthy to be proclaimed by the shouts of all intelligent beings, because it is the triumph of truth and reason. The march of a man through the world in this spirit is the march of a conqueror; and there is not a voice of Nature or Providence crying in the wilderness of time but heralds his progress; prepare ye the way; make straight in the desert a highway for him. Every valley of despair shall be exalted, and every mountain of difficulty shall be made low; and the crooked ways of temptation shall be straight, and the rough places of contradiction and conflict shall be made plain. His whole career shall be an ever advancing and ascending march by succession of manifest victories, toward a glorious and eternal triumph. It must be so, because the more open the opposition to falsehood the more signal its defeat; the greater the accumulation of resisting forces, the more glorious the conquest over them. A man may die in the struggle; but even that is a triumph, because truth is the prize, and fidelity to it the battle. And whether his last breath passes at the martyr's stake or in the prisoner's cell, the one becomes a sacred shrine, and the other as a pillar of fire shining into the struggling soul with strength and good cheer.—Pres. Pease.

J.—Good morning, Br. Grim. I wish to have a little more talk with you about the subject we had under consideration at our last meeting.

G.—I promised to give you my opinion of going to the different churches, as an example to our children.

J.—That is just the subject I wish to have the talk about. You know we must go somewhere; for if we do not, our neighbors look upon us as heathen; and besides, it is setting a bad example to our children to remain at home and not go to meeting anywhere. Do you not think so?

G.—I wish first to ask you a question: Is there any principle of truth that you believe, that is held in common with the church to which you go?

J.—O yes: they believe in God, in Jesus Christ, in heaven, and in a great many things.

G.—That is not answering my question. You say they believe in God. What do they believe God to be? Do they not believe Him to be without "body or parts;" some undefinable nothing, made of three persons, yet, in fact, no person at all?

J.—Well, they say it is all a mystery.

G.—What of Jesus? Do they not teach that He is "the very and Eternal God;" coeternal with the Father, one and the same being with the Father?

J.—Yes, so they say; and when I ask them how it is, they say it is a mystery.

G.—Well, about their heaven, what is it? Is it any more comprehensible than their doctrine of God, and of his Son Jesus? Do they not say that heaven is a place somewhere "beyond the bounds of time and space;" and its locality is all a mystery?

J.—But you said you would answer my question if we ought not set our children an example.

G.—That is just what I am going to do. You say there is nothing in common in your belief; and yet, after teaching your children, there is one God, even JEHOVAH; and one Saviour, Jesus Christ; and that man has no immortality except that derived through a union with Jesus Christ; and having instructed them that what is taught by these orthodox churches is unscriptural, and hence untrue, you set them an example of supporting the very doctrines you are teaching them are untrue! Do you not see the example will be to lead them to think you are acting the part of a hypocrite?

J.—Why, I never looked at it in that point of view; it may be there is some force in what you say.

G.—I have seen many good brethren and sisters who have gone to these churches for the purpose of going to meeting on Sunday, and I suppose setting an example to their children; and almost invariably their children when arriving at a proper age, join some one of these institutions. Now, if there is no harm in joining any of these churches, why, in the name of all that is just and right, do we not cease finding fault with orthodoxy?

J.—What would you advocate doing? are you in favor of organizing churches of our own, that we may have some place in which to meet and proclaim the truth?

G.—I will answer your question so far as I am individually concerned. I am opposed to all organizations, for the simple fact, there is no need of organizations. It has always followed, when you organize, you must give somebody power to rule and set up stakes and compel all to conform to rules and articles of faith; and when any new truth is discovered, or any brother happens to be brushing away some of the rubbish of theology, or rather what surrounds theology, he must be spoken with and prevented from advocating his views. Therefore, I would advise where there are few brethren in any one place to get together, either in a Bible class or social meeting, and invite others, and thus form a nucleus for disseminating the truth as you understand it; and thus set an example to the church and your children, and teach them that you are in earnest, and mean just what you say, that the common preaching of the day of immortal soulism, eternal torments, a visionary heaven, and all kindred subjects are fables; yea, worse; they are unscriptural and libels against the character and truth of God.

J.—And suppose that there are none but myself in the place where I live; what then?

G.—Were that my case, I would stay at home and read my Bible and hold communion with God. If you were in a place where there were no congenial friends, and no good company, would you go into bad for the sake of having company? With me, it is just the same. Jesus prays, "Father, sanctify them through the truth, (in the truth: Bible Union), thy word is truth." John xvii., 17. David prayed, "And take not the word of truth utterly out of my mouth; for I have hoped in thy judgment. Psa. cxix., 43. But you allow these churches to take the word of God out of your mouth, and request you to seal your lips in their churches. Paul says, in Eph. i., 13, "In whom ye also, having heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation: in whom, I say, ye also, believing were sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise."

Here Paul says the gospel is the word of truth—it is the gospel of life, and by believing this truth ye were sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise. Paul says in Col. i., "We give thanks to God and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ;" recognising two separate and distinct beings, which is not taught in the churches, nor dare you explain how you understand it without being read out, and dismissed from fellowship. Again: Paul says, This Jesus, "who is the image of the invisible God, the first born of every creature." You tell them that Jesus Christ is a creature, born like other creatures, and even church cords would not hold you. Now, Paul says, that faith in this Jesus, (Col. i., 4,) has laid up for you a hope in heaven, "whereof ye formerly heard in the word of the truth of the gospel." James says, i., 18, "Of his own will he begat us with the word of truth."

Now, none of the truths which we believe to be the word of God are taught in these churches; and therefore I, for one, cannot encourage them to disseminate what I believe to be, nay, what I know to be error, and contrary to the word of truth.

I am acquainted with some ministers who holds our views, and dare not make it known. They say, they use Bible terms, and use Bible language. So does every minister in the land. Why, it would frighten these ministers so that their hair would stand on end, to expose them before their congregations. This reminds me of the time when we were dismissed from the Baptist church, twenty-four years ago. The preacher asked one of our brethren, Do you believe in future rewards and punishments as the church understands it? The answer was, I believe it as the Bible reads. But do you believe it as the church understands it? How does the church understand it? It understands it to mean eternal life in torments. When you quote a passage, dare you put your construction upon it?

JACOB GRIM.

PHILADELPHIA, NOV., 1868.

FINAL DELIVERANCE.

LIFT up thine eyes, lonely, sighing, laboring, struggling pilgrim, and behold the glory of thine everlasting inheritance! The Lord thy God has not called thee to the sacrifices, temptations and strivings of a Christian life without placing before thee an object of unspeakable interest, to impel thy desires and cheer thy soul. Thou hast in prospect eternal redemption. Thy final deliverance will be glorious indeed. Here clouds and darkness, gloom and doubt, fear and anguish often brood thy feeble spirit; but it is only for a moment, and then comes thy hour of triumph, and thy long, unbroken rest. "Weeping may endure for a night but joy"—divine, unending, perfect joy—"cometh in the morning." Then shalt thou exchange thy weakness for strength, thy groans for songs, thy labor for reward. No more shall satan exact upon thee with seducing wiles, the world charm thee with its flattering show, or baffle thee with its elements of confusion, or the power of the carnal mind bring thee into captivity.

Then shalt thou praise thy God in the fulness of immortal animation. Then shalt thou glory in the perfection of pure knowledge. Then shalt thou satiate thy wondering soul in the contemplation of eternal beauty. How gladly wilt thou possess an organism perfect as that of angelic existences? and that organism, too, glowing after the manner of the glorious body of thy blessed Redeemer! Then pain no more shall distract thy thoughts by day, or drive refreshing sleep from thy couch by night. No longer shall wasting disease lay thee prostrate in helpless weakness, and drag thee down to the loathsome grave. No more shall thy spirit be riven with anguish at the cry of thy loved ones in sorrow. Then shalt thou no more fear famine, or want, for thyself or those connected with thee in life; for "bread shall be given" thee, and thy "waters shall be sure." Then shalt thou no longer complain of the chilling damps of evening, or the burning heats of noonday; the stern rigors of boisterous winter, or the parching of summer's killing drought. No more shalt thou grieve in contemplation of objects of misery, meeting thine eyes on every side. Thou shalt eternally delight thyself in the "abundance of peace;" for thou shalt no more be appalled at the confused cry from the fearful battle-field, or horrified at the sight of garments rolled in human blood. Then shall righteousness and truth spring forth, forever, before the saved nations. No longer shall the holy soul be vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked, or the meek of the earth in sorrow listen to the blasphemy of those who despise their Maker. No longer shall the humble disciple of the Redeemer mourn the personal absence of his beloved One, or sigh and long for His speedy coming: for hen "the Lamb" shall "dwell among them" and graciously "feed them, and lead them unto living fountains of waters." What blessed society will the Christian then associate with! God, Christ, angels, patriarchs, prophets, apostles, martyrs, and redeemed saints in general! And this blessed state of society shall never change! Hail glorious state! Hail world of triumph! Welcome eternal rest! Come day of God!—Selected.

MEANING OF MATTH. XXIV., 34.

"This generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled.

I HAVE never yet seen an explanation of this passage that fully satisfied me. Permit me, therefore, to communicate my view of it. The Scripture meaning of a word can only be learned by observing the Scripture use of it. An examination of the Scripture use of the word (genea) "generation" will show that it is co-ordinate with that other much debated and much abused word (aion) "world" or more properly "age" or "era." Thus in Col. i., 20 we read of a mystery which had been hid from "ages" and from "generations;" the two words having the same scope as regards time. In Luke xvi., 8, we read that the children of this "world," or age, are wiser in (or for) their "generation" than the children of light; the two words having the same scope as regards condition. In Eph. iii., 5, and 21, we have the word geneai (generations) rendered in our version "ages." Other passages will show the same thing. A Scripture "generation," then, is the race that belongs to an "age." This age, or world, or era, in which we now are, extends to the coming of Christ (Matt. xxiv., 3,); and "this generation" signifies this present state of things; this general condition of man, socially, religiously, politically, and even physically considered. This shall not pass, shall not be materially changed, until Christ comes. No glorious millennium shall ever dawn till all these fearful judgments be fulfilled. The text is a most emphatic protest against the boastful spirit of man, especially prevalent in our own time, that hopes for a new era through human effort. This bearing of the passage will be more apparent if the emphasis of the sentence, as seen in the original, is noticed. It is not on "this generation," but on the negative "not," which is made doubly emphatic, first by being placed first in the clause, and second by the use of two particles of negation. The real idea is lost in our translation. A more correct rendering would be, "No, by no means shall pass this generation." Men will say that it will pass, it will seem as though it would pass, many will think that it will pass, but it shall not pass, till Christ comes in judgment.

There seems, indeed, to have been great changes since Christ uttered these words, but they have been more phenomenal than essential, the world has not materially altered since that time. And it will doubtless be found at the last, that the external aspect of affairs will be almost identical with what it was at the time of this prophecy. Just note the prominent characteristics of that time, and observe how they remain. What were the main features of that generation? They were:

1st. The Jewish people. And how they have seemed to pass away; but they still live and are beginning to look again toward form. Strange indeed to human view has been the history of this people. But God hath declared that they shall not pass away till all these things be fulfilled.

2d. The political might of imperial rule. How it has seemed to pass away: but it still lives. As Dr. Auberlin says, "The Roman Empire is the ideal which exerts fascinating power on the rulers of the world, which they are ever striving to realize, and will doubtless succeed in realizing." The clay is indeed intermingled with the iron, but the iron is still there. It seems to ardent republicans that imperialism is doomed. But it shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled.

3d. The true Christian church, in its humble condition. How it has seemed to pass away; on the one hand by growing into a great earthly institution, and on the other by being threatened with extermination through infidel hate. But it still lives, a little flock waiting for the appearance of the chief Shepherd. It shall never gain supremacy, nor ever be utterly destroyed—never be materially changed, till all these things be fulfilled.

The world is essentially the same now as when these words were uttered. And doubtless the literal scene in Palestine will before long be restored, viz., the Jews in Jerusalem in unbelief, under the power of dominant Gentile rule, the temple rebuilt, a few disciples believing in Jesus as the Messiah, hiding here and there through fear of the Jews. So that when the Master shall come, He will find the same state of affairs that He left centuries ago. Men will have done their best to bring in a new era and a new generation, but the same generation, the same state of affairs, the same evils and difficulties, will remain. And God will come to do what man could not do.

OBITUARY.

DIED in Scotland, Conn., Oct., 22d, after a distressing illness of six weeks, AMANDA RIDER, in the seventy-second year of her age.

BR. STORRS: Again I am called upon to communicate to you the sad intelligence that death has once more entered our home, and torn from our embrace another loved, and honored one, a kind and affectionate mother.

It is but seven short weeks since we were called to part with a dear and only child, and is the third death in our family within five months.

Mother was not well when our dear boy died, but was able to sit with us at the funeral. She seemed to have a presentiment that she should follow him to the grave very soon. We hoped it would not be so, but that she would soon be well again. She kept about a part of the time for one week, and then took her bed, which she never left, except for a few moments at a time, until she died. She suffered exceedingly all the time, but expressed no anxiety about getting well, but said she would rather sleep awhile in the grave if it was the will of the Lord.

Few persons ever did the same amount of hard work in the same length of time that my mother did; for very few persons possessed the strength and ability for labor that she had. She possessed not only physical strength, but a strong mind and will, which were brought early in life under the power of Divine grace.

She was converted under the labors of the Rev. David Austin, a very good, but a very eccentric Congregational minister; so much so, that many called him insane. I don't know but he was, in a degree, on the subject of the literal gathering of Israel. I would that more preachers were interested in that subject than are, if they did get a little insane.

Mother remained in that church a few years, until she became acquainted with the Methodists, who were then a humble people, believing in a closer walk with God, and a godly conversation. She felt it her duty and privilege to leave the Congregational Church and join them, and applied to the church for a letter, which they refused to give her, saying, it was her duty to remain in the fold she was in, etc.; but she withdrew and joined the M. E. Church, at Bear Hill, Conn., where she remained for several years a bright and shining light, so far as a humble, devoted Christian is concerned. She then moved back to Bozrah, Conn., her native town, where she, with several others seceded from the M. E. Church, being dissatisfied with slavery and Episcopacy. Consequently she had to go through another ordeal of scorn and censure most trying to bear. But those who act from a sense of duty to God do not fear the frowns of mortal men, and my mother was one of those persons.

A few years later, in the providence of God she came to live in Scotland, Conn., and there, for the first time, she listened to the doctrine of, "No Immortality out of Christ," "The kingdom of God on the earth," and "Unconsciousness of all men in death," etc., which made a deep impression upon her mind and led her to searching the Scriptures to see if these things were so; which resulted in a firm and unshaken faith in all that God has spoken by the mouth of all the holy prophets since the world began, without regard to the creeds and commandments of men. For the past sixteen or eighteen years my mother has been an uncompromising advocate of all the doctrines taught in the HERALD OF LIFE.

She was a firm believer in the doctrine of "NO LIFE OUT OF CHRIST," and contended for it as long as her strength lasted. In her death, Br. Storrs and the HERALD OF LIFE have lost a warm friend and helper, so far as lay in her power; for she was poor in this world's goods, but rich in faith, and I trust an heir to the kingdom. Her life has been one of labor and trial; but she has gone to rest. Some who will read this, will remember her as a true friend, and will feel sad when they know they shall meet her no more in this life. We miss her in our family. Her chair is vacant, where she has sat all the time for almost four years; for she has been afflicted with lameness and could not walk about but a little, and often not at all without a staff.

Dear brethren and sisters. Let us work while the day lasts; for the night cometh in which no man can work. Pray for us, that these afflictions may be sanctified to us, and that we may be ready to every good word and work. Your sister, in the hope of soon seeing the LIFE-GIVER.

OBITUARY.

FELL ASLEEP in the covenant of life, Oct. 13, 1868, SUSAN D., wife of Br. ENOCH HOLT, of Blackstone, Mass. (formerly of Manchester, N. H.) A severe pain in the head, resulting in inflammation of the brain, carried our sister to the grave in the 38th year of her age. For sixteen years she had been an earnest Christian, "well reported of for good works." For the last six years of her life she was grounded and settled in the glorious truths of the precious life-plan, of which she was a persistent, fearless advocate. In the meantime she took good care to "adorn" this "doctrine of God our Saviour by a well-ordered life and a godly conversation," thereby commending it "to every man's conscience in the sight of God."

My own acquaintance with the deceased commenced about the time she embraced the "Life views;" and she strongly reminded me of Bunyan's pilgrim. Like him she seemed to put her fingers in her ears as if to shut out all mere worldly considerations, and setting her face as a flint Zionward, she ran crying Life! life! eternal life!

Thousands have listened, with wrapt attention, to the earnest eloquence of her appeals when addressing "the great congregation" (for she was very gifted;) and the plaintive music of her voice as she sang "the Lord's song in a strange land," will linger long on many ears. But what impressed me more than all this, and what I think will abide longest in the hearts of those who knew her, was her entire faithfulness to her own conviction of duty in every department of Christian life.

No cross seemed too heavy to bear; no duty too onerous to be performed. Were the poor to be cared for? Paul-like, this thing she "was forward to do." Were the necessities of saints to be ministered to? Never were more willing hands employed in the delightful task, as many a weary pilgrim can testify, who has found rest and comfort beneath her hospitable roof. Nor was that much neglected, much-abused, and most thankless of all Christian duties—the administering of calm, Christian reproof to the unwary—wholly forgotten. When she thought the occasion asked it, she could "reprove and rebuke," as well as "exhort with all long-suffering and doctrine."

But the crowning excellence of Sister Holt's character is revealed in this language of her bereaved husband: He says, "While I think many believed her good, I suppose but few knew the real purity of her Christian life, in her family at home." To be a Chrstian abroad; to maintain a spotless integrity in all our intercourse with the various phases of a corrupt society; to set a pure example before the world—one that shall give them a high estimate, an elevated view of the practical workings of Christianity—is saying much. But to so far excel all this, amid the cares and anxieties, and perplexities of a woman's and a mother's domestic life, as to lead one best qualified to judge, to make use of the language quoted above, this is praise indeed! To such an one the language of the apostle, (slightly varied) which he uttered at the close of a well-spent life, seems peculiarly appropriate. She hath fought a good fight, she hath finished her course, she hath kept the faith, henceforth there is laid up for her a crown of righteousness, which the Lord the righteous judge shall give her at that day; and not to her only, but unto all them also who love his appearing. May her dear husband and her precious children be among the crowned in that joyful day.

The warrior, worn with the conflict,
(Whose dust-begrimed battle-scarred brow
Waits the merited crown wreath of laurel,) Seeks rest—She is taking hers now.

The sorrows of life are all over,
Its toils and its trials are done;
The long well-fought battle is ended;
The crown, though still "laid up," is won.

For a brief space, she rests from her labors,
By her lost darling's side is laid down;
While harp, robe, and palm, is in waiting,
And the bright incorruptible crown.

But soon, springing up from her slumbers,
All beauteous, all glorious, and fair
She'll exclaim as she passes death's portals,
O grave! Where's thy victory? Where?

FROM ELD. A. GUTHRIE.

TRUMANSBURG, N. Y., NOV. 1, 1868.

BR. STORRS: I have commenced operations in earnest, although in weakness of body, with the "Campaign Documents." I trust that our campaign will continue long after the hurraing for Grant and Seymour has died away; for we will continue to shout, "Glory to God in the highest; on earth, peace and good will to men." Our King Immanuel is coming to reign in righteousness, "And shall execute judgment and justice in the earth." Jer. xxiii., 5.

The plan of operations which I have adopted in our church-going village, where none of the Life views have ever been presented, is, to go out in comfortable weather and loan two or more of the different pamphlets, which I have, to each individual who is willing to read. In this way, I have an opportunity of feeling of the theological pulse of our town. I find some who are so bound up under the influence of their human church creeds that they have become handcuffed, stereotyped, and spiked down under human tradition so tight that I fear they are in the condition which Paul speaks of, "That they should believe a lie, that they all might be damned." 2 Thess. ii., 11, 12. A few say, "Thank you; the Lord bless you," etc., and are investigating. Then, in a few days, I go round and gather up from those who do not wish to retain them, and lend them to others. In this way there is no loss of means, and our Campaign Documents are not thrown aside by uninvestigating minds or wilful men. I would here say, that it may be well for some to read again Eld. Z. Campbell's exposition of John v., 28, 29, in Vol. V. No. 46, of HERALD OF LIFE. Read with Br. Storrs' sermon on the "Judgment," all clear in the mind, and you will get some good ideas. I would not single out this above others; for I thank God that we have so many able contributors to the HERALD. I speak of this, because it has been considered somewhat difficult, and because our opponents make this passage the Gibraltar of their mortal resurrection theory, where all sinners must stand up in the judgment to give an account for every idle word and every secret thought for himself; when in fact, they have already passed under condemnation in their natural lifetime and all this untold misery and gnawing their tongues for pain in order to satisfy divine justice; when, lo, justice has already been satisfied with the penalty of the law, which is death without mitigation and without hope to every flesh lusting, ungodly man, who shall die in his sins. Yours in hope of life at the resurrection of the just.

SHORT SAYINGS.

HE that loveth not his brother injures himself.

He that boasts of his own wisdom does not discern his own folly.

He who keeps in a lowly condition cannot fall far down, if he should chance to fall at all.

Whoever thinks much of God, thinks little of himself.

Whenever we needlessly speak of the faults of others, we show a capital fault of our own.

Whoever does the works of darkness, seeks the darkness to do them in.

A great talker always has to be chasing his own words.

—DR. KANE, finding a flower under the Humboldt glacier, was more affected by it because it grew beneath the lip and cold bosom of the ice, than he would have been by the most gorgeous garden bloom. So some single struggling grace, in the heart of one far removed from divine influences, may be dearer to God than a whole catalogue of virtues in the life of one more favored of heaven.

SOME men are such non-conductors that the Holy Spirit cannot pass through them so as to affect others. "Lord, is it I?"

Musings on the Past.

The bitterest foes I ever had
  Were those who said they loved me most
And kissed me fondest, while they dealt
  In choicest pet-names by the host.

But swifter than the angels fell,
  I fell, and lower, in their view
And thought while falling, kiss me less,
  O friends, but let the heart be true!

We read of two—the noted two—
  Who kissed the Saviour when on earth;
One kissed his cheek, the humbler one
  Kissed but his feet, and 'twas of worth.

Suspect, then, those who over-kiss;
  They'll over-talk, too, by-and-by,
The slanderer is a murderer,
  And laughs to see his victim die.

O cruel tongue of foul deceit,
  How thou hast spoiled this world of ours;
Glad is my heart that hypocrites
  Can never enter Eden's bowers.

Kate's Forgiveness.

"I will never speak to Clara Martin."

"O Nellie, that is a very hard thing for you tosay."

"You could not be surprised though, Kate, if you knew everything."

"I should be grieved, if not surprised, Nellie; and though I do not so much as wish to know every thing, I am quite sure that you had better think over your words again, and resolve to forgive Clara, whatever she may have done."

"No, Kate, it is quite impossible, and all the girls say the same. They know what she has done, and they all declare that they will never speak to her again."

"But this is very unkind of them, and quite too hard for Clara to bear. What has she done?"

"O, several things. She has been so rude, Kate, that you never could guess the things she has said."

"Whatever they are she will soon be sorry for them, and perhaps she will apologize, and then, of course, all the girls whom she has offended will forgive her at once."

"I don't think they would, even then; but Clara Martin will never apologize, I know; she is too ill-tempered and proud for that. Don't you take her part, will you, Kate?"

"I don't know, Nellie, dear; if you all turn against her, poor child, she will need some one to take her part; and I do not yet know whether you or she was the more wrong."

"Then I will tell you all about it, Kate, for I think you ought to know. She has been in a dreadful temper all day, but this is what began our quarrel. I could not find my grammar anywhere, and I could not remember where I had put it."

"Ah, little Neliie, you were the first to be wrong after all, you see! If you remembered the motto on the school-reom wall, 'A place for everything, and everything in its place,' you would not have lost your grammar."

"Well, but don't begin to scold me, Kate, for I did not begin the quarrel. I asked Clara to lend me hers, for she was not using it, and what do you think she said?"

"I cannot tell."

"She said, 'No, I will not, for you might be dishonest enough to keep it!' There! As if anybody in our school ever did such things!"

"That was certainly very unkind of Clara, but she must have been very angry at the time, or she would not have said it."

"Well, all the girls said what a shame it was, and that only made Clara worse. She told me I was a stupid little thing, and that she would not like to learn her lessons no better than I did mine. And she said something quite as bad to each of the others; but the worst things of all, and those which made us all the crossest, were said about you."

"About me?" said Kate, in surprise.

"Yes, dear Kate, I don't know how she found it all out, but she says she knows everything about you. She says your father is poor enough to be her father's servant; that you never have so much as even a shilling a week for pocket-money; that all your dresses are quite poor and common, and that you will soon have to leave school because your friends cannot afford to keep you here."

"Well, supposing it is all true, Nellie, should I be any the worse for being poor?"

"No, Kate, you would still be the dearest girl in all the world. But she said something else about you; she said we should not make so much fuss about you if we knew that before you came to this school you were turned away, expelled from the last school."

"That is not true," said Kate, looking very white.

"True! We know that not a word of it is true. And must not that Clara be a mean and wicked girl? You will not speak to her again now, will you Kate?"

"I think I shall, Nellie, dear, but I will think about it first."

If you had known Kate Davis, you would not have been surprised that she was the greatest favorite in all the school. She was quite a year older than the other girls, and she was taller, too. She had soft brown eyes, and a face that was rather pale. She was a serious girl, and her smiles were so sweet and kind that they were valued by all about her. She was a real friend, always ready to help others, and she never got angry, even in play, or said unkind things to the rest. They all loved her and were glad to be with her; and it seemed as if they could not say enough things in her praise. So you may be sure they were both surprised and indignant at Clara Martin's speech. They each said something to her about it, and one girl even said, "You ought to be dismissed from the school for saying such wicked things."

Kate walked to the bottom of the garden, where the girls could not see her, and she could not keep the tears from coming into her eyes. It is always hard to have unkind things said about one, and Kate felt it. She wondered, too, where Clara had gained so much information about her. She remembered that her last letter from home had said something about her being obliged to leave school if her father lost some money which was put in a bank which was said to have failed. She thought Clara must have seen this letter. She felt in her pocket and found it was not there.

"I must have drawn it out with my pocket-handkerchief," she said to herself, "but it was dishonorable of Clara to read it even if she found it."

And so of course it was, for no girl of honor would read a letter addressed to another without special permission.

Kate hurried into the house to search for the letter. She could not find it, but the postman had just brought another for her full of good news. The money in the bank was safe, and her father was not, after all, a poor man, and as for Kate, she might stay at school as long as she liked.

Gladdened with this good news, Kate made up her mind that she would forgive Clara. She went back again into the garden to finish her quiet walk. There behind one of the trees, she saw Clara Martin crying bitterly. Kate went up to her and called her softly. She started up with flashing eyes and flushed cheeks.

"Go away," she said. "Why do you disturb me? I am not going to apologize, for I am not sorry; go away."

But Kate was not to be repulsed like that.

"Clara," she said gently, "let me stay. I am not angry with you, but I want to talk to you, for I know you are not happy."

Clara tried to push her away, but Kate was taller, and she took the trembling girl in her arms and kissed her, and laid her cold hands on Clara's hot forehead.

Poor Clara could only cry more, for she had not expected that; and Kate soothed her and talked to her kindly.

"I do not so much mind the things you said about me, but I should like to have my letter back."

"O Kate! I am so ashamed," said Clara; "I found the letter and read it, and I knew it would tease the girls to talk about it. You will never forgive me."

Kate kissed her once more.

"I have quite forgiven you," she said, "because I am sure you will not do so dishonorable a thing again. And you have misunderstood the letter, Clara; the only reason why I left the other school was because I was ill, and they thought I had better not remain."

"I did understand it, Kate; but my wickedness made me say the other. I will tell the girls all about it. Come with me, Kate."

So they walked up the garden together, to the great amazement of all the girls, and Clara confessed her wrong and begged their pardon, and told them that as Kate had forgiven her, she hoped they would not be angry long.

"Dear Kate! that is the way she is revenged," said one of the girls. "I wish we we were all more like her!"

"Ah!" said another, "we shall never be that without God's help. Kate Davis is a Christian!"—Christian World.

The Ten Toes.

"We come now to the last division of the image, the feet and toes. That they correspond to the ten horns, the ten kings that should arise out of the 'exceeding dreadful' fourth beast is apparent."—L. C. Thorne.

I was much edified while perusing the article from the pen of our dear brother as given in the Herald of Oct. 28th. But when I came to the above quotation, I am free to confess, it was not to me quite "apparent." Our good brother declares that "the feet and toes . . . correspond to the ten horns." Those horns were up as early as the fifth century. Their numbers must be complete prior to the rise of the little horn which plucked up three of the original horns "by the roots." Is it apparent that those ten horns are in existence to-day? It is evident that seven only remain after three were "plucked up by the roots." Again, the image is that of a man complete. The head very aptly represent Babylon; the breast and arms Medo-Persia, etc. The breast and arms were not developed until the head was about to pass away; and so with each division in turn. The head was the beginning; the toes are the end of God's measuring line; the very last development of Gentile kingdoms, prior to the setting up of God's everlasting kingdom. Query. Were the toes developed before the knees came into existence? Once more. The image was to span about 2,500 years from the head to the toes. We will allow the image to be six feet high, the toes an inch and a half long. Well, what of that? Why, simply this, we have been living in the toes about 1,400 years, or considerably more than half of the allotted time for the duration of the entire image. Is that apparent?

Those who take the position of our good brother are obliged to find those ten kings, horns, or toes in western Rome; which would be placing ten toes on one foot; an apparent monstrosity, not agreeable to the fulfilment of prophecy.

It is our opinion that the ten toes are now developing themselves. For many years we have heard much from the present Napoleon about the revision of the map of Europe. There have been many changes, and it will be the order of the day until the image is filled out full. In eastern Rome we have already 1, Russia; 2, Austria; 3, Turkey; 4, Greece; 5, shall we say Egypt? (whose Pacha was made king within the past year). If not, there remains the principality in and around the Black Sea, (they are very uneasy under the Turkish yoke) from which a kingdom may be carved out. In western Rome, we have 1, France; 2, Prussia; 3, England; 4, Italy; 5, Spain; 6, Portugal. But, say you, that is one too many. True, but if the two latter powers should be consolidated (an event not improbable) that difficulty would vanish. There are also small powers in Germany which will doubtless be received into the capacious maw of Prussia or France. When the ten toes shall be fully developed, the prayerful student of prophecy will understand that the stone will strike the image, and not before. The order is, "watch and pray." The design is, that we should seek meekness, sanctification, a preparation for the kingdom of God.

W. H. Hanford.

New York Nov., 1, 1868.

From Dr. J. F. Lee.

Monroe, Union Co., N. C., Nov. 2d, 1868.

Br. Storrs: "It is strange," says Rev. James Saurin, "to us, that he (God) should not be affected at hearing the groans of the damned, whose torments can only be assuaged by uttering blasphemies against him. Renounce these puerile ideas, and entertain more just notions of the Supreme Being. He has nobody; he has no organs that can be shaken by the violence done to the organs of a malefactor; he has no fibres that can be stretched to form a unison with the fibres of your bodies, and which must be agitated by their motions. Love, in God, is an intelligence, who sees what is, and who loves what may justly be accounted lovely; who judges by the nature of things, and not by the nature of sensations, of which he is gloriously incapable; his love is in perfect harmony with the spirituality of his essence." Alas!

See his sermon on the compassion of God. Text Psalm ciii., 13. "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him." I give the above quotation without any comment or remark, save this: that it is to me a strange and singular way or method, by which the torments of the damned can only be assuaged, i. e., "by uttering blasphemies against God!" and still more singular, if possible, is his description of God: negatively.

How the utterance of blasphemies against God can assuage torments is something that I should never have imagined. Nor could I commend the remedy or advise any one to adopt it in this life, when suffering under the most painful and exeruciating diseases. How any sane man could have suggested the idea, or by what mode of reasoning or inventive genius he discovered such a cure for eternal torments, is entirely beyond my comprehension. It is strange to us, that wicked men in a rage of passion, anger, and resentment, should curse, swear and blaspheme, saying it did them good and assuaged their wrath, and that it was the only way they could be eased or pacified. Saurin is not the only writer who indulges, at times, in vain efforts to account for what no man ever did comprehend, and what God himself has not revealed. Some writers have said that the devil, long before the creation of Adam and Eve, sinned in heaven—was a sinner from the beginning—fell from heaven with all his company—that God cast him down for the punishment of his pride; that sin, death, and all other evils came into the world by him—that God makes use of him to prove good men and chastise bad ones; that he torments men—inspires them with evil designs—made Judas betray his Master—that God commissions him and lets him loose to accomplish his purposes—and that if the doctrine of demoniacal possession is not just as it is stated, then Our Saviour practised deception on the people, and that the Gospel is nothing but pieces of imposture!

How positive the believers in the devil are—who assert that, if their notions are not true,—if their interpretation of some things is not true, then the Gospel is nothing but pieces of imposture, and the Son of God an impostor! Behold how positive and presumptuous some are, who think if their views of revealed truth, or their construction of the meaning of words is not all right, then Revelation is nothing but pieces of imposture.

It seems strange to us, that great and good men, men of eloquence, should have such weakness, such (shall I say it?) pride. Great advancement has been made by a few writers in Scripture terminology, but the true terminology already written is neither generally received nor fully understood. "The origin and real meaning of the words and phrases about which we contend, are known to but few; and though they are so plain and self-evident, they will not be accepted by the many. Many of the great points of controversy arise, not from the Scriptures, but from the bias of early training, and the influence of Platonic philosophy, Aristotelian, Arabian, Popish and Protestant forms of thought.

Such are some of my cursory or fugitive thoughts which greet thee my beloved brother, with the assurances of my sincere esteem and and Christian sympathy. And in conclusion, I have nothing more to say, than that I believe all that is said of Satan, sin, Diabolos, etc., in the Bible, according to the origin and real meaning of the words—the true Scripture terminology—and of course I believe there are calumniators, slanderers, blasphemers, adversaries, enemies, accusers, antichrists, serpents, vipers, liars, etc., in this world: nay, I know it, for I have seen many such, and can tell them by the "Earmarks," though they sometimes transform themselves into angels of light.

I have no ambition that would lead me to aspire to the character of a ready writer—no disposition to write for the papers so as to elicit from various publications the praise or admiration of my fellow mortals. My letters are addressed to friends, without any labored attempt at pompous diction or dictation to others. I would not wish to utter aught that could in any sense mar the peace or harmony of brethren, or injure the cause of truth. But I think it is but right to have our eyes and ears open to act prudently, cautiously, wisely, to lay hands suddenly on no man. I am sure, in your experience, you have had a few instances, that perhaps made you regret what your charity once viewed as no small aid, but what turned out to be different from which your fancy made it. Perhaps you may comprehend my meaning.

From Maria M. Weaver.

Dear Reader: It is with great difficulty that I write, even when time can be taken from my household duties. But sometimes I do get so full of objections to common theologians that it would really be a relief had I time to write. My eyes are very weak, so it is not prudent to tax them. But for a few days have I felt much interested in having the Life views presented here. Seemed as though the better way would be to preach practical things. But the condition of things at present makes it appear to be the will of God to have his character revealed as it is to this misinformed multitude. It would do them good to have the Scriptures read in their ears, and the future of mankind taught them. O, that some one would tell them that "God is Love," and seek to win them by love, instead of driving them through fear.

It is sad to think that so many of our preachers in this age are so ignorant of the principles they oppose. They tell us "the wages of sin is death," and then say that mere death is "no punishment." "No judgment and no punishment." People say we believe and teach thus.

We had many such misrepresentations made in our hearing a few Sabbaths ago, and "these modern theologists" were made to teach many things contrary to their belief. Indeed, who believes in more of a judgment than we do? It began in Eden and hasn't ended yet. Isn't that long enough?" And as for "punishment," if death, deprivation of life, being blotted out of existence as intelligent living beings, is no punishment, then life, existence, and its attendant privileges, can be no reward. If it is nothing to cease to exist, it is nothing to exist. I'm glad that my ideas of Life, especially immortal life in the presence of God, surrounded by the glory and blessed riches of his kingdom, is so well appreciated by me, and so ardently loved, that I should be of all mankind "most miserable" were this life my only hope.

Poor sinner, without a connection with Christ, the Life-giver, when this life ceases you are gone forever. O be wise, and seek that endless blessed life that Christ freely giveth to perishing mortals.

Then we heard passages read to prove the uprising of all mankind. The "men of Nineveh" and the Queen of the South were paraded before God, angels, and every human being that ever lived, and made to stand up with important airs, and say to other wretched sinners, "I am holier than thou;" and thus "condemn" them. But alas! after the condemnation, altogether they go into everlasting fire, and receive the "second death." Now, if these things are to be literally so, it will outstrip everything in the ludicrous, and be unlike any of God's past doings. He never will bring various classes of sinners before his bar and allow them to compare themselves with each other. Indeed, what a thought! Do you suppose that wicked queen would feel much like standing up before God, Christ, angels, and the whole created world of mankind, and say anything about being better than other sinners? O, why do men preach such strange things, and how can thinking people shout "amen" to it?

Speaking of the reliving of the impenitent, the preacher said "'glory to God, they've got to come up and be punished." Many loud "amens" came in response, and a few seemed to have the "glory" (?) of such a scene shining in their faces. How unlike Jesus. He "wept" over Jerusalem; but this man got happy at the thought of the souls that "pierced" him being brought into life, and made to "bow the knee" to Jesus! God does not seek such to worship him; those that worship him must do it "in spirit and in truth." Thank the Lord.

It is time people knew who their Creator is. The catechism used to say, "Who made you?" and you answered, "God." It is time they knew something about God. Time his goodness was declared unto perishing, wandering souls, and their true condition pointed out. Thank God, there are a few willing to do it. They start hand in hand with loved brethren and declare all men are in a perishing condition—death their doom out of Christ. But sad to say, one half that so teach turn about and say, we mean death in a "lake of fire," where "there be shall weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth." Alas! the "hobby" they ride on to overtake other people's hobbies, here becomes crippled. Yet the Lord is, of a truth, the way and the life.

To choose pleasure rather than virtue, is like choosing the foam on the water, rather than the clear water, to quench a raging thirst.

Tract Anecdote.

A home missionary, travelling through Ireland, for the purpose of circulating the word of God and tracts, and diffusing a knowledge of his gospel among the people, was one night hospitably entertained at the house of gentleman near the mountains of Kerry. On the following morning, he and his host, while looking together over the wild and beautiful country around them, observed a shepherd tending some sheep at a little distance.

"There is Peter," said the gentleman, pointing him out to the notice of the missionary; "he is one of the shrewdest characters that we have in the district."

This remark made the missionary curious to know the shepherd, and he soon after went to where he was, entered into conversation with him, and gave him a tract in the Irish language.

Some weeks passed, and he and Peter met again. The missionary inquired how he had liked the tract, and Peter's strange reply was, "I have swallowed it."

"Well, Peter, if I now give you an Irish Bible, will you swallow that also?"

"Yes, sir: but I won't be in your honor's debt for it; I'll buy it from you."

"Do so; here it is."

"What's the price, sir?"

The missionary replied: "The price I ask is this—when God shall strike the light and love of it into your heart, that you will teach six men like yourself to love the Bible." Peter agreed to accept it on these terms.

Some time went by, and the missionary, accompanied by an Englishman, had occasion to cross the Kerry mountains. They set out on this undertaking just as the day began to dawn. They had not proceeded far when they perceived a countryman on the way before them, and the missionary, on overtaking him, recognized him at once as Peter, who also knew him, and exclaimed, "Is it you, sir? Your reverence is welcome."

"Thank you, Peter. What are you doing here so early?"

"I am doing what is honest, your reverence. I am paying for the book."

"How is that?" asked the missionary.

"Come on, sir, and you shall see."

On they went, and soon reached the top of the mountain. It was now broad daylight. Peter led them to a haystack, and behind it were six men (Romanists), far away from the eye of their priest, who would keep from them the word of life, waiting for their friend Peter to teach them to read it.—Tract Magazine.

All Night in Prayer.

We know not what we owe those tireless nights of prayer. The world's Redeemer there made intercession for all coming generations. What vast trains of the children of men must have swept in review before the Saviour's eye! And as the shepherd knows and recognizes each little lamb in all his flock, so our Shepherd, in those nights of watchfulness and prayer, knew and looked upon us, for whom he came to suffer and atone. For his chosen he sent upward the voice of intense, earnest prayer, asking mercy for the sleeping world at his feet, and for the unborn world that he saw with divine vision.

"Not Wisdom But Christ Crucified."

Men bow before talent, even if unassociated with goodness; but between these two we must make an everlasting distinction. When once the idolatry of talent enters, then farewell to spirituality; when men ask their teachers, not for that which will make them more humble and godlike, but for the excitement of an intellectual banquet, then farewell to Christian progress. Here also St. Paul stood firm. Not wisdom, but Christ crucified. St. Paul might have complied with these requirements of his converts, and then he would have gained admiration and love; he would have been the leader of a party, but he would have been false to his Master—he would have been preferring self to Christ.—Robertson.

Circulation of the Bible in Russia.—The Temoinage says, that there are now in Russia several men and women who are voluntarily distributing Bibles from house to house. One of them writes, "My work is very cheering. All classes of society gladly receive the New Testament; but in no place has our success been greater than in A——, where several of the priests favor the movement. During the first week of my sojourn there, they came almost every evening to ask for copies of the New Testament. The Bishop purchased no less than 3,000 for a religious library recently established, and the priests, of their own accord, are thinking of procuring a colporteur to distribute the Bible in all the houses of the town. One day, as I was passing the shop of one of the principal tradesmen, I felt constrained to enter, and not only did the purchasers buy the New Testament for themselves, but also mentioned to me families where I ought to call, and everywhere I met with a hearty reception." This is a remarkable fact.

A gentleman once said to Rowland Hill: "It is sixty-five years since I first heard you preach, and the sermon was well worth while remembering. You remarked that some people are very squeamish about the manner of a clergyman in preaching, but you then added: 'Supposing one is hearing a will read, expecting to receive a legacy, would you employ the time in criticising the lawyer's manner while reading it? No; you would give all your interest to ascertain if anything were left to yourself, and how much. Let that, then, be the way in which you listen to the gospel.'"

Six Sermons on the Inquiry. Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the true teachings of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.

PAUL'S HOPE.

Acts xxiv., 14, 15. "But this I confess unto thee, that after the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers, believing all things that are written in the law and in the prophets; and have hope toward God, which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust."

PAUL did not utter these sentiments in the English tongue, and furthermore he did not utter some of them at all, in any tongue. King James, who made our version by his bishops, is in a measure responsible for what we find in the above paragraph, for he makes Paul hope not only for the resurrection of the just, but also of the unjust.

Words express ideas. The term Hope embraces two ideas—desire and expectation. This word is sometimes confounded with the term Wish, but they are not interchangeable. Wish expresses strong desire. We may wish for either good or evil, but we hope only for good. The resurrection of the just will be blessed, and may be hoped for; not so the resurrection of the wicked, provided they should have one.

Christians have their hope based upon the promises of God. This term as it is found in Bible never embraces evil. There we read of "the hope of the glory of God;" "the hope of righteousness;" "the hope of salvation;" etc., etc.; but we never read of "the hope of the resurrection of the unjust" except in our version of Acts xxiv., which we shall find is not correct. Everything that God has promised consists exclusively of blessings. "The blessing of the Lord, it maketh rich; and he addeth no sorrow with it." The Lord has "given unto us exceeding great and precious promises;" and their preciousness consists in their absolute freedom from evil. Our hope is indeed "blessed."

God threatens evil, and denounces woes, upon the ungodly. There are persons who use the terms promise and threaten interchangeably; but, as they express opposite ideas, such usage is improper. God does not promise evil to the wicked, neither does he threaten good to the righteous. I have heard parents promise their children punishment, but I have yet to see the child who hoped for such promises.

Paul declared that he had "hope toward (Gr., EIS—in) God." It is quite evident that he hoped for blessings that God had promised. Christians generally have suppposed while reading the English version of Acts xxiv., that he hoped for the resurrection of the unjust; but as such an event is nowhere promised, he certainly could not have had such a hope. Nearly all who hold to the resurrection of the wicked affirm that it will not be to blessedness, but "to wretchedness"—"to judgment"—"to damnation." Paul would not be comforted or gratified by such a resurrection. He was a sinner saved by grace, and surely it was not in his heart to desire the reliving and damnation of those who had no such grace. His hope was "the hope of the promise," and not of the threatening.

In looking over the epistles of Paul, we cannot find one passage that declares that the wicked dead shall live again. This is a very significant fact. On the other hand, he declares that "the dead in Christ shall rise;" "the just shall live by faith;" "them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him;" "Christ the first-fruits, afterward they that are Christ's, at his coming." Such was the doctrine of Paul. It is quite different from that which is advocated at the present day. Additions are made by uninspired men which have no support in the original Scriptures. Our translators have put words into Paul's mouth that he never uttered. They make Paul hope for blessings and curses. A strange medley, indeed! In the text under consideration, they make him deny what he has asserted many times in other places. It is my aim at this time to give what I believe to be the true interpretation of the text as Paul uttered it.

In Acts xxi., we learn that Paul was in the temple, and the Jews supposed that he took a certain Ephesian there, and some Jews from Asia who were present, cried out so earnestly against him, that "all the city was moved, and the people ran together, and they took Paul and drew him out of the temple. . . . All Jerusalem was in an uproar," and Roman soldiers were sent to rescue him from the violence of the people, and they brought him to the castle. From the steps of this castle he addressed the Jews, and they listened to him until he said that the Lord told him he would send him "unto the Gentiles:"—then they lost their temper, and crying out loudly against him, they "cast off their clothes, and threw dust into the air." (See Acts xxii.)

The next day the chief captain "commanded the chief priests and all their council to appear, and brought Paul down and set him before them." There were two sects composing this council, and "when Paul perceived that the one part were Pharisees and the other Sadducees, he cried out in the council, Men and brethren, I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee; of the hope and" [Note. The terms hope and resurrection here express the same idea. Some versions leave out the and, though doubtless it is genuine. The phrase "hope and the resurrection" is a Hendiadys: i. e., "a figure consisting in the expression of an idea by two nouns, connected by the conjunction and." The simple English would be, of of the hope of the resurrection, etc.] "resurrection of the dead I am called in question." These words divided the council. "The scribes that were of the Pharisees' part arose, and strove, saying, We find no evil in this man." The dissension became so fierce, that, to save Paul from being dismembered, the chief-captain took him by force from among them, and put him again into the castle.

After this, Paul was taken from Cesarea, and was placed in Herod's judgment hall by Felix the governor. Then Ananias, with the elders and an orator named Tertullus, (the council who accused Paul,) went to the hall of judgment from Jerusalem, and after Tertullus had plead for the Jewish council, Paul made another defence. Amongst other things, he said, "But this I confess unto thee, that after the way which they call heresy" (Gr. AIRESIN, a sect. Tertullus uses the same word—Acts xxiv., 5, "We have found this man . . . . a ringleader of the sect, Gr., AIRESIN, of the Nazarines,) "so worship I the God of my fathers, believing all things that are written in the law and in the prophets, and have hope toward (Gr. KAI, in) God, which they," etc . . . "Touching the resurrection of the dead I am called in question."

Sometime afterward Agrippa came to Cesarea in order to examine Paul prior to his sending him to Rome. In his defence before the king, Paul said, "After the most straitest sect of our religion I lived a Pharisee. And now I stand and am judged for the HOPE of the PROMISE made of God unto our fathers, unto which promise our twelve tribes . . . . hope to come. . . . Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead."

From Cesarea Paul was sent in bonds to Rome. To the Jews there he said, "For the hope of Israel I am bound with this chain."

Thus the account of Paul's trial, as we find it recorded from Acts xxi. to Acts xxvii., gives us a definite idea of the hope of the apostle. His hope was "the hope of Israel;" "the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers, unto which promise our twelve tribes . . . hope to come;" "the hope and resurrection of the dead." Here the whole matter is summed up. Promises and not threats were made. Blessings and not curses were promised. The twelve tribes hoped for these blessings that were promised, particularly the resurrection from the dead. So Paul labored in order that he "might attain" that blessed promise.

Now for the English text which muddles the declarations of Paul. Did he hope for the resurrection of the unjust? I answer, unhesitatingly, He did not. How can the difficulty be removed? As follows: It must be borne in mind that Acts xxiv., 15, 16, was uttered in the presence of the council of the Jews. That council was composed of Pharisees and Sadducees. They had leagued themselves together against the new church that had sprung into existence. The Sadducees did not believe in the resurrection of anybody from the dead. They believed that after the giving of the law that there were no angels, and that when they are said to appear so often, in the law of Moses, they were framed for that purpose, and after that ceased to exist. They denied that there was a separate existence of spirits from the body, but they held that God was a Spirit, and thus they denied that the spirits of dead people could reveal anything. The Pharisees held to the existence of angels and to the conscious existence of spirits apart from the body, and so they said in verse 9, "If a spirit or an angel hath spoken to him, let us not fight against God." Doubtless reference was here made in regard to the statements of Paul concerning his conversion.

Porcius Festus declared Paul's cause unto King Agrippa, and said concerning the Jewish council who accused Paul, "they brought none accusation of such things as I supposed; but had certain questions against him ot their own superstition, and of one Jesus, which was dead, whom Paul affirmed to be alive." The Sadducees on account of their views, scouted the declaration. What grieved the Pharisees particularly was the fact that Paul preached that the resurrection would be through Jesus. The Pharisees believed that both just and unjust Jews, with the exception of the most wicked ones, would have a resurrection, because of their being the seed of Abraham.

When Paul made his defence before the council he said "I have hope (in) God which (hope) they themselves [Note, also, is not in the Greek) allow (Gr. expect) that there shall be a resurrection (of the dead is omitted in the Emphatic Diaglott, and by Lachman, Tischendorf, Griesbach; says there is probable ground for its omission, and others] both of the just and the unjust. Paul's hope was in the resurrection, and he taught that only the just would attain to it. In the verses before us, Paul declares simply that the Pharisees expected a resurrection not only of the just but also of the unjust. I make the following paraphrase of Acts xxiv., 15, 16, which I believe will give the ideas of Paul as he would have expressed them had he spoken in our tongue: —But this I grant unto thee, that according to the way which they call the sect of the Nazarines, so worship I the God of my fathers, believing all things that are written in the law and in the prophets, and I have a hope in God of the resurrection of the just, and these Jews themselves expect the resurrection not of the just only, but also of the unjust.

The text, as it stands in our versions, makes Paul allow his own hope, and it makes the Jews also allow it. But Paul declares I have hope, etc. Some have tried to remedy the matter by substituting the word expect for allow, but that would make Paul expect his own hope, and it makes the Jews also expect the hope. But Paul had hope. He did not expect his expectations and desires. Our translators held to the resurrection of both classes, and they translated the text to harmonize with their view, though not wilfully. The last day of this age or world is the time when the just will be raised. This dispensation then closes. The fate of the wicked is sealed. They are condemned not to see life.

Then will be ushered in a new age—"the world (or age) to come whereof we speak." "They which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world (or age) and the resurrection from the dead . . . . are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." "If ye be Christ's then are ye Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise.

The Pharisees held that none but the seed of Abraham according to the flesh would have a resurrection while Paul taught as above. Yours in Christ. F. H. BURBANK.

QUERIES CONCERNING BAPTISM.

FOR ourself we have never yet been become persuaded that water baptism is not an ordinance of the Christian church. We have consequently during our entire history as a preacher administered it to all believers who have desired it. But to our mind the arguments adduced by certain writers to prove it such, fall very far short of accomplishing the thing they aim to do. In an article in the World's Crisis by Wm. Hobbs, after quoting "one Lord, one faith, and one baptism," the writer says, "that water baptism is the 'one baptism,' referred to by Paul, is evident from the fact that there was none other that could be legitimately so called." The reason he assigns is this, "Baptism signifies to plunge, to dip, to immerse, as all well-informed persons know, consequently, where the Scriptures speak of being baptized with the Holy Spirit, baptize is used figuratively." We object to this sentiment, first, because if "all well-informed persons" do know this, we must necessarily charge many well-informed persons with downright dishonesty; for to practise what we know to be wrong is nothing short of dishonesty. And that there are many, who are quite as well informed as Br. Hobbs, who do practise sprinkling for baptism, some of us do most certainly know. Many very well informed men deny even that baptism does signify to plunge, to dip, to immerse only. It was our thoroughly appreciated privilege when a boy to be brought under the direct influence of "our pastor," as the motto reads on the tomb stone of the Congregationalist minister, who for years ministered in holy things in our native village, away among the greens hills of Vermont. Under his immediate superintendence we commenced the work of laying the foundation for an education. And in all the years that have passed since those first days of our life, a recalling of the hours, and days, and months passed in his well-ordered, genteel, and Christian family, has inspired in our own heart a deeper love for all that is holy, just, and noble. This man lived and died a most devoted Christian, greatly beloved by all the consistently good within the limits of his very large circle of acquaintances. And indeed, if he was ever found fault with, it was because of his uncompromising adherence to principles of the most strict moral and religious integrity, or by those whose sectarian prejudices have made their tongues sour with the acrimonious tart of religious partyism.

But this man with all his piety and erudition, practised sprinkling for baptism, and did not believe that baptism necessarily, and always means "to plunge, to dip," etc. We refer to our much revered pastor as the representative of a class. Br. Hobbs in his article virtually says that all such men lived and died dishonest men. A broader charity, and less apparent egotism would make an article in a religious paper run much more smoothly.

But we object to this sentiment, secondly, Because it assumes that the baptism of the Spirit is a mere trivial affair. To say that baptism, where it is spoken of as of the Holy Spirit, is used figuratively, is to say that the baptism of the Spirit is not a real baptism. When a figure is used in the Bible it is always used to represent something; and being a figure that something must be different from the figure used.

To illustrate; Christ says, John vi., 57, "He that eateth me shall live by me." This is figurative language. To say that we are to eat Christ's flesh in any literal sense whatever, is to entirely pervert the meaning of the text. So in the case before us, if baptism in those Scriptures where it is spoken of as relating the Spirit of God is a figurative expression, then is there no such thing as a literal baptism of the Spirit. But who constituted Br. Hobbs a judge to decide this matter? Who gave him authority to say that every ime the word baptism occurs in the Bible and refers to water, it is to be understood in its most literal import; and in every instance where it refers to the Holy Spirit it is figurative? Does theory of water baptism require such expositions as this? If the literal signification of baptism is "to immerse," what difference does it make whether we are immersed by being put into an element, or having that element poured upon us to such an extent that it entirely submerges us?. Some men will make very nice distinctions, more nice than splitting hairs. If immersion is baptism because it is immersion; then if, as Br. H. admits, Christians are immersed by the Spirit of God, they are as literally baptized with the Holy Spirit as they are baptized with water by being immersed in water.

But it seems to us that Br. H. refutes his own argument. He quotes from Mark i., 1–4, where the evangelist speaks of John's baptism, and then goes on to say that Peter preached this same baptism, i. e., John's baptism, on the day of Pentecost, and always after when he refers to water baptism; and that, also, Paul preached the same baptism when he taught water baptism.

The question now is, is John's baptism binding on the Christian church? We answer, Acts xix., 1–12, positively settles the question that the baptism of John does not answer the purpose for Christian believers. They must have another baptism than that of John. Now if John's baptism was the only water baptism taught by Peter and Paul, that other baptism taught by Paul, as absolutely essential, must be something else than water baptism. This is simply reasoning from the premises laid down by Br. H.

Again; if certain texts quoted by Br. H. refer to water baptism, what right has he to say that water baptism "is not essential to the salvation of those who are uncertain in regard to their duty, or have no opportunity to comply therewith?" A few of these texts are as follows: Rom. vi., 5. For if we have been planted in the likeness of his death, we shall be also of resurrection. We leave out the words added by the translators. Mark, if we have been planted, etc. Then what? why we shall be in, or have part in, the resurrection. Who cannot see that this text promises a resurrection from the dead only on the condition that we have been "planted in the likeness of his death." If we fail to comply with this one condition, how is it possible for us to be "accounted worthy of the resurrection from the dead?"

Another text quoted is Gal. iii., 27. For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ. How many does Paul say have put on Christ? Just as many, and no more, as have been baptized into Christ. Now if we get into Christ by water baptism; if that is the divine plan, then all who are not baptized with water are out of Christ, and consequently can never have a future life. This conclusion, to us, seems inevitable. But the question comes, Does water baptism get us into Christ? We answer emphatically, No. As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God. Whatever else then, we may think concerning this subject, we are satisfied that the great essential in the gospel is to be baptized, filled with the Holy Spirit of God.

S. W. BISHOP.

THE BURNING BUSH.

"I will now turn aside and see this great sight why the bush is not burnt." Ex. iii., 3.

WHILE Moses was a shepherd, feeding the flock of Jethro, his father-in-law, he came near unto Mount Horeb, and saw a bush burning with fire, and yet was not consumed. Astonished and amazed at the sight, he exclaimed, in the language of my text, "I will now turn aside and see this great sight, why the bush is not burnt." And as he turned to see the great sight, he heard a voice speaking out of the midst of the bush, and saying, "I am the God of thy father, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob." "And Moses hid his face, for he was afraid to look upon God. And the Lord said, I have surely seen the affliction of my people which are in Egypt," etc.

Now, it is not creditable to suppose the Lord showed Moses "this strange, sight" merely to amuse, or astonish him; or to show his omnipotent power to no further purpose. But from what immediately followed—"I have surely seen the affliction of my people in Egypt," it is self-evident that the bush was an allegory of the people of God, then writhing under severe affliction in Egypt. This is still more evident from the fact that the Lord's errand with Moses was purposely to appoint him a leader to bring his people out of bondage and affliction.

And what better figure could have been used to represent them than a bush? As long as the majestic oaks and lofty pines overshadow it, it has but little chance to grow and no hope of being a tree itself. But when the big tree, of Dan. iv., 14, is hewn down, the little bush will become a great tree, and fill the whole earth. See Isa. xi., 9, and Matth. xiii., 31, 32.

But the people of God cannot be fitly represented by a bush, unless it was enveloped in a flame of fire: for such has been the condition of the faithful worshippers of God from the beginning, The first righteous man, the the second Son of Adam, was cruelly murdered by his wicked brother. Here the fire was kindled in the bush, and from that time to this, it has been burning, burning, burning! but, thank the Lord, it is not consumed; because the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac and the God of Jacob is in it.

At the time Moses saw "this great sight" the bush was in Egypt, burning under the wrath of an impious Pharaoh. They, the Israelites, were not only in bondage, but cruelly treated by their task-masters; and besides, a decree had gone forth to destroy their lame children as soon as they were born. To all human appearance, the annihilation of the bush seemed inevitable, but the God of Abraham was in it, and, through a series of miracles Moses lead them out by the power of the Most High.

But the bush still burned. Famine and thirst alternately threatened their destruction; but the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, was still in the bush, and he fed them with manna and quails, and slaked their thirst with water from a rock. They came to Sinai, and the de-evil renewed the flame of the bush, They forsook the God of the burning bush, and made them a golden calf (a young Egyptian bull) and worshipped it. But Moses came down from the Mount; demolished their calf; and reestablished the worship of the God of Abraham. They finally passed the Jordan, and entered the land promised to the fathers. But even here the fire continued to burn in the bush. They were surrounded by powerful nations, which threatened their destruction. At one time, a single monster in human shape, standing eleven feet and an inch high in his pants, came out, day by day, for forty days, and boldly defied the armies of Israel's God, "saying, give me a man, that we may fight together." On seeing and hearing all this, "Saul and all Israel were dismayed, and greatly afraid," and for awhile everything had come to a stand still, and it seemed that the bush must be consumed certain. But the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob was still in it. Little David, already the chosen of God to be the future king of Israel, had just arrived in camp, and, burning with fiery zeal, went boldly out to meet the gigantic Dagon worshipper: trusting solely in the God that delivered him from the paws of the lion and the bear: and with one smooth stone felled him to the ground; and the armies of Israel again prevailed.

But time and talents would fail me in giving a tithe of the burnings the bush has passed through, and yet is not burnt. At the time Messiah was born in Bethlehem of Judea, a decree went forth to kill him. The fire was rekindled in the bush; but the God of Abraham was still in it, and took good care of his own Son, by sending him into Egypt. But he returned, and in due time began to preach, saying, "The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand: repent ye, and believe the gospel." This kindled additional flames in the bush. Those self-righteous Pharisees, in their own estimation, had nothing to repent of; and as to believing the gospel, it was all law with them. Here it is well to remark, that every advance the people of God make in truth and holiness is followed up by renewed persecution. From the time Christ began to preach, the flame of persecution raged more and more, having a whole nation to feed it, until it brought him to the cross, on which he suffered and died.

Three doleful days and doleful nights the great Head of the church lay locked up in the iron jaws of death. The body, too, not being able to live without a living Head, died also as to all spiritual life. They gave up their hope, and fell back into the world, and to worldly occupations.

O, horror the most dreadful! Is not the bush burnt now? Head and body all dead. Where now is the God of Abraham, of Isaac and Jacob? The wicked triumphantly say, He is not in the bush.

But is there no way to pass this Stygian, yawning gulf of universal oblivion, into which the whole human family must drop, and be no more?

Yes; glory to God on high: a narrow plank was laid across that gulf away back, in the days of Moses, where I took my text. The very language there used; "I am the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob," proves a resurrection; for God is not the God of the dead, but of the living. Though this was nearly overlooked by men, it was well understood by angels. And while a veil of darkness was spread over the sun, and the pall of death over the whole world; the weeping and sympathizing angels delegated one of their number to come to the earth by night, with the speed of a noon-day sunbeam, who rolled away the stone from Joseph's new tomb, and Jesus rose again to life and immortality.

Glory to his great Name forever. The God of Abraham, of Isaac and of Jacob had not left the bush at all: if he had, the bush would have been burned then surely. But the wicked have no such head to rise and give them life. Their head, the devil, once dead, will not rise up the second time. This nails the wicked to the dust, and clinches the nail. But to proceed. The church, though a living body again, did not escape persecution: the fire still raged in the bush; during the reign of ten Roman Emperors, until more than three hundred and seventy thousand were put to death. Nor did it cease then: the papal fire next kindled in the bush, destroying millions, until it was said, by papists themselves, that the last heretic was put to death. And what then?

The "Reformation" broke out to restore the ancient faith; and the bush burned anew. Coming down still nearer to our own time, in which Protestantism, in its turn, became corrupted; a few individuals arose to resume the ancient light of the gospel; and began to preach the kingdom of heaven at hand; and the saints' inheritance on the earth; and that "surely die" was the penalty of sin: and here a new fire was kindled in the bush.

The doctrine of the immortality of man added to the flame, and the bush still burned. The restoration of Israel to the favor of God, and to the land of their fathers, is another source from whence the ever burning flame is led. Even many of those, who were still writhing in the flame, turned bush burners themselves, and blowed up the fire until it is hotter than the furnace into which the three worthies were cast. But the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, is still in the bush; and Israel will be restored.

Lastly; a few individuals saw clearly that the immortality of the soul, the resurrection of the wicked, and punishment after death, must all stand or fall together. This, as was expected, rekindled anew the fire of the bush.

Yet an undaunted few, trusting in the God of the bush, met under the "Chestnut Tree," and agreed to start a weekly paper, advocating, "No Life out of Christ;" and that He gives life only to his sheep that follow him, and not to the goats. As this was advancing a step further in divine truth, and an important step it was, it had the usual effect, to increase the flame of the bush. But God was, and still is in the bush; the paper lives, a faithful advocate of truth. And the very liberal donations made to it at the late Springfield meeting is evidence that God is with his people: moving them to declare his whole counsel, without regard to the opinions of men.

And now, brethren and sisters, we have turned aside, and have seen "this great sight," and have learned why the bush has not been burned; and why it never will be burned. Let us, therefore, thank God and take courage, and "press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." We are surrounded by the enemies of truth, who seem determined to tread out the light of the gospel. But hold on; let your light shine, like a city set on a hill, that cannot be hid; for the God of Abraham is in the bush: and when the Gentile tree (the powers of earth) is hewn down, the bush will cease to burn and become a great tree and fill the whole earth. And there will be no more contending for the truth; for all will know the truth from the least to the greatest: and there may we all meet to glorify God forever.

Z. CAMPBELL.

ASHTABULA, Ohio, Nov., 1868.

SOME men were crossing the Alps, and fell down into a cavern in the glacier. The guides, instead of cutting up some leather bags they had into strips, tying the pieces together, and saving them in that way, went three miles to get a regular twisted rope. When they came back the men had perished. It does not take a regular doubled-and-twisted graduate to save the lost. Take the readiest means, the first layman.

I SHOULD rejoice to hear any one of my congregation saying, "I forgot who preached, I felt so much the influence of the truths he preached. Blessed be God, I was enabled to repent, and the silent tears trickled down my cheeks. My heart was affected, it began to relent, and now it relents again, when I consider by whose mercy it was that I was blessed with these feelings."—Rowland Hill.

Gehenna Punishment.

Many of our Christian brethren say that "this is the punishment that all the wicked who have ever lived will receive, when Christ comes the second time, to judge the world."

That this position is an unscriptural one, though honestly held, I think the following facts will demonstrate.

The term gehenna, or gai Hinnom, is found in the Old Testament thirteen times. In eleven out of the thirteen texts it has no reference to future punishment of any kind. It is translated "the valley of Hinnom" that is, a valley belonging to the family of Hinnom. It served as a boundary line, and was also used by the heathen and Jews for abominable rites. The two remaining instances Jer. vii., 32, and Jer. xix., threaten a punishment, but to no other class than the Jews. The desolation of Gehenna is used as an example by the prophet showing that Jerusalem should likewise be desolated.

Gehenna occurs in the New Testament twelve times. Our Saviour and James are the only ones who use the term. It is found in Matthew seven times, in Mark, three times, in Luke once, and in the Epistle of James once. In all these instances it is addressed to none but Jews, and can have no other import than that given by the Old Testament. Ten times it is addressed to Jewish Christians, warning them, etc., and twice to the unconverted Jews.

It is not once found in the Acts, where we have the account of the labors of the apostles for thirty years.

It is not mentioned by John in his gospel, or in his Epistles, or in Revelation. All of these were written after the desolation of Jerusalem.

Paul, Peter, and Jude, whose writings form two-thirds of the New Testament, do not mention it.

James, who wrote "to the twelve tribes," mentions it once.

With these facts before us, can we still believe that the gehenna punishment is yet future. The apostles kept entire silence upon it when teaching the Gentiles. Then there was no profit in the matter to them, else it would have been mentioned. This much for the present, by your affectionate brother in Christ.

The Devil Discussion.

Allow me publicly to express my regrets that the investigation in some fair play way was not allowed to go forward in the Herald, in reference to the existence of such an entity as a personal devil. I have been so taught by my parents and the church; it may be but a false tradition, but has (till I saw the subject seriously questioned in the Herald) looked to me like a sentiment supported by Scripture testimony. And I confess now, to figure the expressions in Mat. iv., 1 to 11 inclusive, Luke iv., 2 to 13, and many other passages too numerous here to quote into mere myths, de-evils or diseases, seems to me as best I can now see, an "advance backwards," rather than forwards in the cause of truth. But I would see the truth. Yours truly.

Marathon, N. Y., Nov. 1868.

Note by the Editor.—We are entirely willing to discuss the spirit-devil question further, if there is a desire for it; but we do not think any more long articles or criticisms on the original would be acceptable to our readers generally. Our brother entirely misconceives our views on this question if he supposes that any of our writers think the term devil, as used in the Bible applies to a myth or fable. But we do believe the use made of it by theologians generally is mythical—a fable—having its origin in heathenism, bolstered up by Romanism to frighten the ignorant, and is one of the filthy garments Protestants brought out of Babylon, by which immortal-soulism has been fed and nourished, and children, grown and half-grown, have made a scape-coat for all their follies and wickedness. Devils there are, innumerable; and there are many men who have at least a "legion" of them. If any one doubts it, let him look in upon New York and New Orleans for a few weeks, and he will doubt no longer. They are realities, and no "myths."

"Thy Will be Done."—"I have been forced," said Fletcher, "by many disappointments to look for comfort in nothing but in the comprehensive words, 'Thy will be done.'" A few more trials will convince you experimentally of the heavenly balm they contain to sweeten the pains and heal the wounds that crosses and afflictions may cause.

The experience of every Christian who has been afflicted has corresponded to that of Fletcher. To one who is mourning over the loss of his first-born, how far from reaching the case are the topics of consolation often suggested by unskilful friends! All utterly fail till the mourner can say from the heart, "Thy will be done." Then they are not needed.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 18, 1868.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

Responsibilities.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

The Campaign Documents.

Some fifteen or twenty thousand of these have been scattered in a few months past, and still the call is for more. "The Living Soul" has recently been added to them, making four in all. (See catalogue on last page.) We trust there will be no abatement in the interest to help on this work. The call has been made to add the sermon "God is Love" to the Campaign Documents, and it will be done before long, making five in all.

Dr. S. P. Townsend has sent $2, C. Swift, South Boston, $3, and Ursula Eaton, Ohio, $1, to help supply the sisters in Albany with the means to scatter light in that city, in answer to a call made a short time since. We have sent them quite a quantity, and shall send them more as soon as they desire them. Let us give thanks and take courage. "Onward" is the watchword: let the echo fly.

"Eternal Conscious Death."

What dictionary will give us a definition of the above phrase? Can Zion's Herald inform us where it gets its authority for the use of it? for we suppose our highly esteemed friend, its editor, would not use it without some standard authority, because he would instruct us in an "unknown tongue," with no interpreter at hand.

In Zion's Herald of last week, we find the expression, "Eternal conscious death is an awful truth, but extinction of being is more awful." Bear with us, Br.; we understand the last member of this sentence; but the first we do not comprehend. Pardon our ignorance, we pray you. We are unable to find a definition of the phrase. If it is a new one not found in any dictionary, will you be so kind as to have it inserted among the thousands and thousands of words in Webster's and Worcester's, which we sometimes consult on difficult words and phrases? It is true the dictionaries give the term "death, in theology" to signify "Damnation; endless punishment; 'Everlasting death.'" But that does not explain the phrase "conscious death." That is where we want light. Death signifies "extinction of life; entire loss of vitality," etc., according to these authors. How can we say "conscious death" when life is extinct? How would it differ, in logic, from "eternal unconscious life?" Is that the reward of the righteous? If so, how far short of annihilation is that state? We can't help thinking, Br. Herald, and you have put us in search of an idea. "Eternal conscious death;" and that "is an awful truth." Whether it is so or not, it is "an awful" undertaking to our mind to comprehend it as a "truth." It seems to us "an awful" contradiction in terms; but it may be we can learn there is a new thing "under the sun."

We are familiar with the expression, absurd as it is, "always dying but never dead;" but this phrase, "eternal conscious death," seems to have come into existence recently. It does not mean "extinction of being," for that "is more awful" says Zion's Herald.

Well, as we believe and teach that "all the wicked will God destroy;" Psa. cxlv., 20; that when life is taken away, "they are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise;" Isa. xxvi., 14; "they shall lie down together, they shall not rise; they are extinct, they are quenched as tow;" Isa. xlii., 17; "they shall be as though they had not been;" Obadiah 16; "he that believeth not the Son shall not see life;" John iii., 36; "the wages of sin is death;" Rom. vi., 23, etc., we say, as we believe these and like texts of the Bible teach their "extinction of being," we teach a "more awful" punishment than Zion's Herald believes is the doom of the ungodly.

Now, good Br. Herald, we hope none of your co-religionists will ever again accuse us of taking away the terrors of the law, and and giving license to sin. A Methodist minister in this vicinity, is reported to have said, if he believed our view of the punishment of the wicked, he would at once give license to all his animal appetites, even to licentiousness and drinking, and enjoy himself without restraint. If he said or thought these things, he did not see our views in a true light, or you are mistaken in saying our view of future punishment is "more awful" than yours.

We find an article in the Ch. Advocate of this city, published near two years ago, in which the writer says, "Eternal life in death is preferable to eternal annihilation." We have heard that the present editor of Zion's Herald was the author of that article, but we cannot say that he was; yet as the expression is very similar to "eternal conscious death," perhaps the former may help to give the author's meaning in the latter expression. In the one case life, and in the other conscious is the word employed; and as, in this case, 'death' cannot be understood literally, the phrase "eternal conscious death" turns out in fact, to be a revamp of the old phrase "eternal, indescribable torments;" and this "is preferable to eternal annihilation."

Surely we "have not labored in vain, nor spent our strength for nought" for the last twenty-eight years. Our opponents are endeavoring to hide the hideousness of their theory of future punishment: but it reminds us of the fowl, which, to escape the shot of the hunter, puts her head under water, and fancies she is safe because she cannot see; but the hunter has all he can wish for as her body is in full view, and the fowl has no chance to dodge.

"Eternal conscious death" is only putting the head of the eternal torment theory under water; it is not very likely to prevent the effects of the shots of eternal truth, with which we propose to continue to storm the deformed body of the horrid monster, eternal torments, which has so long made war on the government of a holy, just and loving God. It is time this monster was slain; and we neither ask nor wish for any other weapons to slay it than the words of "the living God;" the Moloch god has already been "wounded unto death," and it is not possible to heal his "deadly wound" by the soft words of "eternal conscious death," or, "eternal life in death." Those expressions may answer to hide the monster's "head," but his heart is in his body, and still exposed to our shots, and we shall "fight it out on this line, if it takes" till the "millennium," sure of the victory in the end. We have no fears or misgivings in that matter. We are satisfied our respected Methodist brethren will, sooner or later, help to slay the monster of eternal or hopeless torture. Their hearts, many of them, as is evident from the change of phraseology, are too tender much longer to look on the hopeless torture theory without lending a helping hand, or to "be in at the death;" for die it must; the 'old villain" has been arrested, and is on trial for his life; the evidence is clear and abundant of his long continued robberies of God, and torture of his children; "the law and the testimony" is all against him. He may, and perhaps he ought to die a lingering death; but we can assure all men, it will be an "eternal annihilation," which Zion's Herald says, "is more awful" than "eternal conscious death." Very well, let the convicted criminal—the doctrine of future hopeless torment—have the "more awful" punishment; he deserves it, if any one ever did. All good orthodox Christians of whatever name or denomination, will say, "Amen," when the execution takes place. "And every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them," will be "heard saying, Blessing and honor, and glory, and power, be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever." Rev. v., 12, 13.

We rather "guess" this language covers all places and all creatures, and the "eternal conscious death" place will vanish like all other creatures or things of men's inventions or fancies.

"The Guillotine Theory."

We were a little puzzled at finding the above expression in Zion's Herald last week, in a disclaimer from Dr. E. O. Haven, President of Michigan University. We cast about to see if we could find its origin, as he had quoted it. Looking into our file of papers, Vol. V., Jan. 30, 1867, we found an article we had transferred from the Christian Advocate to our columns, which, after stating that annihilation was a doctrine "adopted usually as a refuge from the doctrine of eternal fire," says:

"But the refuge is worse than that which it seeks to escape. Who would not prefer the dungeon to the cord, the rack to the guillotine? Death is the greatest punishment man or God can inflict. Eternal life in death is preferable to eternal annihilation."

Out of this language has grown the expression "The guillotine theory": that is, death is death; and God means what He says, "Thou shalt surely die"—"the wages of sin is death." This doctrine is the "guillotine theory of final extinction." Dr. Haven says, "It is stated that I have renounced the doctrine of eternal torment and embraced the 'guillotine theory of final extinction,' . . . . which I deny." That is plain enough. Let no one again repeat the "charge." The matter has turned out as we expected.

While on this point, we will make a few more remarks on the singular phrase "eternal life in death." "Eternal life" is a Bible phrase, never employed in the Scriptures except in reference to the reward of believers in Jesus, and as "the gift of God through Jesus Christ." It is never applied to the wicked in any sense; no, not once in the Bible. Why then use "the rack" to make the Bible speak a language which has neither orthography, scripture, nor reason to sustain it? We think if the Bible could speak, it would say, "O ye, my friends, spare me 'the rack;' if you must use violence take the 'guillotine' at once, and not torture me in this manner."

Life, eternal life, is the great proclamation of the gospel of God; it is the grand, the glorious promise of God to every one who believeth on his Son; and, except a man eat Christ's flesh and drink His blood—form a vital, a living union with Him—he has "no life in him." John vi. How then, in sense, reason, or Scripture, can it be said that unbelievers, enemies of Christ, have "eternal life" in any sense? Let those believe it who will, we do not. We are sure it is the last resort for a desperate cause. The doctrine of inherent immortality and eternal torments are twins, who die together, and die hard; but they are doomed to the "guillotine," and will perish forever. May the God of Love speed the execution.

A Practice we Cannot Approve.

Some persons engaged in an unpopular reform, if they think men of high standing among our opponents lean toward our views, they make haste to bring out their names publicly. The effect of this is evil.

1. It makes those thus brought out objects of suspicion among their bretheren; and hence,

2. Being suspected, it puts them on their defence; and if inclined toward our views, they are yet too weak in the faith to withstand the reproach they fear will fall on them, and at once beat a hasty retreat, and are likely to become our open opposers to wipe off the suspicion of their brethren.

3. If any are inclined to our views, let them declare, themselves, their adhesion, and not forestall them. If they have strength to stand at all, they will prefer to make their own announcement in their own way. Let them alone before the public till they see fit to make themselves known.

A Prophecy.

The New York City is steadily gaining on Rum and the Devil. The vote for Grant this year was nearly 50,000, (47,778.) An increase of 11,000 over that of 1864. We shall yet see that city redeemed unto God. In no spot of the land is there more prayer, more work, more liberality for God. He will surely there bruise Satan under his feet shortly.

—Zion's Herald.

The above is good news if it proves a true prophecy: but we have to confess, we are afraid it is a "conditional prophecy": it looks suspicious. In the first place, it is of man, and has not God's mark upon it. Since we have resided here, now about seventeen years, if good has been accomplished, the evil has increased enough to make ones ears tingle.

Our Br. of Zion's Herald counts the increase of good by the increase of votes for one party in four years, i. e., "11,000." What of the other party? It has increased its vote sixty or seventy thousand in the same period. If that indicates anything, it indicates exactly the reverse of Zion's Herald's prophecy. Thus:

God's army increased 11,000 in four years: "Satan's" only 70,000 in the same time!

Therefore "satan will be bruised under his feet shortly."

Is that good logic, Br. Herald?

We think with Paul that, "Evil men and seducers will wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived," till Christ, the Son of God, returns "from heaven" to take the throne of His father David;" then New York city may be purified as Sodom was. We confess we have little hope of its regeneration in any other way, or by any other means. "The wickedest man in New York" has not been converted yet, notwithstanding he has set so many ministers and church members on tiptoe looking for the "millennium" before Christ comes from heaven; and Zion's Herald bears witness to this fact, in its issue containing the above prophecy, in the following language:

The only person that seems likely to make anything in fame, virtue or cash, out of the Water Street reform, is Oliver Dyer. He invented the name of "The Wickedest Man." He is getting big prices for his description, and has gone into the lecture business. It's an ill wind that blows nobody good.

Remember, it is not we who say the whole "Water Street reform" has proved a stupendous humbug; though we have had very little faith that any real "virtue" would come out of it, from the first; but we have waited to see the fruit. If that is the way "Satan" is to get "bruised under feet" in this city, we fear we may despair of its ever being done; and the prophecy will not only prove to be a "conditional" one, but the author of it will prove that "God has not spoken by him." See Deut. xviii., 22.

P. S.—Since the foregoing was written, we see a synopsis of a sermon by Henry Ward Beecher, last Sunday evening in Brooklyn, reported in the Tribune of this city, in which Mr. B. seems to put cold water, or scorching fire, on the prophecy above-named. We give an extract, that Zion's Herald may see how "Satan" gets "bruised under" foot in this city. Mr. B.'s text was, "Abhor that which is evil," and he scorches New York churches and New York itself, in the following language, as reported:

He said that there was a growing tendency among church members and others to allow wickedness to grow and flourish, from a mistaken idea that every man should attend to his own business. Others compromised with their consciences until they became indifferent as to whether the guilty were brought to justice or not. New York has nearly as many churches as dens of infamy, yet the pulpits of that city allowed all kinds of corruptions to grow within its borders until it is second only to Sodom and Gomorrah. Business men who stand in the church set examples before their clerks that ought to make every honest man abhor them from the bottom of his heart. Ministers are supposed to be the mouth pieces of God, yet they grow fat in the service of the devil by keeping silent when they should lift up their voices and expose the wickedness of corrupt men in high places. . . . . . . Were all the villainies of men in high places brought to light, they would include all the crimes known to Sing Sing and Auburn. It is time for some one to "thunder," or society will be overwhelmed with the corruption of its members.

That does not look much like the "city" being "redeemed to God," as Zion's Herald prophesies.

A letter from Chicago, Ill., containing $1, came to us with the following note, but no signature:

"A poor man's mite toward the tract fund. May the blessing of the God of love and truth rest upon this effort, and multitudes through it be brought to the knowledge and love of Christ as the glorious Life-giver. Amen."

Mr. Beecher Excited.

The Tribune of this morning 16th inst., reports Mr. Beecher in his pulpit yesterday as follows:

[We omit Mr. Beecher's remarks here, because we have given most of them in our article "A Prophecy," which please see. His concluding remark, however, we insert because Br. Thorne has specially referred to it. It is as follows: Ed. of Her. of Life.]

The people must rise up and show their abhorrence of these wicked men. Until the church and its members do this we are at the mercy of swindlers and thieves. In his prayer, Mr. Beecher called on God to have mercy on the judges and take them away.

Why does Mr. B. rage? Is the "gentle shower" of wickedness likely to become a fierce storm, despite the prediction of orthodoxy that the world is about being converted to Christ? He says, "It is time for some one to 'thunder,' or society will be overwhelmed with the corruption of its members." Judging from some of his language we conclude Mr. B. has decided to commence the thundering process. If he will search his Bible he will find there a time plainly brought to view in which society is to "be overwhelmed with the corruption of its members," a condition of things which immediately precedes, not the thundering of some proud little "worm of the dust," but the soundering of the "mighty, mighty trump," and the revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ, "taking vengeance on them that know not God"—"who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from" his "presence, and from the glory of his power." The reverend gentleman herefrom quoted, once preached, we believe, a funeral sermon from the text, "And Enoch walked with God; and he was not, for God took him," and attempted to show a similarity between the cases of Enoch, who did not die at all, and the dead man then lying in his coffin before the speaker. Now he prays and calls "on God to have mercy on the judges, and take them away." Is he praying that God may kill them? that he may take them as he did Enoch? "Enoch walked with God, and he was not, for God took him;" and now Mr. B. wants it to be said that these wicked judges didn't walk with God, and they were not, for God took them. Don't get excited, Br. B., for the "wheat and tares grow together until the harvest;" and the good fish and the bad were in the same net.

A Complaint.

A respected correspondent writes us, he regrets that some expressions appear in our paper which prevent his showing it to those not of our faith. Among other things he refers to an article in the number of Nov. 4, where the writer uses the expression "an orthodox ape." We regret that we did not exclude the last word. We did erase it in reading the manuscript; but as we read on and found the writer confessed himself "the ape," we thought it would give no offence, and so restored it. Our first thought, however, was the best, and we should have adhered to it.

We do not intend to let expressions go into our columns that may give needless offence; at the same time, we cannot expect that everybody will be suited where our work embraces themes so antagonistic to the popular theology of the age. Yet all writers should avoid, as much as possible, any expression which might be construed as implying contempt of opponents. We are all liable, when a point is clear to us, to indulge in language which seems to border on a severe condemnation of others who do not see with us.

We are far from supposing that what may be called "severity" is always to be avoided. Some are to be "rebuked sharply;" but this is only to be done when it is manifest there is wilful wrong doing. Sentiments, also, may be severely criticised, while love is manifested to such as hold them; especially, when it is manifest that opinions are held honestly or sincerely.

After all, too much fearfulness of offending some one will prevent any advance; for how mild so ever you may be there will always be those who will think you hard and denunciatory, if you dispute the truthfulness of a theory which is the foundation of a sect or party. We say, however, offend as little as possible without compromising your conviction of truth. When the truth is clearly concerned, it is not a question, Who will be offended by its promulgation? He that seeks to save his life, or reputation, by withholding his clear conviction of truth, for fear of offending his dearest friends, is unfaithful to the truth, and may expect his light to go out. Yet he may and he ought to present the truth at the wisest time, and in the best manner possible.

All our friends know that we are no compromiser where our mind is settled on a point as the truth. We abhor the very name of "compromise" where truth is concerned. A compromise in all such cases is a virtual abandonment of the truth. No reform ever did or ever can go forward where such a course is pursued. It needs men who have counted the cost, and have laid all on the altar, and hazard all for the truth's sake, to lift men out of the mire of error.

It is asking more than human nature is capable of, to suppose that an earnest man, in his advocacy of truth, will never employ an unkind or an unwise expression; especially, when he is met by fierce opposition. Paul once called Ananias the high priest, a "whited wall," in open council, and told him, "God shall smite thee." Acts xxiii., 2, 3. True, Paul made an apology; he had somewhat overstepped the bounds of propriety.

Jesus once called his opposers, "fools and blind," and told the "scribes and Pharisees" that they were "hypocrites" and "like whited sepulchres" and "full of all uncleanness," etc. Matth. xxiii., 19, 27. The apostle John the disciple who above all others imitated his Master, and was full of love, declared that some men made "God a liar" by not believing that He had given unto us "eternal life; and that this life is in His Son," 1 John v., 10–12.

Paul on one occasion addressed an opponent in the following language, "O full of all subtlety and all mischief, thou child of the devil, thou enemy of all righteousness, wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord?" Acts xiii., 10.

It may be said, These men all spake by the Holy Spirit. True: but it shows that that Spirit approves of some men being addressed or spoken of in what all will call severe terms; hence severity is not of itself a sin; it is the spirit in which it is uttered that gives it its character. A strong love of truth, or a deep abhorrence of sin and wrong-doing, may lead good men to expressions, which both they and we may regret afterward, but which might not have been sinful to them, though exceeding hard to bear by those who are the subjects of the censure. In political affairs, who doubts this? True, "the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light;" but may we not learn something even of those who are wiser in their generation than we?

Helpers.

Most religious papers have what is called a "Corps of contributors"—prominent men, whose names carry weight—to help give interest to their issues, and who are expected to be regular contributors. We are not favored with such helpers, and have to do the best we can without them. If we do not make every issue equally interesting, our readers must bear with us; for we do the very best we can, and that our strength and means will permit. We feel no consciousness of neglect in our work, though we often regret that we cannot do it better. The cause in which we are engaged is worthy of the labors of the best and most mighty men in the land; but such men appear not to be God's choice. Fishermen, tent-makers, merchants, farmers, and the like, have seemed to be the persons he calls to do the work of moral regeneration. "Not many mighty, not many wise, not many noble are called." 1 Corth. ii., 26.

If two angels came down from heaven to execute a divine command and one was appointed to conduct an empire, and the other to sweep a street in it, they would feel no inclination to change employments.—John Newton.

The Lord's Supper.

For the benefit of those who are inquiring on the above subject, and who have not seen our full argument on the question of the yearly celebration, we give the following synopsis of it, intending to give it in full, in some form, some time the coming winter. We open our remarks with Paul's declaration, "For even Christ our passover is sacrificed for us." 1 Corth. v., 7.

This text opens up the subject under consideration, and may serve as a key to it. Christ is set forth as he truly is, as the anti-typical passover Lamb. Hence, in order to understand the question at issue, we must examine the passover institution. We turn to Exodus xii.

The Lord was about to pass through Egypt and slay all the first-born of the land. He directs Moses to have the children of Israel take a lamb, on the tenth day of the month, and "kill it in the evening." Then they were to take of its "blood and strike it on the two side-posts and on the upper door-posts of the houses wherein they shall eat it"—the passover lamb. They were to eat it with their loins girded, their shoes on, and their staff in their hands. They were told, "The blood shall be to you a token upon the houses where ye are: and when I see the blood I will pass over you, and the plague shall not be upon you to destroy you, when I smite the land of Egypt; and this day shall be unto you for a memorial; and ye shall keep it a feast unto the Lord throughout your generations: ye shall keep it a feast forever." They were to put away all leaven out of their habitations, and eat no leavened bread during this feast. Of the passover, it is said, "In one house shall it be eaten; thou shalt not carry forth aught of the flesh abroad out of the house; neither shall ye break a bone thereof." An evident prophecy, by a fact, of Christ's death without breaking a bone of him. John refers distinctly to this prophecy when speaking of the fact that his legs were not broken with the malefactors'; "These things were done," saith John, "that the Scripture should be fulfilled, A bone of him shall not be broken." Thus Jesus is identified as the antitype of the pass over lamb.

Concerning this passover feast, it is thus ordained—"Thou shalt keep this ordinance in its season, from year to year:" and "it shall be a sign unto thee" . . . "and for a memorial between thine eyes; that the Lord's law may be in thy mouth; for with a strong hand hath the Lord brought thee out of Egypt." Ex. xiii., 1–10. See the whole text.

We have thus briefly contemplated the passover institution, and find it established as a yearly feast, an anniversary one, commemorative of the Lord's deliverance of Israel, and the slaying of the passover lamb. It was only once in each year the feast was to be celebrated.

The relation of this type to the anti-type will now be considered. In order to do this we must examine the institution of the Lord's Supper. That it was instituted at the pass over none will question. Of the particulars, Luke's account is the most full. We may notice it seemed necessary Jesus' death should occur at the passover, and when he sent his disciples to prepare for the passover, he bid them say to the man where they went for that purpose, "My time is at hand; I will keep the passover at thy house with my disciples:" Matth. xxvi., 18. When he was set down, and the disciples, "he said unto them, With desire I have desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer." Luke xxii., 15.

There must have been a special reason for this intense desire to eat "this passover." What reason so likely as that the institution itself, as a type, was to end by the anti-typical Lamb being slain? and hence, Jesus would take the occasion to make such alteration in the institution as should make it correspond to the fact. The passover feast was always kept in the night, and probably lasted most of the night. After the lamb was eaten, and as the close of the supper, a portion of bread and wine, which had been reserved, was used at the conclusion of the service, after which a hymn was sung, and they parted. See Mark xiv., 26. It seems the reserve portion of the passover feast was that used in the institution of the Lord's Supper. Jesus had told his disciples while eating the passover, "I will not any more eat thereof until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God;" and also, "I will not drink of the fruit of the vine until the kingdom of God shall come:" Luke xxii., 16–18. He then proceeds with the concluding part of the passover service, "And he took bread and gave thanks, and break it, and gave unto them, saying, This is my body which is given for you: this do"—this what? this concluding service of the passover—"in remembrance of me." There is to be no lamb used in this service thereafter—for the true Lamb is now to be "sacrificed for us;" hence that part of the passover service is hereafter to be omitted, but "this" breaking the bread and eating of it, as the symbol of his "body given for you," is to remain in use "in remembrance of" him, and to "show forth his death." See Luke xxii., 19, and 1 Corth. xi., 26.

"Likewise also the cup after supper, saying, This cup"—what cup? that which concluded the passover supper, and hence called "after supper," i. e., the closing of it—"This cup is the new testament"—the new covenant, in distinction from the old, under which the passover had been established permanently, but was now to give place to a new covenant. "This cup is the new testament in my blood which is shed for you," and Matthew says, "for many, for the remission of sins."

All the circumstances go to show that the Saviour instructed his disciples, that at the recurrence of the yearly anniversary of the passover they were, hereafter, to attend to "this" concluding service only, and to do it in remembrance of him.

If these things are so, it is plain, the yearly anniversary of Christ's death, or of the slaying of the true passover Lamb, is the true and only authorized time for the celebration of the Lord's Supper.

Because the Saviour is represented as saying, "This do ye, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me," some infer they may do it "oft" as they choose. But it strikes our mind this is a misaprehension of our Lord's words. "As oft as ye" do what? "As often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup." What bread? and what cup? To us, it seems clear it is the bread and cup which concluded the passover feast; all the other parts of that service then passed away; but Christ retains "this" to be used in remembrance of himself as "our passover, who was sacrificed for us."

It appears to us, the coming together of a number of believers, who can conveniently assemble, at the anniversary of Christ's death, and partaking o. a moderate festival, and conversing together, suitably contemplating the fact of their redemption by Christ, the Lamb of God, and concluding the interview by the use of bread and wine, reserved for that purpose, and singing a hymn of praise at parting, is just what is a gospel celebration or commemoration of our redemption from sin and death by "Christ our passover, who was sacrificed for us."

To suppose the first day of each week was selected to ttend to the memorial of Christ's death, or to "show forth his death," involves an absurdity which has been entirely overlooked. Any celebration on that day would manifestly have been appropriate only as a memorial of Jesus' resurrection; and it would have been entirely out of place to have kept a memorial of his death on the day of his revival into life; and we could not admit such a supposition without positive proof, which cannot be found in the Bible.

J.—Good morning Br. G. I wish to renew our conversation on the subject that last engaged our attention. You seemed to think it was furnishing our children and the church with an example of hypocrisy for us to attend or hold fellowship with the church, and thereby guilty of an evil. If I could view it in that light it certainly would change my course in the future.

G.—Suppose I give you an example which came under my own observation. There is a a very interesting speaker in this city, who has the ability of pleasing the young, and therefore draws a large number to his congregation, and among them my two daughters, and in a moment of excitement they gave their names for membership. I said nothing at the time, wishing to abide my time. Before receiving them, the minister called (at my daughters' request) to see me. He stated the fact of their having given their names, etc. He asked me if I had any objection. I told him I had some serious ones. He wished to know what they were. Have you a creed and confession of faith? I asked. He answered, Yes, but we do not question applicants about their faith. I asked, Is it not your creed and confession of faith that makes you the particular church you are? Answer, Yes. Is it not understood that each member gives consent to your creed? and by uniting with you, in preference to any other body, they thereby give consent thereto and profess to believe it? He replied, We do not mind what they believe, and do not question them. But, do they not give to you and the church the impression, if intelligent persons, that they do believe your creed and confession, and therefore wish to join your particular church? Well, yes, he thought they did. Very well, said I. Your church believes in the Trinity, three Gods in one? He replied, Yes. Well, my daughters do not. Your church believes in the immortality of the soul? Yes, we do. My daughters do not. You believe in a hell of eternal torments? Yes. My daughters do not. You believe the soul goes to heaven when the person dies? Yes. My daughters do not. Well, said he, I do not think your daughters could join our church. Then I replied, we agree; and my daughters replied, upon reflection, they could not do it; and after giving him a synopsis of my faith, we parted. And I confess I cannot see how any one can unite with a church with which they have nothing in common. I cannot see how they can avoid the charge of hypocrisy.

J.—Your language is very strong, yet I cannot gainsay your remarks. But you made a remark at the close of our last conversation, and asked a question, Could any of us explain Scripture and place our construction upon texts, and hold our connection with the church? Now, do you think all those good brethren and sisters stultify themselves who are members of the different churches?

G.—I have seen nothing in my experience to change my views; and I have found men who were bold and outspoken for the truth when meeting with us, who, when in the company of these churches, were perfectly mute. I recollect in 1857, when the "union prayer-meetings" were held all over the land, one dear brother, whom I esteem very much, attended those meetings daily. I went to see how he would act in the company of those ministers of the various churches. One arose and made some remarks on the great outpouring of the Spirit, and he was looking for the commencement of the conversion of the world. Then a brother prayed for the success of the work just begun, and that the time might then come that the heathen might be given to Christ for his inheritance and all the earth for his possessions. Our good brother arose and commenced speaking. I thought now, if ever, was the time for him to explain what was the meaning of the kingdom and reign of Christ. But no, he contented himself with some commonplace remarks and spoke of the good feeling and union, and sat down. I thought the ox was muzzled while treading out (down) the corn. I spoke to him of his opportunity neglected; but, it would distract the union and harmony of the meeting.

I was acquainted with a Baptist minister in this city, who, in conversation with him, would give his assent to almost all the truths we hold, and converse with me evening after evening, and invite me to his meeting. If I happened in there during any of his meetings for the encouragement of the government during the war, and he would see me, he would call upon me by name. But if I would come into his meeting for social worship, he invariably found some excuse not to ask me to take any part. He was afraid I might speak some of God's truth to them and disturb their harmony.

Sometime back a minister called upon me for some talk in relation to our views. He said he was with us in our belief and was preaching it to his people; that is, he used Bible terms; but he put no construction on them. This reminds me of an invitation I received to preach in the colored Methodist church in this city. I went, and made up my mind to give them the gospel in its simplicity, but only use Bible language, without stating my belief. I never spoke plainer, and never more to the point; brought forth the strongest proofs showing what the inheritance of the saints is to be, how be to obtained; and that only those in Christ would obtain it. Well, they felt good; and the preacher turned to me when I was through, and remarked, "Br., my people like that, it makes them feel good." But the fact was, neither the preacher nor his congregation knew what I was preaching because I did not tell them the wicked dead would have no resurrection. I made up my mind I could go into any church in the land, and the Methodist in particular, and preach our views, using only Bible terms, and nobody would find any fault with me.

But I sent an offer to preach for one of these brethren who use Bible terms; and bless me, it was like sending word that a hawk was in the rookery. They began to flutter before any of the birds were hurt; and word soon came; "Br., you had better not come; it would not be convenient." No, my brother, tell the people what you mean by Life only in Christ, and they do not want either you or yours.

J.—I should like it very much if something could be done by which we could be more united and have more influence in the world. Cannot some way be adopted by which there can be more concert of action?

G.—Yes, there is only one remedy that I know of, and that is, for every one to do his or her own duty. If there is a meeting of Life believers in the city, town, or village in which you live, attend it in preference to going to any other meeting; and help make it as interesting as you can.

J.—But we have no preacher.

G.—Then preach or talk the best you can; or read your Bible out aloud, and ask some question; do something; keep together and keep moving onward in the truth; keep the lamp burning, and let your light shine.

A New Year's Gift.

Friends of the Herald of Life, in about six weeks, New Year's day will be upon us. Now is the time to think of the presents. It has occurred to my mind that one thousand of you might send one dollar and a half apiece to the Herald of Life office and have the paper sent to your friends for the last nine months of the present volume. Who'll invest? Make a transfer of U. S. Bonds into the Lord's treasury. There is no breaking or failing there. Heap up a little more riches toward God. The reaping day is at hand. Your brother in Christ. F. H. Burbank.

Faith the Highest Act of Man.

"Your religion is a religion of faith, not of reason." This sneer of the chief infidel of the last century was repeated by every subservient follower, who was now anxious to "thumbs up" when Simon said so.

Hume said nothing directly against faith itself; simply said that it was the ground of religion in distinction from reason. It was reserved for the shallower men of this age, not only to adopt the sneer, but to raise a cry against the dignity and power of faith itself. It is not strange. For it is easy for lustful idolaters to say of Moses, when he is beholding the glory of God, "We know not what is become of him, let us worship a calf." And it is just as easy for men desiring to repudiate their obligations to God, to depreciate the powers that can see God, and fall in worship of a lower faculty. But ere long Moses comes with a glory that confounds them. He grinds their abominable idol into powder and makes them drink its bitter dust. So those faculties that have been sneered at return, strengthened by divine communion, and bring all that despised them into shame.

We believe the act of faith, whereby a soul embraces Christ as its salvation and eternal life, to be the grandest act it ever does. It then leaps higher than at any other spring.

It is not a great exercise of power, when the eye seeing four fingers on each hand the mind calculates that there are eight in all. It is a greater exercise power to multiply numbers; greater yet to follow a never seen world along its track, guided by a law as unsubstantial as a thought. Men admire such an exercise of power, and declare it to be the greatest triumph of the human mind to thus trace God's works and ways. But surely it is a higher achievement of human power of rise and see God himself, and bring back knowledge of his nature, and strength that is eternal.

Faith is presumably the greatest achievement of man. It is declared to be the occasion of most radical changes of man's nature; his emancipation from sin; his alliance with God. That it is thus an occasion for so great results is easily proved.

Surely no object among all man's varied conceptions, either inmaterial or educational departments, can for a moment be compared with this. The draining of marshes, the irrigation of deserts, the overlaying of continents, or underlaying of oceans, bears no comparison with gathering souls out of sloughs of despond, and causing dead and withered men to live by the waters of eternal life. All men's gropings after knowledge, by guesses at error and truth, amid material things, are as nothing to the assured knowledge of God's nature and power to save, as revealed to man by faith. What is it to know by seeing, that God can round worlds, divide seas, or even cause the waters to ascend from the ends of the earth compared to knowing by inner consciousness that God can purify souls, breathe love, and assure of immortality? Presumably the faith that does this must be no feeble exercise of a lower order of man's abilities.

Consider what is prerequisite to an exercise of faith. To infer the existence, and fix the place of Leverrier, required a knowledge of the law of gravitation, and of all the irregularities of the planets for five hundred years, What is required to an exercise of faith? Knowledge. One cannot stand on conjecture, inference, or any of the tottering bogs of incertitude, and take the mighty leap to God. Convictions that are to give shape to every act of future life, cannot consist of such flimsy stuff as dreams are made of; they must be real, sure and firm as the mind can contain. Not only must the knowledge be firm and sure, but it must be of the greatest importance, and of the highest nature. First, a man must know himself: a knowledge so high that no man was ever able to attain it without divine help. He must have a knowledge that is unpalatable, that he is forced to accept in spite of his efforts to repel it. A knowledge that a man is a sinner, helpless and hopeless, induced upon his mind in defiance of every effort to shake it off, is surely a knowledge that for certainty and power has no equal in any other department of man's conceptions. But the wings of faith are not yet moulted.

A knowledge of God is prerequisite. That man must somehow get beyond all that nature can teach him. He must learn something of God that birds never sing, which flowers never hint. The thunders of ocean are silent of it and it is never hymned by the singing stars. Where Newton, La Place, and every other philosopher stops as a philosopher, the man who would have faith must move right on. All God's works being left behind, he must know God. Somehow he must get knowledge of his attributes that these things can never teach him. He must dive deeper into the awful depths of Deity than the records of geology or the asymptote of the mathematician can carry him. He must know that God is willing to forgive iniquity, transgression and sin. He must know Christ is a brother, and a God able to save. It is a difficult knowledge; yet faith is impossible without it. Though man may risk his life-gatherings in uncertain enterprises, and the very bread of his hungry children at the gaming-table, yet the constitution of man and the characteristics of faith forbid its exercise, while any uncertainty hangs over man's knowledge of himself and God in the particulars mentioned. The highest, surest knowledge not of nature, but of man, not of creations, but of God, must be indubitably settled as a foundation for faith.

The completeness, extent and power of that knowledge is seen in what it induces in man before faith is possible. It induces a determination to renounce all unlikeness to God. The cherished pursuits of a lifetime, the pleasures that are as dear as a right eye, passions that are a part of the man, and often the strongest part, associations of a lifetime, and often life itself, are weighed against his new discoveries and vivid convictions, and are counted as the small dust of the balance, and altogether lighter than vanity before faith becomes possible. And when this knowledge is attained, these sacrifices determined on, that soul calls in its every power, possession, prospect, and possibility, and by one act of the will nerved as it never has been before, lays all for time and eternity in the hand of God. And, though the thing surpasses all his thought, he exercises faith in God, grasps at an unseen hand and leaps off the shores of time into bottomless, shoreless eternity. The promised hand is near to save. Everlasting arms are underneath. The heart feels divine love filling every avenue with the joy of heaven, knows that eternal life is surging in him.

Can you persuade such a man that any effort in the field of knowledge that shall vanish away, ever equalled the one just made?

The characteristics of faith are seen in its after effects. It continues to be a medium of communication between God and the soul. It not only conveys knowledge, but it worketh by love. It is a characteristic of God, and one of the highest exhortations ever given us by Jesus was, "Have the faith of God." Suffer no blind bat to sneer at your sunlight. There is a faculty for faith as surely as for seeing. As surely as one sees the things of earth, the other pierces heaven. And each holds rank according to the sphere in which it works.—Zion's Herald.

Obituary.

Springfield, Mass., Nov. 8, 1868.

Br. Storrs: I wish to inform you of the death of my dear husband, that you may record it in our paper the "Herald of Life," It is about eight years since he embraced the views of no future life out of Christ. He has been in feeble health for nine years. The second of last January, he had a shock of palsy and never fully recovered. The twenty-second of October he had another shock and lost the use of the right side, and his speech. He lived until the fourth of November at West Springfield. I fully believe he now sleeps in Jesus, and that we shall meet him again at the resurrection, if faithful. God in mercy has spared me a daughter for my comfort. Your sister in Christ.

Letters and Extracts.

Words of Encouragement.

Not many days since we received a letter from a gentleman of whom we had never heard, not a thousand miles from this city, saying, a friend had loaned him our Six Sermons, which he had read with great interest, and wished us to send him and one or two numbers of the Bible Examiner, if yet published. It would seem he had no previous knowledge of us or our writings, and addressed his letter to Brooklyn, N. Y. It found us and we immediately sent "Life Only in Christ"—"The Judgment"—"The Living Soul" and No. 1 of the present volume of the Herald of Life. To these he responded with $3 and writes:

I received in due course of mail, your book "Life only in Christ," and a copy of the "Herald of Life;" also, tracts, "The Living Soul," and "The Judgment."

I have not had time as yet to give the tracts a careful reading; but I am particularly impressed with those on "The Living Soul," and "The Atonement;" having given them more of my attention. Your explanation of the atonement is, to my mind, the Bible view, and the most satisfactory of anything I have ever read upon that all-important theme, and will be a valuable help to me in endeavoring to present Christ to the consideration of my fellow-men.

I feel greatly dissatisfied with much that I read and hear upon the great truths of the Bible; and have been groping for years in a sort of dim twilight after some of the truths which your writings set forth plainly.

I have known Jesus as my Saviour for some ten years, and delight to testify concerning Him and His gift of eternal life; and I feel grateful that I am apprehending Him more fully through his truth.

That you may continually have the Spirit to lead you into the truth is the prayer of your brother in Christ.

From Eld. Rufus Keeler.

Columbia, Cal., Oct. 26, 1868.

Br. Storrs: I have delayed writing you for two weeks, or more, on account of the Herald not making its accustomed visit, as we had thought best to wait its re-appearing. We love the friendly visits of the Herald, and I think it wears better with the brethen in these parts than any other paper; and most of the brethren have taken three or four different ones; and though one after another is discontinued, I notice the Herald is continued.

The little band of expectant ones meet together from time to time for counsel and encouragement, for prayer and praise; and Br. Martin has had a series of public meetings on the public square in which myself and other brethren at times participated. Now the weather is cooler, Br. M. preaches in a hall.

This and other work in behalf of the Life views have stirred up strong opposition. The Baptist minister both preached and wrote in bitter and strong terms against them. The result appears to have been (salutary or otherwise, time will tell), the unyoking from the trammels of their creed some eleven or twelve in all; two or three in Columbia and nine in Sonora. Well, the Lord knows best how to turn the weapons of our enemies back upon themselves.

The brethren here and in Sonora are usually well and hopeful as the day approaches, and as the judgments of Jehovah fall in increasing frequency and severity upon the un repentant nations and apostate churches. May God help his watchmen to stand firm and un wavering amid all the attendant trials, and contine by practice as by precept to warn this wicked generation of the coming wrath. Please find enclosed eight dollars to renew the subscriptions of four subscribers.

I have the promise of one or two more subscribers soon. Yours in Christian love.

Note by the Editor.—Will Br. Keeler please inform us if any numbers of the present volume of the Herald of Life have failed to reach subscribers in California? If so, what numbers, and names and Post-office? We shall be glad to forward the missing papers again, as we have a plenty at present.

Mrs. Ursul Eatona, Leonardsburg, Ohio, writes: I send $1 for Campaign Documents, to be sent to Sisters Wood and Earl. The Life views are more precious to me as time advances. O, that people would read and receive the truth, and not say of any of those Documents, "They will do for waste paper." It seems to me that the "orthodox" churches are endeavoring to unite for a final struggle against the truth; though perhaps they know it not. But the wisdom and power of the Almighty will be made manifest in the defeat of all such attempts. Those who fear the Lord have no time to spend in idleness, or in following the vain fashions and amusements by which they are surrounded. O that thousands of those Campaign Documents might be scattered among those who would appreciate their value. Yours, in hope of a resurrection through Jesus, the Life-giver.

J. H. Wiggins, Dixon, Pa., writes: I send $3. Continue the Herald of Life. I do not want my family to be without this precious paper. I have tried here to get subscribers; but in vain: they are afraid of the doctrine. Some call me Infidel; some a Universalist; while some give no name, but say it is a dangerous doctrine. I thank the Lord I have His word to read and am not obliged to believe all I hear from those who claim to be orthodox. I am a firm believer in "Life only in Christ, the Life-giver," and have been for five years, and my pathway grows brighter and brighter; I pray that it may even unto the perfect day when Christ shall come and quicken all those who share his Spirit. My wife has been a strict Methodist for many years, but now embraces the doctrine of Life only in Jesus. Yours, in hope of eternal life.

Wm. B. Wade, Leesburg, Ind., writes: I have neglected to send my subscription till now; but I have no idea of doing without the Herald of Life; for I consider it the very best religious paper I know of; and I thank you for continuing to send it after my subscription had run out. I send it now, and $1 50, also, for the "Campaign Documents." I want them for distribution. Send mostly "Life from the Dead."

Little Bob, the Fireman's Dog.

Little Bob is one of the best known dogs in London. His master is fireman of a fire-company, and Bob goes with his master whenever there is a fire. He is so gentle that everybody loves him. He is not snappy and snarly, but attends quietly to his own business, and lets other dogs alone. He is very intelligent, and seems to know quite as much as a man. He is always faithful, and whoever else is absent from a fire, Bob is not. Some years ago he took upon himself a certain duty, and a very important one it is, too; and that duty he never neglects. He knows the bells of London, and what they mean when they ring. Bob has his place in front of the engine while it remains in the engine-house. The bells may chime, they may ring, one or many, very furiously, they may open their brazen throats never so loud, and clang away in concert all day long, but Bob will sleep on his mat at the door of the engine-house undisturbed. Bob knows the fire-alarm as well as his master. At the first sound of the bell Bob is up and wide awake, tearing round the engine-house as if he was mad, waking up everybody, anxious to impress everybody with the importance of the occasion, and in a great hurry to be off. He keeps in advance of the engine to clear the track; he seems to know exactly where the fire is, and never makes a mistake in the direction in which he runs. He halts in the right place and is ready to obey orders.

At the fire Bob addresses himself to the work in which he has been engaged many years. He has taken upon himself to ascertain whether in a burning building there are any little folks that can't get out. Many of the buildings in London are very high. Long ladders are brought and put upon the burning building and firemen run up amid smoke and flame to rescue any person who can't get out. Bob keeps his eye on the ladder. The moment it is placed on the building, up he rushes in advance of everybody else; he dashes through the window if it is open, and through the glass if it isn't, barking all the while at a furious rate, telling all in the building that help is at hand. Bob can run up a ladder almost as quick as a squirrel. If the doors are shut so that he can't get in and the little children are fast asleep, and know nothing of their danger, this sagacious little creature knows where the little folks are. He will take his stand at the door, and will bark and scratch and whine and cry till some one comes to open the door and save the inmates.

One day Bob went with his master. After searching the house all over, the firemen went down the ladder, but the dog was not to be seen. His master whistled for him but he would not come. Bob came to the window after a while, gave a sharp bark, and ran back into the flames. The firemen said, "Bob is crazy; there is nobody in the house." But his master said, "Bob don't think so. There must be somebody in the house." So the brave fireman rushed up the ladder, because he knew Bob never deceived him, and was soon lost sight of. The fire was hot and the smoke thick. Bob heard his master coming and kept on barking till his master reached him. Oh, how glad he was to see him! He yelped with delight. He seemed to say, "Open the door! Do open the door quick!" The door was burst open, and in the room was found a little girl crying with all her might, who, but for the fireman's dog, would have been burned to death.

After the fire had been put out Bob's master ordered the ladder to be taken down. The fire was confined to one building. There was nothing to be done but to let the building fall. So the men were preparing to remove the ladder when Bob gave a sharp bark, as if an idea had just struck him. He rushed up the ladder and disappeared. He was gone but a minute. He made his appearance at the window holding in his mouth a little cat which he had rescued. Bob saw her when he was hunting after children. He no doubt told pussy that she must wait until the little boys and girls were rescued, and then he would come after her. It is quite certain that Bob forgot his promise; the order to remove the ladder reminded him of it. He scampered off with all his might to make amends for his neglect. A moment later and pussy would have been burned to death. He actually exposed his own life to save that of a cat. He came down the ladder with all the dignity of one who had done a good deed. When the people saw Bob coming down the ladder, they all shouted "Bravo, Bob! Well done, fine fellow!"

Bob is a spirited fellow, and knows how to romp and have a good time as well as how to work. When he works he works, and when he plays he plays. He is not a dull, stupid fellow because he is useful. Bob is very funny and entertaining, and the firemen have rousing good times with him when there is no work to be done. Bob will sit on his hind legs and go through all the motions of working a fire-engine, putting up the ladder and putting out the flames.

I wonder how many little boys and girls that read this story are as ready to learn, are as obedient, as faithful, as unselfish and as useful as this little fireman's dog. He did not always know the way up a ladder; he was not always ready to rush into a burning building and rescue little children. We must do good to others if we would be loved, and be faithful if we would be trusted.

Stop me not,
But onward let me jog;
For I am Bob,
The London fireman's dog.

The Voyage of Life: or, the Chronology of the Human Race.

BY DR. N. H. BARBOUR.

There are signs of land on every side, brother, and the sweet music from the celestial city, "which hath foundations," will soon gladden thy heart.

Our chart informs us that the port is in view, and there is a light hung out "to which ye do well if ye take heed." The "lead" has been cast, and the prophetic line gives soundings, with good anchorage at only four fathoms. Our tempest-tossed fleet with its precious burden of wayworn mariners and sleeping saints has nobly withstood the waves, beneath which, for nearly six thousand years, so many of the sons and daughters of Adam have perished. But, blessed be God, we shall soon anchor within the veil, when those who sleep below, and those who watch on deck, shall together enter through the gates into the City.

Let us, while waiting for the Pilot, take a retrospect of the voyage, and like David, when he went into the sanctuary, perhaps we may understand some of God's dealings with us. He who knows the human heart has, after giving us so many prophetic periods, and carefully fixing the exact date of almost every event, seen fit to withhold the knowledge of these things, and to seal the book "even to the time of the end," that each generation might have the powerful inducement to watch which springs from present expectation. "What I say unto you, I say unto all, Watch." "And seeing that ye look for such things, what manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness?"

Here, it seems to me, is the secret of his dealings with us; and the reason this knowledge has been withheld from the wise and good of former generations is, doubtless, because it would have proved the key with which to open what God had sealed.

Viewed in this light, and believing as I do, that we are in "the time of the end," and "that this generation shall not pass away till all be fulfilled." I have great confidence in presenting to your earnest consideration a Chronology in which there is no break or flaw, over which God has not thrown his own measuring line, and nothing but the fact that he had set his seal upon it, and said, "hitherto shalt thou go, but no farther," can account for the many ingenious ways in which writers have avoided this simple, and only road, leading to the end. And we shall find, as our examination progresses, that wherever there is an apparent break in the regular chronology, it is just there, and nowhere else, that the New Testament comes to the rescue and tides us over in such a way "that the wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err therein." And, to my mind, this is the unanswerable argument in its favor.

On the death of Terah God calls Abram into Canaan and makes the covenant with him: see Gen. xii., 5, 7, and Acts vii., 4, 5. From the death of Terah and the covenant with Abram to the law, 430 years; see Exo. xii., 40, 41; Gal. iii., 17. They arrive at Mount Sinai, where the law is given, in the third month after coming out: see Exo. xix. From the law to the sending of the spies, about one year; see Num. x., 11, 12, when they leave Sinai and go to Paran, and from Paran the spies are sent. Numb. xiii., 3. From the spies to division of land 45 years. Josh. xiv., 7, 10. From division of land until Samuel the prophet, 450 years.

This has been questioned, because it does not agree with 1 Kings vi., 1, which see.

There is certainly a discrepancy here; for if you subtract one year to the spies, 45 to division of land, 40 for Saul, or Samuel and Saul, 40 for David, and four of Solomon's, making together 130 years, which from Solomon's 480, leaves only 350 years for the Judges. But before forming an opinion we will examine the evidence on the other side. And first the chronology as found in the Judges, without question or comment, is as follows, viz.:

Judges	iii.,	8	8	years
"	"	11	40	"
"	"	14	18	"
"	"	30	80	"
"	iv.,	3	20	"
"	v.,	31	40	"
"	vi.,	1	7	"
"	viii.,	28	40	"
"	ix.,	22	3	"

"	"	8	18	"
"	xii.,	7	6	"
"	"	9	7	"
"	"	11	10	"
"	"	14	8	"
"	xiii.,	1	40	"
"	xv.,	20	20	"
1 Sam. iv.,		18	40	"
Total,			450

A difference here of 100 years would necessitate a number of mistakes, while in Kings the alteration of a single figure rectifies the discrepancy.

The odds, then, are in favor of the Judges. But we have another witness. St. Paul was familiar with the holy Scriptures from a child, and after receiving the Spirit of inspiration, his calculation, which, judging from Acts xiii., 20, he seems to have made, are quite reliable. And although there is evidently a break of many years between the division of the land and the time when they are sold into the hands of the King of Mesopotamia, Judges iii., 8, still there is an overlapping of the twenty years of Samson, which you will observe from Judges xv., 20, was in the days of the Philistines, and I can come to no conclusion but that this was so arranged with the express design that it should not be understood until the "set time" had come. At all events, I feel safe, with St. Paul, in putting the time from the division of the land until Samuel the prophet, at 450 years; and that one year to the spies, and 45 to the division of the land, is the right track to follow, instead of giving forty in the wilderness, and then trying to find how long Joshua and the Elders lived, is evident from Acts xiii., 19, where St. Paul is particular to state that it is after the division of the land that this 450 years comes in; and in the next verse he continues the chronology, giving us forty years for Saul until David.

Having now passed all the doubtful points, and found that in each case where assistance was necessary, the New Testament has come to the rescue, while in no other place does it refer to chronology, it seems to me that God has, by this means, stamped it as his own.

We will now recapitulate and finish our chronology.

Cyrus B. C.	536
	6000

At the close of 1872, the 6,000 years will will terminate.

The evidence that the first year of Cyrus was just five hundred and thirty-six years before our Christian era, as now reckoned, is founded on our historic and scientific data.

And whether the birth of Christ was four years before our present reckoning or not, makes no difference; for from the first year of Cyrus to the close of A. D. 1872, will be 2,408 years. In this all chronologists agree. In fact, there is but one chronology since this reliable historic era began; since which the date of many events, battles, etc., have been determined to a day, or even hour. For instance, Herodotus (book i, p. 74), states "that the Lydians and Medes had been at war for several years, when, during one of their battles, an eclipse suddenly turned the day into night, upon which they immediately concluded a treaty of peace."

In Newton's chronicle this eclipse is said to have occurred 585 B. C., while Scaliger gives the first of October, 585 B. C., as its date. But Prof. Airy, by taking advantage of some recent data, has decided that this eclipse occurred on the 28th of May, 584 B. C. Here you see history was pretty accurate even before the fall of Babylon; since which historical records have been more complete, and therefore more reliable.

Thus God helps us with revealed chronology until we can help ourselves with scientific data, allowing them to overlap just a little that we might not stumble. "Truly God is good to Israel." N. H. B.

N. B. Eliott, a recent writer on the prophecies, and to whom I am much indebted for light on this subject, believing that the prophecies terminated in 1866, endeavored to use this chronology as an argument, stating that "it seems to overrun a few years, and there may be some error, though I am not able to detect it."

The Year-Day Time.

Have we a rule for any period of time in prophecy to represent a year? If we have such a rule I know not where to find it. If the Lord has given us such a rule we are bound to be governed by it in all cases, provided he has not given us some specific exception. If, then, this rule is in the Bible, it follows that the seventy years of captivity in Babylon should be reckoned a day for a year.

It was a prophecy that Abraham's seed should be afflicted four hundred years. Was this to be a day for a year? It may be said that in these instances the nature of the case requires it to be literal time. Then what becomes of the rule for the year-day time? The one thousand years in Rev. xx., is prophetic time. Does this time come under the above rule?

Where do we find a word expressive of any rule that a day in prophecy should represent a year? In Num. xiv., 34, a day is made to represent a year. Also Ezek. iv., 6. In these places there is nothing whatever to show that we have the above rule. On the other hand the fact that the Lord stated in these places that a day was for a year, shows most conclusively that there are exceptions to a rule. This rule is to take God at his word. When he says a day or days, take it literally, unless he has explained it otherwise, as in the cases cited. Therefore, the proper rule in prophecy is to take the time literal, unless God has made exceptions to the rule as in the two cases referred to. The king of Babylon was to eat grass until seven times passed over him. By what rule should that seven times be seven years? And further on in the same prophecy the word time he made to represent 365 years, or so many entire revolutions of the the earth around the sun? If a year in prophecy is 360 days, by what rule does it require 365 days to fulfil it?

Who is the author of the year-day rule I know not, while I am sure the Lord has given no such rule.

It may be said that the time in Dan. is connected with symbols, and therefore the time should be understood symbolic. But did the angel who was sent to explain the vision explain the symbols literally, and the time symbolically without saying so? It he did, how did he make Daniel understand? Are we left to explain the angel's explanation? If so, where is the inspired man who can tell us what he did mean?

It may be he claimed that the seventy weeks are not literal time. It is literally seventy sevens. Daniel knew what a seven meant, for he had seen it fulfilled in the case of the king of Babylon. As seven times had been fulfilled in seven years, Daniel could know that seventy-seven were seventy times seven years. Besides the first time the word week is used in the Bible it stands for seven years. Gen. xxix., 27. J. S. White.

The Definite Time of the Advent.

REMARKS BY GILBERT H. BUZZELL.

I wish to express in the Herald of Life a few thoughts on the definite time of our Lord's coming. It has been alluded to and remarked upon, but not much in its favor in our paper. First I would say I have come to the conclusion with Br. Storrs, that the prophetic periods were not designed to give God's people the definite time. We are not told anywhere in the Scriptures that we shall know by them the day and hour; and I am inclined to believe that every one who may attempt to fix on the time is destined or liable to a disappointment. All human skill and ambition may be exhausted and prove a failure. But some may say, What are they in the Bible for? Well, we must admit they are for our instruction; and let the history of the past tell what they have done. But do the Scriptures teach us that God's people will know the day and hour? I know the Saviour said, "Of that day and hour knoweth no man:" and he said more, that "The Son and the angels did not know." Then will it answer to say He meant to teach that no man ever would know? Would not his words teach the same of himself as it does of men and angels? On the other hand we read this, "If, therefore, thou shalt not watch I will come upon thee as a thief, and thou shalt not know what hour I will come upon thee."

What are we to infer from these words? Is it, that if I do watch I shall know what hour he will come upon me? If not I am at a loss to know what the words may teach. We hear another say, "but ye, brethren, are not in darkness that that day should overtake you as a thief." You may say, He cannot come on me as a thief, because I am looking all the time. But how is that? Do you get disappointed all the time? Men who look at but one point in a year get disappointed; and how can you look all the time and not get disappointed once? But says one, Don't you look all the time for the coming of the Lord? I do in the sense that the apostle did when he said, "We, according to his promise, look for new heavens and earth." But did he at the time he said it, expect it? Neither do I in the sense of expecting it to-night, or to-morrow; if I do I shall not go to work as usual to-morrow. "But says another, "Don't you think He may come to-morrow?" Well, if I admit that, does it not amount to saying, He may not come? This "He may come" is far from real expectation; too far to bring any disappointment. If I am not expecting an event when it comes does it not overtake me as a thief, or come upon me unawares? How can I be aware a thing is coming if I am not expecting it?

How then, can we escape that day coming on us as a thief unless we are made to know the time, the day and the hour? and does not the word of God teach us that his people will know? Such as are careful to obey Him, and walk in his footsteps by keeping his sayings, and do not forsake him though the points of time should pass to which they have looked for the Saviour. But some may say, How are we to know? I reply, Do the Scriptures teach us how? Then surely I cannot answer; but I am inclined to believe that the Scriptures do teach us that the wise will have made known to them the time.

I know that we have expressions in the Word like this, "Watch, for ye know not when the time is." But I do not understand this to teach them that they never will know; but I verily believe that it is by carefully watching and keeping ourselves in the love of God that we shall be considered worthy to have the time made known to us. But if I am wrong (and probably many will say he is) I do not mean to remain so; for to be right is a long way ahead of wrong.

The English Language in India.

Says an East India paper:

English is the classic of India. Time was when Sanskrit or Persian was the highest accomplishment of a Hindu scholar, and although Sanskrit still retains its place in the religious reverence of the people as the key to unlock its mythological stories, the language of its highest poets, yet it has to a great extent been superseded by our own tongue. The English is the language of the rulers of India. Places of high emolument and power are within the reach of Hindu fellow-subjects. Hindus sit and debate in our imperial council, mercantile eminence is open to them, they plead at the bar, and in the Mysore province a Hindu may become a deputy superintendent, but he must know English. He knows he will stand upon high ground, and will be much less likely to draw a blank if he has the power to talk with comparative correctness and tolerable fluency in the language of Britain. We know how keen the Hindu is, how sharp to see a point that will benefit himself and how unremitting to follow it up by dogged effort. In the meantime we see that this is facilitating the spread of divine truth. By studying our language they acquire our thoughts, and become familiar with the great facts and truths of our religion. The influence of a Christian literature is good, leading the mind, habituated to healthy thinking and reading, to turn away from books noted, in some instances, for little else than impurity and trifling. But where the mind is brought in daily contact with religion and such a religion as that of the Bible, who can tell its influence for good? The youth may be but an ambitious aspirant for fame, but this is often made the means in the hands of the divine Spirit of his obtaining the knowledge of a Saviour "mighty to save" and thus, though he may care little else but for the honor of being highly esteemed by his family and friends, yet he may carry away the honors of Christian discipleship.

The White Stone.

"To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the hidden manna, and will give a white stone, and in the stone a new name written which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it."—Rev. ii., 17.

In primitive times, when travelling was rendered difficult by want of places of public entertainment, hospitality was exercised by private individuals to a very great extent. Persons who had partaken of this hospitality, and those who practised it, frequently contracted habits of regard and friendship for each other; and it became a well-established custom, both among the Greeks and Romans, to provide their guests with some particular mark, which was handed down from father to son, and insured hospitality and kind treatment wherever it was presented. This mark was usually a small stone or pebble, cut in half, and upon the halves of which the host and the guest mutually inscribed their names, and then interchanged them with each other.

The production of this stone was quite sufficient to insure friendship for themselves or their descendants, whenever they travelled again in the same direction. While it is evident that these stones were required to be privately kept and the name written on them carefully concealed, lest others should obtain the privileges instead of him for whom they were intended, how natural is the allusion to this custom in the words: "I will give him to eat of the hidden manna;" and having done so, having recognized him as my guest, my friend, "I will give him a white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it; a pledge of my friendship, sacred and inviolable, known only to himself."

Honesty the Best Policy.—Hegiage was a celebrated Arabian warrior, but ferocious and cruel. Among a number of prisoners whom he had condemned to death, was one who, having obtained a moment's audience, said:

"You ought, sir, to pardon me, because when Abdarrahman was cursing you, I represented to him that he was wrong, and ever since that time I have lost his friendship."

Hegiage asked him if he had any witness of his having done this, and the soldier mentioned another prisoner who was likewise about to suffer death. The prisoner was called and interrogated, and, having confirmed the fact, Hegiage granted the first his pardon. He then asked the witness if he had likewise taken his part against Abdarrahman. But he, still respecting the truth, answered that he had not, because he believed it was not his duty to do so. Hegiage, notwithstanding his ferocity, was struck with the prisoner's greatness of spirit.

"Well," said he, after a moment's pause, "suppose I were to grant you life and liberty, should you still be my enemy?"

"No," said the prisoner.

"That's enough," said Hegiage, "your bare word is sufficient; you have given us undoubted proof of your love for truth. Go, preserve the life that is less dear to you than honor and sincerity; your liberty is the just reward of your virtue."

Six Sermons on the Inquiry. Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the true teachings of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an in valuable help to understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.

DEATH AND THE DEVIL.

"Forasmuch, then, as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same, that, through death, he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil."—Heb. ii., 14.

Adventists, to a considerable extent, hold, that a prince of fallen angels, (a personal being,) called "Satan," "the Prince of the power of the air," "the Prince of this world," "Beelzebub," etc., etc., is the devil referred to in this text. To sustain this position, recourse is had to the scene in the garden of Eden where the serpent tempted Eve, and to other portions of the Bible where the foregoing terms are found. The temptation of Eve in the garden, is the foundation and corner stone of this doctrine. It is asserted that the serpent was simply the instrument of the devil, or in other words his medium, through whom he led our first parents into temptation and disobedience, thus bringing upon them death. He is now charged with being the author of death, and as the one who has always had the power of death.

Against this view, unanswerable objections can be urged, some of which are herewith presented. In the record of that transaction, such a being as the devil is described to be, is not declared, or implied, or even hinted at, as one of the parties. Moses speaks of Adam, Eve, and the serpent. If the popular devil was in the serpent, or controlled him in such a manner mesmerically that he became his mouth piece, not only Moses, but the Lord also was ignorant of the fact.

In judging the case, penalties were pronounced upon three parties, Adam, Eve, and the serpent. If there was a fourth party present, even the devil, as described, no penalty was pronounced upon him. He who is generally represented as the head and front of the rebellion, and of all rebellion, is passed by in silence. Then, to all appearance, he who does the mischief gets clear, while his dupes suffer all the punishment.

In passing sentence upon the serpent we have the following record: "He said unto the SERPENT, Because THOU hast done this, THOU art cursed above all cattle, and above every beast of the field: upon THY belly shalt THOU go, and dust shalt THOU eat all the days of THY life." What can be more definite than these words? The Lord charges the serpent himself with the crime, and he pronounces the penalty upon him for it. If the said devil mesmerized the serpent, then the devil, and not the serpent, was guilty. If that is true, the serpent got the devil's due, while the devil escaped. If the devil got into the serpent either by permission or by force, still the result is the same—the devil is not touched. The leading criminal gets the others into trouble, and escapes censure.

Our opponents tell us that the serpent is the devil and satan. If that be true, it must not be forgotten that he was sentenced to go upon his belly, and eat dust all the days of his life. But this involves our friends in serious difficulties, for we find satan on his feet in the very time that Moses wrote his account of the affair, and if he knew the fact, he must have been staggered considerably when he penned the words, "And upon thy belly shalt thou go all the days of thy life." It is hardly to be believed that he thought the serpent was dead, and that the spirit of the serpent or devil was alive and walking about. Job was cotemporary with Moses; and in Job i., 7, we read, "And the Lord said unto satan, Whence comest thou? Then Satan answered the Lord, From going to and fro in the earth, and from WALKING up and down in it." If the serpent and satan are the same, then by some means or other he got out from under the penalty which God pronounced upon him, and took a tour through the world to make all the mischief he could.

We find a similar record in 1 Peter v., 8. "Be sober, be vigilant; because your adversary, the devil, as a roaring lion, WALKETH about seeking whom he may devour." Here we find him yet on his feet.

In the case of Job, satan tells the Lord that "All that a man hath will he give for his life." The Lord permits this satan to afflict him, but not to kill him, for he said to him, "save his life." Yet, notwithstanding this command of the Lord, after Job had a return of prosperity and wealth, he dies, and, by our friends' theory, satan disobeyed the Lord, and took the life of Job, and got all he ever desired, for they inform us that the devil, the serpent, satan, has the power of death, and Job, and all who have ever died, have fallen into the devil's clutches for a while, at least.

Another difficulty. In the New Testament dead Christians are represented as "asleep in Jesus." If the devil view under consideration is correct, we might not wonder if Michael and the devil got into a dispute, or even into a war with each other, over the bodies of Moses and other saints of the Most High, at times. There is something of the kind written concerning Moses' body.

Furthermore: we are told that this mighty devil, "that old serpent called the devil and satan" is BOUND a thousand years—some say "in the past," others "in the future." If that is the one who had the power of death, then somewhere in the past this side of the birth of Christ there must have been, or it yet in the future there will be, a thousand years during which period not a death occurs.

A formidable obstacle again comes in the way. At the time John wrote the Revelation, the devil had not been cast out of heaven. He saw what was coming to pass. How could he have been a transgressor back in the garden more than four thousand years before he was thrust out of heaven? Again, this dragon, or devil of John had SEVEN heads, and seven crowns, and TEN horns, and a tail, which "drew the third part of the stars of heaven, and did cast them to the earth." He does not compare very well with his namesake of the garden of Eden.

Christ said, "I beheld satan as lightning fall from heaven." It is evident that he referred neither to the serpent of the garden, for he never was in heaven, nor to the "great red dragon" of John, for he had not yet been thrust out.

Thus I have presented some of the many objections to the popular view amongst Adventists concerning "him that had the power of death."

What answer can be given to the question, What had the power of death? To my mind the only one that can be given and sustained by the Bible is—the law. With this view I will attempt an exposition of Heb. ii., 14.

"Forasmuch, then, as the children are partakers of flesh and blood," etc. The children referred to, are those which God has given to Christ—"Behold I, and the children which thou hast given me." These children are "partakers of flesh and blood." The phrase "flesh and blood" is a Hebraism for mortality, or this present corruptible state. It does not refer, as some suppose, to the descendants of Abraham alone, but to all the children of Christ many of whom are not descended from Abraham.

"Forasmuch, then, as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same," etc. The evident meaning is, that he, Christ, also himself, likewise, took part of mortality; "for verily he took not on him the nature of angels, but the seed of Abraham." That seed was mortal.

"That through death." He took part of mortality, in order that he might die; hence the phrase "that (for this purpose) he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil. The death of Christ and not the death of the devil is referred to. By his own death he destroys him that had the power of death.

"That is, the devil." It has already been shown that it cannot be the kind of a devil that is generally advocated in this matter, and the point is, to prove that it is the law.

The original term rendered devil in the text is DIABOLOI. It occurs in the New Testament thirty-eight times, and is rendered "devil" thirty-five times, "slanderers" once and "accusers" twice. It is rendered "slanderers" in 1 Tim. iii., 11. "Even so must their (the deacons') wives be grave, not slanderers. It is rendered "accusers" in 2 Tim. iii., 3. "In the last days perilous times shall come; for men shall be . . . . false accusers." Also in Titus ii., 3. "The aged women likewise, that they be in behaviour . . . . not false accusers." Our translators here admit by their renderings that the original term can some times mean an accuser, etc., for they with us would be slow to admit that the popular devil consisted of deacons' wives and old women.

We claim now that the term should also be rendered accuser in Heb. ii., 14. The following paraphrase of the text is now submitted: Forasmuch then, as the children of Christ are mortal, Christ also himself likewise took part of mortality, that through his death he might abolish that which had the power of death, that is, the accuser—the law. Christ has established the fact that the law is the accuser. In John v., 45, he said unto the Jews, "Do not think that I will accuse you unto the Father: there is one that accuseth you, even Moses, in whom ye trust."

The question may be asked, How about those who have never been under the Mosaic covenant? The answer may be found in Rom. ii., 13–15. "For not the hearers of the law are just before God, but the doers of the law shall be justified. For when the Gentiles, which have not the law, do by nature the things contained in the law, these, having not the law, are a law unto themselves; which show the work of the law written in their hearts; their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts the meanwhile (mar., between themselves), accusing or else excusing one another."

In the garden of Eden an oral law was given. Thus we find law in some form or other existing from Adam's day down to the present. "The law is holy, just and good." Law is a system of justice. "By the law is the knowledge of sin." "Sin is the transgression of the law." "The wages of sin is death," and that is the penalty of the oral law, the Mosaic or written law, and that which is in our heart and conscience.

"Christ died for our sins," "and rose again for our justification." He, by the grace of God, tasted death for every man. In 2 Tim. i., 8–11 we read that he "hath abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel." In abolishing death he abolishes the law of which death is the penalty, because law ceases to be such when its penalty is abolished. So we read of Christ, that through his death he might destroy (lit., abolish—the same word in Gr. in the phrase "hath abolished death,") him that had the power of death, that is, the accuser—the law.

By referring once more to the garden of Eden, we find that God gave a law to Adam, and defined its penalty to be death. That was done before the serpent tempted Eve. It is quite evident that the Lord made his law have the power of death and it is also plain that he did not take the serpent, or a fallen angel into partnership with himself as his prime minister to execute that law. Nay, the serpent himself came under a penalty. Who executed that?

From Adam's day to Moses, law existed, and by it men were condemned to death. In Moses' day the law was written upon tables of stone. Its penalty was death. When Christ was sacrificed, that law passed away, and now we have the work of the law written in our hearts, as before the written law was given.

Christ becomes "the END OF THE LAW for righteousness to every one that believeth." The law of God holds every unbeliever in a state of condemnation: he is still under sentence of death." "He that believeth not is condemned already." But he that believeth is said to have "passed from death unto life." This phrase is a prolepsis, that is, he has future life by anticipation.

Why do the righteous die at all? Because the day of salvation has not yet come. Now is the day when salvation is offered to the perishing. "Now is salvation nigher than when we first believed." Paul says, "We are saved by hope; but hope that is seen is not hope; for if a man seeth that which he hopes for, why doth he longer hope for it?" The law cannot give life, and it claims the eternal death of the sinner. Jesus said, "He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and he that liveth and believeth in me shall never (lit., not forever) die." "And this is the will of him that sent me, that every one that seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life, and I will raise him up at the last day." The Christian has hope in his death, and at the last day the redemption awaiting him will be realized.

"So then when this mortal shall have put on immortality . . . then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory. O, Death! where is thy sting? O, Grave! where is thy victory? The sting of death is SIN, and the strength of sin is the LAW, but thanks be unto God which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

"The letter killeth." "I am he that liveth and was dead, and behold, I am alive forevermore, Amen. And have the keys of hell and of death."—JESUS.

What will be the end of those who do not believe on Christ? "He that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him." How great the contrast. The wicked die an eternal death: the righteous awake in the morning. The wicked "remain in the congregation of the dead:" while the good will see life and enjoy it forever. The wicked perish like their own dung;" while the righteous rise again like their living Head. The wicked, the children of wrath: the righteous, the children of the resurrection.

Sound out the glad news of life from the dead by faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. Let the theme gladden the heart and fill it with peace. Soon the LIFE-GIVER will appear. Redemption's day is at hand. We may now look up, for it draweth near. "Yet a little while." Rejoice ye upright in heart. Praise the Lord. Glory to his name. Lo, he comes. Gird up thy loins. Thy kingdom come. Yours in Christ.

F. H. BURBANK.

SPIRITS, GEHENEA, DEVILS, ETC.

FROM ELD. W. S. CAMPBELL.

CHICAGO, ILL., Oct. 24, 1868.

BR. STORRS: I find some people in their eagerness to establish the existence of immaterial spirits will overshoot the mark, and leave a worse look for their faith in divine revelation, and the plain statements of truth, than they would even charge us with. How a man who has had time to examine the word of God and the philosophy of derived existence, after having previously obtained the "precious faith," of Christ in regard to immortality through him, can reason thus is more than I can fathom. Perhaps not; for men will never be philosophical and logical in their conclusions as a whole. If this had been true, we should have all come to the legitimate conclusions to which we are now necessitated, at once. The early impressions will tie and trammel some to the last moment. The mind having once come up, in given cases, to a great height of improvement, and even discovery on some great points in given instances, reacts and holds on others the most egregious error; as if it feared a blunder might already have been made, or too great a sacrifice already had been required.

The grasp often seems to be much more firm upon what is left of an old theory on account of what has been torn away. I often think some look with alarm from the dizzy height of faith they have already reached, and only dread that some irresistible force may compel them to advance. The old and effete ideas that have bound the people of God in other days must give way; but it may take more than one generation to effect the result. This is certainly true, if those who have conviction will still, as we fear, resist the strong light of faith which that conviction brings. There is, manifestly, a fear with many people who are convicted of the great incoming truth upon the nature and destiny of man, that they may be compelled, in the end, to forego much that they have been taught, and which may have given them position heretofore.

The position is not desirable at all. It must be one of torment. The devils cried out, "art thou come to torment us before the time?" This may illustrate two things. They were compelled to believe: for the devils believe and tremble; and another, that people will, in their desire to show the evidence of the existence of spirits, resort to the testimony of the word concerning influences to maintain their own position upon personal existences; assuming (according to their education) that the beings exist, and then attempting by the real or supposed action of the fancied existences to prove the nature of their being. It is assumed that the spirits of which the man was said to be possessed, (or the persons in other instances) spake out to Christ; and, in one word, that the spirits were the real actors.

Let us look at the matter in a common sense light. Some will tell you who believe in the destruction of the wicked that the language of Jesus in respect to the "Gehenna Fire" is to be understood by full and fair consideration of the people to whom he spake, all the circumstances, and the very philosophy of the ground occupied in the instructions. If one says that this proves the immortality of the soul, they are ready to turn the attention of the objector to the prophet where it is said the carcasses of men shall suffer the same condition. If we search for the true philosophical condition of the word we shall be more likely to follow in the track of truth. Jesus did not speak of Gentile sinners, or to the Gentile sinners in introducing the great figurative representation of destruction, for the guilty rebels who, from the position of worshippers of the living God had become idolators and heathen; adopting heathen ideas, usages and worship, modes of propitiation and a horrid exhibition of heathen philosophy, even to the burning of their children in the valley unto Moloch; where from the sounding of a peculiar kind of drum, during the sacrifice, "tophet" was located; but he spake to those who should be in danger of "hell fire," from the departure manifested in their conditiont from the law of the Lord under which they were placed by Moses, and of them who were like "whited sepulchres" full of rottenness and dead men's bones; and thus unable to "escape the damnation of hell." To such a people, whom he presents as a "generation of vipers;" a mass of rottenness, theologically and morally they were like dead men, Jesus spake of the "worm" that was undying, and of the "fire" that was unquenchable.

This is all very easy when we look at the people, and the facts, which qualify the language. Who will doubt longer?

Now if we take the language of Christ on other great inculcations in a fair view, as shown by the people and the conditions in which the Lord found them, we shall find a true philosophical reason for taking a line of conviction different from that which the common theological declaration presents. Take a strong case. The man out of whom went the "legion of devils." First, what was the trouble with the man? The history must inform us. One of the gospel writers said, that he had "a foul spirit." Another that he had "devils of a long time." Another, that he had "a legion of devils." He said, "my name is legion, for we are many." Now, when the man himself speaks it seems to be admitted that the question of identity is plain; but when the devils speak since there were so many, and they were spirits too, there should seem to be some difficulty, if not confusion; for how could spirits speak with a man's voice, even if devils could use human language? Still further, how could these speaking devils speak one and the same thing at one and the same time?

The description of the man makes him a maniac. He was possessed of preternatural strength. He was pleased to dwell among the tombs: he was wild; not at all in his right mind; he tore off his raiment.

But when he was healed by the word of the Son of God, we find him clothed and in his right mind. This tells the story really of his previous condition. But the people had notions either false or true concerning the influence of demons over such persons. Which were they? They had derived their conceptions from the law and the prophets, or from the philosophy of the heathen, who had affected the whole nation with false ideas of worship, God, and devils. Now I do not find any word in the instructions of Moses or the Jewish prophets to sustain the position that a man could be taken possession of in his moral, mental and physical condition by personal devils! I do find that the people might have had aplenty of this stuff from the heathenism with which they had been associated and by which they had been so fully and terribly poisoned. I find, again, that the wiser among them might have been prepared to apprehend in a consistent and philosophical way, while the ignorant would at least become impressed with his power to work mighty miracles; overcoming influences which baffled all attempts at control either by medicine or the coercion of binding, and thus He led them to believe in the Messiah, "for the works' sake," before he could have convinced them of the error of their traditions in a single item.

What, then, is the real idea of spirits here? Whether one or many "devils?" It is this; the man was a maniac. He spoke and acted like one. It was an extreme case. From its strangeness and peculiarities, the wildness and strength of the man, it was said, many devils had entered into him. The people judged by the influence; and having no other way to account for the condition of this strange man, laid it to the devil or to a host of devils. He, himself, in the account, said, his name was "legion," including himself, for they were many. He might have spoken according to the popular idea, and they, many of them, might have spoken after the assumption of the crazy man himself.

The speaking was done by one man without a doubt. Hence when the request is made that the devils might go into the herd of swine which is attributed to the devils, the man, only spoke, still as the maniac, that he was; and when the recorder speaks of the man out of whom he cast a legion of devils, I do not feel compelled to admit that either he or the Master should be held as indorsing the heathenish notion that the people in their idolatrous condition held; but he recorded after the ideas which prevailed, as I find true with respect to other Scripture writers, and as a narrator might even do now.

But what was the matter with the swine all of a sudden? The same devil, or the same set of devils was in them that had been in the man. The same condition came upon them. But they did not speak and they were choked, swine and devils too, in the sea! The community lost a large amount of pork which they were getting ready for market. Where was the man? He was one of the legion according to his own statement. I see no good, philosophical reason for supposing that these were personal devils. The word of scripture does not prove it.

CONDITIONAL PROPHECY.

BY ELD. J. PARRY.

As of old, there are some in our day who, perhaps without intention, seem to strive to make the word of God of none effect by their traditions. They would destroy and trample under foot the most sacred treasures of truth and hope by their prejudice, and long cherished theories.

Many of the promises and threatenings contained in the Bible, we know, are conditional: but to confound these with the exceeding great and precious prophecies, so clearly and frequently revealed of the coming kingdom and glory of Messiah's reign over Israel and the nations, in the future age—this is indeed to cast our frail barque of hope on a boundless ocean, without a chart, a compass, or a helm, the sport of every wind and wave. At one time, we are told that all the prophecies of Israel's restoration and future glory have been fulfilled to the letter. Finding this rather hard to believe, in the face of such evidence to the contrary, it is asserted that they never will be fulfilled; the conditions not having been complied with.

It is high time for those who have any confidence in the power and faithfulness of God, to expose, and put a period, to this fearful attempt to sap the foundation of the believer's hope and confidence in Him. If prophecy is conditional, there is an end to all faith, hope, and confidence in the future: all is deep, dark, uncertainty — confusion worse confounded. If the foundation of our hope be thus ruthlessly destroyed, what shall the righteous do? Echo answers, what! If the oath and promise of God, who cannot lie, may be null and void, and the puny arm of mortals can frustrate the wise and gracious designs of the Almighty governor of the universe, his poor miserable creatures are in a pitiful plight indeed. Yet "conditional prophecy" would land us on this desolate shore, without hope of rescue.

Better blot out the sun from the placitary system, and leave the world in total darkness than rob the Christian of the hope set before him in the gospel of the kingdom. The promise to Abraham and his seed, that in him all nations should be blessed—all the rich and glorious prophecies, from the inspired tongues and pens of Isaiah, and all the prophets, that have been the joy and hope of the people of God for ages. Are these all contingent, uncertain, chance work? or, if there is a distinction, where are we to draw the line? Is there no solid foundation, no rock of ages, on which we may build safely and surely?

We are frequently reminded that "prophecy is history before-hand." "Those who have read the Bible to any purpose, and studied the signs of the times, know that it is so, and each succeeding year gives demonstration to the fact. Is this history to be cut short in the middle, and an extinguisher put on the shining light, before it has burned out, and just as the hope of the final glory is in near prospect? No: a thousand times, No. If God is able to accomplish his purposes, he will carry out and complete all he has so gloriously begun to the final consummation. Not one jot or one tittle of His word, promise, or oath shall fail. "Fear not little flock, it is your Father's good will to give you the kingdom."

SANDY HILL, N. Y, Nov., 1868.

THE OBJECTS.

THE objects had in view in writing the article entitled "The Fifth Kingdom," one position in which Bro. Hanford criticises, were first, to show from Nebuchadnezzar's dream of the image, Dan. ii., and Daniel's vision of the fourth beast, Dan. vii., that we are now living in the times in which "the God of heaven" is to set up an "everlasting kingdom;" and secondly, that the United States in which we live is not, as claimed for it by some students, that kingdom. We had no intention to attempt to show what powers were represented by the toes of the "image" and the "ten horns" of the "fourth beast" else would we not have so summarily passed them by in our remarks. Whether those symbols are identical or not, little affects the questions then under consideration.

Suppose we were to admit that the ten horns do not correspond to the toes, the latter being only a sort of counterpart to the former, denoting the period of destruction of the power, when it shall be smitten by the "stone" and "broken to pieces," and become "like the chaff of the summer threshing floors;" as the rise of the ten horns, under such a supposition, denoted only the inauguration of its divided state, or period of weakness; still, as the eleventh or little horn, a symbol introduced to represent a power not brought to view in the "image," was to continue "till the thrones" (ten of which are the toe-kingdoms, according to the position of Br. H, and now in existence, saving a slight consolidation) "were cast down," and "the Ancient of days came, and the judgment was given to the saints of the Most High; and the time came that the saints possessed the kingdom," the argument of the article is unimpaired.

Further consideration of the subject may create the impression, where it does not already exist, that placing the power denoted by the toes of the image, in western Rome is not quite "an apparent monstrosity," while it will be very likely to suggest the inconsistency of making Russia, a country which, if we except a very small corner of it, was never a part of the Roman Empire, one of the divisions of eastern Rome.

Our Br. thinks our theory makes awkwardly long toes since the "ten horns were up as early as the fifth century." He therefore proposes others of very uneven lengths, some of them, viz., England, France, Spain, Portugal and Austria having been established almost as early as he claims the ten horns to have been, while the history of Russia, whose dominions comprise about one seventh of all the land on the face of the earth, is involved in such obscurity as to render its age uncertain. Greek and Roman writers, however speak of a people inhabiting the vast and unknown regions of the North, especially of the country between the Don and the Dnieper, a description of which is given by Herodotus, a Greek historian, who wrote more than 400 yrs. B. C. while Strabo and Tacitus, Roman historians, who wrote some years B. C., speak of a people, ruled by kings, who occupied the southern districts of modern Russia, and with whom the Greeks entered into commercial relations. Of course, it may be difficult to say whether those people were Russians, or whether they have since become so. Though we have no desire to characterize the Russian toe, because of its length, a "monstrosity," we do think it a little too long to look well.

We have no confidence whatever in any set time, believing it has worked much mischief to the cause of truth, but we do believe the end is nigh at hand. It is reasonable to suppose that immediately preceding our Lord's return, events will transpire that shall show beyond peradventure to all earnest, sincere lovers of him and his appearing, that he is "even at the door." May we all be consistent, humble, faithful watchmen, prayerfully giving "meat in due season;" for "blessed is that servant, whom his Lord, when he cometh, shall find so doing." L. C. T.

DESTINY OF THE WICKED.

FREDERICKSBURG, IOWA, Nov. 16, 1868.

BR. STORRS: I have long thought of noting down the passages in the Old Testament that speak of the destiny of the wicked, and I have begun with the book of Job. Almost all Bible students believe, and I think from good evidence, that the book of Job was written in a very early day, soon after the flood; therefore the destruction of the enemies of God is a Bible doctrine. Speaking of the wicked in Chapter xviii., 12, it is said, His strength shall be hunger-bitten, and destruction shall be ready at his side. 13. It shall devour the strength of his skin: even the first-born of death shall devour his strength. 16–21. His roots shall be dried up beneath, and above shall his branch be cut off. His remembrance shall perish from the earth, and he shall have no name in the street. He shall be driven from light into darkness, and chased out of the world. Surely such are the dwellings of the wicked, and this is the place of him that knoweth not God. Chapter xx., 7. Yet he shall perish forever like his own dung: they that have seen him shall say, Where is he? 8. He shall fly away as a dream, and shall not be found: yea, he shall be chased away as a vision of the night. Chapter xxi., 30–32. That the wicked are reserved to the day of destruction, they shall be brought forth to the day of wrath. Who shall declare his way to his face? and who shall repay him what he hath done? Yet he shall be brought to the grave, and shall remain in the tomb. Chapter xxiv., 19. Draught and heat consume the snow waters, so doth the grave those which have sinned. The womb shall forget him; the worm shall feed sweetly on him; he shall be no more remembered; wickedness shall be broken as a tree. Chapter xxvii., 8. For what is the hope of the hypocrite, though he hath gained, when God taketh away his soul, or life? 19. The rich man shall lie down, but he shall not be gathered: he openeth his eyes, and he is not. Chapter xxxi., 3. Is not destruction to the wicked? and a strange punishment to the workers of iniquity? Chapter xxxiv., 25. Therefore he knoweth their works, he overturneth them in the night, so that they are destroyed. Chapter xxxvi., 6. He preserveth not the life of the wicked, etc. 12. But if they obey not, they shall perish by the sword, and they shall die without knowledge. Chap. xxxviii., 12, 13. Hast thou commanded the morning since thy days; and caused the day-spring to know his place; that it might take hold of the ends of the earth, that the wicked might be shaken out of it?

"POSITIVE TEXTS."

WHAT AN ELDER DID WITH ONE OF THEM.

ELD. C. preached in our school-house recently. Sunday morning, when speaking of the non-resurrection of the wicked, he said, "when I find a positive text of Scripture that conflicts with my rule of interpretation, my rule must be wrong." Said I, let me test you, brother, with one. "They are dead, they shall not live: they are deceased, they shall not rise," etc. Isa. xxvi., 14. He replied, "There is nothing positive about that text: the words 'ever, and forever' are limited." Said I, Neither of those words occurs in the text or context. He replied, "Never shall, the same thing; there is nothing positive about it." Feeling that there was something very positive about his way of disposing of positive texts, I left him to finish the conversation with my wife, while I got ready for meeting. G. U. LEWIS.

ADVANCING.

BR STORRS: S. G. Mathewson, in a sermon at the Boston Conference, April 2d last, said, "as reported" and published in the Crisis, Nov. 4th; the Editor of that paper calls it a "point . . . well made." It is as follows:

"ONE KIND OF LIFE.

"Talk about different kinds of life! Why, life is life, is it not? I do not know anything about Adamic and Christ life; about animal life and spiritual life? about temporal and eternal life; about mortal and immortal life, as differing one from the other in kind. There is but one kind of life and that was given to Adam; and if he had been obedient he would have lived right on forever; and that would have been eternal life, would it not? But he was cut off from life on account of his transgression; and so are the wicked. Now this life is given to the righteous only, on account of their faith in Christ; and Paul says, they are raised incorruptible, does he not? The wicked do not get the gift of life! 'For this cause was the gospel preached also to them that are dead, that they, the dead, might be judged according to men in the flesh.'"

Just so, brethren. "The wicked do not get the gift of life!" They "shall not see life." To what then are they raised?

THEOLOGY RUN MAD.

THE Advent Herald, Boston, Mass., to let its "readers know what the views of Mr. Wesley on the intermediate state really were," gives an "extract from his sermon On the discoveries of faith." In that extract we find the following "discovery of" fancy, called "faith."

> It discovers the souls of unholy men, seized the moment they depart from the quivering lips, by those ministers of vengeance, the evil angels, and dragged away to their own place. It is true, this is not the nethermost hell; they are not to be tormented there "before the time;" before the end of the world, when every one will receive his just recompense of reward. Till then they will probably be employed by their bad master in advancing his infernal kingdom, and in doing all the mischief that lies in their power to the poor, feeble children of men.

We hardly think there is a Methodist minister, with even a moderate degree of intelligence, who can be found to indorse such an insane mass of assumptions; and especially to call them the discoveries of faith. A rational faith is always founded on substantial and unimpeachable testimony. Look at the above mass of fancy and superstition.

1. It assumes the soul to be a distinct and living entity, surviving the body, and immortal. Where is the testimony in the word of God for such an assumption? to say nothing of testimony on which to found faith? It is nothing but a baseless assumption.

2. But admit such an existence: then where is the testimony that this soul, when a man dies, "departs from the lips?" Andrew Jackson Davis' "faith" makes it depart from the other extremity; and his fancy has as much foundation in the Bible as Mr. Wesley's, on this point.

3. What foundation for "faith" is there in the Bible that these departing souls are delivered into the hands of "evil angels," and that these angels are employed of God as "ministers of vengeance?" Please give us some testimony of the truth of this assumption. We want just a little evidence.

4. What foundation for "faith" is there in the words of God, that disembodied souls are "dragged away to their own place" by those "evil angels?" Please give us chapter and verse, so that we can have "faith." Where is it? Where?

5. Though these souls are "dragged away to their own place," it turns out "they are not to be tormented severely before the end of the world;" so they are not tormented much, if any, yet; and if not tormented, what are they about? Orthodoxy generally maintains the end of the world is yet a great way off, say a million of years or so. That is a long time for them to go untormented. Where is the testimony on which to build "faith" for this statement? We shall not accept any of the guesses of even so good a man as Mr. Wesley: we must have "the law and the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them." Isa. viii., 20.

6. We now come to the climax of "the discovery of faith:" and here even Mr. Wesley's faith wavered, for he says, "probably." Probably what? Why "probably they will be employed:" then they are not idle; and as "they are not to be tormented before the end the world" in the "nethermost hell," they must have a very nice time of it! Well, how are they employed?

(1.) "In advancing their bad master's infernal kingdom." Well, that would seem to be a bad business; but "they are not to be tormented" very badly while at this work, and they have a long time to do it in, if "the world is to be converted" before the end of it. All this makes a slippery place for faith to stand on. No wonder Mr. Wesley said, "probably." But we have yet to consider the climax of this "discovery of faith," which, however, grows weaker as it advances, which is certainly a bad sign; for "the faith of the just" grows brighter and brighter as he advances; whereas Mr. Wesley's grows darker and darker, till it drops down to "probably," which is a confession that his "lamp has gone out." However, we will see how he works in the dark. He says,

(2.) These unholy souls are probably employed by their bad master "in doing all the mischief that lies in their power to the poor, feeble children of men." There, reader, is not that the climax? See, here is a "bad master," supposed to be his majesty Mr. "Satan," according to good Mr. Wesley and others of like faith.

Now let us survey the field from their standpoint. This "bad master" is out on a recruiting campaign. He made a bad business with old father Adam; for though he enlisted him early he had to wait over nine hundred years before he could get his soul out from between his "lips" and get it fairly into camp. For the first sixteen hundred years his camp seems to have filled slowly. But at the end of that period he was favored with a better engineer. This personage took pity on the "bad master's" loneliness, and sent him sixty or seventy millions of recruits at one time—all by water, by the cheapest and most expeditious route. Well, that left only eight "feeble children of men" to work "mischief" with. Now if this bad master, thus recruited, can't do about as he pleases, he is not a skilful leader and his troops are not much to be feared. Only think! an army of seventy millions; fresh from the "lips" of so many, with all their experience of "the works of the flesh," to do battle against eight "feeble children of men!" What odds! and much obliged this bad master must be to this splendid engineer. Old father Noah stands a poor chance now!

Time passes on, and the new engineer sends the bad master another large roll of strong fellows from Sodom and Gomorrah. This time they go by fire; the more acceptable for that, "probably," as his majesty is supposed to deal largely in that element. But the successful engineer sends the monarch of Egypt and all his mighty men along, by water, as the first large column went; then a million or so of the children of Israel are forwarded into the bad master's army from the wilderness during forty years. Next, hundreds of thousands are pushed forward from Canaan by a sub-engineer called "Joshua." Thousands and tens of thousands from all lands and nations followed on, down to the present moment, till billions on billions must, by this time, be in line of battle under this bad master. He has no great reason to fear, "probably," that his chief engineer, who has sent him so many recruits, and in such vast numbers at once, will stop all supplies in future; for the past is a guarantee for the future where one is "unchangeable."

Now if all this seems ridiculous and blasphemous—as it certainly does to us—it is simply because the notion of a soul-entity, which is immortal and survives in death, makes it so. The whole theory, in our mind, is a blasphemy against God and his government of this world. Kill the monster, "inherent immortality," and the whole system built thereon crumbles to dust, and "Life only in Christ, and by a resurrection, at the last day" will stand out in all its glory to the honor of God, and to the praise of his grace in his only begotten Son our LIFE-GIVER.

"THE MILLENNIUM."

The Advance, one of our most interesting exchanges, in its issue of Nov. 12th, has an article headed "National Salvation." In it we find the following expressions:

> As conductors of a religious journal, we congratulate the Christian world on the result of the late election. The success . . . is, at this juncture, a long step toward the millennium. . . . We shall have peace. . . . . . The votes of Christian men at the polls on the Tuesday of election did more for the coming of "the kingdom" for which they pray, than did all their religious exercises on the preceding Sunday. . . . The prayers for the world's conversion offered at the Monthly Concert by those who at the polls vote for upholding the devil's kingdom, are the "sacrifice of the wicked" which "is an abomination to the Lord."

As a "religious journal" we have nothing to do with party politics; but if either party is engaged in their political campaigns with a view to bring in the millennium, or the conversion of the world, we sincerely pity them; and we have no doubt they will be sadly disappointed. We see no warrant in the Bible for any such hopes, or that God will employ any such means for such ends.

God never had but one kingdom on earth, viz., "The kingdom of Israel." When that was overturned (Ezk. xxi., 25–27), he subjected his people to be ruled by Gentiles ("uncovenanted nations"—nations without a covenant relation to God.) That rule, or the supremacy of such rule, was to continue till "he come whose right it is" to resume "the throne of his father David;" and God says, "I will give it him."

This Gentile rule is symbolically represented, in Daniel and Revelation, by dreadful and terrible beasts. Under some forms of which Christians may modify, to some extent, its evils; but the essential features of these beastly governments are unchangeable. The last form of these earth-born governments is that which is known as democratic or republican, which is only another name for the "clay" of the Image of Dan. ii. It is the last form of Gentile governments. It will have its trial; but will be found as incapable of withstanding "the corruptions that are in the world" as any of the previous ones, yet so far as it may seem to be established there will be a cry of "Peace and safety." And we confess, the cry which so nearly resembles that of which the apostle speaks, has so often been uttered of late, from almost all quarters, and is reiterated by The Advance, italicized by itself, has made us feel that the apostle to the Gentiles foresaw these days in which we live, and warned Christians to be on the lookout, "For," says he, "yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night: for when they shall say, Peace and safety; then sudden destruction cometh upon them, . . . and they shall not escape." 1 Thess. v., 2, 3.

If this event was the world's conversion or the fancied millennium of the modern churches, the apostle's language could hardly have been more inappropriate. But we are not left in the dark, unless we "love darkness rather than light," for the apostle tells us in the previous verses of the preceding chapter what "the day of the Lord" is, of which he is speaking. He says, "For this we say unto you, by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent (lit., go before) them which are asleep: for, the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first: then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore comfort one another with these words." 1 Thess. iv., 15–18.

This, then, is "the day of the Lord that is to come suddenly when men are crying "Peace and safety," or prophesying, "We shall have peace." We therefore say, again, This cry indicates that we are "hasting unto the coming of the day of God," when "sudden destruction cometh," and there will be no "escape." A terrible day indeed to such as are looking for the world's conversion and the millennium before the "Lord himself shall descend from heaven." O, that our brother of The Advance, and his co-religionists, could see these things in what we regard the Bible light, and helps to warn the ungodly of their approaching doom.

WHO ARE THE HERETICS?

THE following remarks we give just as we found them in the Protestant Churchman, a few years since, and also in the Christian Advocate, the Methodist paper of this city.

POWER OF IMMORTALITY.

> "Were a man designed only like a fly, to buzz about here for a time, sucking in the air, and licking the dew, then soon to vanish back into nothing, or to be transformed into worms, how sorry and depicable a thing were he? AND SUCH, WITHOUT RELIGION, WE SHOULD BE. But it supplieth us with business of a most worthy nature and lofty importance; it setteth us upon doing things great and noble as can be; it engageth us to free our minds from all fond conceits, and to cleanse our hearts from all corrupt affections, to curb our brutish appetites, to tame our wild passions, to correct our perverse inclinations, to conform the dispositions of our souls and the actions of our lives to the eternal laws of righteousness and goodness. It putteth us upon the imitation of God and aiming at the resemblance of his perfections: upon obtaining a friendship, and maintaining a correspondence with the high and holy love; upon fitting our minds for conversation and society with the wisest and purest spirits above; upon providing for an immortal state; upon the acquisition of joy and glory everlasting.—Dr. Isaac Barrow.

What have we ever said stronger than that "man without religion"—or without union with Christ, which is the same thing—will "vanish back into nothing." But "DR. BARROW" said this! That makes all the difference in the world! And very likely, it may be urged, he did not mean what he said! Very well: he said what we mean; and if the above papers, which copied from Dr. Barrow, do not mean what the words import, let them confess themselves deceived. We believe that just such is man "without religion"— or without union with Christ the "LIFE-GIVER;" with this difference—man is guilty for rejecting life and immortality offered to him through Christ: a guilt of which the lower animals are incapable. Immortality, as an offered benefit through Jesus Christ, is the most powful motive to a life of holiness and devotion to God that can be conceived of: and of this motive the common notion of inherent immortality entirely deprives man; and therefore that notion is subversive of the power of the gospel, depriving it of its most mighty engine for turning men from sin to God.

THE PERSONALITY OF THE DEVIL.

The Advance referring to the belief of the Romanists, wherein they attribute certain strange things, supposed to be connected with Spiritism, to the devil, says, in its issue of Nov. 12th:

> "We, also, believe in a personal devil, and the doctrine is not only a fact of revelation, but a key to human history."

The Advance does not believe the devil performs all that Romanism attributes to him, but agrees with it in the belief of such a being. We do not call in question our brother's right to his belief in a personal devil. We suppose he means a spirit-devil, a fallen spirit-angel. How that is "a key to human history is beyond our capacity to understand. If he can give us any light on the subject we would be glad to see it. Does he mean that such an existence as a spirit-devil is the key to unlock the origin and continuance of sin? If so, we need still another key, back of that, to let us into the secret of how holy angels became sinners? Who was their tempter? Were there evil beings before they sinned who induced them to rebel? Where shall we stop? Shall we go back till we find a self-existent devil? If our Br. of The Advance has a key that opens that devilish "history" it might lead us to a harmony with him on the subject that seems not now exactly to exist. We believe in "personal devils," and we have seen many of them, though we never "smashed" up our inkstand in the attempt to hit one of them for laughing at our perplexities, as Martin Luther is reported to have done; but we have seen people that we thought made a strange smashing up of their own responsibility in trying to make out that a spirit-devil led them into sin; but it has been our opinion, after all, that they made out just about the same as Adam and Eve did when they tried "fig-leaves" to hide their nakedness. If any one can make it appear that a fallen angel is a spirit-devil going about seeking whom he may devour, we confess it will need several keys to explain how he broke his "everlasting chains" (Jude 6) and has been roving where he will for 6,000 years, torturing and deceiving the poor, "feeble children of men," most of whom never heard of him, and have gone down in death in total ignorance of his existence; and those who have heard of him, find him constantly in their company. Not only has the chief "fallen angel" escaped his "everlasting chains," but it would seem the whole company of them have a strange degree of liberty, by what is attributed to them. We would be glad to get the "key," if there is one, that shall unlock such a "history." Perhaps that key might explain the equity and wisdom of omnipotent power permitting such malignant spirits to have the benefit of carrying on their work in the dark, so that the victims of their malice, for the most part, have no suspicion of their presence.

If our Br. of The Advance has a "key" that will open these intricate locks, pertaining to the spirit-devil "history," so intimately connected with "human history," he will do us a great favor to lend us its use, that we may be his companion in the faith of personal spirit-devils.

LITERAL FULFILMENT OF PROPHECY.

THE mystical interpretation of the Scriptures of truth, that is, making the plain words of inspiration to mean something else than their obvious or literal sense, pretending that there was a hidden sense in which they were to be understood, was introduced into the church, says Enfield, in his Philosophy, "almost as soon as the apostles had left the world." Heathen philosophers continually dealt in mysticism. The temptation of the primitive church, after the apostles passed away, was very great to interpret the Scriptures on the same principle, and many fell into that snare; but it seems not to have been brought to perfection till the third or fourth century. Having lost the glory which attended the ministry of the apostles, and a strong desire existing to multiply converts from heathenism, and especially by those who had been converted themselves from among the Pagans, they sought for and pretended to find wonderful things hidden in the Scriptures under the language there employed. By this course they expected to win over to Christianity, heathen philosophers and their followers. To some extent they were successful; but Christianity has paid dear for such a victory: it prepared the way for Papacy, or the "Man of Sin;" and since the Reformation, has been the scourge of the church, by producing all the fanatacism and wild fancies that have led to confusion and every evil work.

There is but one remedy for this evil, viz., a rational adherence to the literal construction of the language of the Bible, according to the use of that language at the time it was written, or such as would be sound in reading any other work of sober instruction. That there are figurative and symbolical illustrations of truth is not to be denied; but they were such as to be understood by the common people at the time they were used; that is, it was such language as was in common use in that age; hence, all we need is to learn how such illustrations were understood then; or, place ourselves in that age, and make ourselves familiar with their manner of expression. Thus furnished, a literal construction of the Scriptures must be the true one, and the only one that we can safely follow. The sun, moon, stars, mountains, rivers, various beasts, etc., are all used figuratively, or symbolically, oftentimes in the Scriptures to denote kings, rulers, kingdoms, states, governments, etc., but they were not so used to hide or cover up the meaning, but it was the common mode of expressing such things in those times when almost every idea had some symbol to represent it to make it more plain to common minds, instead of more obscure, as some seem now to suppose. We are not to give those symbols, or figurative phrases, a fanciful interpretation, but carefully mark the interpretation which the Scriptures give of them, or diligently inquire how they were understood at the time they were written. Then we are to explain the Bible as we would any other common sense book that was written to communicate information to the minds of men in general; that is, according to their plain, literal and obvious meaning.

Now let us briefly glance at some of the of the prophecies that relate to the first advent of our Lord.

1. The Lord Jesus was to be born of a VIRGIN. Isa. vii., 14. Such a prophecy, humanly speaking, it was not only improbable that it should have a literal fulfilment, but impossible: such a thing never had happened; and it was a clear departure from all established laws of nature. Had we lived when that prophecy was uttered, and could have admitted the principle of mystical interpretation, we should have said it must not be understood literally; but, "a virgin" means a pure church, in which shall be found our "Immanuel." Surely, there was ten thousand times more reason for giving such a wonderful prophecy a mystical interpretation, than for doing it in almost numberless instances where it is done in these last days. But what did the fulfilment show? It is literally fulfilled. See Luke i., 26–35; Matt. i., 18–23.

2. The place of our Lord's birth is the subject of prophecy. Micah v., 2. "Bethlehem." When the time of it drew near there seemed no probability that the prophecy would have a literal accomplishment. The virgin and her husband were residing in Nazareth, far to the north of Bethlehem, and the days are almost fulfilled. How are they to be at the place where the prophecy said the child should be born? God provides: and the Roman Emperor must issue his decree to tax the whole world, and every one must go to his "own city to be taxed." Yes, there must be a literal fulfilment of the prophecy, and the whole world must be moved to prevent a failure. Thus Joseph and Mary are brought to Bethlehem just in time for the child to be born there. See Luke ii., 1–7.

3. His lowly character is the subject of prophecy. Zech. ix., 9. "Riding upon an ass." Surely, might one say, who viewed things through the spiritualizing or mystical glass, that it is not to be understood literally. How improbable that he who is to have the throne of his father David, and reign over the house of Jacob forever, should literally appear on an ass. But it is fulfilled to the letter. See Matt. xxi., 1–11.

4. The light in which the majority of the people would regard him is the subject of prophecy. Isa. liii., 2, 3. "No beauty—despised—rejected." Who would have thought this could be literally fulfilled. See John i., 11. "His own received him not." See also Mark xv., 6–15. A murderer is preferred to him. And Luke xxiii., 8–11. Herod and his men of war set him at nought.

5. His conduct under his ill treatment is a subject of prophecy. Isa. liii., 7. "Opened not his mouth." See Matt. xxvii., 12–14. "Answered nothing," when most violently accused. See also Matt. xxvi., 59–63.

6. He is prophesied of as a man of sorrow. Isa. liii., 3, 10, 12. Compare with Matt. xxvi., 36–44; Luke xix., 41, 42; Heb. v., 7, 8; and xii., 2, 3; Matt. xxvii., 46.

7. The price for which he should be betrayed and the use made of the money is a subject of prophecy. Zech. xi., 12, 13; compare with Matt. xxvi., 14, 15; and xxxvii., 3–7. Thus far in the smallest matters all is literally fulfilled; and we find no hope to hang a spiritual or mystical fulfilment upon.

8. The prophecy said he should be cut off, or put to death, not for himself Dan. ix., 26; Isa. liii., 12; with 1 Cor. xv., 3; Matt. xxvi., 28; Luke xxiii., 13–15. Pilate and Herod could "find no fault in him." 1 Pet. ii., 24 and iii., 18. Judge Noah of New York, a modern Jew, twenty years ago, bore this testimony of Jesus. He said: "I have never considered Jesus of Nazareth an impostor. The impostor generally aims at temporal power, attempts to subsidize the rich and weak believer and draw around him followers of influence whom he can control. Jesus was free from fanaticism; he was quiet, subdued, retiring faith; he mingled with the poor; communed with the wretched; avoided the rich, and rebuked the vain-glorious. In the calm of evening he sought shelter in the secluded groves of Olivet, or wandered pensively on the shores of Galilee. He sincerely believed in his mission; he courted no one, flattered no one: in his political denunciations he was pointed and severe; in his religion calm and subdued. These are not the characteristics of an impostor." Such is the testimony of a Jew. Surely, the prophecy was literally accomplished: he was not cut off for himself.

9. The manner and circumstances of his death are the subjects of prophecy. Ps. xvi., 22. Pierced his hands and feet—parted his garments and cast lots for his vesture. Compare the prophecy with the facts. Literally fulfilled. See also the type Ex. xii., 46. "Bones" not "broken." John xix., 31–37. See also Ps. lxix., 21. Gave "vinegar" to to him. John xix., 28–30. Small matters they might be thought, and only to be understood spiritually, but they are literally accomplished.

10. His resurrection is a subject of prophecy. Ps. xvi., 10. Peter under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit says, that David spake this as a prophet. Acts ii., 25–31. Was it literally done? See Matt. xxvii., and John xx., 24–29.

11. His ascension was a subject of prophecy. Ps. lxviii., 18; compare with Eph. iv., 7–10, and Acts i., 9. All is literal yet.

12. His being seated at God's right hand is a matter of prophecy. Ps. cx., 1, with Eph. i., 20; Heb. ix., 27, and x., 12, 13; Acts vii., 55, 56.

Thus we see how the prophecies relating to the first advent of our Lord, and the connecting circumstances were literally fulfilled. Will not the unfulfilled prophecies be as literally accomplished? Where is there a rule for departing from this conclusion? In our next we shall notice those prophecies which relate to the second advent of our Lord, and then proceed to a general survey of other prophecies. We hope the reader will follow us closely; and may the Lord give us understanding in all things.

To Subscribers.

The first of January will soon be here, and those who have not yet paid for this volume will be forwarding the amount due, because they have made up their minds that they cannot do without the Herald of Life. Be sure not to send us ragged postal currency, or counterfeit bills. Such are in circulation, and we are subjected to loss or the trouble of returning them when sent to us. Next, do not send money "Registered." We regard that system as worthless, and an extravagant tax on the sender, as he has to pay twenty cents on the smallest sum sent, besides the regular postage, and has no security then, for the post-office is not responsible if it is lost. If you wish to make it safe, get a post-office "Money Order." The cost is less than for a "Registered letter;" even fifty dollars can be sent for twenty-five cents. But for all sums less than five dollars, our opinion is, you may as well omit any of the above precautions and inclose your money in a letter carefully sealed and directed plainly as we state under the head of "Terms," etc.; which see. Do not add anything to our directions. It is a rare thing for us to lose a letter when directed as there set forth. We have used that one post-office "Box" ever since we have resided in this city, or for near seventeen years.

Let us hear from you all as early as possible, as we must regulate our Office Books the first of January. Send one new subscriber, if possible. See Br. Burbank's suggestion in last week's issue, and our indorsement of it.

Last Week's Issue.—Several mistakes occurred in it. One in making up, in the fifth column, inside, by which an item about "A Letter from Chicago, Ill.," is there entirely out of place. In the fifth column, outside, first page, thirty-sixth line from the top, for "lame" read male. In the next column, line forty-five from top, for "immortality" read non-immortality; and five lines below, for "led" read fed. These are some of the vexations of an editor. Other errors occurred, but we pass them.

Marriage of Divorced Persons.

One good thing the Episcopal Convention did, which our General Conference declined to do. It forbid its ministers from marrying persons divorced for any other than the sole scriptural season. It is time that the church spoke out on the subject of divorce. Members and ministers of our church, and all churches, are living, according to Christ, in concubinage. The facility of divorce is used for every breach of affection, for every whim of desire, and the parties thus sundered have no more scruple about marrying than if they had never been married; nay, they seem to have less. One man, infamous for his brutal massacre of the women and children of Indians then fighting for us, was married to his own daughter-in-law, and is now the father of his own grandchildren. Such looseness will yet fill the land with lust and crime. We rejoice that the Episcopal Church had the courage to meet this question in the right way.—Zion's Herald.

We are glad to hear Zion's Herald speak out on the above subject. It is time that all Ministers of the gospel and professed Christians set their faces against the practice of assenting to the marriage of divorced persons, except for the one cause the Saviour stated. Our mind has long been settled on that question. We have refused to marry such persons, when they have applied to us; and we think they should renounce their profession of religion who commit such deeds. We regard such persons as living in adultery according to the words of Christ; and civil law cannot alter His decision. It is a burning shame for ministers of Christ's gospel to show favor to the practice. Let the abomination cease to be countenanced by Christian people.

Another Dialogue.

C.—Good-evening, Br. Grim. I have been anxious to see you for some time. I desire to have a conversation with you on what some of our brethren call the "Future Age." If I understand aright, or am rightly informed, you are not a believer in it.

G.—That depends upon what you mean by the future age. There are so many opinions about the "Future Age," that when I am asked about my opinion, I must understand what is meant about a "future age, and whose theory is referred to, before I give my answer.

C.—Well, do you believe that the prophecies relating to the future age will all be fulfilled?

G.—I do; every one of them.

C.—But do you believe that Jesus will sit upon the throne of his Father David, and that His name shall endure forever, and that David shall not want a man to sit upon his throne so long as the sun and moon endureth?

G.—Yes, every word of it; and I believe that God did fulfil a portion of the prophecy when in the language of Peter in Acts ii., 30, he said, "Therefore being a prophet, and knowing that God had sworn with an oath to him, (David) that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne." And I believe God did do it; and I believe also, "The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand," (how long?) "until I make thy foes thy foot. stool. Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly that God hath made that same Jesus whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Christ." Now if Peter understood the import and the meaning of Psa. cx., Jesus has been, and is sitting at his Father's right hand waiting; and how long does he remain there? I answer, until his enemies are made his footstool. This was one of the purposes for which God raised him from the dead.

This work of conquest is the work of the Father's, and Jesus does not take possession of his kingdom until his enemies are made his footstool.

C.—That is not according to my understanding of the Old Testament scriptures.

G.—I have nothing to do with how you understand the Scriptures; there is the trouble. One brother gives his interpretation of prophecies, and then because I do not believe in his interpretation, I am charged with a lack of faith in the prophecies, when I only refuse to believe in his interpretation

C.—Do you not believe when the Scriptures speak of Israel that they mean Israel in the flesh? or do you believe they mean spiritual Israel?

G.—There never has been but one Israel, and never will be but one. Such a thing as spiritual Israel is not found in the Bible. It belongs to the same school as immortal soulism. You might as well talk to me of a spiritual American, as a spiritual Israelite. When a man, whether formerly a Dutchman or Irishman matters not, once complies with the conditions of citizenship and subscribes to the conditions of our covenant as a nation, he becomes an American citizen, and is entitled to all the rights that the covenant gives him. So I understand that God has a commonwealth called Israel; so I understand Paul when he says to the Gentiles "that at that time ye were without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope (in the promises) and without God in the world. But now in Christ Jesus ye, who sometime were far off, (from Israel as a commonwealth) are made nigh by the blood of Christ." Eph. Now I understand this to be God's commonwealth, called Israel. The polity consists of resurrected Jesus as King, or head of this commonwealth. So I understand Paul in Heb. i., "In the last of these days He hath spoken to us by his Son, whom he appointed heir of all things; on account of whom also he constituted the ages." Again, Heb. i., 13, "But to which of the angels said he at any time, Sit on my right hand until I make thine enemies thy footstool?"

Peter's preaching was quite different from some who are called "Future Age" brethren at the present time. Mark the contrast, the Jews still hope for the promise of God unto the fathers, and to be restored to their land under the reign of the Messiah, and in this respect they are in the true faith; much more so than most Christians. In denying that Jesus is the Christ, they do not deny the Abrahamic faith, or lose sight of the promise. What then are they broken off from? Not from Christ, for they were never in him. They have all the faith in Messiah; that is, in the Messiahship that Abraham had, and much more than Christians generally; but they deny the man. "When they see him in glory their expectations will be realized, and they will worship him."

Therefore, according to one of your best writers, it was God who was in the fault, and not Israel; for had the Lord sent Jesus in a proper way, that is, according to their expectations, they would have received him. And the next time God sends his Son into the world He will consult the wishes of these Jews and send him in a regal manner, and they will receive him.

Peter spake differently, when he said, "But ye denied the holy One and the Just, and desired a murderer to be granted unto you; and killed the Prince of Life, whom God hath raised from the dead." Peter says, they did it through ignorance; nevertheless, he charges the crime right home upon them, and in such a manner that when he announced this fact, that Jesus was to sit upon the throne of his Father until his foes were made his footstool, some of the house of Israel thought they were included in those enemies; "and when they heard this," they cried out, "Men and brethren, what shall we do" (to be saved)?

C.—But you do not suppose the new covenant has been made with the house of Israel?

G.—And why not?

C.—The new covenant was to be made with whole twelve tribes of Israel, for it is with the house of Israel and Judah that the new covenant is to be made. It is to be made with a people who had one made with their fathers before them, when the Lord led them out of Egypt. Even if it is the present gospel covenant, it remains to be made with the literal seed of Jacob; for a covenant is an agreement between parties, and the Jew never agreed to this covenant; and one party alone cannot make a covenant.

G.—To me this seems to be strange logic. You seem to consider all covenants as agreements between two parties.

C.—We admit the gospel covenant was offered to the Jew, but he would not accept of it; the offer was then withdrawn from him and made to the Gentiles, who did accept it. We admit, too, the Jew ought to have accepted it, and saved himself the torment he is now in. But the ordinances of heaven must be torn down over his head, and the foundations of the earth under his feet must be torn up before we can prevent him from having a new covenant made with him, and one that will make him a Jew inwardly and restore him to the favor of God, and replant him in his own land.

G.—You seem quite an enthusiast in your belief, and we hope during our conversations we may be enabled to discover some truth. At our next we will endeavor to talk about a covenant and see if it partakes of the form of an agreement, and if it require both parties to subscribe to it; so good-bye for the present.

The Devil alias Tyrus.

Far be it from me to believe that all devils are diseases and myths, and equally as far, to give countenance to much that is said concerning their origin and character by many well-meaning but mistaken persons. For a long time I have ceased to make the devil the cause of my temptations and sins; and for an equal length of time have I renounced the idea that he is anything like an omnipotent, omniscient, or omnipresent being. Passages of Scripture, which I used to quote when I held the prevailing theory, I have found in most cases, when studying them, sustain no such ideas. Among others, Ezek. xxviii., 11–19, was very famous in the list.

In these verses we find such phrases as—"Moreover the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, Son of man, take up a lamentation upon the king of Tyrus, and say unto him, Thus saith the Lord God: Thou sealest up the sum, full of wisdom, and perfect in beauty. Thou hast been in Eden, the garden of God; every precious stone was thy covering . . . Thou wast upon the holy mountain of God . . . Thy heart was lifted up because of thy beauty . . . Thou hast defiled thy sanctuaries," etc.

That this matter has no reference to the popular devil is evident from the following facts:

The King of Tyrus, or the Prince of Tyrus, was never the devil. He was simply the King or Prince of Tyre—Tyrus being but another way of rendering Tyre. There was such a place as Tyre. It was in the midst of the seas. Is was a place of great wealth, and magnificence, and learning. In the second and third verses of the chapter we read, "Son of man, say unto the prince of Tyrus, Thus saith the Lord God; because thy heart is lifteth up, and thou hast said I am a God, I sit in the seat of God in the midst of the seas; yet thou art a man, and not God, though thou set thy heart as the heart of God. Behold thou art wiser than Daniel; there is no secret that they can hide from thee." Here we learn that the king of Tyrus was a man, and consequently not the popular devil.

Our opponents say, How could that king have been "in Eden, the garden of God: every precious stone (his) covering," etc? I would answer, first, it would be very strange if the Lord set Ezekiel to uttering prophecies concerning the devil, when we are told that judgment passed upon him in the garden of Eden, as recorded by Moses. Second, it is queer that he was such a great merchant, and had sanctuaries. It is doubtless the fact that the covering of precious stones represented the riches of the King of Tyre, and the phrase, "Thou hast been in Eden, the garden of God," the beauty of his kingdom.

In the next chapter, Pharaoh is called "the great dragon" with fishes sticking to his scales. In the next chapter to that, he is represented as a man with a broken arm. In the xxxvi. chapter, God calls Assyria a "cedar," and he says, "The cedars in the garden of God could not hide him . . . all the trees of Eden, that were in the garden of God, envied him." Thus through the prophecies of Ezekiel we shall find these bold figures used, but they have no more reference to the devil than they have to the supposed man in the moon.

Ezekiel xxviii., is a prophecy against Tyre and its Prince. It was exalted to the garden of Eden and the mountain of God; but like Capernaum, which was exalted to heaven, it was brought low, and became a place for spreading nets in the midst of the seas. The prophet is his own expositor, and his entire exposition of the matter of Tyrus can be found in chapters xxvi., xxvii., and xxviii., of Ezekiel. There we shall learn concerning the beauty, the precious stones, the wisdom, the traffic in merchandise, etc. Yours, learning daily.

F. H. Burbank.

The Year Day Theory.

BY ELD. J. S. WHITE.

Nearly all the commentators that I have seen, have seemed to take for granted that a day in prophecy is to be taken for a year. Some have referred to this fact as proof of the year-day theory. But if this is evidence of the truth of the theory, then as these very men have taken it for granted that man has an immortal soul, it is evidence that he has such a soul.

It is said that a year in prophecy is 360 days. If this be true, why should it require 365 days to fulfil it? Or if a day in prophecy represents 360 days, why should it require 365 days, or a solar year, to fulfil it? Or, in other words, if God has given a rule in prophecy to say that a prophetic year is 360 days, why depart from that rule by saying that it requires 365 days to fulfil it? It is said that the Jewish year was 360 days, and that prophetic time in Jewish prophecy is based on that fact. But it is not a fact that the Jews ever called 360 days a year. They never had such a year. Their year was solar; that is, they measured their year by the sun, which made 365 whole days. In the early part of their history, after they left Egypt, they computed their time as did the Egyptians, viz., twelve months in a year, and thirty days to a month, except the last, which had thirty-five days, making 365 days. If they noted a period of time by months, less than a year, they, of course, called the months thirty day each, as in the case of the flood. Five months there are called 150 days. When they had a year, it was 365 days.

In process of time, when the Jews became associated with the Greeks, they adopted their mode of reckoning time. They kept their months by the moon, making them twenty-nine and thirty days alternately; and twelve months to a year, in all 354 days. To the third year they added another month; making the three years, three times 365 days —1,095 days.

Adding half of a year to this, half of 354—177, would make 1,272 days for three years and a half. By what rule should this be called 1,260 days?

The angel was sent to Daniel to make him understand the vision which he had seen. If he did as he was told, and as he said he came to do, he did make Daniel understand it. But if the angel did not explain it literally, or mean just what he said; and when he spoke of time, if he did not mean just what Daniel as a Jew understood, how did he make him understand the vision.

Letters and Extracts.

From R. Cadwell.

Cortland, N. Y., Nov. 15, 1868.

Br. Storrs: You will accept the enclosed, [$40], with what has been sent to make up the sum at which I am put down, [viz., $150] and as in harmony with my present decision and knowledge.

It strikes me, there is a bewildering error on the being of God, in the tract "Living Soul." I have not examined it thoroughly (and perhaps am not able). I have it not on hand, it being lent to others to read.

The most clear perception of the human mind, aided by revelation, is, God is supremely an intelligent person or power, acting by free volitions of will, choice, or pleasure; prompted by infinite wisdom, and goodness; since there is nothing can prevent him so acting.

The tract seems to confound God with his works: so that to produce, or form anything, he must act, or operate upon himself, since it makes God the body and soul of everything. Hence he cannot act, or move, or strike in any direction, without striking and acting upon himself.

I hope I am mistaken in this. But no man can show me I am, while it is asserted—"All are parts of one stupendous whole, whose body nature is, and God, the soul."

Or, as another author speaks, (near as recollected) "God from one spirit fountain poured, of spirits, infinite, and those remaining, or made as perfect as at first, reabsorbs them into himself." The destiny of the others, don't recollect. Probably, they constitute the conflict of eternal "ages" with himself, as some seem to talk, who believe the soul-entity of man to be the "child" of God, and part of his own spiritual nature. To such hard doctrines I subscribe no faith.

R. Cadwell.

From Mrs. M. B. D.

East Hampton, Conn., Nov. 16, 1868.

Br. Storrs: In consequence of long continued sickness in my family the past spring and summer, and attendant expenses, I have failed to write you in reply to the books and papers you so kindly sent me last March. I have not forgotten them or the glorious release I then experienced. The remembrance of those great truths is yet fresh and sweet; and I expect to gather strength from them all my journey through. Yes, I read and reread them, again and again; with tears of joy I praised God for the great deliverance he hath wrought. While the words of good cheer found in Hebrews ii., 14, 15, were brought home to my mind in such a manner that I could not fail to understand. Surely thought I, this is indeed the mystery that hath been hid for ages, but is now manifest. I saw the old Adamic body condemned by the holy law of God; all corruption and fears steadily crumbling and wasting under the curse, the result of believing that old popular lie, "thou shalt not surely die," until the dust covered him. Dead without hope; but alive with a living Christ formed within. He'll burst the tomb and come up a living conqueror over death, hell, and the grave. Then shall come to pass the saying, "Death is swallowed up in victory. Oh death, where is thy sting? Oh grave where is thy victory?'

And since the loving kindness of God our Saviour hath appeared to us, and hath given unto us of his free grace and dying love love, a good hope, a sure foundation for the time to come, that we may lay hold of eternal life, and hath raised us up from beds of sickness, I feel like resuming my long neglected pen, and tuning my harp anew to the praise of him who doeth all things well.

From S. S. Call.

Canton, Minn., Nov. 15, 1868.

Br. Storrs: I am constrained to write a few lines for the Herald of Life. There is quite a stir here in behalf of Universalism; they have got their smartest man, and are crowing loudly that he can whip the world on Scripture argument. He held a discussion with Mr. Rathburn, (mortal resurrection Adventist) and whipped him. Of course he could save all that he raised.

To day he (the Universalist) preached from 1 Corth. xv., 44, "There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body," (not going to be, but is, present tense.) So he built on the old foundation of inherent immortality, and that all who die in Adam shall be made alive in Christ; that death was, and was not an enemy; death was the gate to endless joy; and that the body was not the man, but the house the soul lived in; that there never would be any resurrection of the body; that the soul went to heaven at death, to the body eternal in the heavens; that there was a germ or principle in man that never dies; it was sown a natural body, and was not quickened except it die. Such, in brief, is the substance of his discourse; after which, he gave liberty for remarks. I arose, told him I was puzzled to see how a man could be quickened according to his teaching; for you say he never dies; and if he never goes into the grave how can he be raised from the dead? and if the body never comes up, and the soul never goes down, what have you to raise? pray do tell me, if you can. I would like to have you tell me what Christ saves, or what use you have for a Christ? where is your Christ? and now, sir, I would like to have you or any other man show me a passage between the lids of the Bible of a promise of any man's going to heaven, either in this world, or the world to come! Show me one if you can.

He arose and blackguarded and threw dust; got up a laugh, read some Scripture, till I said, look here, friend, blackguard is not argument; it is only throwing dust, getting up a laugh, and draws attention from the questions. We want the truth. Please answer, then, and give us the light we need.

This nonplussed him and brought him to his senses; yet he did not meddle with the question, though repeatedly requested so to do.

Query! If the germ or life-giving principle leaves the body at death, what is the use of planting it? How long will it take it to sprout? As well might corn grow after taking out the chit, or germ.

From Louisa J. Beach.

Strange as it may seem, it is certainly true, that the views we advocate are but imperfectly understood by the mass of people by whom we are surrounded; even though they may know the name by which we are identified. Many people of intelligence even, in our enlightened country, have never heard, neither do they entertain a single correct idea of God's great plan to redeem mankind. Adventism, so-called, is confounded with Spiritualism, Mormonism, and all the delusions of the day now prevalent. I am often reminded of Paul's expression, "known, yet unknown."

A few evenings since, a gentleman doing business with my husband, called at our house, and during our conversation, asked me if we attended the Baptist church. I answered, No, we are Adventists. Noticing a shadow pass over his countenance, I remarked, you did not think we were so foolish, did you? He replied, "In religion and politics every one can think for themselves;" then added, "but I haven't heard anything about the Adventists for a number of years. I guess there are none in New York now." By the way, he formerly lived in Brooklyn a number of years. I told him there were a considerable number there, that they sustained meetings, etc. "Why," said he, "I thought they had all run into Free love-ism." I asked him if he considered us the same as Spiritualists? He said, "yes;" he "always thought we were all one." I then had the pleasure of informing him, that no two classes of persons were wider apart in their views; and gave him a tract, "The Living Soul," which he accepted and promised to read. I trust he may become enlightened by it.

I have been endeavoring during the past two weeks, to scatter some of the tracts referred to, sending some off through the P. O. and wherever I find an opening, hoping that some little good may be done thereby. While we are praying that the truth may spread and prosper, I think a little sprinkling of works, along with it, goes well. What sums of money are expended annually to sustain missionaries in foreign lands, while here at our very doors people are perishing for the bread of life.

"Darkness covers the land, and gross darkness the people." There are, however, some tokens of encouragement; and in this vicinity, the precious truth of Life only in Christ is gradually working its way.

I have recently attended a meeting of the lovers of truth and life at Bristol, about ten miles from this place. Several of the church there have lately embraced the Life views, and others are investigating the subject. We enjoyed a blessed and refreshing season. Brn. Geo. Brown, Pile, and C. Barker were present to preach the word, and truly the Lord helped. The Life-theme was prominently presented, and with good effect. It was the universal testimony of all who were gathered there, that the reception of this truth has produced a sanctifying effect upon them, causing an enlargement of heart as well as enlarged views of the character of God and of his plan. It seems to beget a spirit of love in every heart brought under its influence. May it continue to spread until the whole body of Christ shall be permeated by it.

New Britain, Conn., Nov. 21, 1868.

From J. S. Potter.

East Boston, Mass., Nov. 23, 1868.

Br. Storrs: As I am ready to sail to-day for Nova Scotia, I thought I would pen a few lines for the Herald of Life, desiring the prayers of all the brethren and sisters who have access to the throne of grace that the Lord will bless and sustain me in presenting the light of the great crowning truth of the Gospel of the Son of God; and that I may have wisdom to rightly divide the word of truth, not in the wisdom of men, but in the wisdom and power of the Spirit of God.

I do not expect to see the Herald while I am gone; therefore I shall loose a weekly feast; but if I am faithful to the Lord I trust I shall feast upon the Bread that came down from heaven; which if a man eat thereof, he shall "never die." May we all eat of that Bread that we may have eternal life; for, "he that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life." May the blessing of God be with you all. Amen.

Eld. J. Lewis writes from Otto, Ill., Nov. 12th: To-day I arrived at this place in good health; found the little band here firmly established in the faith of the gospel of "one Lord, one faith, and one baptism," viz., "of the Holy Spirit," without which Spirit no son or daughter of Adam will ever have a resurrection to life. We found also the Campaign Documents sent us; for which we are very thankful. They are battering down the walls of false theology faster than one would imagine. We have a good report from Lewiston. They begin to want the old "soul-sleeper" to come and preach in the court-house, which they have kindly offered. We hear also from Mason County, requesting us to come and talk to them about the "strange doctrine," as some call it. We learn from other places where we have travelled and scattered tracts, that there is an increasing desire to hear. May the Lord send more laborers into this western field. Pray for me.

Note by the Editor.—The tracts to Wm. B., to which you refer, were sent some time since.

Poetry.

All's Well.

The day is ended. Ere I sink to sleep
My weary spirit seeks repose in thine;
Father, forgive my tresspasses, and keep
This little life of mine.

With loving-kindness curtain thou my bed,
And cool in rest my burning pilgrim feet;
Thy pardon be the pillow for my head—
So shall my sleep be sweet.

At peace with all the world dear Lord, and thee
No fears my soul's unwavering faith can shake,
All's well, whichever side the grave for me
The morning light may break!

Honesty The Best Policy.

A few days ago a youth of about sixteen came from the country to Boston to fill a subordinate situation in one of our first mercantile houses. The head of the firm received the youth in the most freindly manner, and caused his son to take the stranger around town and show him the principal places during the afternoon of his arrival.

While amusing themselves in this way the stranger youth told his companion that, in coming along in the train that morning, he had given a boy a bright cent for a pond lily, and that the coin having been mistaken for a five cent, the vender of lilies had paid him four cents back as change.

The merchant's son questioned the honesty of the transaction, but the young man from the country defended it on the score of smartness. Shocked at the absence of principle in his companion, the merchant's boy told his father of the transaction, who next morning interrogated the young man from the country concerning it, and found that he was somewhat inclined to pride himself on account of the act.

"Was the cheating of a poor boy who, perhaps, had a sick mother to provide for by his industry, not cruel, let alone its injustice?" queried the good merchant.

"It was his look out," the boy replied.

"Was your conduct not dishonest?" asked the merchant.

"I don't know that it was. He ought to have been smart enough not to give me the money."

"Young man," said the merchant, "I call your share in the matter stealing; and if the four cents had been so taken by me, I believe they would have burned a hole in my pocket."

The youth boldly replied, "They have not burned a hole in mine, Sir."

Disgusted at discovering such moral obliquity in the young man, the merchant told him it was impossible that he could employ one who exhibited such dishonest notions concerning a small thing, for in matters of great importance the possessor of such loose ideas of honesty would most likely give way.

With much good advice the youth was sent home to his father, with a letter from the merchant relating the affair stated above, and expressing regret that the circumstances had completely shut the boy out from his confidence. So the young man lost an excellent chance of succeeding in life; and it is hoped that the lesson may teach him hereafter that "Honesty is the best policy."—Boston Journal.

Count Zinzendorf and the Dove.

Cruelty to animals is always the sign of a mean and little mind, whereas we invariably find great men distinguished by their humanity.

I remember having read, some time ago, a beautiful story of Count Zinzendorf when a boy. He was, as I dare say you know, a great German noble, and lived to do a great deal of good in the world.

One day when he was playing with his hoop near the banks of a deep river which flowed outside the walls of a castle where he lived, he espied a dove struggling in the water. By some means the poor little creature had fallen into the river, and was unable to escape. The little Count immediately rolled a large washing-tub, which had been left near, to the water's edge, jumped into it, and though generally very timid on the water, by the aid of a stick he managed to steer himself across the river to the place where the little dove lay floating and struggling. With the bird in his arms, he guided the tub back and got safely to land. After warming his little captive tenderly in his bosom, the boy ran with it into the wood and set it free. His mother, who had watched the whole transaction, in trembling anxiety for his safety, from her bed-room window, now came out.

"But were not you afraid?" she asked.

"Yes, I was rather," answered the little boy; "But I could not bear that it should die so; you know, mother, its little ones might have been watching for it to come home!"—Plea for the Dumb Creation.

Who Shall Preach the Gospel?

On the seal ring of Archbishop Usher were inscribed the words, Vœ mihi si non evangelisavero—"Woe is me if I preach not the gospel." We may well believe that the conviction expressed in those words was more deeply engraven on his heart. His life was one of singular devotedness, and perhaps no man ever wore the highest ecclesiastical honors more unconsciously than he did. He knew no higher ambition than pre-eminent usefulness as a minister of Christ.

But to preach the gospel is not the duty only of archbishops or of ministers. It consists in making Christ known to others, and that is obligatory on all believers. The command is—"Let him that heareth say come;" and that invitation may be uttered in the parlor as well as the pulpit, by the wayside as well as before the great congregation. Whoever has personal experience of the regenerating and sanctifying power of the gospel knows that it is God's gracious provision for a guilty and lost world. That is enough to impose a duty. He may not have the gifts of eloquence. He may not be able to expound and harmonize all the doctrines he believes, but, like the blind man healed by Christ, he can say, "Whereas I was blind, now I see."

Such testimony is oftentimes the most impressive and affecting. It is something which sophistry cannot set aside, and which cannot be met by infidel argument. When the celebrated English statesman, Windham, visited Dr. Johnson on his death-bed, the latter, who had just found Christ precious to his soul, spoke to him tenderly, but faithfully. Windham was powerfully affected, and the tears stood in his eyes. There is nothing of which the believing soul is so assured as of the adaptedness of the gospel to all its need, and of the power of Christ to save. And why should this testimony be suppressed? Why should a false modesty or a fear of men silence it? True, it should be uttered on fit occasions, but the occasions may, by wise forethought, sometimes be made fitting.

It is a false idea that to preach the gospel we must have a crowd before us. In the early history of the church, God blessed his own word to small assemblies. Peter preached to Cornelius and his household; Paul to Lydia and her household; Philip, on his desert way, to a single hearer. Such sermons are sometimes the most effective. A single soul is inestimably precious, and a single convert has sometimes proved himself a host. We have read of sermons addressed to a mere handful of persons that have proved the seed of abundant harvests. A poor ploughman taught the celebrated James Harvey some useful lessons out of his humble experience; and who can tell the influence of these lessons? It is marvellous how much good was accomplished in Scotland and Geneva by the eminent Robert Haldane. To trace the streams of good that have flowed from the fountains of his influence seems like romance. Yet of him it is said that it was to the conversation of a pious stone-mason, with whom he once walked some miles through the woods of Airthray, that he attributed his first clear conceptions of the plan of justification.

That stone-mason was a preacher. No metropolitan pulpit could have added dignity to his work. He preached the gospel more truly and effectively than many who have attempted it in gown and bands. Perhaps if he had aspired to do it in the sacred desk, he would only have made a failure. The grass-grown path through the woods of Airthray was pulpit enough for him, and, content, yet faithful, in his humble sphere of influence, his words have already, through his single hearer, gone forth to the ends of the earth.

The prosperity of the cause of Christ depends largely on the fidelity of the private members of his church. There is work for each one to do. Every one may find a pulpit of his own, and in that pulpit he should discharge his duty with all the solemn earnestness and fidelity of "a man of God." It may not be a very elevated pulpit, it may not be very conspicuous to human eyes. It may be as humble as the seat of a Sabbath-school teacher, or a chair by the fireside. But if the living truth as it is in Jesus may go forth from it, that will change it into a pulpit. A single soul led to Christ will infinitely more than compensate for all the effort made; and many a soul that would perhaps never be reached by the Sabbath's sermon may be won by the gentle tones of Christian fellowship.

It is this individual effort in lowly spheres, amid the scenes of common life, by the wayside, as it were, that is demanded, in order that the cause of Christ may be effectively promoted. Who, with the personal knowledge of the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, cannot do something? Will the humbleness of his position justify him in putting what little light he has under a bushel? Should he not be the more diligent, if he has but a single talent to improve, in attempting to make the most of it?

In a searching criticism on his own deficiencies and shortcomings, William Wilberforce once wrote: "Who knows but that if I had been sufficiently on the watch, and had improved all the opportunities of doing good and preventing evil which have been afforded me, many who are now strangers and enemies to God, might have become known and reconciled to him?" Such was the self-questioning of a man who, under the sense of his solemn responsibility, preached by the pen to an audience to be numbered by the tens of thousands, to an aristocracy which Thomas Scott, and Newton, and Cecil, would in vain have aspired to reach, and in whose words—from the printed page—reached Leigh Richmond in his worldliness, and Thomas Chalmers in his sick chamber, and called them forth to their noble careers of wide-spread usefulness. And yet he queried with himself how much more good he might have done! It was a deep consciousness of his accountability that pressed this question home to his conscience. And yet how many not only fail to put this searching inquiry to themselves, but lack even the aspiration for Christian usefulness in which his life was so prominent!

Let it be that the man who stands in the sacred desk has five or ten talents to account for, yet every disciple of Christ has as solemn responsibility resting upon him for the use of one. It is the business of all—the grand business of every Christian life—to preach the gospel: and whether it be done by acts of charity or words of kindess, by clothing the naked or instructing the ignorant, by services which supply the means to prosecute, or energies which execute, the designs of the gospel of Christ, the duty is none the less obligatory, and each Christian disciple might well have engraved on his heart, if not on his signet ring: "Woe is me if I preach not the gospel."

The writer of the foregoing article, taken from the New York Observer, has struck the key-note of Christian usefulness. All followers of Christ, whatever their station or ability, should, in the measure of that strength which God has conferred or made attainable, be preachers of the gospel. With what consistency, however, can they who have built upon Jesus Christ, the "chief corner stone," a superstructure of "wood, hay, stubble," enjoin upon their lay brethren the necessity for preaching the gospel, while the fact is notorious that almost, if not quite, every author of anything like persistent attempts in that direction incurs religious ostracism? It is the duty of all Christians to preach the gospel; but how can men dispense what they have not received? How can they teach what they do not themselves comprehend? How can they enlighten others while darkness reigns in their own minds? To every preacher and layman of the so-called orthodox school we would say, throw away your anti-Bible, God-dishonoring human traditions, which men in their arrogance and self-will have put in the place of truth, and then go meekly and prayerfully to the word of God and receive from it the gospel of our Lord Jesus. When the dawning light of truth has revealed the falsity of your doctrines, have the honesty and the boldness to declare an uncorrupted gospel, though you thus sever the fondest ties of friendship. You may be humbled in the eyes of men, but you will be exalted in the truth, and be permitted to attain unto high places in Christ Jesus. If any, in the exercise of brief authority, enjoin silence upon you, adopt the language of Peter and John when commanded "not to speak at all nor teach in the name of Jesus," and say to them, "whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye." If they threaten disassociation, do not fall into the dreadful error, a trap which will surely be set for you, of thinking your sphere of usefulness will be contracted by disconnection from human organizations. Many have thus listened to the voice of temptation, but the inevitable cloud has enveloped their minds, and their last condition has been worse than their first. Which of all the martyrs for Jesus might not have reasoned with themselves, "If I now die, my usefulness will be wholly cut off. I will deny my Master this once and then I can preach him privately. They died, and though they are dead they yet speak. If you have the truth, preach it in humility and godly fear, on all proper occasions, and leave the result with God. Though you may be thrust out of what may seem your proper field of labor, rest assured if you are only faithful God will place you in larger fields of nobler labor.

Preach the truth, then, both by word and deed, especially the latter. You may, God helping you, call out a greater than Richmond or Chalmers, who will effectively ring the truth in the ears of many who in their turn will become efficient preachers of the gospel. We cannot all be preachers of the gospel, in the common acceptation of the term preaching, but we can all be powerful livers of it, and thus, by demonstrating its sanctifying power, preach it eloquently and effectively. Each one should realize that a knowledge of the truth imposes the duty to make it known to others, and should feel with Paul that "necessity is laid upon me; yea, woe is unto me if I preach not the gospel!" The Immortal Soul.

Hartford, Conn., Nov. 9, 1868.

[Br. Storrs: I found so much profit in reading Theology of the Bible, by Judge Halstead, yesterday, that I thought some extracts would afford like pleasure and profit to others, and herewith send you some from pages 325 to 328. I wish that all could see the force and beauty there is in the glorious doctrine of Life only in Christ. W. S. Olmsted.]

Saurin on what Orthodoxy calls "Endless damnation," says,

"I sink! I sink under the awful weight of my subject; and I declare, when I see my friends, my relations, the people of my charge, this whole congregation; when I think that I, that you, that we are all threatened with these torments; when I see in the lukewarmness of my devotions, in the languor of my love, in the levity of my resolutions and designs, the least evidence, though it be only presumptive, of my future misery, yet I find in the thought a mortal poison, which diffuseth itself into every period of my life, rendering society tiresome, nourishment insipid, pleasure disgustful, and life itself a cruel bitter, I cease to wonder that the fear of hell hath made some mad and others melancholy."

These are natural consequences of belief in Orthodoxy's "Eternal damnation." Nay, the world would be one vast madhouse if a realizing and continual pressure of such a belief was present (as God's system in reference to us should always be) to the minds of mankind; weighing them down with constant forebodings as to their own fate, and with constant imagining of what nearest relatives and best friends who have died may be actually suffering. I think that the reader of the foregoing pages is prepared to exclaim: Who but a madman could ascribed such a system to God! Albert Barnes tells us that he has written eleven volumns of commentaries on the New Testament, and five on portions of the Old Testament. He then says, p. 69, 70.

"I have no hope of the immortality of the soul, or of future happiness, except that which is found in the gospel of Christ. I have seen no evidence, I now see none, of the immortality of the soul as derived from human reasoning which would be satisfactory to my mind, and my belief that the soul will exist forever is founded on the fact that 'life and immortality are brought to light through the gospel.' The reasoning of Plato on the subject, with Phædo, has done nothing to convince me on that point, nor have I met with any reasoning, apart from the statements of the Bible, which would convince me, or which would give support or consolation to my anxious mind when I think on this great subject."

The immortality of the soul, spoken of by Mr. Barnes, is inherent immortality in every one. Mr. Barnes collocation of 2 Tim. i., 10. "Life and immortality are brought to light through the gospel," and makes the verse to mean, that, through the gospel life and immortality of all are brought to light: The E. V. callocation is, hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel. The Gr. is, having brought to light (using the E. V. words) a life and incorruptability through the gospel. What is it that the Gr. says is brought to light? It is a life and immortality through the gospel; i. e., a life etc. through belief in the gospel; and, of course, to those only who believe in the gospel, good tidings, of a, or, the, Christ came. The E. V., by dividing the verb brought to light into two parts, and putting brought before life and immortality, and to light after these words makes the sentence capable of being understood, hath brought life and immortality of all to light through the gospel; i. e., that the gospel has brought life and immortality in all to light. Whether the E. V. callocation was intended to be so understood we can't say: but Mr. B. tells us he so understands the verse. Is it not amazing that any man, after saying that he finds the tenet, the immortal soul, no where else in Scripture, and from no reasoning whatever, should be so wedded to the enormous dogma (the consequences of which Saurin pictures as so appalling) as to be determined to find it somewhere in Scripture; and be determine to find it in this verse, 2 Tim. i., 10! I have never been able to see what there is in the tenet to be so in love with that men should persist in wresting Scripture in attempts to find it in God's word. All such efforts are just so many proofs furnished by Orthodoxy itself that its theory, the immortal soul, is not in the Bible. Of orthodoxy's scheme that tenet is the foundation corner-stone. [That's true.] And if it were a part of God's system it would occupy the same position: It would not have been left to man's guessings.

To show what can be done by collocating, placing together words in a sentence in a way to suit a theory, I give the Gr. of Acts xiii., 48; "episteusan hosoi, Believed as many as, (i. e., As many as believed; the Heb. and the Gr., generally put the verb first) were set in order for a life eternal; in perfect accord with every other passage in reference to faith and the promise made to it: The E. V. is, 'As many as were and ordained to eternal life believed'! Wholly at variance with every other passage relating to the promise made to faith. And so in Heb. ii., 4; Rom. i., 17; and Gal. iii., 11; Heb. x., 38, the Heb. and Greek are, 'the just by, or on account of faith shall live again,' in perfect harmony with all Scripture. And James Murdock, D. D., and very likely of the orthodox school, in his translation of the Syriac New Testament, renders Rom. i., 17, 'The righteous by faith, shall live.' And Gal. iii., 11, 'The just by faith, shall live': And Heb. x., 38, 'Now the just by my faith, will live,' (i. e., by faith, of, in, me.) He puts a comma after faith in each of these verses. The E. V. in each of these verses is, 'the just shall live by faith.' The E. V. both of Acts xiii., 48, and of the four last cited verses, is due to the Calvinism of James's Ecclesiastics; which would read: they who are ordained (i. e., as it would have us understand that word elected) to be just, shall live by faith. The English clergy that came after them, and not very long after, discarded Calvanism.

The Coming of the Lord.

A LETTER TO E. B., OF ST. JOHNS, MICH., BY A. BOYNTON.

Dear Brother: In answering your kind letter we might write of the season, crops, worldly hopes, fears, trials and blessings; but when we look over all, these there is one event which so far exceeds all others in magnitude and grandure, as well as in importance, that notwithstanding much has been said upon it, we feel pressed still to present it, viz., The coming of the Lord—the second advent of Jesus, the Messiah. We feel on this subject somewhat as did Elisha when he rebuked his servant for taking a gift from Naaman: see 2 Kings v., 26. "Is it a time to receive money, and to receive garments, and olive-yards and vineyards, and sheep, and oxen, and men-servants and maid-servants?" Also, as the apostle felt, 1 Cor. vii., 29–31. "But this I say, brethren, the time is short. It remaineth, that both they that have wives, be as though they had none; and they that weep, as though they wept not; and they that buy as though they possessed not; and they that use this world, as not abusing it. For the fashion of this world passeth away." We write not to enlighten or convince the judgment of these solemn truths; so much has already been said, that "familiarity has brought contempt" from the wicked, and too often indifference from the (professed) waiting disciple. The point we wish to press, and to us the all important one is, feeling; yes, feeling. We don't mean that kind which shouts as well at a political meeting as in the church; but such as stirred Elisha and Paul in those utterances quoted above. A feeling prompted by the Holy Ghost, which energizes and moves the whole being, and that because its work is felt at the heart; the very fountain or seat of affections. We know (and this faith [theory] has many adherents) that the Lord is soon coming! But what effect does this faith have upon us? What says the observer? what says conscience? do our works correspond? or are they like other men's? Why are not Adventists moved by these things as they once were? (We do not refer to any fanatical conduct). They believed; and, in practically carrying out that faith, were accepted of God and blessed with a good portion of the Holy Spirit; but now they have failed to heed the command, "Grieve not the Holy Spirit, whereby ye are sealed unto the day of redemption." And how grieved it? By neglecting to heed the admonition of the apostle above quoted. Equally true in this case as in the one on which the apostle wrote, "the letter killeth, but the Spirit giveth life." And how fearful the position of those, as a class, to whom the Spirit says, "I would that ye were either cold or hot [had no faith or else one working by love] but because ye are lukewarm [theoretically religious] I will spue thee out of my mouth."

The reality of the near coming of our Lord is felt proportionate to our conduct or daily action in reference to this event.

Perhaps we had best say no more to enforce this most important subject then only to call attention again to Paul's solemn words. "But this I say brethren, the time is short," etc. The great trouble is, we don't take time to meditate. Truth, although uttered by the Holy Ghost even, requires time to fasten and impress itself deeply on the mind; like the burning glass, we must hold it steadily for some time before the designed effect is produced,

While the world are rushing, we must be moderate, calm; "think on these things;" give ourselves wholly to them. God help us, my Br., to keep out of the bustle, the exeitement and strife of this perishing world, and so walk and talk with God as to be found of him in peace at his coming and kingdom.

West Batavia, N. Y.

The Mercy Seat.—The throne of grace and the mercy seat are terms in very frequent use among prayerful Christians. Their signification is nearly synonymous. They both refer to the cover of the ark of the covenant, before which the Jewish high priest, with solemn ceremonial appeared on the great day of atonement. Bearing in his hand the golden bowl in which had been caught the streaming blood of the slain lamb, the high priest entered the holy of holies and sprinkled the blood upon and before the ark, and made supplication for the mercy and forgiving grace of God.

Under the Mosaic dispensation the high priest alone could enter the sacred place and approach the mercy seat; but now, since Jesus, the great high priest of our profession, has entered the heavens and removed the vail, the trembling soul may venture into the presence of God. Whatever complaints the humble though unworthy suppliant has to make may with confidence be poured forth into the ear of the divine Saviour; whatever desires burden the heart may all be made known to Him whose pity for all his children is as boundless as his love. At the blessed mercy seat relief may be be found when the worn spirit is perplexed by the constant recurrence of life's petty annoyances, or overwhelmed with floods of sorrow.

When there is no human ear willing to listen to our experience of trials and temptations, when sympathy fails, when no friendly hand grasps ours in cheering fellowship, when disappointments, weakness and pain are our portion, then what a precious refuge is the throne of the heavenly grace.

"It is the place where Jesus sheds
The oil of gladness on our heads:
A place than all besides more sweet,
It is the blood bought mercy seat."

—Zion's Herald.

S. S. Rogers, Plantsville, Conn., sends $20 for the Herald of Life, and writes: My health has been very poor for most two years, and I have been unable to write any part of the time. My physician thought I could not live; but I have never thought of dying, but that I should live and "See the Lord in the land of the living." I think He will come soon; all things proclaim His coming near. May we all be ready to receive him with joy. Yours, in love,

Energy.—Energy, literally from the Greek, is inward workingness; the blooming of the flower is energy; the increase of fruit is energy; the growth of the body is energy, yet in these there is no violence; the efficiency is not destructive, but vital; without it the whole frame must fall at once into corruption; with it instead of corruption we have life.

To hear, to understand, and to bring forth fruit, are the three grand evidences of a genuine believer.—Dr. A. Clarke.

BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail, the postage has to be pre-paid.

Six Sermons on the Inquiry. Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—" the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the true teachings of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.

No. 1. Earth, not Heaven, is to be the inheritance of the saints. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

THE OBJECT of this paper is to promulgate the truth of "LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST:" or, a future life and a resurrection from the dead, are both conditional; and only bestowed at the second advent of Christ, "at the last day."—See our motto.

"MEDIATORIALISM."

Under the head of "The Essential Life" there has appeared some eighteen articles in The Advance, a Congregationalist paper, "BY THOMAS C. UPHAM, D. D." We have once or twice given extracts. For some time past we had overlooked them, and regret especially the loss of the paper which contained the number on philosophy's vindication of the doctrine of the Cross. In The Advance for Nov. 12th is an article in the series on "MEDIATORIALISM AS A UNIVERSAL AND PRACTICAL PRINCIPLE."

We must say, we have been exceedingly interested in the topic presented; and though we would have preferred, in some places, language more adapted to common minds, and expressions less liable to be misunderstood, yet the article we regard as highly interesting, and as furnishing food for deep thought. In some places we fear it is not sufficiently guarded. The great fact that "there is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the Man Christ Jesus" (1 Tim. ii., 5,) is recognized in the article; but possibly not as prominently as it should be. So far as our mediatorial character is concerned it arises wholly from our being in Christ, or being "of His body." In that relation we are indeed mediators. But this point needs to be well guarded and defined. With these introductory remarks we give our readers the larger portion of the article, only adding, Do not read it carelessly nor pass over it hurriedly. Dr. Upham speaks as follows:

2. The subject of this article is Mediatorialism. A subject which cannot be mentioned without at once leading our thoughts to our great chief and leader. We harmonize with what is taught us in the Christian books in saying that Christ is the embodiment of the mediatorial principle; the principle existing in the organic personal form; the mediatorial personality; the Mediator. Mediatorialism is the name of the principle; Mediator is the name of the person or being mediating. And as mediatorship can exist practically and personally only on the basis of a mediatorial principle or truth antecedently existing, the whole subject comes within the sphere and the recognitions of philosophy. It is conceded to the claims of philosophy that one of its functions is to deal with principles, in distinction from forms and manifestations, including the relation of principles, whatever they may be, to their results. We have already seen in a former number that philosophy vindicates the doctrine of the Cross, and places it on a higher and more permanent basis than dogmatic theology, which is wisely adapted to the incipient unfoldings and conditions of the human mind, has ever proposed to do, or ever been, by means of dogmatic statements alone, able to do. Philosophy, in the higher and diviner sense, which is the only true sense, so far from being at war with the massive and truly glorious dogmatisms of Christianity, shows the divinity of the wisdom which gives them their dogmatic form and place, and also defends them in the eternity and necessity of their subjective foundations.

3. Mediatorialism, which becomes a subject of discussion only by means of language, is the expression for the fact that, by a great law of the universe, the goods, which are imparted to us and which enrich our own individualisms, shall cease to have that power, and shall turn back to our own destruction, unless they are distributed and shared by us with others, who stand in the likeness of a common necessity. It is a law of being. It is what Christ calls a truth. The wisdom of God, which is only another name for the divine and personal acceptance of the eternal truth, demands, and has forever demanded and will never cease to demand, that mediatorial life and activity shall exist, and that the mediatorial channel shall be kept open. To the closely observant eye, the history of humanity, saying nothing here of the many passages of Scripture which go to confirm these views, will be found to illustrate this great principle. The man who warms himself by a comfortable fire in a cold winter's day, with a knowledge that his neighbor's children are suffering and perishing in the cold, which he could prevent, but will not, is building an iceberg in his own heart, which will freeze outward from the centre. The man, who has bread enough and to spare, and sees his neighbor's children starving for bread without relieving them, is taking, by a law of being, the bread of life from the lips of his own soul; and he nourishes his poor decaying body at the expense of the starvation of his spirit. The man who has the gospel of the Son of God, and will not send it, and will not aid in sending it to the heathen, closes his own ears to the words of life, and in refusing to hear it, it is taken away from him.

4. The subject presents itself in various aspects. Mediatorialism in its results is giving. To give implies gifts in possession; and as there is but one original source or fountain of such gifts, to give is primarily and eminently the prerogative of God. To give, inasmuch as God would not be God without giving, is the eternal Truth; the spirit of giving is the eternal Life; and mediatorialism, which is based upon the fact of innumerable diversities involving innumerable wants, is the Way, by means of which the Life carries the Truth into effect. It is in this sense that Christ is called the Way, as well as the Truth and the Life. Standing in the relation of God "manifested in the flesh" or the God-man, and thus harmonizing mentally and physically with the attributes of the race, he stands in the position of the distributive channel of the measureless infinitudes of God into the finite measurements of all subordinate existences. It is not improbable, however, that some will ask the question here, whether God could not give what he has to give without the aids of a mediatorial channel, or as they sometimes disparagingly express it, without some one to help him. With whatever spirit the question is asked, reverently would we answer, that there seems to us to be no other way. Mediatorialism is an unalterable law. He could not, because he has not. The course he has actually taken, as shown by the Scriptures and by his providences, indicates what the highest wisdom dictates, and from that path of wisdom he has never deviated; and being what he is, it is impossible that he should. And furthermore it is proper to be said that the Cross as a principle and mediatorialism as a principle, though the latter may be regarded as logically subsequent in time and in some sense subordinate in position, are connected together in close and inseparable relationship as means and end. The goods of the universe, which exist necessarily in God as their source or fountain are, by the law of the Cross, to be distributed, and to manifest themselves in their appropriate forms and results, in all degrees of existence from the highest to the lowest. And it is the principle of mediatorialism, which always stands in connection with the Cross, that does it. And as the human mind is not able to conceive of any other way of doing it, it may justly be said that the Cross necessitates mediatorship as the fulfilment of itself; and the truth of the Cross becomes, by its own imperative necessities, the birth of the truth of a mediator.

5. It is sometimes said, and said truly, that truths are germinant; one by necessary relations being born out of another. And upon the basis of this admitted idea, it may be to our purpose to present briefly some of these views in another form. If truths are germinant, and if certain truths exist, which imply the existence of definite practical results, such truths may be said to imply and to necessitate the germination and out-birth of the truth or reality of appropriate living activities. So that it can be said, with a real and precious meaning to the truly serious and thoughtful mind, that Christ was an out-birth of the truth; was cradled in the truth; and the truth was manifested in him. And again, truths which imply the certainty of practical results, not only imply and require by the necessities of the case the appropriate living activities which bring such results about; but they imply and necessitate also the fact of a WAY or method of the exercise of such activities. And hence that mystic but fruitful saying of the great Teacher, which appropriately finds its place in the illuminated apostle John: "I am the Way, and the Truth, and the Life." Christ on the Cross, by realizing and manifesting within the sphere of humanity the great principle or truth of the Cross, which constitutes both his own glory and the glory of the Godhead, became the Way; in other words, the channel, the mediumship, or mediator, or mediatorial instrumentality of all possible good; and especially of that Holy Spirit or spirit of Universal Love, or what, if properly understood, is the same thing, of universal self-sacrifice, which is destined as an active and living principle, and as the soul and inspiration of mediatorialism, to overflow the world, and to fill all the channels of thought feeling, and action. Such are the revelations and truths of the Scriptures, and not less of enlightened reason and philosophy; namely, that the truths and goods of the universe, in belonging to God, belong to the universe; that the great principle of love or self-sacrifice, which binds both heaven and earth, necessitates their distribution; and that mediatorialism, which is another name for the Christ principle in action, becomes the distributor. So that Christ stands before us now and forever the Way, as well as the Truth and the Life; and in harmony with a universal law, which he could neither overlook nor violate, he is the mediator between God and man. There are some things which are ultimate, and one is, that the infinitudes of God could not by any conceivable possibility find their way into the possession of finite beings, except by methods which recognize and harmonize with the fact of their finiteness. But the way from one to the other is founded in the nature of things, and is one of the products of "eternal generation:" grand, mysterious, intuitionally as well scripturally revealed, and banishing forever all those doubts which would separate God from his children. God the Absolute and God the Finite; or rather God manifested in the finite form, and manifested in part for this very purpose, are mediatorially united in Christ, and in a way so wonderful that he lays one hand on the great Infinitude of existence, and with the other touches the poorest and lowest of human beings, and brings them into each others presence, and linking the last with the first, and the highest with the lowest, harmonizes the diversities of the universe.

6. And now let it be remembered, that Christ sustains the relation of "elder Brother;" the first born of many brethren. And those who are born of the Spirit of God are born into the community of life and into the image of Christ. And what is the great and interesting point here, they are born, and their birth would be an imperfection without it, with the same essential attribute of mediatorial activity and results. To the extent of their capacity, and within the sphere which Providence allots them, their life, which is founded in the truth, necessarily becomes a revelation of the truth and thus becomes a seed of life to others. What was true of Christ, with the limitations which naturally suggest themselves in connection with his special position and character, is true of his people. As was said of Christ, so it can be said of the true follower of Christ, "virtue goes out of him." On the supposition that the true Life-power is in him, which is of course involved in the fact of his being a true Christian, it will always be found, in virtue of the necessary relations of the principle of the Cross, and the principle of mediatorship, that he is a channel, a method of communication, a mediatorial gateway; and that he is so, not by a temporary and arbitrary arrangement, but by the constitution of things and the divine necessities of the case. So that men cannot look upon him without being blessed with the divine light which beams from his countenance; and they cannot talk with him without feeling almost sensibly the divinely inspirational weight of his words; and can hardly touch the hem of his garment, such is the mystic power of the mediatorial law, without the influx into their own souls and bodies of a portion of the Eternal Life.

7. There is one attribute of the mediatorial principle, which is worthy of special notice; it is the attribute or law of increase. The intuitional inspirations of Christ have announced this law in remarkable words; not the less striking perhaps, because they are negative as well as affirmative in the form: "He that hath, to him shall be given; and from him that hath not, shall be taken even that which he hath." He who is not a true subject of mediatorial life, in not accepting the great law of instrumentality in goodness, cannot grow; but is deprived of the gifts, whatever they may be, which he already has. Mediatorship in its results is giving. And the law of increase corresponds to this result; the increase in the power or capacity of the principle itself being greater or less, in proportion to the beneficial results attending its own practical exercise. He, who does good, and every time that he exercises goodness, and in the degree that he does good, grows in the power of doing good, so that the benevolent activity of the soul is practically and resultingly the growth of the soul. How delightful is the thought that it is our privilege not only to be mediators, but to grow as mediators; not only to be channels of good to others, but by a fixed and ultimate law to become wider and deeper as channels; not merely to be the little rivulets that flow on with small results, but to swell into mighty rivers that nourish cities and nations, and float the commerce of the world.

8. Such is the brief outline of the doctrine of mediatorship when, without any disrespect to the value of the dogmatical expression, it is subjected in accordance with the progressive demands of the age, to the inquiries of analytic thought and reason. And we do not see that anything is lost by it. The mediatorial principal is a permanent and universal one; existing everywhere and under all possible varieties of circumstance, because, besides other reasons, it is necessarily involved in, and may be considered as an outgrowth of the great principle of the eternity of the Cross. As distinguished from all and separate from all, Christ is mediator in the celestial sense. We accept him as such, and honor him as such. Human reason is not able to fathom the mystery which is hidden there. But meditorialism, as a law and attribute of being, is stamped unchangeably upon all who are born into the same likeness. Such being our position and privilege, and destined by that position to follow in the Master's track, and "fill up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ," let us with all heavenly aids and appliances keep the mediatorial channel clear. Let it be our endeavor, that the heavenly waters, destined as a living fountain to nourish the souls of others, shall flow on unpolluted; without pride, without passion, without worldly ambition, without self-seeking; and with the "single" or purified eye, like that of the Elder Brother, kept ever fixed upon the good or happiness not only of humanity but of all existences.

9. Humanity in the consciousness of its great needs, calls for the announcement of spiritual truths which shall be practically carried out. Mediatorialism is one of them. What the world wants to-day, and what, with its "Macedonian cry," it calls for to-day, is mediators; men who are trained in the self-denying school of the great mediatorial captain and leader; men who, by the internal law of their being, are mediatorially alive; men who know the celestial mystery of life and the growth of life by the communication of life. What but the principle of mediatorial life, the life which receives good only to impart it, can do battle with the stolid but deeply rooted superstitions and institutions of heathenism? What but this great resource, which recognizes but one form of strife, that of doing the utmost possible good to each other, can solve among other things the terrible social problems which press upon our suffering race? The heart trembles, when, going below the surface of things, it everywhere beholds the social and moral volcano on which our present selfish society stands. The millions in our cities who are suffering in poverty and wrong and crime, are restlessly demanding their day of redemption. There is no peace but in justice. No justice but in the law of the Cross, which is practically useless, unless it is mediatorially complemented and carried out. Mediatorialism is Christ in action. The contest may be long and severe, but the benevolent principle of mediatorship, which, in receiving good only to communicate it, hears all groans and wipes all tears, will gently draw out the deep and smouldering fires which lie around and beneath us, and prevent the threatening convulsions.

10. One of the results of the great principle of mediatorship is, that it associates us with angels. The mediatorial principle, in being a principle and not merely an event or incident, is not only eternal but universal. It is the law of men; it is also the angelic law; and is not more the true life of the earth than it is of the heavens. Angels, and all beings in the heavenly spheres, are the embodiments of mediatorial activity. The Scriptures affirm it; and if they did not, it could not be otherwise. It is of these high and holy beings it is said that they are "all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them, who shall be heirs of salvation." So that it can be said in a true interior sense, that, in becoming mediatorial, and in thus falling into the line of harmony with all good and useful activities whether above or below us, "ye are come unto Mount Sion and unto the city of the living God, and to an innumerable company of angels."

THE WORD OF PROPHECY.

After many days thou shalt be visited, in the latter years thou shalt come into the land that is brought back from the sword, and is gathered out of many people against the mountains of Israel, which have been always waste, but is brought forth out of the nations, and they shall dwell safely, all of them.—Ezek. xxxviii., 8.

THE foregoing passage of Scripture has been always accepted as the word of the LORD, by the mouth of the prophet Ezekiel, concerning what would take place in the then future.

In these days of prophetic interpretation and conditional prophecy, we are asked to believe that it means anything or nothing. By a certain arrangement of figures, it has been attempted to prove that the final consummation and overthrow of all things earthly is at hand; and prophecy in the Bible, concerning events which should take place in the last days of this dispensation, has been to some extent, set aside by the plea that it was conditional.

To those who are striving to possess their souls in the faith and patience of Jesus Christ, believing that whatever God has declared shall be done, He will most surely perform, I write.

For some time our mind has been attracted to the prophecy containing the words of our text, as what is therein declared was to take place in the "latter years," a time which is generally admitted to be drawing rapidly to a close.

In the beginning of this chapter we have an account of a certain power which should make an attempt to invade a certain country, but should be turned back; yet afterward the invasion should be accomplished. This was to take place in the latter years; and as we have indisputable proof that we are living in those times, we may expect that past and present events will throw some light upon this portion of Scripture. It is generally believed, and I cannot bring a doubt against it, that this first movement took place in 1854–55 in what was called the Crimean war.

Many believed at that time that the final onslaught had come, and that the long expected advent of our Saviour would immediately follow. The war closing suddenly, the great invader having been turned back, caused a great deal of surprise; when it was discovered that it was twice repeated that he should be turned back. A common mode of stumbling, by a careless way of reading the Scriptures.

"After many days thou shalt be visited; in the latter years thou shalt come into the land that is brought back from the sword."

What was to be the condition of the country ere it became the centre of attraction and object of conquest? and what is it now? and what was it to be at the time of its conquest? If we examine chap. xxxiii., verse 26 and onward, we shall find that because of the iniquities and abominations committed, the LORD God had declared that He would lay the land desolate, and give its inhabitants to the sword and pestilence, until it should be utterly wasted.

That has been indeed accomplished. But will it be always thus? Shall the sword lay thus heavily upon this land, until the new heavens, and the new earth appear?

Let the Lord Almighty speak, and let all the earth keep silence before Him. "Thus saith the LORD God, Behold, I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen, whither they be gone, and will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land. And I will make them one nation in the land, upon the mountains of Israel; and one king shall be king to them all: and they shall be no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all." Ezek. xxxvii., 21, 22.

"Behold the days come, saith the LORD, that I will perform that good thing which I have promised unto the house of Judah. In those days, and at that time, will I cause the BRANCH of righteousness to grow up unto David; and He shall execute judgment and righteousness in the land. In those days shall Judah be saved, and Jerusalem shall dwell safely; and this is the name wherewith she shall be called, THE LORD OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS," Jer. xxxiii., 14, 15, 16.

"Therefore, behold the days come, saith the LORD, that they shall no more say, The Lord liveth which brought up the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt; but, the Lord liveth, which brought up and which led the seed of the house of Israel out of the north country, and from all countries whither I had driven them; and they shall dwell in their own land." Jer. xxiii., 7, 8.

Thus page after page of Scripture might be written out concerning what the Lord will yet do for His ancient people Israel.

What is the condition of this land at the present time? Plainly, under the sword. But our text declares that at the time of this invasion, it has been brought back from the sword, and that the people of Israel dwell safely; or, as the margin reads, "dwell confidently," yet without walls and gates.

Will this gathering ever take place? Will these unwalled villages ever be built? Will this state of things ever exist as declared in our text? We certainly meet with very many who deny it.

Shall we throw away the prophets? "Go and tell this people, Hear ye indeed, but understand not? and see ye indeed, but perceive not."

"Who is blind but my servant? or deaf, as my messenger that I sent? Who is blind as he that is perfect, and blind as the Lord's servant?"

D. J. ELLSWORTH.

WINDSOR, CONN., Nov., 1868.

THE RIVER JORDAN.

"THIS sacred river has been called, most appropriately, the River of God. It divides the Holy Land into two unequal parts. It rises at the juncture of the inconsiderable streams known as the Jor and Dan, and, crossing the marshes of Lake Merom, takes a southerly course, passing the ancient city of Bethsaida, and empties into the Sea of Galilee. From thence it flows through the heart of Palestine into Lake Asphalrities, or the Dead Sea. It follows a serpentine course from north to south—from the base of Mount Lebanon to the Salt Sea. Near its mouth the stream widens and is deep and rapid, and the current becomes violent.

"The Jordan has two banks, but the water reaches the upper bank only in the rainy season, when the snows melt on the summits of Lebanon. This occurs in March but not always with regularity.

"Its course is not over two hundred miles even in its circuitous route. Its width varies from seventy-five to two hundred feet, and its depth is only from three to twelve feet.

"The descent of the river is very great, for the Dead Sea into which it empties, is said to be thirteen hundred feet below the level of the Mediterranean.

"In its upper part the land is tilled to its very banks. It is also used as pasture-ground for horses, sheep, cattle, and the black buffalo.

"Its banks throughout are lined with a rich profusion of trees, shrubbery and flowers. Pink oleanders, rose-colored holyhocks, the purple thistle, the yellow marigold, and the scarlet anemone; cedar trees, the arbutus, willows, and tamarisks shade its rapid waters; and the silver-leaf ghurrah glitters in the sun. Sailing over its bosom are flocks of wild ducks, cranes, pigeons, swallows and the Syrian nightingale."

The waters are cool and soft, and abound in fish. But the charms of this ancient river lie in its hallowed associations, which are closely interwoven with the history of the people of God.

On his return to his native land the patriarch Jacob passed over it with his staff in his hand. Joshua and his followers forded it dry shod; "the waters retreated at the presence of the ark, and left an open space until the tribes had gained the opposite banks." "There they piled large stones upon each other for a perpetual monument."

It was also miraculously passed by the prophets Elijah and Elisha. In its waters the Syrian captain was healed of his leprosy. In later times the Baptist made it the place of his ministry; and our Lord himself was baptized in its sacred waters. "When Israel went forth from Egypt, and the house of Jacob from a barbarous people, the Jordan was turned back." "The Lord," saith the son of Sirach, "maketh understanding to abound as Jordan in the time of the harvest."

On the banks of this rushing stream multitudes once gathered: priests and writers of Jerusalem, tax-gatherers from Jericho and Gennesareth; soldiers from Damascus, and peasants from Galilee.

"The interest," says Stanly, "which attaches to this celebrated river is shown by the mosaics found in the earliest churches at Rome and Ravenna." "The Jordan is represented as a river god pouring his stream out of his urn."

It has been the practice of all ages for pilgrims periodically to visit and bathe in these holy waters. The ceremony is generally performed on the Greek Easter. The caravans sometimes number eight thousand devotees, collected from all parts of the Byzantine Empire. The pilgrims wear white dresses when they plunge into the water, and these garments are sacredly preserved by them for their winding sheets.

The Jordan is strikingly emblematical of the river of death, for it takes its rise in the youthful streams of Mount Lebanon, full of life and freshness, and after a downward race through marshes and lakes and barren plains, finally deposits its waters in the silent sea of death.

It has no outlet like other rivers, into the bosom of some boundless ocean, the likeness of immortality: but it terminates in a stagnant lake, which has none of the signs of life.

Thus human life commences with bright and hopeful prospects, but soon reaches the marshes and shallow pools of temptation and sin. Toward the sad and silent lake of death it rushes with irresistible impetuosity. In all its windings and doublings it fails to escape its destiny, for human life is a series of rapids from birth to the grave.

But it teaches us, typically, a still more instructive lesson, for it prefigures the division line between time and eternity, the seen present and the unseen future.

On its shelving banks all the past representatives of our fallen race have stood with awe and perturbation. Its waters must be passed though they are dark, deep and bitter. Those who die in strong faith in God are permitted to ford it; those who die in their sins sink beneath its sweeping torrents.—Selected.

IT NEVER DRIES UP.

I WAS staying at a village on the Welsh coast, where the people had to bring all their water from a well. Not a single house had a pump. At all hours of the day, but chiefly before breakfast and before tea-time little feet and great, often unshod, but very active, might be seen passing along a narrow lane, with every kind of pitcher, kettle and can, to a fresh water well. Not a very trustworthy friend, after all, was this village well.

"Is this well ever dry?" I inquired.

"Dry? Yes, ma'am: very often in hot weather."

"And if the spring dries up?"

"Why then we go the well higher up—the best water of all."

"But if the well higher up fails?"

"Why, ma'am, that well never dries up—never. It is always the same summer and winter."

I went to see this precious well which "never dries up." The water was clear and sparkling, coming down from the high hills, not with torrent leap and roar, but with the steady flow and soft murmur of fulness and freedom. It flowed down to the highway side. It was within reach of every child's little pitcher. It was enough for every empty vessel. The small birds came down thither to drink. The ewes and lambs had trodden down a little path to its brink. The thirsty beasts of burden, along the dusty road, knew the way (as I could see by their tracks) to the well that "never dries up."

It reminded me of life and salvation flow-

"The Most Direct Argument."

While laboring with the Mission tent, we hung up a canvas in the rear of the desk, on which is painted in large type—"For the hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation." John v., 28, 29.

This text is seen and read by every one who visits the tent. Many read and then ponder and re-read it; their eyes are often upon it; after service, some will come and ask where this text is to be found, and are informed.

Thus the facts that there are two classes of mankind, with a great contrast in the destiny of each, and that each must have a resurrection from death to get their reward, are constantly before the Universalist, Spiritualist, and all who deny the resurrection of the dead, either all, or a part. This is one direct argument. There is another.

In several instances persons have come to talk with me about this text, and to cavil, and to evade its clear statements concerning them "that have done evil," and have closed up with, "Well, I don't believe it." This is direct, and more honest than all their other efforts.

I. C. Welcome.

The foregoing we take from the World's Crisis of Nov. 25th. It certainly does not do much credit to the author. Suppose he had placed underneath his text, in equally "large type," "He that believeth not the Son SHALL NOT SEE LIFE, but the wrath of God abideth on him;" and, "The man that wandereth out of the way of understanding shall REMAIN in the congregation of the dead," (John iii., 36; and Prov. xxi., 16,) and some one should point him to the "clear statements concerning" unbelievers and wanderers from the way of understanding; and after finding "J. C. Welcome" not convinced of the non-revival of the wicked dead, should go away and report that he (Welcome) said, "Well, I don't believe those texts;" would he think himself fairly dealt with? Would he not be likely to say, "What I did say was, I do not believe your construction of those texts." Yet, they are just as plain as language can make it that the wicked dead shall not live again, and the text John v., 28, 29, does not say they shall live again.

But what we object to most of all in this statement of Welcome's is the last sentence, "This is direct, and more honest than all their other efforts." Does he mean the efforts of those who disagree with him in the matter of the re-living of the wicked dead? If so, he may rest assured we have no controversy with him; because the man, professing to be a Christian, who can deliberately insinuate that those who differ from him are dishonest, needs to learn the first principles of the gospel of Christ; and, of course, is incapable of discussing the advanced doctrines of the Bible.

It is one thing to say, "I do not believe your construction of a particular text," and another thing entirely, to say, "I do not believe the text" itself. Suppose a believer in eternal torments should pitch his tent, and have "painted in large type"—"He shall be tormented with fire and brimstone . . . and the smoke of their torment ascendeth up forever and ever," etc., Rev. xiv., 9–11; and argue from it the truth of his theory, putting his construction on the language, affirming it to be a "clear statement" of the fate of the "worshippers of the beast," etc, and therefore the doctrine of eternal torments is true.

How would "I. C. Welcome" relish that construction of the language? He might possibly say, "Well, I don't believe it." Would it be "honest" to report him as having said that he did not believe the text itself? Would it be fair to make such a statement? and to insinuate that all who rejected the doctrine of eternal torments were destitute of honesty? Would he not claim that an isolated text could not be construed to over-ride the general tenor of the Scriptures, how much soever it might seem to sustain his opponent's views?

"The wages (reward) of sin is death." To say that the sinner "must have a resurrection from death to get his reward"—i. e, to get death—is such a contradiction in terms, such confusion of language, that one can hardly help being amazed that any person should ever make such a statement and call it "argument." With such minds argument, in the proper sense, seems without power and useless.

Anecdote.—An African preacher in speaking from "What is a man profited if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" mentioned, among other things, that many lost their souls by being too charitable. Seeing the congregation astonished beyond measure at his saying, he emphatically repeated it; and then proceeded to explain his meaning. "Many people," said he "attend meeting, hear the sermon, and when it is over they proceed to divide it out among the congregation. This part was for that man—that part for that woman; such denunciations were for such persons—these threats for you sinners; and so," continued the shrewd African, "they give away the whole sermon and keep none for themselves!"—*Evan. THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 2, 1868.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

Spread the Truth.

We noticed the suggestion by Br. Burbank, in the Herald of the 18th inst., and take pleasure in expressing our hearty concurrence. Very many, possibly most of the Herald subscribers, might, without imposing upon themselves any particular financial inconvenience, send the paper as a present for nine months or a year to some friend who would not otherwise become a reader of it. If six, eight, or ten hundred copies, in addition to the regular issue, could by that means be sent weekly to parties judiciously selected by the friends of the paper, we think it not an extravagant estimation that a third of the recipients would, at the expiration of the nine or twelve months, as the case might be, gladly order a renewal rather than be without what they would then have learned to regard as a medium unrivalled by any weekly publication for the dessemination of gospel truth. An inestimable benefit would then be conferred upon many, the interests of truth effectively subserved, the name of Christ exalted among men, God glorified, and ourselves encouraged and strengthened for the work. Many who now rejoice in the truth with exceeding great joy, and are happy in the possession of something like correct conceptions of the character of God, and of the work accomplished by Christ, first had their attention directed to the subject through kindness and love thus displayed. Friends, our brother's thought in this matter is a happy one; and if all who can will act upon the suggestion, great good will surely result, for God will delight to bless the movement, and will give increase. Let us, then, try the experiment, and so benefit others by diffusing the precious light of truth. Shall we do it? May the response of each individual be, "I will."

"The World's Conversion."

The Methodist, of this city, in its last week's issue, gives some account of the recent "National Christian Convention." It says:

This convention of earnest men, representing every denomination of evangelical Christianity in the nation, closed a three days' session in the Presbyterian church in Fifth Avenue, New York, Rev. Dr. Hall, pastor, on Thursday evening, November 19th. It was one of the signs of the times—another instance of the wonderful activity of modern thought.

The Methodist tells us "the predominant element of the occasion was Calvinistic; and adds, "from some cause or other Methodism was hardly represented;" which it "regrets." After some remarks on the proceedings of the Convention, it says:

The results of the earnest but somewhat desultory discussion of the three days may be summed up in two conclusions, perhaps: First, the alarming prevalence and activity of satanic agency in society; and, second, and inquiry as to the best means to encounter this state of facts, and to conquer the world for Christ.

Why be alarmed at the "prevalence of satanic agency?" Men who are commissioned to "conquer the world to Christ" should express no fear or alarm at the rallying of Satan's army. It is the slothful man or a coward who says, "There is a lion in the way; a lion in the street" . . . . . "The wicked flee when no man pursueth; but the righteous are as bold as a lion." If the "satanic agency" were ten thousand times more active than it is, that should be no cause of alarm to men commissioned to "convert the world." Is not He who is for you greater than he who is against you? Will you, like the army of Israel, quake and tremble before the Goliath, called "satan" in these days? Who is this modern giant who seems to set the whole "evangelical" brotherhood to quaking at his "alarming prevalence and activity?" Have you no little Davids to go out against him? Peradventure there may be one found, but he might be looked upon by you as David was by Eliab, his elder brother, whose "anger was kindled against David" because the stripling talked about going out to kill Goliath, the Philistine. Eliab thought this boy, whose business was to keep sheep, had no business in the battle; and for him to talk about killing the giant was attributed to his "pride and the naughtiness of his heart;" he was not "evangelical" in his brethren's estimation. They had fled before the giant, even the whole army of Israel, and poor little David thought he could kill him alone! What presumption! cried out the frighted hosts of Israel. But the little shepherd-boy insisted on making the trial; but if he will go out against this tall "satan," they will put on him "Saul's armor." But that did not suit the boy, he must choose his own weapons, even if they were not "evangelical." They were such as he was used to; and trusting in God, he knew how to throw "stones" that should do the work. Doubtless the "evangelical" lookers-on, thought him a presumptuous lad; but the giant fell, and right glad was Israel to see his head cut off, and they could shout "victory" as loud as if they had not previously been alarmed at "the activity" of this "satan"—this defier of Israel's God.

The Goliath of modern Christendom is a spirit-devil. He has made a most "alarming" manifestation in various forms, to the members of the "National Christian Convention," who recently met in this city. In considering this "satanic agency" at work, The Methodist says:

The condition of the neglected masses of our large centres of population presented a fearful problem to the Convention. The presence of heathenism on our Pacific coast, of European rationalism and infidelity on our Atlantic coast, the spread of transcendentalism in New England, of Romanism and High-Churchism everywhere, of Spiritualism and kindred errors, were all fairly met, and the present comparative inefficiency of the Church was as frankly and as earnestly deplored.

Thus modern Israel stands alarmed at the giant's progress and their own "inefficiency," and "earnestly deplore" this state of things. Certainly it does not look much like these "evangelical" Christians "conquering the world to Christ."

There are, we trust, a few Davids in the world, if the "evangelical" will not despise their help, who may kill their Goliath, and cut off his head; that done they may have a fair fight, in an open field, with all those enemies of which they speak. The existence of all these, to a great extent, depends on the "evangelicals" keeping alive their satan—the spirit-devil—the very idea of which has begotten nearly all the evils of which they complain, and paralyzes their own efforts against the wickedness of men. Let men know that the great evil is in themselves and of themselves; and that the root of all their pride and contempt of God is in the idea that they are possessed of inherent immortality. Let the spirit-devil die out of your theology and the twin doctrine of natural immortality, and you will find most of the evils of which you complain will receive a check which will astonish even yourselves.

What the church needs to-day, above all else, is a higher type of spiritual power, as an experimental fact, than has been known in this age. The necessities of the times call for a fuller development of energy, for larger measures of the Holy Spirit, than the church has ever witnessed. We want to know more of what is meant in the promise: "It shall come to pass in those days that I will pour out my spirit upon all flesh; your sons and your daughters shall prophesy; your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams; and also upon my servants, and upon my handmaids in those days, will I pour out my spirit." This gift alone will qualify the church to save the world.

We heartily agree with The Methodist in these remarks. We do need "a higher type of spiritual power," etc., and "to know more of what is meant in the promise" spoken of; but we are not likely to know more on that subject till we abandon the vain notion of a spiritual entity in man called an "immortal soul," going to heaven or hell at death. Let men know and understand that all our spiritual existence depends on our having the Holy Spirit of God dwelling in us; and that without this we shall all "utterly perish in our own corruption like natural brute beasts;" and if anything can arouse them to seek eternal life, this will do it. If not, their case is hopeless.

P. S.—Since the foregoing was written we learn from the World's Crisis that its editor was in the Convention. Is he getting to be "evangelical," and an expectant of the world's conversion?" It is rather dangerous to get popular at this late day. We confess we have no faith in any of the churches being able "to conquer the world to Christ." He will do that work for himself ere long. So we believe.

A Future Life of Torment:
A CONVERSATION.

John.—"God is Love—infinite and endless love. While I gaze on his glory as manifested in the compassionate Jesus, I see the heart of God as it were laid open, and I am overwhelmed with the grand and glorious truth, "God is Love."

Peter.—All creation speaks him to be Love. We are encompassed with love as the globe is encompassed in the atmosphere. Voices are heard on every side proclaiming "God is love:" but the grandest voice of all is that which is heard from Bethlehem to Calvary. What tones of love are heard by the shepherds in that glorious night in which Jesus was born; and it continued to peal along the path of his whole life till he expired on the cross: nor did it cease even then, but continued till the angel messengers announced "This same Jesus" shall come again. All things speak in heavenly strains, "God is love."

J.—Since I came to the knowledge of this truth I have been utterly unable to reconc the idea of a future hopeless torture of any creature God has made. Such a view involves his character in a transaction wholly at variance with all ideas I can form of the God of love. Such a view I feel wholly unable to defend in the presence of an unbeliever.

P.—I have for a long time been perplexed with the idea of the God of love inflicting on the works of his hands hopeless torture in a future life. To reconcile such an idea with the statement "God is Love" I find an utter impossibility; nor do I see how it can be reconciled with the future perfect happiness of the saints.

J.—I cannot unravel the amazing idea of hopeless torture and perfect bliss existing at one and the same time among those who lived together here in more or less enjoyment in each other's society, perhaps as husbands and wives, parents and children, brothers and sisters, etc. I must confess my own happiness as a Christian has been imbittered, and I know many others who feel as I do at the thought of future hopeless torture—whether temporary or eternal—for any of those whom God has endowed with the sensitiveness belonging to living beings. The more blessed I feel at any time the more wretched I am at the thought of this hopeless torture of my fellow-creatures; hence I coincide with your idea of the irreconcilability of such torture under the government of the God of love and justice.

P.—Not unfrequently has it been urged that the saved will be so satisfied with this hopeless torture that it will not mar their happiness. Satisfaction with the justice of the punishment of a criminal will never remove from a rational and pure mind the idea of wrong in inflicting hopeless torture; especially when that torture cannot benefit the sufferer or those who witness it. And such seems to be the character of all hopeless torture in a future life. Our happiness comes from without, and I judge there cannot fail to be an influx of sympathetic pain from the sight of the agonies of those enduring hopeless tortures.

J.—The more I reflect on this subject the more do I see the necessity of some clearer light upon it. O for one bright ray to scatter the darkness.

P.—My opinion is, there is no lack of light in the holy Scriptures if we can look at its pages with a single desire to know the truth on these perplexing points. That word can never shock the mind of a sincere inquirer after truth by any of its revelations. God saith "Come, now, let us reason together." This shows nothing is to be accepted as truth at which reason revolts.

J.—Your remarks would startle most men Do you intend to call in question doctrines held by good and pious men, because they seem contrary to our reason?

P.—Reason is God's gift, and he has planted it in us to guide us in our course in this world where error abounds, and fancy rules so many minds. Reason, it is true, needs divine aid; and hence God has said, "Let us reason together." But if reason is set aside, man is like a vessel at sea, having neither chart nor compass; he is the sport of "every wind of doctrine," and most likely will make shipwreck. The province of reason, then, is to judge of facts. Is it a fact that God has revealed the hopeless torture of any of the children of men in a future life? By this question I take it for granted that God has made a revelation to men of his will and designs in relation to them.

J.—In my mind there is no doubt on that point. But you do not doubt but that the impenitent will be punished hereafter.

P.—I have no doubt but what unrepentant men, and all wilful unbelievers, will be punished just as God has said they shall be. But we are not to receive any man's opinion for God's revelation. No man or body of men, however good or wise, must be allowed authoritatively to decide for us what God has said shall be the doom of the ungodly. "To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them." Isa. viii., 20. Hence the question arises, What has God said shall be the result of a sinful life? Or, what is the penalty for sin? Let this question be answered and it unravels the whole subject.

J.—I think you have taken the right view of the way to settle the question of the destiny of men hereafter. If it can be determined what is the wages of sin, what God has said is the penalty of transgression, that must be an answer to the question. On this point you and I do not and cannot disagree; we have both been long settled in the belief that man by his natural constitution has no inherent immortality; that a future life depends on the will of God, as does, also, the character of that life. "The wages of sin is death;" and we are agreed that the term death, in law and as defining penalty, cannot be used figuratively; such a construction is an impeachment of the love of God in dealing with poor finite creatures, who need to be taught in the plainest language and in the most explicit manner. Such was Jesus' course in instructing the "common people," for they "heard him gladly;" which shows that he taught them in plain terms, easy to be understood. He set "Life and Death" before them distinctly. Life, if they believed in him and became obedient to his teachings, assuring them that such he would "raise up" from the dead "at the last day." And as death is the wages of sin, the fact that Christ will raise up the believers from the dead as a reward, or gift of God, seems clearly to be a declaration that unbelievers shall not be raised, or "shall not see life" from the dead, but are "holden with the cords of their sins," and "remain in the congregation of the dead" as the punishment of a refusal to come unto Christ that they "might have life."

If these things are so, then the idea of a future life for unbelievers, for a longer or shorter period of torment, seems to have no place in the government of God, and is opposed to the great fact that "God is love," and to that reason with which he has endowed us by which to test any theory purporting to be a a revelation of his will and purposes concerning the children of men, who are the workmanship of his hands. Life future, or life from the dead, seems to be the great idea of revelation, bestowed as a gift of God on those found "worthy" of it under whatever dispensation God's providence may have placed them. But we will talk more on this subject hereafter.

Dr. J. K. Finley.

Dr. Finley is known to most of our readers as the author of "A Letter to a Clergyman," which we published many years since in the Bible Examiner and afterward issued in a tract which has had a wide circulation. At the time of his writing that Letter, he resided in Pittsburg, Pa. He had formerly resided in Niles, Mich., and was a prominent member in the Presbyterian church in that place. A few years since, he returned from Pittsburg to Niles, where he now resides. His present relation to the Life cause will be seen by his letter to us in another column. His influence in Niles must be considerable, as he has sent us a number of subscribers, and writes in defence of the Life views in the Niles Republican, a secular paper. He has sent us several numbers of that paper containing articles from his pen, but says they only contain "first principles," and he does not desire us to insert them in our columns. We think, however, there are many of our present readers who will be glad to see these principles reasserted.

With this view of the subject, we have inserted the commencement of those articles in this week's issue of the Herald of Life. More may be expected to follow.

Literal Fulfilment of Prophecy.

In the previous article we have shown that the prophecies which related to the first advent of our Lord, had a literal accomplishment in the most minute particulars. If then, God has given us no other rule for interpreting the prophecies that relate to the second advent, we are bound to give them the same literal construction; to dep rt from it is to be wise above what is written. Of the multitude of texts, in the Old and New Testaments, that speak of the second advent, we can notice only a few.

First, those of the Old Testament that speak of the reign of Christ: Psa. lxxii., 7–11; "In his day shall the righteous flourish; and abundance of peace so long as the moon endureth. He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth. They that dwell in the wilderness shall bow before him; and his enemies shall lick the dust. The kings of Tarshish and of the isles shall bring presents: the kings of Sheba and Seba shall offer gifts. Yea, all kings shall fall down before him: all nations shall serve him." Here is a prophecy clearly future, and, on the principle already established, to be literally fulfilled in the personal reign of Christ on the earth. Jer. xxiii., 5: "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous Branch, and a King shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth." Here is the same truth; and it is expressly said, in the next verse, that "his name whereby he shall be called," is, "The Lord our Righteousness." Here then can be no mistake. Daniel, in vision, sees this King come, "with the clouds of heaven: and there was given him dominion and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." Dan. vii., 14.

The New Testament presents our Lord at his first advent, with this remarkable prophecy, by the angel Gabriel, Luke i., 32, 33, "He shall be great, and shall be called The Son of the Highest: and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David: and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end." From all the prophecies that had gone before, we find the general impression was that Messiah would set up and establish his kingdom immediately. To correct this erroneous opinion our Lord spake a parable, Luke xix., 11, "And as they heard these things, he added and spake a parable, because he was nigh to Jerusalem, and because they thought that the kingdom of God should immediately appear." Here we see the error was not about the fact that such a kingdom was to "appear" as they looked for, but it was an error of time. To correct this error, "He said, therefore, a certain nobleman went into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom, and to return." None can doubt but that our Lord represented himself by this "nobleman." So certainly, then, as he went personally away into a far country he will personally and literally return. Any other construction of his language would be as absurd as to suppose the nobleman by whose case he illustrated his own, might go and receive a kingdom, but never personally come back to take possession: and if the servants of such nobleman were to conclude that they were never to look for his personal return, but only for some agent of his, or letters from him to be sent them, they would act a similiar part to those who conclude we are not to look for our Lord's personal return and reign upon this earth, "from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth."

The next text to which we call attention is that remarkable one in Acts i., 9–11. We must, however, before coming directly to the subject of it, notice the preceding circumstances. Our Lord had not only accomplished his ministry among his disciples prior to his crucifixion, but after his resurrection he was with them "forty days" instructing them in "the things pertaining to the kingdom of God:" and, "he opened their understanding that they might understand the Scriptures." After all this, "When they therefore were come together, they asked of him, saying, Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom of Israel?" Acts i., 6. Let it be recollected that this question immediately preceded his ascension into heaven, and after the full instruction he had given them about the kingdom. It is not to be supposed, therefore, that they were mistaken about the matter of that kingdom; and if they were, it is not likely our Lord would have left them in that mistake. They knew the kingdom was to be given to Christ, not only from the prophecies already noticed in the Old Testament, but from a still more remarkable one in Ezekiel xxi., 27, where God, speaking of the kingdom says, "I will overturn, overturn, overturn it: and it shall be no more, until he come whose right it is: and I will give it him." The disciples wished to know whether our Lord intended "at this" time to fulfil that prophecy. With respect to the matter of the kingdom they were right; with respect to the time our Lord told them it was not for them "to know the times and the seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power." In these circumstances and at that moment, "When he had spoken these things, while they beheld, he was taken up; and a cloud received him out of their sight. And while they looked steadfastly toward heaven, as he went up, behold two men stood by them in white apparel; which also said, Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." Acts i., 9–11.

Now, imagine you stand there with the apostles, with your eyes uplifted to heaven, seeing your blessed Lord as he goes up, till your sight is intercepted by the clouds. Would you doubt but that it was the real person of your Lord? While the mind is thus absorbed two shining ones address you, and say, "this same Jesus shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." We ask you could you understand anything else than just what the words express, viz., That the same identical person, in his visible form would "return" again to the earth? Would you have ever dreamed that you were to understand only a spiritual coming of your blessed Lord? Impossible. If that ever was a spiritual coming it must have been on the day of Pentecost, when the Holy Ghost fell upon the disciples. Did they understand this to be their Lord so coming in like manner as he went into heaven? Let Peter instruct us. Acts ii., 32, 33; "This Jesus hath God raised up, whereof we all are witnesses. Therefore being by the right hand of God exalted, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, he hath shed forth this which ye now see and hear." This language is explicit. It was not our Lord coming "in like manner." No—he was "exalted," and in his state of exaltation he had "received" that which "He hath shed forth." Surely, he did not receive himself, and shed forth himself. That this was not the fact Peter tells us distinctly in chap. iii., 20, 21, when he says, God "shall send Jesus Christ, whom the heaven must receive until the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all the holy prophets, since the world began." Those times have not yet arrived; therefore, "this same Jesus" has not, yet "so come in like manner" as he went "up into heaven." Hence, any spiritual or mystical application of this coming of our Lord is a "wresting the Scriptures;" and we fear some may do it to "their own destruction."

This point established, that the first chapter of Acts teaches a literal and personal coming of our Lord, we must understand the apostles, in every instance where they speak of the coming of our Lord, after he was taken up from them, as referring to that coming of which they were informed when their Lord had just been received out of their sight. The events of that moment could never have been absent from their minds. They lived, they wrote, they spoke with that glorious event ever in their thoughts. We have no right to put any other construction upon their words than the literal, obvious one, unless they, themselves distinctly inform us that they mean something else; this, however, they never do when speaking of the coming of Christ.

Peter, who with James and John witnessed the transfiguration of our Lord, and saw the "vision" of his glory, says, 2 Pet. i., 16–18, "For we have not followed cunningly-devised fables, when we make known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eye-witnesses of his majesty. For he received from God the Father honor and glory, when there came such a voice to him from the excellent glory. This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased. And this voice which came from heaven we heard, when we were with him in the holy mount." Peter here gives us to understand that the coming of our Lord in his "power and majesty" is a thing to be witnessed with our eyes, and is no "fable" or fancy.

John, another witness of the transfiguration, tells us, 1 John iii., 2, "It doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for, WE SHALL SEE HIM AS HE IS."

Paul assures us, 1 Thess. i., 16, "The Lord Himself shall descend from heaven—and the dead in Christ shall rise," at that time. Not the "dead in sins;" but "the dead in Christ;" showing that this coming of Christ is at the "resurrection in the last day." Paul also tells us, 2 Thess. ii., 8, that the Lord "shall destroy the man of sin with the brightness of his coming;" and that the "Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ." 2 Thess. i., 7, 8.

These testimonies of the apostles might be multiplied to almost any extent; but these samples will suffice to show that the inspired servants of the Lord looked for the real, literal, personal coming of our Lord Jesus Christ again to this earth, at which time there would be a resurrection of those who sleep in Jesus, and a change to immortality of the saints who are alive and remain unto that day. Shall we stand on that original faith, or turn aside to follow the "fable" of a merely spiritual coming? "Watch, for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh."

We shall next enter on an examination of the promises and prophecies relating to Abraham and his seed.

THE LIFE VIEWS.

[THE following is the commencement of a series of articles which have appeared in the Niles (Mich.) Republican, in the past few months, written by Dr. J. K. Finley, of that city.]

"DESTRUCTIONISM—THE DOCTRINE OF THE BIBLE."

MAJOR DUNCAN—Dear Sir: Having been invited by you to write occasionally for the Republican on any subject I might prefer, I have concluded to accept your kind invitation. The subject which I have selected is one in which a very general interest is felt at the present time, viz.: "The constitution of man, viewed from a Scriptural standpoint, in reference to its bearing on his moral and religious responsibility, and involving his future and eternal destiny. It may seem strange to some of your readers that a layman, in writing for a secular paper, should select a theological subject for his theme; but if you will look back over the last thirty or forty years, you cannot fail to see that religious subjects have enlisted the attention of the people generally, during that time, to a greater extent than at any previous period, since the reformation of the sixteenth century. The masses of the people have come to realize more than ever before, that in the Bible, they are addressed individually and directly, and not through the intervention of any body of men having authority to dictate what they must believe.

The Honorable and Rev. Baptist Noel, the most popular preacher in London, belonging also to the aristocratic class, gave up his position in the established church of England, and joined one of the dissenting churches, because he conscientiously believed the union of church and state was opposed to the spirit of the gospel. In his work on the "union of church and state" he says, "Men can no longer receive the creed of their fathers or of their country without investigation; but each one is bound to search after truth, to receive it, maintain it, and to promulgate it in the world in opposition to all error, however venerable or popular."

Whilst it is undoubtedly true that the vast majority of the people do still receive the religious opinions that have been handed down to them from their fathers, and do still bow to the teachings of their clerical instructors, with unquestioning submission, there is nevertheless a large class of intelligent Christians, and a rapidly increasing one, including both the clergy and laity, who have broken away from the fetters of tradition and are not afraid to go to the fountain of all truth, the Bible itself, as the only authority by which their religious belief shall be governed. They are determined to adhere to the noble declaration of the early reformers, "The Bible, the Bible alone, is the religion of Protestants."

It is a lamentable fact known to all and denied by none, that the church of Christ is divided into almost countless numbers of sects, who have heretofore and are now spending more of their strength tenfold in fighting against each other, than in fighting against what they call the common enemy. Ex-Chancellor Halsted, who has recently published a most valuable and learned work, entitled, "THE THEOLOGY OF THE BIBLE," has well remarked, "Books of so-called theology have become so multiplied that a lifetime is not sufficient to read and compare the thousand and one different and contradictory views of men on various points supposed to be involved in Theos-logos-God-word — Theology of the Bible, but which have really no foundation in God's word." It is a sad reflection too, that the vast majority of all these divisions result from differences of views on non-essential doctrines.

And now it is probable some will say, Do the destructionists propose to remedy the evil by adding another to the great number of sects already existing? Such, I am happy to say, is not the case. We recognize and acknowledge the fact that all the evangelical churches hold and teach the great fundamental truths of man's lost condition by reason of sin, and his recovery alone through the great work accomplished by the Lord Jesus Christ in his life, his death, and his triumphant resurrection from the dead. These essential truths God has blessed to the salvation of millions of our race: and although we differ from all the churches in what we regard as truths very important to a correct understanding of God's plans and purposes, yet we consider the evils of sectarianism greater than the good that might accrue, from a separate organization in which these truths should be preached. Our views are believed and dearly prized by thousands and tens of thousands in the ministry and out of it, both in Europe and America, who remain in the churches, and desire to make no change. I will mention but one, and his name will command respect from all who are acquainted his character as a man of sincere and unaffected piety, extensive learning, and profound scholarship; I allude to the late Archbishop Whately, of Dublin; it was through his writing that I first became acquainted with these doctrines.

It is apparent to all who have given attention to the subject that within the last quarter of a century there has been a general disposition manifested among evangelical Christians, to bring all their religious opinions to the strict test of Scriptural truth. The consequence has been that some of the views almost universally believed and incorporated into the symbols of the various denominations, have been found to rest upon the false teachings of traditions handed down to us from the dark ages of the Church, and not upon the plain, simple and harmonious teachings of the Bible.

Thus, although in all ages of the church, there have been, here and there, good men who have borne testimony in favor of what are now termed millennarian doctrines, yet these doctrines were scarcely known to exist, by the great masses of the Christian world. Within the last thirty or forty years, however, such an amount of Scriptural testimony has been brought forward to prove the literal, and pre-millennial return of the Lord Jesus Christ to our world, that they have secured the belief and enlisted the support, both from the pulpit and through the press, of many of the greatest and best men in every branch of the evangelical church.

Within about the same period, we find also a very wide-spread defection from the ordinarily received opinions in reference to the constitution of man, as revealed by God in His word; involving the penalty of sin, the ultimate destiny of the wicked, and the reward of the righteous. Multitudes of devoted Christians, eminent for scholarship and piety, whose praise is in all the churches, and whose claims to be regarded as strictly evangelical cannot be questioned, have discarded the dogma of the eternal sufferings of the wicked, as not only not taught in the Bible, but as clearly opposed to the plainest enunciations of the inspired volume. The talented editor of one of the leading theological journals of our country says: "These doctrines have become of late far more common than formerly. At the distance of even a generation they had few disciples; now, however, they find advocates in denominations, both that do not make them an element of their creeds, and that reject them, and number in their ranks persons respectable for talent, cultivation and influence.

G.—In our last conversation you spoke of a covenant, yet in the future, to be made with the house of Israel and Judah in the form of an agreement; and in this agreement they were to be placed in their own land. There are a few things we wish to inquire into; first, What is a covenant? and second, is the land the property of Israel and Judah—as you term it, their own land?

We will, for a few moments, look at the several covenants as they present themselves to us. The first covenant was the Edenic, or as it is called, the Adamic. I find no agreement in this covenant. But God as a Sovereign "commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat: but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die."

Here is a covenant or law imperative in its language, and Adam was not consulted in the making of it; nor does it appear that he was asked whether he liked it or not. Again, we read that God made a covenant with Noah and his seed; and yet there is no evidence that Noah was consulted in the matter. This covenant partakes of the nature of a promise on the part of God to all flesh. And now we come to the covenant that God made with Abraham. We read in Genesis xii., "Now the Lord had said unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will show thee; and I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing; . . . and in thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed." Here is the commencement of the gospel covenant according to our understanding; and it ran on through several dispensations until it was confirmed and completed in Christ. And yet this partakes of the nature of a promise on the part of God, without any consultation in regard to the wishes of Abram. God commands Abram to do a certain thing, and then makes a promise of what he himself is going to do for Abram. In the 7th verse we have an addition to this promise added, "And the Lord appeared to Abram and said, "Unto thy seed will I give this land." Again in Gen. chap. xiii., "Look from the place where thou art, northward, southward, eastward, and westward: or all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed forever; and I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth: so that if a man can number the dust of the earth, shall thy seed also be numbered." Here is something more added to the covenant, and yet Abram is not asked to enter into any agreement with the Lord. So far the covenant is all on one side, and consists wholly of promises, and those seemingly unconditional.

Now if this promise contained one or two words I should have no difficulty in understanding it as you wish me to. If it read to thee, will I give this land, and to thy seed after thee, I should have no difficulty. I could then conceive how Abram might enjoy the possession of the land during his lifetime, and his seed possess it after him. But those few words, "To thee (personally) will I give it, (the land), and to thy seed forever," which partakes of an everlasting promise, and Abram is to have a share in it.

C.—Do you suppose that this seed spoken of as numerous as the dust of the earth, is the seed that is to possess the land forever?

G.—We will leave the question of the seed for the present; it will come in better after awhile: for the present we will try and settle the question of what does a covenant consist, and what is its nature? we have examined three, and find they are of the nature of commands and promises. The Mosaic or Sinaic covenant is one of commands, and runs in this nature—"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God; thou shalt remember the Sabbath day; thou shalt not covet; thou shalt not kill," etc. And we find Moses saying, "Hear therefore, O Israel, and observe to do it; that it may be well with thee, and that ye may increase mightily, as the Lord God of thy fathers hath promised thee, in the land that floweth with milk and honey."

C.—But surely Israel consented to do and keep the commands, and thereby satisfied the covenant, as I understand it.

G.—I understand an agreement in a very different light. When two parties meet to make a covenant in the form of an agreement, they meet for the time being on equal footing, and each party has the right to state what they are willing to do, and thus the agreement is mutual between them.

C.—Is it always the case that covenants partake of the nature of agreements?

G.—No: we find that some covenants, even among ourselves partake of the nature of a Will or Testament. For instance, a man wills or bequeaths his property to his heirs or to some person or institution, and yet they are not consulted in the matter at all and do not know anything about it until after the decease of the testator.

C.—Do you think that any of the covenants that we have been talking about are of this nature?

G.—I think the covenant that God made to Abram was of the nature of a bequest; but different in some respects from some wills, in this particular, God showed Abram the land He bequeathed to him; and informed him of it, and then gave Abraham to understand it would be of no benefit to him during his life time. But the will was couched in such language as led Abraham to believe it was to be enjoyed in an immortal or endless life.

C.—What makes you think so? I certainly do not see anything so strong in the language to warrant it.

G.—Suppose we follow the dealings of the Lord with Abram. Gen. xv., 2, "Abram said, Lord God, what wilt thou give me, seeing I go childless? . . . Behold to me thou hast given no seed; and lo, one born in my house is mine heir."

Here Abram's faith was wavering. God had promised him seed as numerous as the dust of the earth; and lo, he says, "what wilt thou give me?" "And behold the word of the Lord came unto him, saying, This shall not be thine heir, but he that shall come forth out of thine own bowels shall be thine heir." "And he believed in the Lord, and it was counted to him for righteousness." In chap. xxii., we find when Abram was ninety years old and nine, the Lord appeared unto him; and the Lord enumerates a number of blessings he is about to confer upon Abram. "And God said unto Abram, As for Sarah, I will bless her, and give thee a son also of her, yea, I will bless her, and she shall be a mother of nations; kings of people shall be of her. Then Abraham fell upon his face and laughed, and said in his heart, Shall a child be born unto him that is an hundred years old? and shall Sarah, that is ninety years old, bear?" Here Abraham doubts again, and cries out "O that Ishmael might live before thee." And God said unto him, "Sarah, thy wife, shall bear thee a son indeed; and thou shalt call his name Isaac; and I will establish my covenant with him for an everlasting covenant; with his seed after him." From this point in our next conversation we will show how God taught Abraham the doctrine of faith in a future life.

JACOB GRIM.

FROM DR. J. K. FINLEY.

NILES, MICH., Nov. 21, 1868.

BR. STORRS: I have been thinking for some time past of writing to you, if for no other reason, that I might express my continued and increasing regard and affection for our laborious leader in the great work to which your life is devoted. It is a glorious privilege you have long enjoyed of standing up for the truth, faithful where so many have proved faithless, in defending the character of God from the misconceptions and misrepresentations of both friends and foes. When I think of the length of time during which all the best energies of your life have been consecrated to this object, the reproach, contempt, contumely, and misrepresentation that have been heaped upon you; the care and labor, the vicissitudes and anxieties, that have marked your course, I feel that God has truly called you to the work, and that he only could have sustained you in it. It is, and ought to be, a great blessedness for you to know, that multitudes have been made unspeakably happy through your abundant labors of love, and are not ashamed or afraid to "rise up and call you blessed;" and especially to look forward to the greater blessedness of a hearty "welcome into the joy of your Lord." Ah! I am afraid at that gladsome and joyous occasion, there will be many who don't think of the danger now, who will tremble when they hear the Master say, "Ye were ashamed of me and of my words." The great tidal wave of "LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST" has at length reached our pleasant and prosperous city of Niles, and so far from carrying death and destruction before it, some, and I think and hope more than have made it apparent, have been carried on the top of the wave to a peace and joy in believing to which they were strangers before.

My reply to the aspersions of Br. Morgan, last May, stirred up a good deal of feeling, both good and bad. It set some to thinking and others to scoffing, some to investigating, and others to ridiculing. The minister of the Methodist Church, after taking a couple of months to prepare himself, gave a number of sermons against our views. He is a good man and is regarded as one of the strongest in this Conference. His discourses were as good, perhaps, as could be expected, seeing he had so little help from the Bible. I did not hear him often, but as far as I could learn, he advanced nothing new, and nothing that shook the faith in our doctrines, of any who had begun to understand the Bible truths upon which they rest. He is courteous and gentlemanly, and, I believe, no one took exception to the manner in which he treated his opponents. About the time he finished his course of sermons, the Adventists of Buchanan (six miles from us) came with a tent and set it up in a grove on the outskirts of the city. I knew nothing of their intention to come until they were here. Two of the brethren, Revs. Edward Himes and Farris, called on me and informed me of their purpose to hold a series of tent meetings. We talked the matter over very pleasantly, and I expressed my hearty approval. My health was so infirm that I could not hear them as often as I could wish. It was well understood that they had the sympathies of my family and friends as far as I could influence them, and, of course, just so far as I co-operated with them I sank in the esteem of the bigoted portion of my orthodox friends. One whose good opinion I had alway enjoyed before, said she would not go to hear them and did not wish anything to do with those who did go. This was terrible, but I confess I forgot to ask for any extra support under it. I had several interviews with the brethren, and on one of their visits to my house, we talked over the points of difference between us, on the penalty of sin and the resurrection of the impenitent dead, but without any controversy. During the last two months they have preached in a public hall on Sunday afternoons, generally to good and attentive congregations. Soon after they struck their tent, my own minister conceived it to be his duty to guard his people against our dangerous delusions. I heard all of his discourses, having requested him to preach them in the mornings, as I have been unable for some months past to go out after night. There was nothing objectionable in his deportment toward us.

While my minister was giving his defence of the orthodox belief it was thought by the believers in our doctrines, that there was no good reason why we should not defend ourselves, and I was urged to write a series of articles for the "Republican," a secular paper of our city. The Editor was very cordial in offering his columns for the purpose, and I commenced with "Destructionism the Doctrine of the Bible," followed with "The Constitution of Man as revealed in the Bible." It was thought advisable then, in consequence of the great press of political matters, to postpone the further publication on the subject until after the election. My first article since the election was in last week's paper on the immortality of the soul.

I did not intend to send them to you, because they are for beginners, and of course so elementary in character, that I did not suppose you would regard them as being adapted to the HERALD. I would have sent them when first published, only that I was afraid you might think I desired you to put them into the HERALD. And I now wish to say, that I have no wish of the kind. If there is anything in them that you prefer to publish, do so, but not otherwise. I also send a rejoinder to the two first by "Enquirer;" and I may, when I get through the "Constitution of Man," reply to him.

OBITUARY.

FELL asleep in Jesus, October 28, 1868, ROBERT L. JAQUES, Esq., aged 76 years, six months and 17 days.

BR. STORRS: After a short illness, of little over a week, your dear and lamented friend was taken from us, with that terrible disease the paralysis. In his younger days he was converted to God, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, and lived up to its doctrines until the days of Wm. Miller, the Adventist; when, believing in the second coming of Christ, he attended to the principles of that belief, searching the holy Scriptures daily, praying and watching patiently for His coming. In later years he has fully believed in the "Non-immortality of the soul;" that "the righteous only will live again," and will inherit this earth; that all the saints who die will sleep till the resurrection day, when Christ will descend from heaven with the angels, and that the righteous living will be changed in the twinkling of an eye, and the righteous dead be awaked from their sleep, and both inhabit this earth, which will be regenerated or made new.

Previous to his sickness, it appears that his whole mind was wrapped up in his "Life views;" he sent to each of his children a copy of your excellent work on "LIFE FROM THE DEAD," with the "HERALD OF LIFE," with his advice to read and study it; and even with his business pursuits gave copies of your "LIFE FROM THE DEAD" to his friends and acquaintances; his whole conversation and prayer was that he might live to see Jesus descend from heaven to inhabit the new earth.

Our dear father was consistent in whatever he undertook, either worldly or spiritually. He abhorred any semblance of pomp or show, and when he did a charitable act, he did not wish his name mentioned in connection with it. In his early days he practised law; but he was the pleader for both rich and poor, with or without his legal fee; and would undertake no case unless convinced that he could serve the ends of justice. His habits were regular; and punctuality was one of his crowning virtues. He believed that the "laborer was worthy of his hire," and it would grieve him to owe any man, and he could not rest easy until the debt was paid.

His walk through life was straight forward, not swerving one way or the other, in his intercourse with the world, but practising what he preached, and showing by his daily walk that he was a consistent Christian. Family prayer was never neglected by our dear father, who prayed night and morning for the conversion of his children, who were near and dear to him, and also for the coming of our dear Saviour.

On the Sunday afternoon before his death, the minister visited him, and before his departure asked him if he should pray with him, and if he had anything particular that he should pray for? Our father said, he should like him to pray for the "conversion of his dear children." The minister did so; after which, father, in very feeble tones, told of his religious experience, and that he did not expect to be with us long, and that he was prepared to die, and would like us to meet him on the resurrection day. Such a death-bed scene will never be forgotten by those of his children who witnessed it, and who promised their dear father that they would try, by the grace of God, to so live that they would meet him in that day; a promise that we will all try to keep.

Early Monday morning, his mind was clear; he spoke about an affair which was unsettled and troubled him through the night; he called for his son, who had attended to his business, and gave him instructions about his worldly affairs, which being settled so as to leave no claim on the estate, he called for his children who were present, and talking to his wife about his funeral and where he was to be buried, and resignedly said, that he supposed it would be "Wednesday."

That day the paralysis so gained on him that his tongue cleaved to the roof of his mouth, and refused utterance; but his mind was clear and he was contented with his lot; appearing perfectly resigned; in which state he remained until a quarter to eight Wednesday morning, when he fell asleep in Jesus (without a struggle) whom he had served for over forty-five years of his life, and to the last moment, wishing and praying for His coming.

We have lost a dear parent, and you have lost a dear friend, who always had you and your cause in remembrance; and the community has lost a benefactor, and the poor and needy a friend who was always willing to give where it was needed.

JOHN AND EUGENE.

HUDSON CITY, N. J.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—In the foregoing, the children of Br. JAQUES have set forth their father's faith and life truly, so far as our knowledge extends. He first became personally known to us about ten or twelve years since. It was seldom, however, that personal interviews were enjoyed, owing to the distance of our residences from each other, and our confinement to our editorial work for the past six years.

For the past four or five years we had not seen him at all, though often receiving communications from him, with donations to the HERALD OF LIFE and the Tract Fund; in the latter of which he was particularly interested. He had, as his children have stated, actively engaged in scattering the tracts, and has taken special pains to put the "Campaign Documents," on the Life views, into the hands of his friends and business associates far and near; so that "he being dead yet speaketh."

For several weeks we had been looking to get time to go over to his residence to see him, and deeply regret that we failed to do so. We truly feel that we have lost a firm and unwavering friend, and the cause of truth, a firm supporter. We rejoice to know that his "end was peace." He "sleeps in Jesus" till his Lord shall return from heaven to raise His sleeping saints, and to take "the kingdoms of this world" and rule over all on "the throne of His father David;" then shall our brother share in the glory in which he believed, and for which he looked. May we all so live that if we sleep before our Lord's return, we may be of those who shall "awake at His appearing and kingdom."

ITEMS.

People say we should n't be morose; God wants us to enjoy ourselves. I suppose any one who lives in Christ finds amusement enough in that—don't want anything else.

Fasting is to be left to the conscience and feelings. Could the disciples derive as much benefit from a week's fasting as they could get by a week's converse with Christ? As they had access to Him they could ask for what they wanted.

Poetry.

WHAT IS LIFE?

A little crib beside the bed,
A little face above the spread,
A little frock behind the door,
A little shoe upon the floor.

A little lad with dark brown hair,
A little blue-eyed face and fair;
A little lane that leads to school,
A little pencil, slate and rule.

A little blithesome, winsome maid,
A little hand within his laid;
A little cottage, acres four,
A little old-time household store.

A little family gathering round;
A little turf-heaped, tear-dewed mound;
A little added to his soil;
A little rest from hardest toil.

A little silver in his hair;
A little stool and an easy-chair;
A little night of earth-lit gloom;
A little cortege to the tomb.

LOVE YOUR ENEMIES.

ONE morning after breakfast Charley Allen took his little Testament, and, opening it at the 5th chapter of Matthew, he read some of the rules which were given by our Saviour for the direction of our lives. Charley thought they were very beautiful, and especially liked the verse, "Love your enemies," etc.

His mother came in while he was thus engaged, and Charlie looked up with a bright smile, saying, "Mother, I think if we all loved our enemies the soldiers would not be needed."

"No, my dear; their weapons would grow rusty, and they would have to follow the command to beat their swords into ploughshares, if they used them at all. But, Charlie, it is not so easy a matter to love our enemies and it is only by the assistance of our Saviour that we can feel a loving spirit toward all."

"I know that, mother; but when I was reading it just now, I thought nothing would be commanded us which we could not do."

"No, my child, with our Saviour's help we can do anything, and that help will be given to all who rightly ask Him for it."

His mother then left the room, and Charley sat still for a few minutes, wishing he might be helped to overcome all his bad feelings, and said to himself, "I hope I shall remember to-day, if I am provoked, to be kind and gentle."

He then put his Bible away and ran out into his garden. His garden was near the fence, and while he was engaged in pulling up the weeds, and putting it in nice order, a man passed along the street driving a cart of gravel. He saw Charley in his garden, and feeling disposed to tease him, threw a handful of gravel in his face.

Charlie did not like it very much, but the words came into his mind, "Love your enemies," and he quickly brushed away the sand, and made no complaint. After he had finished his work, he went and sat down on the door-step, and was watching the workmen who were engaged in building a new house opposite, when the same man passed again with another load of sand, and seeing Charley sitting there, saluted him with another handful.

Charley, remembering the words, "love your enemies," ran into the house and asked his mother to give him a pear. She did so, and he ran out again very quickly. Feeling some curiosity, she went to the window, and saw Charley running after the man, calling to him to stop. The man stopped in amazement, and Charley, putting the pear into his hand, ran back to the house.

The man looked ashamed, and though he passed Charley many times afterward, he threw no more gravel and Charlie felt much better than if he had been angry with him; for, as he said to his mother, "I believe it hurts me more than it does those I am angry with."

At dinner time his father brought him a fine large kite, which Charley had been wanting for a long time.

After dinner he ran out to fly his kite. He had her all ready, but, on trying her, found she needed a little more tail. He laid his kite down on the door step, and went into the house to get some. He soon returned, but the kite was nowhere to be seen.

Poor Charley was sadly troubled. He ran up and down the street, and round the corner, but the kite could not be found; and coming into the house, he told his mother the sorrowful tale.

She pitied him very much, and tried to comfort him, but it was hard work, and Charley spent a sad afternoon, thinking of his lost treasure.

The next morning school commenced, and Charley started for it; but what was his surprise and grief, when he saw one of his schoolfellows with the missing kite in his hand.

"Joe," said Charlie, "that is my kite; I am so glad to find it."

"Indeed it is mine," said Joe, who, I am sorry to say, was not always truthful. "It is mine, and I shan't give it up."

Poor Charley looked astonished, and said, "Why Joe, my father bought it for me yesterday; there is the red line it had painted on it."

Joe seized the kite quickly, and run off with it so fast that Charlie could not catch him, so with an aching heart he went on to school.

When he went home to dinner he told his mother the story. She felt very sorry that Joe could be so wicked as to steal the kite and then tell a falsehood about it; but told Charlie to try to be patient, and perhaps Joe would return it soon.

"Well, mother," said Charlie, "I was very angry with Joe, at first; but then, something whispered, 'Love your enemies;' and I pray that I might feel so towards him; and now, mother, I believe I do love even him."

His mother kissed him, and told him how pleased she was that he had been enabled to overcome his angry feelings; then Charley started off for school again.

The weather had changed, and it was now raining, but Charlie did not mind that, as he had a nice little umbrella of his own, and he ran along with a light heart.

As he turned the corner he saw Joe walking along without any umbrella, and evidently very wet. Charlie ran up to him, saying, "Why, Joe, come under my umbrella, it is raining so hard."

Joe looked as if he would rather not, but Charlie insisted; and after school went all the way home with him, Joe looking very much ashamed.

When bedtime came, and Charlie lay down to sleep, he thanked his heavenly Father for having helped him during the day; and after asking Him to keep him through the night, went quietly to sleep.

Next morning, while they were sitting at breakfast, the door-bell rang, and a fine large kite was handed in, with a card on it, directed to Charlie Allen from Joe.

Charlie's eyes fairly danced, he was so delighted; and he said to his mother, "I thought yesterday nothing could make me happier than to have my kite; and now I believe I am still more glad that I have been enabled to to keep that commandment, 'Love your enemies.'"—Selected.

THE MORTAL RESURRECTION.

FROM H. J. SWEETLAND.

BR. STORRS: I notice in the Crisis of Nov. 18th, part of a sermon preached by H. Munger, recently, in New York, upon his mortal resurrection theory. In order to get the wicked alive from the dead, he takes the position that our Lord was made alive from the grave in a mortal corruptible body, and the saints will be made alive in the same manner. His text is Psa. lxxiii., 20, "as a dream when one awaketh; so, O Lord, when thou awakest thou shalt despise their image." He says that the wicked must live again to have an image after they wake up for God to despise. But if this proves what he intends to have it, it proves also that the Lord must die and have a resurrection in order to "wake up" to despise their image; for it says, "O Lord, when thou awakest," etc. He chose a very unfortunate text to prove his position; for it proves too much.

He next refers to Dan. xii., 2. But to meet that point I will refer to a Jewish writer upon that passage. R. Saadias Gaon comments upon it thus: "This is the resurrection of the dead of Israel, whose lot is to eternal life; but those who do not awake, they are the destroyed of the Lord." Mark; it is many of them that awake; and all that do awake will have everlasting life.

His next quotation is John v., 28, 29, and he remarks that "Jesus says, all the righteous and wicked must come out of their graves alive to be rewarded." Now, Jesus says no such thing; but we will see what Jesus did say upon this subject. There are two words in the Greek that He used, which are translated life, viz., zoee, and psuche. Zoee means animated existence; state of being alive. This word applies to this life and also to the future life. But the word psuche is never applied to a future life. The zoee life we now possess is animated by blood: the zoee life in the future will be animated by spirit. The blood life, which we derive from Adam, ends at death. It is never restored: the law demands and holds it eternally. Jesus did not take up his blood life again; if he did, he took back the sacrifice. The law still holds it; but that God might be just and the justifier of them that believe in Jesus, He introduces a life upon a new principle, which is animated by spirit. Jesus was the first to be animated with the spirit-life; for he is the first-fruits of them that slept; afterward the saints at his coming.

We will now see how Jesus used these words. John xii., 25, "He that loveth his life (psuche) shall lose it: and he that hateth his life in this world, shall keep it unto (zoen aianion) life eternal." Nothing said about a (psuche) life in the future. Again: John v., 29, "They that have done good unto the resurrection of (zoee) life." Again: John iii., 36. "He that believeth not the Son, shall not see zoee." That is, will not be made alive. This is the true import of the passage. We will now put the two passages together as we understand them. They that have done good will come forth from the graves in a state of living animated existence; (which will, of course, be eternal;) but they that believe not the Son shall never see a state of animated existence, or shall never be made alive. This appears to me to be the true meaning of the word; for Jesus says, in John xii., 25, "He that loveth his (psuche) life, shall lose it." This, which is the blood life, shall never be restored. This is the fate of all the wicked. And as the (zoee) life is never said to be given only to the righteous, the wicked are eternally shut out from all life.

S. Bliss, once editor of the Advent Herald, said, speaking upon the word zoee, "This word never means 'eternal life' unless the word eternal or everlasting is attached to it." If this statement is true then it settles the point that the wicked will never be made alive, but their resurrection will be a condemned one, not to see life.

Br. Munger next quotes Acts. xxiv., 15. I would refer him to an exposition of that passage made by Br. F. H. Burbank, in the HERALD OF LIFE, Nov. 18th. Br M. now asks the question, "What did the broken law claim of Christ to satisfy the demand against Adam? Was it eternal death?" I do not know that the law had any particular claim on Christ. He gave his life; no law demanded it. We will suppose that Christ had not died at all. Whose sins would Adam and his posterity have died for? and how long would they have remained in death? There is but one answer to be given; that is, they would have died for their own sins and would have remained in death eternally. But those who believe in him will live again; and those who reject him will be as though He had not died at all.

Again; reference is made to those that Christ raised from the dead, and the statement made that there is no evidence that but one was a righteous man, viz., Lazarus. As it cannot be proved that any of them were wicked we let it pass. But it is said he was raised or awaked mortal. This is easily accounted for. Christ had not power to give what, at that time, He did not himself possess. He could give the same life he had, and no other. But after his resurrection "All power" was given him; then he could give immortal life. Now I ask, Did He ever raise one mortal after his resurrection? I answer, he did not; and there is no evidence that He ever will. He will never go back to restore the Adamic or blood life after he is in possession of the Spirit-life.

But we now come to a wonderful discovery; never discovered before. That is, coming from the grave is not rising from the dead to immortality; but going up into the air; then comes the change. Then, according to this new interpretation, Christ's coming out of the tomb was not his resurrection from the dead. We will try this by the word. Acts x., 40, 41. "Him God raised up the third day, and showed him openly. Not to all the people, but unto witnesses chosen before of God, even to us, who did eat and drink with him after he rose from the dead." The word says, He was raised up the third day; but Br. M. says, He was not raised up until the fortieth day. Again: If His ascension was his resurrection from the dead, and the Apostles ate and drank with him, they must have gone up into the air to perform this ceremony; and if rising to immortality is going up into the air, then the Apostles were made immortal for the time being; and in coming back again, they must have been changed back to mortality; for they all died. Thus we see what an awkward position those are placed in who take such ground to evade the truth. Br. M. refers to 1 Cor. v., 51, where Paul says, "We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed." But he does not seem to discover the fact that the Apostle stands as a representative of the righteous living at the Advent. Because he says, "We shall all be changed," he thinks that includes the resurrected ones from the dead. Paul is reasoning upon the same point in 1 Thess. iv., 15. "We which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not go before them that are asleep." The Apostle says, also, in verse 16, "The dead in Christ shall rise first," before the living are changed; and then all are to be caught up together into the air to meet the Lord.

Now for Br. M.'s theory. He virtually denies the statement of the Apostle when he says, "The dead shall be raised incorruptible;" (that is, first) "and we shall be changed" next. He says, the rising is going up after the change comes. Then, according to this exposition, the righteous dead are caught up before the living are changed, because they "rise first." That would leave those who are alive to be changed and caught up after the dead had been raised and gone; but the word says, "We which are alive shall be caught up together with them."

We see a difference between Paul's theory and Br. Munger's. The Apostle says, "We which are alive shall not go before them which are asleep." So Br. M. makes it out that "them that are asleep" go before those that are alive.

But I must leave the subject. I could say much more. I will now refer to a statement of Br. M.'s in my hearing, and then close. Br. M. stated that the doctrine of the non-living again of the wicked has killed out all the life of the church where it has gone; they are all backslidden. But if Br. M. has not backslid he surely has turned his sled round; for he has certainly slid a long slide from the truth, and is now groping in darkness at the bottom of the hill. Br. M. says, that if he is not correct in his exposition of the Scriptures, then Universal salvation is true, or "No life out of Christ" is true. I think in turning his sled around he is fast sliding toward Universalism; for he claims all they claim. They believe that all that die in Adam are made alive in Christ; and so does he; and I think it will not be long before he will see eye to eye with them.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—Br. M. and all others had best to cease "judging one another." "He that judgeth us is the Lord." How does such judging our brethren differ from reviling and beating the men servants and maid servants? While we may treat the views of brethren with severity, if we regard them as dangerous errors, we must all beware of indulging a spirit of judging their state, lest we are like the drunken man finding fault with the ground for rising up in his face, wholly unaware that it is himself who is in the blame. That the mortal resurrection theory is a real heresy does not admit of a doubt in our mind; but some good men are involved in it to avoid what they regard as heresy; that being their only escape from the conclusion that there is "No future life out of Christ." Let us be patient with them. It takes time to get clear of old traditions; and we have all been in them. It is very clear to us that a universal resurrection is the high road to Universalism. It may not land all its advocates there, but it should if they are consistent; for "the dead are raised in glory, in power, and spiritual." If that does not cover all the ground that a Universalist can ask, we are incapable of seeing what more is necessary.

ROMANISM AND THE SOUTH.

LAST spring Jefferson Davis made a speech in New Orleans. He recalled the friendly act of the Pope toward the Confederacy, in recognizing the Southern nationality in the second year of the war. In addressing his Roman Catholic audience, he reminded them that Rome was the only national friend who came to their aid officially in the bloody struggle.

Various indications, open and covert, show that the Roman Catholics have a deep purpose. They mean to rule this country, and their Jesuit plan is to move on Washington through the South. In one of his New York addresses last winter Father Hecker said that the Catholics must possess and govern this country, and he confessed that he was teaching their people to expect this and to work for it. We cannot account for so bold a revelation of their plans but in the fact that they already claim eleven millions of our population, and so are confident and outspoken. In A. D. 1900, they say will have the power to rule America.

With such expectations and purposes, we can see why they are playing with a strong hand to win the South. They hope to get the control of four millions of freedmen and eight millions of whites there. So they have there now a thousand Sisters of Charity engaged in all kinds of humane and Christian and wily work to steal the hearts of the people. They have access to all ranks and classes, but their special aim now is to direct the education of the white females of the South. It is said that already this is almost wholly under their control. In their churches, the ancient custom of the papal church enables them without show of offence to open their doors free to black and white alike. So they are bending over to themselves the goodwill of the populace, and moulding the mass, especially the young, by both education and religion. So important do they consider the Southern field to carry their plan to govern America, that in 1866 the Society de Propaganda expended in the South for Romish ends six hundred thousand dollars in gold. That amount, as the balances there are now trembling, is no insignificant sum. The negro mind, prone to religious faith and forms of some kind, is in a condition to be seriously affected by Romanism, and will be carried, if the Protestants are not judicious, active and prompt. Has Rome a Jesuit agency for the promotion of some men in the army and for keeping others back? She has formerly done strange things with courts and cabinets and armies. We raise these questions in view of a singular statement. Our generals now stand in this order, or nearly so: Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, Thomas, Rosecrans, Meade, Orr and Foster. It is said all of these are Roman Catholic except Grant. In the event of his removal or death, therefore, in peace or war, the army of the United States, singularly enough for a Protestant nation, would be under Roman Catholic control. It is the wisdom of Romanism to lay her plans far back and so foreclose issues for herself, almost before they are made public questions to others. If Rome may educate the females of the South, who does not see where not only the wives and mothers, but husbands and fathers of the next generation will rank on popery? If she may educate the freedmen, where will they vote? The remarks of Jefferson Davis in New Orleans, and of Father Hecker in New York, are worth studying.—Congregationalist.

Such thoughts and facts as the foregoing may well awaken alarm in believers in "the conversion of the world," before the advent of Christ to sit on David's throne. But to a believer in the personal advent of Christ, and his literal reign on earth, it need produce no painful apprehensions for himself; for he is fully persuaded Roman catholicism is doomed to an entire and eternal overthrow before "1900" will be reached; and that the saints will be glorified with Christ their King. Protestant churches, possibly, may, for a short time, be given over to a bloody persecution (for their pride and worldliness) by Romanists. That may be God's method to purify those churches; but Christ will very soon end the trial by the utter overthrow of the bloody power.

CHRIST THE FOUNDATION.

THE Christian system of religion has for its central idea, its "corner stone," Christ. Take Christ out of that system, and nothing remains more valuable than may be found in many, perhaps any, of the old systems of philosophy.

It it be not true that the hope of the future rests upon Christ what hope has the Christian more than the pagan? Yet the tendency of modern reform, so called, seems to be toward a system that rejects Christ. There seems to be a growing feeling that Christ and his teachings were very good for the barbarous of fifteen hundred years ago, but we have "progressed" beyond the need of such doctrines—never stopping to look at the sea of blood that proves barbarous still. True, we have sermons full of fine sayings, and apt illustrations. All are advised to be truthful and honest; and it is shown that the upright and virtuous are happier than the vicious. This is very well. It is called "practical" preaching. It is practical in a certain sense. It is just such teaching as the old philosophers presented. It may be better told; there may be new and better illustrations; but there is no Christ in it. There is nothing in it that supplies the wants of a soul desolate on account of sin; of one who sees death before him and is filled with an insatiable longing for immortality.

No matter how excellent may be the character in all that is good, amiable, and worthy of admiration; there yet comes from the very depths of our being a voice that will be heard, and asks, "If a man die, shall he live again?" With this question before the mind everything else becomes insignificant. How small is the import of a few years, if this life be all? Better well spent than ill, but however spent, it is soon finished, and we pass to a future of darkness and doubt. All the "practical" teaching of morality and virtue for six thousand years has not sent one ray of light through this darkness, or removed one doubt from a living soul burdened with the fear of death. To him who looks beyond the present what can be practical that does not promise eternal life? and where is that promise but in Christ?

What, then, do we need? Not a philosophical morality which has its motive in the happiness resulting from virtue, but a Christian morality with Christ for its foundation. All virtue is to be commended, but that only is Christian virtue which grows out of a union with Christ.

Multitudes speak well of the Christian religion, and yet discard Christ. Men listen to a gospel without Christ in it, and say, How beautiful the precept, how wise the counsel, how excellent the man! This is not the gospel of eternal life. Christ and him crucified is not its burden. It does not look toward a resurrection; it cannot save from death. *

THE OLD MAN'S MEMORY.

An old man's memory is the rubbish of to-day, but the riches of yesterday.

IN conversation yesterday with an old man who has passed a long and useful life, and with whom it is now Indian summer, we were impressed with a remark he incidentally made. He had seen the opening of nearly seventy springs; at first the winters came and went, but by-and-by unmelted snow-flakes lingered on his hair, and he saw them drifting over the graves of one after another, whose feet, with his, had brushed the morning dews together. At last they whitened over his old wife's resting place—over her who knew him when the shadows fell to the westward and "the day was before" them both—who never thought him old—though all the world pronounced him so. Everybody said when she died, "It is a terrible blow to the old man" and a few did all they could to make him forget,—but there was no need of that,—"For," said he, "they didn't seem to know where the blow fell, they didn't think how much I missed somebody to help me remember." REBECCA.—The Advance.

SKETCH OF LUTHER—BY CARLYLE.

A COARSE, rugged, plebeian face it was, with great crags of cheek-bones—a wild amount of passionate energy and appetite! But in his dark eyes were floods of sorrow; and the deepest melancholy and sweetness were there. Often did there seem to meet in Luther the very opposite points in man's character. He, for example, for whom Richter had said his words were half battles, he, when he first began to preach, suffered unheard agony. "Oh, Dr. Staupitz, Dr. Staupitz," said he to the Vicar-General of his order, "I cannot do it, I shall die in three months. Indeed, I cannot do it."

Dr. Staupitz, a wise and considerate man, said upon this: "Well, Sir Martin, if you must die, you must; but remember that they need good heads up yonder, too. So preach, man, preach, and then live or die, as it happens." So Luther preached and lived, and he became, indeed, one great whirlwind of energy to work without resting in this world; and also before he died he wrote very many books—books in which the true man is found, for in the midst of all they denounced and cursed, what touches of tenderness lay. Look at the Table Talk, for example.

THE POWER OF PRAYER.

THE Bible account of the power of prayer is the best we can have. Jacob prays—the angel is conquered; Esau's revenge is changed to fraternal love. Joseph prays—he is delivered from the prison of Egypt. Moses prays—Amalek is discomfited: Israel triumphs. David prays—Ahithophel goes out and hangs himself. Asa prays—Israel gains a glorious victory. Jehosaphat prays—God turns away his anger and smiles. Elisha prays—the waters of the Jordan are divided; a child is restored to life. Isaiah prays—one hundred and eighty-four thousand Assyrians are dead. Hezekiah prays—the sundial is turning back; his time is prolonged. Mordecai prays—Haman is hanged; Israel is free. Nehemiah prays—the king's heart is softened in a moment. Ezra prays—the walls of Jerusalem begin to rise. The church prays—the Holy Ghost is poured out. The church prays again—Peter is delivered by an angel. Paul and Silas pray—the prison shakes: the door opens; every man's bands are loosed.

BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS

SIX SERMONS on the Inquiry. Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on CHRIST THE LIFE-GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER; OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the true teachings of the BIBLE is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.

No. 1. EARTH, NOT HEAVEN, is to be the inheritance of the saints. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS. Price 5 cents.

No. 4. THE SOUL SAVED OR LOST. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS. Price 5 cents.

No. 5. MORAL DEPRAVITY; by GEO. STORRS. Price 5 cents.

No. 7. DOOM OF THE UNGODLY: OR THE WICKED DEAD REMAIN ETERNALLY UNDER DEATH'S DOMINION. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS. Price 5 cents.

No. 8. THE WAGES OF SIN; by a Presbyterian Clergyman. Price 5 cents.

No. 10. LETTERS TO A CLERGYMAN; or Life only through Christ not a heresy; by Dr. J. K. FINLEY, Pittsburg, Pa. Price 5 cents.

The foregoing tracts are 16 pages octavo. They will be sold at $3 per 100, or, fifty cents per dozen, free of postage.

No. 9. THE ESSENTIAL BAPTISM; by the EDITOR of the Bible Examiner, 32 pages. Price 7 cents.

The following are 12mo. Tracts, of 24 pages each

MAN'S NATURE AND DESTINY; or the Animal Man and the Spiritual Man. A Sermon by GEO STORRS. Price 5 cents.

THE ATONEMENT, by GEO. STORRS, and THE GOSPEL HOPE, by the same; both works now printed in one Tract. Price 5 cents.

CAMPAIGN DOCUMENTS.

1. LIFE FROM THE DEAD, ETC. .... 5 cents.
2. A DEFENCE OF THE BIBLE .... 3 "
3. THE JUDGMENT .... 2 "
4. THE LIVING SOUL .... 2 "

No discount can be made on these works, and the purchaser must pay the postage; which, on the four together, is four cents.

Unless attention is paid to all these matters confusion and delay are inevitable.

THE LIFE VIEWS.

BY DR. J. K. FINLEY.

BEFORE entering upon the investigation I have proposed, I will suggest some thoughts which afford strong presumptive evidence that the commonly-received views do not properly represent the divine mind. That the all-wise God, who knew the real difficulty and danger by which our race was beset, should have devised a plan for our relief which has thus far proved incompetent to accomplish the results he intended, is not to be believed; and the presumption is that some important mistake has been made in understanding the nature of our danger and applying the remedy. There can be no doubt but that in some way, by some fault of our own, the benevolent designs of our heavenly Father have been partially frustrated. The late excellent Doctor Vinet, the Chalmers of Switzerland, as he has been called, felt this difficulty in all its force, and has but expressed a feeling common to very many thinking persons, who have reflected seriously on the reasons for the small success of the gospel, when he said, "Even now, after eighteen centuries of Christianity, we are very probably involved in some enormous error of which Christianity will at future time make us ashamed."

Now, we can conceive of no error which would be so likely to produce such extensively injurious effects as that, which imputes to a perfectly just and merciful God and Father, who delights in revealing himself to us under the appellation of love, the purpose of consigning to torments inconceivably great, and of never-ending duration, unnumbered millions of men, women and children, his own creatures, for the offences of a few days or years.

Judged by the light of reason and all established principles of justice, no doctrine could be more dishonoring to the character of God; and to an unprejudiced mind, it can be demonstrated from His own word that it is without any foundation in truth.

We believe, and with good reason, that the doctrines advocated by the destructionists were the doctrines universally held by the church in the first century, and that the heathenish and unscriptural dogma of the soul's inherent immortality came in with the heathen converts in the second century, especially those from the school of Plato, and was at first a concession to their prejudices, in order to secure their favorable regard toward Christianity.

It is a fact well known to students of ecclesiastical history, that in the third century there was a body of Christians in Arabia who held the doctrine of the non-immortality of the soul, and other doctrines flowing from that belief. They do not appear, however, to have exercised much influence in the church, and were lost sight of in the rapid growth and increase of the great anti-christian hierarchy, subsequently developed into the Papacy.

Some two hundred years ago the same doctrines attracted a good deal of attention in England, and were ably advocated by Rev. Samuel Bourne, of Birmingham, and others, whose names have not reached us, although their writings have, under fictitious titles. I have seen and read with much interest and instruction, several of these essays.

The celebrated Thomas Hobbes advocated similar doctrines, and because of his materialistic views, was denounced as an infidel, and his name is always associated with those of open and undisguised infidels and atheists. While he is invariably spoken of as "Hobbes, the infidel," the fact is, he was a sincere believer in the Bible as a revelation from God, a member in full communion with the Church of England, the associate and intimate friend of the most excellent men of his day, and at last died in the firm faith of his interest in the Saviour, and in the hope of a resurrection to eternal life.

Orthodoxy, finding itself unable to refute his arguments drawn from the Bible, reason, and common sense, adopted its usual tactics, having the masses of professed Christians on their side, and taking advantage of ignorance and prejudice, they undertook, by misrepresentation and calumny, to blacken his character, and raising the mad dog cry of heretic, infidel, etc., they succeeded in their unhallowed efforts. The testimony of all history goes to prove that orthodoxy has always been exclusive and tyrannical. From the time when at the bar of Pilate it cried out, "Crucify him, crucify him," down to the present moment, it has shown itself bigoted and intolerant, and when it had the power, persecuting and cruel. It virtually claims to be infallible, and proscribes all who dare to dissent from its dogmas. In its various attempts to stop the progress of our views, it has resorted to base insinuations as to our motives, slanderous assertions against personal character, misstatements of our doctrines, low sarcasms, contemptuous sneers, degrading epithets, and its silly and, thank God, now-a-days, harmless cry of heretic, infidel, etc. Such has been, not always, but too often, the course pursued both from the pulpit and the religious press; but almost invariably both pulpit and press have been refused for respectful replies to their attacks. We know, however, that the many good men, who give their time and labors to the revival of the grand and glorious doctrines of the ancient church, feel grateful to their adorable Master that they are counted worthy to suffer shame and reproach for his truth's sake. It is matter of thankfulness, too, that we live in an age of investigation, when we feel that it is both a duty and a privilege to "prove all things and hold fast that which is good;" an age of progress, when things new, as well as old, are to be brought out of the treasury of God's word. We believe the command of our great leader is as imperative now as when he uttered it. "Search the Scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life, and they are they which testify of me." We believe we shall be held responsible for believing and obeying the teachings of these Scriptures, but not at all for disbelieving what others choose to tell us they mean. With many thanks, Mr. Editor, for the kind offer of your paper, I shall next week take up the constitution and nature of man as taught us in the Scriptures.

J. K. FINLEY.

THE DEVIL OF REVELATION.

IN order to ascertain who the devil of the book of Revelation is, the book, or that portion of it containing his history, must be read. The twelfth chapter ushers him in to our notice. It must not be forgotten that Jesus is showing John what is coming to pass shortly.

Rev. xii., 1—"And there appeared a great wonder in heaven; a woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars: and she being with child, cried travailing in birth, and pained to be delivered. And there appeared another wonder in heaven; and behold a great red DRAGON, having seven heads and ten horns, and seven crowns upon his heads. And his tail drew the third part of the stars of heaven, and did cast them to the earth."

To my mind there is no more evidence that this dragon is the popular devil, than that the woman is the virgin Mary.

"And the DRAGON stood before the woman which was ready to be delivered, for to devour the child as soon as it should be born. And she brought forth a man child, who was to rule all nations with a rod of iron: and her child was caught up unto God, and to his throne. And the woman fled into the wilderness, where she hath a place prepared of God, that they should feed her there a thousand two hundred and three score days. And there was war in heaven: Michael and his angels fought against the DRAGON; and the DRAGON fought and his angels, and prevailed not; neither was their place found any more in heaven. And the great DRAGON was cast out, that old serpent called the devil, and satan, which deceiveth the whole world; he was cast out into the earth, and his angels were cast out with him."

John thus gives us a complete description of this devil, and we have found that he was "great" in size, "red" in color, and having no less than "seven heads and ten horns," with seven crowns upon his heads. His tail must have been prodigious both in length and strength, for it "drew the third part of the stars of heaven, and did cast them to the earth."

If people are determined to have the popular devil in the book of Revelation, they must not alter John's description of him, but take his word concerning the heads, horns, crowns, tail, etc. If they are tempted not so to do, they must not forget what Rev. xxii., 19 saith.

This same dragon is the devil that "is come down . . . having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time. And when the DRAGON saw that he was cast unto the earth, he persecuted the woman."

The next chapter brings to view a beast which came out of the sea, which had as many heads and horns as the dragon, with ten crowns upon its horns, "and upon his heads the names of blasphemy." This beast was like a leopard, his feet were like the feet of a bear, and his mouth was like a lion's.

The seven-headed dragon called the "devil" and "satan," gave this seven-headed leopard-beast his power, his seat, and great authority. Next, in the same chapter, we read of another beast that came up out of the earth. This one had two horns like a lamb, and spoke like a dragon. This beast played the part of false prophet to the leopard beast.

The sixteenth chapter brings again to view the dragon and the two beasts. "And I saw three unclean spirits like frogs come out of the mouth of the DRAGON, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet. For they are the spirits of devils, which go forth unto the kings of the earth," etc. If the dragon is the popular devil, then the beast and false prophet who have spirits of devils coming out of their mouths, just as truly as the dragon has one coming out of his, must be own brothers, or very near relations, at least, to him. But, if our friends are right, then, as John shows us that the spirit of the popular devil leaves him, it might imply his death, via. the popular theory. However, though the spirit of a devil came out of the dragon, it seems that he still lived.

The twentieth chapter brings the dragon again to view, where we learn that he was bound a thousand years, after which he was loosed from prison, and then went to war against the camp of the saints, is defeated and cast into the lake of fire where the beast and false prophet were cast.

This short history of John's dragon-devil is submitted in love by F. H. BURBANK.

THE NEW BIRTH.

THOSE who are advocating the mortal resurrection theory are virtually denying their own theory of the new birth. The position is generally taken among Adventists (so called,) that the new birth takes place at the resurrection from the grave to immortality. Jesus was the first who experienced the new birth. In Col. i., 18, Paul says that God's dear Son was the first born from the dead. How could this be if the new birth is not a resurrection from the grave, and to be made immortal at the same moment. Lazarus had been dead one day longer than Jesus yet he was not the first born from the dead, for he was not brought forth immortal.

Again: Paul says in Acts xxvi., 23, "That Christ should suffer and that he should be the FIRST that should rise from the dead," etc. How could this be, if he was not brought forth from the tomb immortal? He was not the first raised from the dead mortal; for he raised a number, including one who had been dead longer than himself. Is it possible that Jesus came out of the tomb alive and lived forty days before he was born from the dead? Will some of the mortal resurrectionists explain this matter? I am confused if I look at their views as truth. Was there a change in our Lord immediately after he came out of the tomb? There certainly was. Mary was well acquainted with him. She saw him bow his sacred head and die. She knew he was put into the tomb. She went early in the morning to the sepulchre. She saw he was not there; yet she "knew not the Scripture that he must rise from the dead." Does that mean that she knew not that he must go up into the sky? In Mark xvi., 6, 7, the angel told the disciples, saying, "He is not here he is risen and gone into Galilee." Does rising from the dead mean going up into the air as mortal resurrectionists teach? If it does, then our Lord did not go into Galilee for over forty days after he came out of the tomb; and he had to descend again from heaven in order to go into Galilee. According to this interpretation, He made his second advent from heaven in a very short time after he rose from the dead.

His appearance was very different after he came out of the tomb; for Mary did not know him the third day after his crucifixion. What caused this marked change in him if he had not commenced an immortal and spirit life? Again: while two of the disciples were going to Emmaus, he appeared in another form. They did not know him. How was this, if he had not then been born again? He could go into the room, "the door being shut," in a different manner from what he ever did before his death. There are many circumstances which transpired between his resurrection and ascension that go to prove that he came out of the tomb immortal and bloodless.

Again: His priesthood after the order of Aaron was changed at his coming out of the tomb. He was then a Priest after the order of Melchisedek. He could not be a priest after the order of Melchisedek until he came into the possession of the "power of an endless life." This could not be until he was made immortal. If Christ and the saints are raised from the grave mortal, then the same body is raised that is sown. But Paul says, "Thou sowest not that body which shall be." I apprehend that reference to the nature, and not to the identity, is what Paul meant. That which is raised is not that mortal, blood body, which is sown; but it is raised "incorruptible." The word incorruptible in 1 Cor. xv., 52, is aphthartos; the same word used and applied to God in 1 Tim. i., 17. "Now unto the King Eternal, Immortal" (aphthartos); the same words that are applied to God, the incorruptible, immortal God, are applied to the saints at their first coming out of the grave; and to the living saints, that are changed after the immortal resurrection of the righteous dead. As Christ was raised from the tomb immortal, he being the first fruits of them that sleep, they too must be brought forth immortal; for the harvest must follow in the same train as the first fruits.

As the mortal resurrection theory denies the statement of the Scriptures, it appears to be a dangerous doctrine, and I hope that all who look at it, will examine it carefully before embracing it. H. J. SWEETLAND.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

FROM WM. C. STONE.

BOSTON, MASS., NOV. 30, 1868.

BR. STORRS: We have of late heard the efforts of several preachers to crowd proof of a resurrection of all the human race. Br. Henry Pratt a few Sundays ago, took his text in Acts xxvi. "Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead." He showed the old Scriptures taught a resurrection; and said that the term death and sleep were the same. "Your fathers are dead"—"they are dead." Then he said, his subject would be in reference to the incredibility of the resurrection. He stated that there were particles of the body that were never lost; that many years ago, by philosphy, he had learned that there were particles in the human body that did not go to nourish any other beast or animal; though the beast might eat up and devour the body yet there were the particles kept separate: he said it was possible to have a resurrection according to philosophy; it was only the gasses that go into other bodies. He then quoted, "As the Father hath life in himself so he has given the Son to have life in himself;" then he asked, to whom will he give life but to the sheep? He said that man is mortal; that their mortal bodies would be changed, and the Spirit would do it. He quoted Romans, viii., "If the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, it shall also quicken (or make alive) your mortal bodies by that Spirit."

I thought he was right. I compared it with some of his brethren who turned this quickening to a reviving and strengthening of these mortal bodies, such as usually is done in meetings and other places when one is blessed with the Spirit. This view I fear is got up to avoid a conclusion. All are to be raised they say; but when it expressly says that a certain class named above will be made alive by that Spirit, they cannot find what is to raise the wicked, but with some it is the power of God. But do they not know that that power means no more nor anything different from the Spirit of God? Now, I would not question the wisdom by which Paul spoke; but when we are told that the Spirit will do a special work for the believer, and then told it will also do the like work for the unbeliever, I don't see the propriety in such language. Why is the quickening always connected with the believer?

H. Pratt, after stating that the thought of dying was dreadful to him, asked the question, Will any rise but the righteous? and went on to say that he was very fond of harmony in music, in singing. He believed that there was a harmony in God's word, and said, "God help me to play on this instrument harmoniously this afternoon." "Amen!" came from certain abstract readers of the word. He then quoted Heb. xi., to show that there were some who wanted a "better resurrection;" then Acts, where Paul is supposed to hope for the resurrection of the just and unjust. Then he came to Revelation, which he said was a detector of all erroneous doctrines. Chap. xx., was read to show two resurrections; then he brought Math. xii., 41, "The men of Nineveh shall rise," etc. Then he ask the question, "Do you say, they wont rise?" Then, 1 Cor. xv., "Did all die by Adam? then all will be made alive by Christ." (I thought that some Universalist would say; "Amen," to that). He stated that "Christ bought them all, and he would do with them what he had a mind to." (When he twisted the word in to by, I wondered if he had considered the word in, in the verses above; "Then those who have fallen asleep"—is it, by, here? if so, it would make Christ to be the means of their death or sleep. I question the authority to change that word. In every other place in the epistles of Paul the words in Christ are characteristic; and no one that I have heard of, who has had a Christian experience but what understands it so; but here is a vital point, and those who don't like "Life only in Christ," cling to it, and charge others with turning and twisting. If in in this verse, 22, is by, just read by in some others places, and see what harmony (of sounds) it makes. I think about the harmonious sounds, that the inhabitants of Sodom are not to be brought to life again and suffer the vengeance of eternal fire over again. The reward of sin is death; and if they are not dead, but only sleep, as some prominent ones say, what penalty has Adam to pay that he has not paid? If he shall rise from the dust of the ground, convinced that he had broken God's law, and must suffer for it by fire from heaven (a penalty that he never heard of before,) I think this would not sound very harmonious; and it might not be according to his understanding at the time he was tried and sentenced, six thousand years ago. That was he should "surely die," lose his existence; cease to be; become extinct; "return back to the dust of the ground," "reap corruption," and worms.

NOTHING is more common than for persons to mistake obstinacy for conscience.

"ALL NATIONS HAVE BELIEVED IT."

IT is a frequent assertion of those who advocate the doctrine of the soul's natural immortality, that "all nations of every age have believed it." The following quotations may possibly lead some to see their mistake in this direction.

In his work on "The Advantages and Necessity of the Christian Revelation," Prof. Leland remarks:—"What that great man CICERO says of the philosophers of his time is remarkable. In that celebrated treatise, where he sets himself to prove the immortality of the soul, he represents the contrary as the prevailing opinion; that there were crowds of opponents, not the Epicureans only, but, which he could not account for, those that were the most learned, had that doctrine in contempt."

In Prof. Hudson's work, "Debt and Grace," we find the following quotation from SOCRATES. "Can the soul which goes to the presence of a good and wise God, (whither my soul shall shortly go) can this soul of ours, when separated from the body, be immediately dispersed and destroyed, as most men assert?"

Prof. Stuart says,—"CICERO, incomparably the most able defender of the soul's immortality of which the heathen world can yet boast, very ingenuously confesses, that after all the arguments which he had adduced in order to confirm the doctrine in question, it so fell out, that his mind was satisfied of it only when directly employed in contemplating the arguments adduced in its favor. At all other times he fell unconsciously, into a state of doubt and darkness."

Of SOCRATES, Prof. S. says—"It is notorious also that SOCRATES, the next most able advocate among the heathen for the same doctrine, has adduced arguments to establish the never-ceasing existence of the soul, which will not bear the test of examination. Such is the argument by which he endeavors to prove, that we shall always continue to exist because we always have existed; and this last proposition he labors to establish, on the ground that all our present acquisitions of knowledge, are only so many reminiscences of what we knew in a state of existence antecedent to our present one." (See his Exegetical Essays, on words relating to future punishment.)

Dr. Morrison says of the followers of Confucius who have dedicated 1,560 temples to him,—"And this sect of the learned, which is so miserably deficient respecting the deity, is also entirely silent resdectiug the immortality of the soul, as well as future rewards and punishments . . . of a separate state of existence they do not speak."

The common assertion is thus disproved. "All nations of every age" have not admitted the natural immortality of the soul. Jesus has made the matter plain. He is the fountain of immortality. There can be no immortality out of Christ. Yours, seeking for immortality. F. H. BURBANK.

HERALD OF LIFE Office.

THE BIBLE.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., Nov. 29, 1868.

BR. STORRS: What pleasure it gives one while patiently waiting and longing for the coming of the blessed Redeemer, to obtain some proof from quarters where we least expect it, that our faith is not a myth, but founded upon a rock that no tempest can remove. A few days since while reading the contents of the Union (a daily paper published in this place) my eye fell upon a short piece entitled "Abiding Word." I was so well pleased with it that I thought it might be of interest to the readers of the HERALD.

LUCY J. HASTINGS.

THE ABIDING WORD.—No army ever survived so many battles as the Bible; no citadel ever stood so many seiges; no rock was ever blistered by so many hurricanes and so swept by storms. And yet it stands. It has seen the rise and downfall of Daniel's four empires. Assyria bequeaths a few mutilated figures to the riches of the British Museum. Media and Persia, like Babylon, which they conquered, have been weighed in the balance and long ago found wanting. Greece fairly survives in its historic name: "'Tis living Greece no more;" and the iron dome of the Cæsars is held in precarious occupation by a feeble hand. And yet the book that foretells all this survived. While nations, kings, philosophers, systems, institutions, have died away, the Bible now exercises man's deepest thoughts, is examined by the keenest intellect, stands revered by the highest tribunals, is more read, and sifted, and debated more devoutly, and more vehemently assailed, more defended and more denied, more industriously translated and freely given to the world, more honored and abused than any book the world ever saw. It survives all changes, itself unchanged; it sees all things decay, itself incorruptible; it sees myriads of other books engulfed in the stream of time, yet it is borne along triumphantly on the wave; and it will be borne along until the mystic angel will plant his foot upon the sea, and swear by him that liveth for ever and ever, that time shall be no longer. "For all flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man as the flowers of the grass. The grass withereth and the flower thereof fadeth away; but the word of the Lord endured forever."

EXPULSION OF THE JESUITS FROM SPAIN.

ONE of the significant acts of the Provisional government in Spain, inaugurated by the recent revolution, is the expulsion of the Jesuits and the confiscation to the state of all their property. If this were done out of religious antipathy and persecution we should utterly condemn it. The Romanists have as much right to their belief, mode of worship, and form of ecclesiastical government, as Protestants, and should be protected in their right as carefully, (we might even say more carefully) where they are a small minority as where they are the overwhelming majority. If therefore a Protestant government in Spain had banished the Jesuits for religious reasons, and confiscated their property, we should cry out against it as a sin against all liberty and modern civilization. But we know not that there are a thousand Protestants in all Spain, and the act in question is done by professed Romanists and in the name of a nation more universally Romish than even the Irish.

What, then, does such an act of severity mean? It means that the Jesuits' not content with the Papacy in the church, or with the mass and the worship of the Virgin, have so meddled with the politics of the land as to have been the instigators of the tyranny under which the nation has so long groaned, the trusted counsellors of the infamous queen, and the denouncers and persecutors of all who incline to free institutions. They are punished, then, not for religious tenets, but for the gravest political crimes. The friends of liberty in Spain know their deadly enemies by as sure an instinct as sheep know wolves. Retribution has at last come upon these wolves in sheeps' clothing, and few tears will be wasted over their misfortunes. The revolutionists have been content with sentencing to exile; the Jesuits, in a similar case, would have inflicted death.

Let this be a warning against the attempts of Romish ecclesiastics in this land to gain ecclesiastical ends by an alliance with a corrupt political party, such as they appear to have made in the City of New York. They are at liberty to exert all the moral influence upon their members, as to political duties, which any religious teachers may claim, but when it comes to be understood by the people of the United States, that it is sought to make the State tributary to the church of Rome by special patronage, gifts or concessions, and that Romanism means political intrigue and corruption as well as peculiar religious views, there will be a reaction as fatal to all Papal plans in this land, as the revolution in Spain has been to Jesuit domination.
—The Advance.

"SERVE THE LIVING GOD."

WE must be children of God before we can serve him; and how do we become children of God? By believing in Jesus. But then, having thus become the children of God, it well becomes us to seek to be imitators of the Lord Jesus Christ; to love and serve that Blessed One who died for us on the cross; to follow him who so lovingly and perfectly served the Father.

But it is not enough to begin this course—to set out well. This is comparatively easy; but the great thing is to go on—week after week, month after month, year after year, in the same steady, even course of service. It is this patient endurance to the end, which so greatly glorifies God, and which is, therefore, of such deep moment.

Thus it was with our adorable Lord Jesus! He "set his face as a flint" throughout his perfect course of service, though he well knew at the outset that the end was the cross! And thus it was when, knowing the shame and the suffering and death that awaited him there, that blessed One, "steadfastly set his face to go to Jesusalem!"

But, beloved in Christ, in order that we may, in some feeble measure imitate our adorable Lord in this, his spirit of patient continuance in well-doing, we need to continue in prayer and in meditation on the Word of God, so that our souls may be constantly nourished and strengthened. There can be no fruitful service, except we ourselves are happy in the Lord.

Our first thought, day by day, should not be "What may I do?" "What work can I undertake?" but rather, "How may I get my own soul fed, and be happy in the Lord?"

Deeply important is it to win souls, to help on our fellow-believers, or to succour the needy; but of greater importance still is it that our own souls should be first fed and nourished by reading and meditating on the Word of God, and rendered happy through believing intercourse with God, so that out of us "may flow rivers of living water." There is no reason why this should not be the case with us habitually. How needful is it, continually to pray, "Hold Thou me up, and I shall be safe."

This service of the Father is a most blessed service. For myself I would gladly live fifty years longer, if the Lord Jesus should tarry, to serve him in this world. It is such an honor and blessed privilege to be allowed to do any little thing for One who has so loved us.

I have said it to myself a thousand times, "If I had tried with all my might to please myself, and make myself happy in the service of satan, I could not possibly have known a hundreth part of the peace and joy which I have experienced in the Lord's service."

He who speaks to you (and I say this for the sake of any of my dear friends here present who are as yet unreconciled to God,) he who speaks to you has tried both services. With all his might he served the world, and sought happiness there. In the ball-room, the theatre, at the tavern and the card-table—there was no place of merriment or sinful amusement where poor young George Muller was not. But I never found happiness in these. I found it, at last, in the wounds of Jesus, in that precious blood which he poured forth so freely on the cross for poor guilty sinners. Then I tasted true pleasure, and since then my happiness has been increasing. The older I get, the happier I am; the more gray hairs increase, the more do my peace and joy in God increase. Every year is a happier one than any that have gone before it.

Now I go to rest at night, and lay my head on my pillow, knowing that if the Lord Jesus were to come, or if it were my last night on earth, I should awake in his blessed presence.

Perhaps you may think, "Ah, he feels so, because he is a good man." But no; I am in myself, but a poor, vile, wretched sinner; but I trust in Jesus, I depend on his precious blood, and thus I obtain these unspeakable blessings. And in the same way may any of my dear unconverted friends and fellow-sinners become partakers of them.

I bless God for these meetings. I bless him for allowing so many of his dear children to come together this evening. And now, beloved in Christ, let us one and all seek to aim after this, that we do not leave this place without the holy, godly purpose of our souls being confirmed—to seek to labor for God. Let us also especially seek to cultivate a Christ-like affection one for another, to look less at the weaknesses and infirmities of our fellow-disciples, and more at our own, and to be continually seeking for the image of Christ in each other.

TO GAIN ETERNAL LIFE.

THIS is a work which demands the constant exercise of all the powers of our being. It will not do to make it an incidental object of effort: it must be the first. When the poet would create a great work which will live for ages, he makes that the object of all his mental strength during the best period of his life. Experience, mind, feeling, occurrences of life are all bent in that one direction. Everything is compelled to give tribute in this matter. In like manner ought every being to act who would bring about the greatest of results, Eternal Life. Diligence, it has been said, is genius: it is religion as well. Eternal Life is not a blessing which falls upon our path as we eagerly follow the things of sense. The new creation must be sought with diligence. We must sell all if we would purchase the pearl of great price. A. H. H.

The foregoing excellent sentiments we find in The Advance. In a few words the writer has set the greatest and most important subject and work before us. O that men—Christian men, even—felt and realized the value of Eternal Life and would put forth the energy which should correspond with the immensity of the value of the object to be obtained. How would the objects which now employ the minds, time, and energies of most people, dwindle into childish folly if they were duly impressed with the value and importance of Eternal Life. Though that Life is the "gift of God," it will be bestowed only on such as prize it above all earthly objects.

ONLY JESUS.

I HEARD the experience of a converted Catholic lady, which should be published throughout the land. Bitterly opposed by her parents, she was compelled to attend our church without their knowledge, where she found peace to her troubled soul. On the day of her conversion her mother had followed her to the church with the intention of compelling her to return home, but as she entered the house of God the congregation were singing,

"Hide me, O, my Saviour, hide."

When the poor penitent said: "Jesus hides me, my mother can't find me." And the Saviour did hide her beneath his protecting wings, and to-day she is a shining light. Her description of the confessional was remarkable. She had often gone and confessed, but did not feel that she was a sinner, and when the priest said, "Your sins be forgiven you," she knew they were not, because she did not feel that they were. She could not have faith in the Virgin Mary, for she felt the "Mother of God" could not save her, but when Christ was revealed to her understanding her faith saved her. I have never before felt so forcibly that the poor Papists are not saved, and that they have devotion without godliness. They confess but are not penitent; they worship but know not whom; they trust in Mary but not in her Son, Jesus Christ. How can such be saved? Will God wink at their ignorance? Are they not rather like other sinners, called to the same conditions and appointed to be judged by the same laws?—Dr. Newman.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 9, 1868.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

"THE FIRST OF JANUARY."

OUR few subscribers who have not paid for the paper in advance, for the present volume, will remember the point of time to which we consented to wait is just at hand. If they would not fail of the first numbers of 1869 let them not fail to send the amount due for this volume. We send out no "Bills," and have no duns to make. We know if any wish the paper continued they will inform us by or before January. Let us hear from you.

"PROF. MATTISON."

THE person named above, was well known to the readers of the Bible Examiner some fourteen years ago, in his controversy with the EDITOR of that periodical. Years have since passed, and the Professor rose to a "D. D." in the Methodist E. Church, and sent out one large volume and also a small one on the "Immortality of the Soul." How much the M. E. Church values those works we do not know. As it seems to have adopted them we shall hereafter hold it responsible for the inaccuracies contained in them; and hope that body, or its "Agents," will have the magnanimity to correct the misstatements in them, when fairly pointed out. The Author's responsibility has ceased. We are informed by the papers that "Rev. Hiram Mattison, D. D., died in Jersey City, N. J., Nov. 24th, of pneumonia." It is stated by the Christian Advocate that, "he died in hope of eternal life." No one can rejoice more than ourselves to find that "hope" realized in his case. We were pleased to see the language used, "In hope of eternal life." That life is "the gift of God;" not inherent.

VOTING IT DOWN.

WHEN men fail in argument it is not unfrequently the case that they resort to calling names; the cry of "Mad Dog" they seem to suppose will answer as a sure defence against a theory they cannot refute in open, manly and Christian conflict.

It seems strange to thinking men, that others who have been travelling about the land annoying the sects or denominations of professed Christians, by preaching doctrines which have been "a cause of discord," etc., should all at once come to the conclusion that such a course is very wrong. But so it is, and always has been. When those who have battled for the right, against all sects and denominations, to promulgate what they believed to be important truths, and commence organizing churches, and their preachers have stereotyped their views of truth, they commence shutting out any further advances in knowledge, and fence against its approach by uniting their churches into "Conferences," and begin the old sectarian cry of somebody's "preaching doctrine" among them that "is a cause of discord," etc., hence "Conference" action must be had after the fashion of their predecessors, from whom they themselves had been compelled to separate, because their old religious associates would not allow them to preach among them what they honestly believed to be true; so they left them that they might enjoy liberty, and most likely denounced those sects as "popish" and "bigoted," as "opposers of the truth," etc.

We have been led to the remarks by reading the doings of the "Massachusetts State Quarterly Conference Report"—of a body of Advent believers, held in Chelsea, Oct. 20th, but just published in the World's Crisis.

It would seem these doctrine of "No future Life out of Christ" is making inroads among them, as the doctrine of the Advent had in former years among other sects: so, after preliminary talk and appointing a "Committee" to see what to do, they finally had a "Report" of a "Whereas" and a "Resolution," after the old fashion of all self-constituted churches, who have taken "the seat of God, and sit in the temple of God, showing themselves that they are gods," determining what doctrines shall not be preached. The following is the Manifesto of this self-made body of Adventists, avowing themselves the true descendants of the "Correctors of Heretics." They say:

"Whereas the preaching of the doctrine that there will be no resurrection to life of those who have done evil is a cause of discord, and is deadly in its influence on the spirituality of the church; therefore,

"Resolved, That this conference disapproves of the preaching of this doctrine to the distraction and division of the church of God, and that we have no fellowship with such a course."

There now, who will dare go into their "parishes" any more to preach the hated doctrine of "No future Life out of Christ?"

This preamble and resolution has the genuine "mark of the beast" upon it: most perfect Jesuitism. Look at it. The "conference disapproves of the preaching of this doctrine to the distraction and division of the church of God," etc. Do they mean to say that they graciously grant us the privilege of preaching "this doctrine" if we will only do it so easy as to cause no conviction of its truth? The father of lies never asked much more of any gospel preacher than that. "O, yes; you may preach the gospel, only do not do it so as to make any one believe you mean what you say, for that would disturb some sleepy soul who has gone quietly to rest, and thinks he knows all that is needful to be known."

But "this conference" may mean not to be so easy in this matter. Possibly they wish it understood they exclude the doctrine of "No future Life out of Christ" entirely from their self-made churches; which they would have us believe is "the church of God." That sounds well; but Rome is in the field, and has been for many long centuries, to keep the "Mass. State Conference of Adventists" from wearing that appellation without disputing its claim.

Where was MILES GRANT during that famous conference at Chelsea? We ask this question because he said, in his sermon in the "Life Tent," at Springfield, last August, that "some people complained of others making divisions and discord by introducing doctrines opposed to our views." Said he," There would be no division if you did not go to fighting them. It is you who make the division by that course of proceeding."

That is just what we believe; and if Br. Grant had been at the Chelsea conference he must have made the "14," who voted for that "Preamble and Resolution;" ashamed of such action.

These opposers of the doctrine we preach, "vote" us out of all places where they choose to go; for they pass another "Resolution" as follows:

"Resolved, That it is our duty to carry the glorious truth of the coming of the Lord and the resurrection of the dead into places where it has not been preached, so far as we are able, and that we proceed to raise funds for this purpose."

Thus they give themselves liberty to go everywhere preaching their views; no matter what "divisions" or "distractions" it may make in other churches: but woe to those who go into the same places, because they do "not follow us!" and they make "division of the church of God" of which we—of "Mass. State Conference"—are the true representatives!

They monopolize to themselves the right to "cause discord and division;" and that is to be done by preaching their peculiar tenets, among which is "the glorious truth of . . . the resurrection of the dead:" i. e., of all the dead; and some of the glorious "14" preach the mortal resurrection of saints and sinners; but that is not worth naming among these loving "14," who seem to think it a "glorious" doctrine! Its chief glory is, however, that they have been driven to connive at this mortal resurrection theory as a last resort to prevent the truth of "No future Life out of Christ" from sweeping through all their churches. But beloved, you might as well call your next conference at Niagara Falls, and pass a "Whereas and a Resolution" that the waters shall cease to flow there, as to attempt to stop the onward progress of the "glorious" Bible truth of "Life future only to those who shall live forever," and who "cannot die any more," for "they are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection," Luke xx.

This last effort at Chelsea, Mass., we venture to guess will make the Life views flow more freely and more sweepingly than ever before. "Votes" do not avail much, unless they can command the civil arm, papacy like, to use fire and sword. We shall keep as calmly and as fearlessly proclaiming the blessed truth of "Life future only in Christ" as if no such event had ever occurred as that of "14" well meaning brethren voting on the question. We are "in nothing terrified by" such manifestoes; they harm no one but the authors.

DANGER OF POPULARITY.

SOME twenty years ago, Rev. Luther Lee, then a prominent minister in the Wesleyan church, founded by himself, and other prominent ministers from the methodist Episcopal church, wrote a work entitled "Lee on the Soul." In 1850 the work had become popular, even with the old church from which Mr. Lee had separated. At that time he was Editor of "The True Wesleyan," the organ of the Wesleyan church, and we noticed the the approbation he was receiving as follows:

PILATE AND HEROD FRIENDS: Or, "Lee on the Soul." The True Wesleyan says, "All denominations agree in commending it [Lee's book] as a valuable addition to religious literature." It then proceeds to give "Notices from the Religious Press." Among those notices we see three "Episcopal Methodist" papers. Against Episcopal methodism Br. Lee and his associates have kept up a tremendous war from the outset of Wesleyan methodism: nothing hardly could be worse and more despotic than Episcopacy or "Bishops," in their opinion. But it seems Dagon, or immortal-soul-ism, is in danger; and hated Episcopacy is invoked to commend a work in its defence. Very well; we have no objection. You perceive, Luther, the use of "Episcopacy" may be seen in more than one case. One of these invoked "Bishops," says of Br. Lee's book, "especial attention is given to the refutation of the doctrine of the annihilation of the wicked," etc. It adds, "the subject is thoroughly treated, presenting a perfect antidote to the false teaching of Storrs and his disciples." Surely we are gone for it now! "A PERFECT ANTIDOTE"!! That is—A perfect remedy! How perfectly harmless "the false teaching of Storrs" is now! Why, Episcopacy has discovered "the tree of life;" for "Lee on the soul" is a perfect antidote." Well, Luther, probably you may get a "Cardinal's hat" sent you yet for this labor; for if immortal-soulism falls, the "Mother of harlots" falls along with it: and if you have really found the "patent" remedy—the "perfect antidote"—for the doctrine we advocate, the Pope cannot be far behind the lesser bishops in acknowledging the service you have rendered him. We shall keep our eye on Rome.

This we wrote in 1850. Our prophecy in part, is at length accomplished. Luther Lee has made peace with Episcopacy and returned to the old church; and, if we are not mistaken, he has "D. D." added to his name; which is as near a "Cardinal's hat" as Protestantism can go. After all the "perfect antidote" fell harmless at our feet, and we have gone on our way as easily as if no such "patent medicine" had ever been discovered. A number of like "perfect antidotes" have appeared since, but they all fail of arresting the onward progress of the terrible malady of "No LIFE OUT OF CHRIST." We may never get to be a "D. D." Besides, it is rather too late in life to think of it at the age of 72.

CHRONOLOGY: A SHORT METHOD.

MANY are searching to find out the age of the world, and when the famous six thousand years will end. Zion's Herald has the following, in last week's issue.

This is a most important personal item:

If Adam's life had been spared, it is said he would have been 5,863 years old on the 13th of September last.

Where is the family Bible from whose register this information is extracted? How much younger was Eve than her husband? And what were the dates of the births, baptisms, marriages and deaths of their children? Let us have the whole register, with the photographs of the family. All their children will want them for their albums.

We unite with Zion's Herald in asking for the "register" from which Adam's age is known. And will the author of the statement tell us how much older the world is than Adam? Because, if the world is to last just 6,000 years, and is no older than Adam, then it is to run on 137 years longer before the consummation; a terrible time for those to wait who are in a hurry for the end.

However, the above statement of Adam's age is just about as sensible as many attempts to find out the definite time of an event of which the Saviour has said, "Take ye heed, watch and pray: for ye know not when the time is." Prophetic events show us when it "is near." That is all the authority we have for knowing its approach. Let us then obey our Lord's injunction, "WATCH and PRAY."

INQUISITORIAL.

AT the "Mass. State Quarterly Conference," at Chelsea, recently, a Br., who had been "reported as believing in the doctrine of the non-resurrection of the wicked dead," it seems was called to an account; for, says the "Conf. Report,"

He said he felt "that the great truth of the soon coming of Jesus should be kept prominent; and we should labor to get ready and get the people ready to meet that event. He never had said that he believed the wicked dead would not be raised. If Jesus had said all the dead saints should hear his voice and come forth, then he should preach it; but as Jesus did not say that, but, as Jesus did say, 'all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth,' he had to believe what Jesus said about it."

Thus the Br. had to make haste to rid his skirts of the suspicion of being tinctured with that which was so offensive to this body of ministers and laymen, who shortly after passed the "Resolution" we have noticed in another article, by which they assume that they are "the church of God," and "disapprove" of any one's preaching the non-living again of the wicked dead. We record it to the credit of the Br. who made the above statement that he voted against the inquisitorial "Preamble and Resolution" passed by the aforesaid conference: it shows that the inquisitorial screws did not crush out all his manhood. We are glad he has some self-respect left, enough to record his "vote" against such proceedings.

We think all this Br. needs is a little more light. He says, as reported by the "Report" of said "Conference," that "If Jesus had said all the dead saints should hear his voice and come forth, then he should preach it; but as Jesus did not say that," etc.

Will our good Br. consider a few thoughts on this subject, and see if Jesus did not "say that?" When a class is specified as called to do a thing, does not that exclude all others? If government specifies that all male citizens from twenty-one years old and upwards shall be legal voters, does not that law exclude all minors and women? Is there any need to make a specific law saying that these shall not vote? The answer is plain. The peculiar privilege granted the one class excludes all others.

Jesus has said, "The gates of hades (the state of the dead) shall not prevail against my church." Math. xvi., 18. Is that not equivalent to saying, hades shall prevail against all others? We think it is. Again: Jesus said, "This is the Father's will who hath sent me, that every one who seeth the Son, and believeth on him, shall have everlasting life; and I will raise him up at the last day." John vi., 40. Four times he repeats, "I will raise him up at the last day," in this one chapter. Is that not equivalent to saying, "Unbelievers I will not raise up at the last day?" We think it is.

Now put these two facts together, viz., Hades shall not prevail against the church, or "saints," for he (Christ,) will raise them up from hades, or the dead, at the last day. Do not these declarations put the question at rest of the non-revival of the unbelieving dead? We think they do. Is there a resurrection of any man from hades, after "the last day?" If so, where is the proof. John v., 28, 29, gives no such statement; nor does it speak of life to any only those who have done good. We "believe what Jesus has said about it."

We might press this subject to any extent with testimony from both the Old and New Testaments, but do not think it necessary till our opposers, who "disapprove" of our preaching, shall demonstrate there is to be a resurrection after "the last day;" and that it embraces the wicked dead. They never have, and they never can produce a text from the Book of God that says an unbeliever shall live again who has once gone down in death. They have looked in vain for a declaration of that character. They have tortured 1 Corth. xv., 22 to make it speak in harmony with their ideas on the question, but invariably, logically, land in Universalism or a mortal resurrection of saints as well as sinners, which is such a palpable contradiction of Paul's declaration that "The dead are raised incorruptible," that an impartial mind cannot fail to see the case they would make out is a desperate one, and utterly fails for lack of evidence.

THE COMING AGES.

WE have, in a previous number, given some reasons for rejecting the "World burning" theory. We do not deny but that some portions of Scripture favor that idea; but years of study have satisfied us that the general tenor of the Bible is utterly irreconcilable with it. Let us test it in one or two particulars, remembering the world burning theory makes that event to occur immediately at the second advent.

In the prophecy of Dan. ii., representing the four universal kingdoms and the final division of the fourth, it is said, "In the days of these kings [rulers in the divided state of the fourth universal one] shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom." Mark, it is "in the days of these kings"—not before or after, hence it was not set up 1800 years ago, before the divided state of the fourth kingdom; nor is it to be set up after the kings ruling over the divided state are destroyed. The Prophecy saith, expressly, "In the days of THESE KINGS the God of heaven shall set up a kingdom;" and it saith, moreover, that this kingdom "shall never be destroyed;" or, "left to other people," as the previous four universal kingdoms have been; but this "kingdom of God, set up in in the days of these kings" [the kings of the divided state] "shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms and shall stand forever." Dan. ii., 44.

Here the Bible order is clearly set forth:

1. Setting up the kingdom of God.
2. Breaking in pieces the kingdoms included under the idea of the divided state of the fourth universal kingdom.
3. Then the extension of the kingdom of God over the whole earth: "filled the whole earth;" verse 35.

The theory of burning the world runs thus:

1. Destruction of the kingdoms of this world, in a general conflagration of the heavens and earth, at the coming of Christ, and before the kingdom of God is set up.
2. Creation of new heavens and new earth.
3. Setting up the kingdom of God on the new earth.
4. Filling the new earth with His glory.

A pretty wide difference in the two theories. Both cannot be true. Which is true? We accept the order laid down by the prophet. The first parts of the prophetic history, that relating to the four universal kingdoms, have been fulfilled most literally. Are we to call in question the fact that the last and most glorious part of the prophecy is to be as literally accomplished as the previous parts? We dare not. Let God be true though all of us should be mistaken. He saith, "My word shall not return to me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please," etc. Isa. lv., 11.

Let us now compare Dan. vi., 13, 14, with Dan. ii. "I saw in the night visions, and behold one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought Him near before Him. And there was given Him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve Him: His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and His kingdom that which shall not be destroyed" . . . "All dominions shall serve and obey Him;" verse 27. The order here laid down is as follows:

1. The coming of the Son of man.
2. Giving Him dominion and glory and a kingdom.
3. All people, nations, and languages, and all dominions are to serve and obey Him, the Lord and King of the whole earth.

The world burning theory runs thus:

1. The coming of the Son of man.
2. Destruction of the heavens and earth, and all people, nations and languages, and all dominions (except the saints) by a general, or universal conflagration.
3. The creation of a new heavens and earth.
4. Then setting up the kingdom of God on the new earth.
5. The taking of the kingdom on the new earth by the saints of the Most High.
6. Then the extension of the kingdom over the whole new earth.

Who cannot see this "burning world" theory makes Christ to destroy before His reign commences, "all people, nations, languages, and dominions over which He and His saints are to reign? and it removes His reign from this earth, the very place where the Bible locates it. Think on these things, before you burn the world in a hurry.

"TRUST IN THE LORD FOREVER."

"Take therefore no thought for the morrow; for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Matth. vi., 34.

OUR Lord repeatedly warns his followers against taking anxious thoughts for the morrow. He points to the birds of the air and the lilies of the field, and draws from them the sweet lesson of simple trust, which, alas! we are so slow to learn—"Take no thought for the morrow." "Your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of these things;" therefore by anxious care we dishonor our Father, and doubt either his power or his willingness to provide for his children. Our Saviour's exhortations are necessary, not for those only who gain their daily bread with difficulty; for the rich, as well as the poor, are far too prone to take anxious thought for the morrow, and heap to themselves cares of various kinds, which engross them to the exclusion of due care for the interests of a better life; and thus the thorns spring up and choke the seed of the word in the field of their hearts. Lord deliver us from those thorns! May we remember that "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof;" and if inclined to fear that the evil will be more than sufficient, may we remember the other word of promise—"As thy day so shall thy strength be!" Alas! how many have lost the blessing of quiet peace all their lives, merely by anticipating evil! They have suffered, not from what actually came, but from what they feared might one day come.

"Does each day upon its wing
Its allotted burdens bring?
Load it not besides with sorrow
That belongeth to the morrow.
Strength is promised, strength is given,
When the heart by God is riven;
But foredate the day of woe,
And alone thou bear'st the blow."

CALENDARS.

THE Boston Type Foundry will accept our thanks for the very beautiful specimens of Calendars which it has sent us. They are truly ornamental as well as useful. We wish them a large sale.

BALAAM'S PROPHECY.

Num. xxiv, 17-19. "I shall see him, but not now: I shall behold him, but not nigh: there shall come a star out of Jacob, and a Sceptre shall rise out of Israel, and shall smite the corners of Moab, and destroy all the children of Sheth. And Edom shall be a possession, Seir also shall be a possession for his enemies, and Israel shall do valiantly. Out of Jacob shall come he that shall have dominion, and shall destroy him that remaineth of the city."

BALAAM was a heathen, and came from

"Aram," or Mesopotamia, "out of the mountains of the east" to Balak the king of the Moabites. He was cotemporary with Moses. Aaron died a short time previous to the utterance of this prophecy, in Mount Hor. His sister Miriam died just before that. The children of Israel were in the wilderness on their way from Egypt to Canaan, the promised land. The Israelites had been refused a passage through the country of Edom, by its king, and the Canaanites warred against them, taking a few prisoners. The Lord then gave the Canaanites into their hands. The children of Israel continued their journeyings, and finally pitched their tents "in the plains of Moab, on this side Jordan by Jericho." When Balak, the king, saw this mighty host, knowing how they had overcome the Amorites, he sent for Balaam to curse them. God told Balaam not to curse them. He at last goes to Balak, and refuses repeatedly, after the urgent entreaties of Balak, to curse Israel. Eventually he utters the prophecy that we are to consider.

He fell "into a trance, (but had) his eyes open," and said, "I shall see him but not now: I shall behold him, but not nigh," etc. It has been supposed by many persons, that Balaam is beholding Christ in a vision, and declaring that at some future time he shall see Christ literally. Those who hold to the re-living of the wicked dead, are quite positive that this text teaches that Balaam will have a resurrection to life, and it is urged upon us who think differently from that, to prove the contrary to be true if we can.

The conviction in my mind is, that the resurrection to life of the wicked, or of Balaam, is not taught there; but rather that Balaam, in a trance, saw King David and the work which he should perform. Almost at the feet of Balak and Balaam were the host of Israel. The king desired the prophet to curse them, but instead thereof, he foretold the destruction of the Amorites and Moabites by one who should come from Israel.

The only difficulty apparent in the text, is the Hebrew manner of using the future tense when the present tense is meant. Literally it would then be, "I do see him . . . I do behold him," etc.; that is, he said in the hearing of Balak that he saw the king that was to overthrow his kingdom. Bishop Patrick, Bishop Newton, and very many other eminent scholars are agreed upon this point. That alone settles the point in my mind that the doctrine of the resurrection of either good or bad is not even hinted at in this prophecy.

The prophet continues, "There shall come a star out of Jacob, and a Sceptre shall rise out of Israel," etc. The term star, in oriental language, is frequently applied to eminent personages.

Because a star was seen over Bethlehem at the time Christ was born, many have thought that that part of the prophecy that declares "there shall come a Star out of Jacob," was then fulfilled. I wonder that such mistakes can be made, when upon reflection it must be evident that the star that hung over Christ at Bethlehem was not "the Star" that Balaam saw. The "Star of Bethlehem" and Christ the "babe of Bethlehem" were not one and the same—they were two distinct objects. The star in the heavens showed the wise men where the infant Jesus was.

"And a Sceptre shall rise out of Israel." Here a king evidently is meant. That David was the foretold Star and Scepter is plain from the work prophesied: he "shall smite the corners of Moab, and destroy all the children of Sheth, and Edom shall be a possession, Seir also shall be a possession for his enemies; and Israel shall do valiantly. Out of Jacob shall come he that shall have dominion, and shall destroy him that remaineth of the city." The event was at a distance from Balak's time—not then: in the future—not there.

In 2 Sam'l. viii., 2, 14, we find the prophecy fulfilled, or rather the record of its fulfilment. David was the Star and the Sceptre. David sings in Ps. lx., 8–12, "Moab is my wash-pot; over Edom will I cast out my shoe: Philistia, triumph thou because of me. Who will bring me into the strong city? who will lead me into Edom? Wilt not thou, O God, which hadst cast us off? and thou, O God, which didst not go out with our armies? Give us help from trouble, for vain is the help of man. Through God we shall do valiantly, for he it is that shall tread down our enemies."

Thus David, a man of war, literally speaking, and not Christ, is the one who led Israel in fighting valiantly against the Amorites and the Edomites. The Lord gave them into his hands. All this, and nothing more, was seen in trance by Balaam in the presence of Balak, the king of Edom, who desired to annihilate Israel.

Bishop Horne, though holding the popular view, writes, that "Rosenmuller and other eminent biblical critics have contended (that it) cannot apply to Jesus Christ." The learned bishop then says, "This passage, it is true, in its primary and literal meaning, intimates that from the people of Israel should arise a mighty prince, who would obtain an entire conquest and bear rule over the kingdoms of Moab and Edom: and it is fulfilled in David, for it is expressly recorded of him, that he finally subdued those nations."

Hymn-book theology has made Christ the Star of Balaam, and the Star of Bethlehem. Most Jewish and many Christian writers apply the prophecy chiefly to Christ. Their method of spiritualizing the Scriptures led them to such a conclusion.

The children of the Lord will have all difficulties that may appear to go against the view that only the children of God will have a resurrection, eventually, removed. Trust in the Lord with all thine heart and he will bring it to pass. "Godliness is profitable unto all things; having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." Yours, rejoicing in hope.

SIGNS OF CHRIST'S COMING.

"And great earthquakes shall be in divers places, and famines, and pestilences; and fearful sights and great signs shall there be from heaven."—LUKE xxi., 11.

THUS spake the Master to his disciples in recounting some of the peculiar features of the times immediately preceding the second advent; and lest they should fall into the error of supposing that event would occur in their time, he digressed and informed them that "before all these" they should be persecuted, and be delivered up to "the synagogues, and into prisons, being brought before kings and rulers;" "betrayed both (or, even) by parents and brethren and kinsfolks, and friends;" "hated of all men for my name's sake;" and finally "be put to death." He told them the Jews should "fall by the edge of the sword," and should "be led away captive into all nations: and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." He then resumed the eschatological line of his remarks and detailed more fully the signs by the existence of which his return might be known to be nigh at hand, saying "there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth; for the powers of heaven shall be shaken."

Nothing, then, could well be made more positive and definite than that fearful irregularities in the realm of nature are to herald the "day of the Lord;" that Christ's coming will transpire in a time specially marked by startling occurrences. Eminently important, therefore, to all who wait for him, and love to contemplate his appearing, is the question, "Are the times in which we live characterized by an unusual prevalence of those peculiarities related by our Lord to his disciples?" That they are times of more than ordinary peril, exciting strong and wide-spread solicitude, few, we think, of even the most casual observers, have failed to notice. But do they so well answer to prophetic description as to justify the lively and implicit faith in them as the divinely appointed harbinger of the approach of Zion's glorious King, that all have in the speedy return of summer when in spring they see the trees shoot forth. Having for years past noted the signs of the times, and still watching them with eager longing, most of our readers recognize the marvellous occurrences that are taking place about us, and the extraordinary state of society in the present day as unmistakably fulfilling, in their measure, the foregoing prophecy of our Lord, and hence there is no need that we here attempt to prove them objects of special reference by him.

They who have been consistently engaged in prayerful watchfulness are as firm in the faith that we are living in the end of that period of the world's history denominated "the times of the Gentiles" as they are that summer is nigh when the trees begin to put forth their leaves. But some may say to us, "in your excessive desire of the ushering in of the day of final consummation, you lay hold on trifles; you grasp insignificancies, and distort and exaggerate commonplace circumstances. Other people see nothing so strange or unnatural in the realms of politics, of morals and of nature. True, the times are wonderful in many ways, but others no less so have existed."

Of course, none can conclude without either ignoring or downrightly rejecting the testimony of inspiration, that the world in general will, even down to the hour of Christ's coming, be other than ignorant of the portending nature of what is transpiring; but let us see whether it is true that other people fail to see anything startling in passing events; whether they discern at all the condition of universal disorder and unrest in the world, and if so, whether it is regarded by them as anything more than either what is liable to result from the ceaseless energies of nature and from the natural progress of human developments, or re-enactments of what have already occurred at various points in human experience and in the world's history.

Read the following, having reference to the subject, taken from the editorial columns of a secular paper having extensive circulation:

Certain it is that a great rebellion has taken place for some cause or other, and that the earth has been shaken from centre to circumference. So far from their being any decrease of vigor in the igneous energies, they are more active than ever. Etna and Vesuvius, and Hecla, that pretty toy of the Icelanders, are henceforth to be set down as among the prettiest fire-works of the creation, and have been completely shorn of what used to be considered their grandeur and sublimity by the tremendous rock-rendings and oceanic fires which have made the Pacific islands so famous and so terrible. All over the globe, as by a general conspiracy and premeditated simultaneous movement, there has been a regular Walpurgis hellabaloo, and fiery dance of destruction and death. Vesuvius and the Tahitian volcanoes roared to each other at the same moment in voices of primeval thunder, across the immeasurable brine which writhed with a new and unheard-of agony, wrecking great ships in its wrath, and swallowing their runs like so many grains of sand.

This dreadful outburst is hardly over before a mighty wave of earthquake sweeps over New Zealand, and at the same time the volcanoes of Peru were most active, and San Francisco shook through all her bones at the rumbling, tumbling, shaking and roaring of the earthquakes in California. Even those countries which for ages have grown corn and wine upon the surface of extinct volcanoes have been subjected to the terrors of this fiery visitation. Nature seems to have renewed her youth and vigor, and re-announces herself upon this large scale to justify her pretensions. The wise old grandfathers of Ireland and England laughed at the idea of an earthquake troubling such old and respectable countries as those, and insisted upon it that the more rabid and furious energies of the earth had long since expended their strength in those parts, and left the laboring peasant to toil in peace on twelve shillings a week, and pay house-rent and fuel, and keep his average family of five children. And yet Ireland came in for its shake. Then England came in for its share of the hubbub, and the cathedral town of Worcester and the beautiful watering place of Leamington tottered and reeled like a drunken man. What is the meaning of it all?

We have the intelligence by way of San Francisco, that destructive storms of wind and rain had swept over North-western Mexico, doing immense damage and causing great suffering and loss of life; that the city of Alamos, in the State of Sonora, with a population of seven thousand, had been destroyed by floods and whirlwinds; that Loreto and some smaller towns in the peninsula of Lower California were entirely demolished; that whole herds of cattle had been swept away and groves of oranges and other crops totally ruined, and that the Yaqui and Mayo rivers in Sonora were swollen to a height of forty feet—rivers which, during their long dry summer, in their course to the California Gulf, are absorbed in the intervening desert sands. In other parts of Mexico, meantime, the inhabitants of towns and villages had been frightened from their houses by earthquakes, thus showing the elements under the earth as well as the elements above it to be in dreadful commotion.

In both hemispheres, but especially on this continent and among the adjacent islands, these visitations of tornadoes, floods and earthquakes, with their tidal waves and fissures emitting gas, fire, smoke, steam, and boiling water, are becoming alarmingly frequent. Last autumn they had them all in high revelry at St. Thomas and the neighboring islands, and such terrific hurricanes of rattling hail along the southern frontier of Texas as were never known there before back to the first occupation of the country by the Spaniards. This year the line of operations of these celestial and subterranean phenomena appears to be (with the recurrence of the meteors) along the Pacific side of the continent, and may be traced to the late disastrous convulsions of the dry land and the sea along the western coast of South America. Violent storms follow in the track of earthquakes, and such storms doubtless result from the derangement of the atmospheric equilibrium by the disturbing gases and electrical forces arising from these subterranean outbreaks.

It is so remarkable, at all events, that this year, as last year, we have an eruption of Vesuvius simultaneously with these shakings of the earth in the West Indian latitudes and near the time of the earth's collision with that strange nebulous formation in the heavens which gives us those wonderful meteoric showers—it is so remarkable, we say, that all these things should come together that we cannot resist the conclusion that these meteors, earthquakes and volcanoes have much to do with the unparalleled hurricanes and inundations all over the world of these latter days.

And this:

Galignani's Messenger (Paris) says that the sun's disk is at present riddled with holes, or spots, one of which is of very considerable size. It is a deep cavity in the photosphere, and so wide that the whole terrestrial globe would find room in it without touching the edges. There is another spot which, though much smaller, still has one of its diameters as large as that of our earth.

The authors of the foregoing observations cannot for a moment be considered as chargeable with a proneness to seize upon insignificances, and exaggerate commonplace circumstances to serve a theory, as they evidently know not that they write about portents of an event more important, solemn, and surpassingly majestic than human eye ever beheld, one at once both glorious and terrible. It avails them nothing to say, by way of explanation, however correctly, that the one class of these fearful, devastating phenomena result from the other class, or from any known cause, for our blessed Lord did not intimate that miracles would be wrought in order that his words be fulfilled. He simply stated the fact that during a period immediately preceding his return these things should exist. If purely miraculous events should occur, the attention of the world would be arrested and a panic ensue in which millions would be frightened into a mere form of obedience, incited by no love to God. It was not that the world might know Christ's coming near that those occurrences were foretold; but as a sign by which they who love him, and long and wait for his appearing might thus know that the voyage is ending; that only a little way beyond and already in view, the beautiful, long-sought haven, whose happy, blissful shores no enemy can tread.

If from the department of nature we turn to society we read the same tale of violent commotions. The first thing which here commands our attention is the astounding prevalence of a murder-mania. We see whole armies of men and women engaged in throwing others into rivers, beating out brains, cutting throats, shooting down by the wayside, heaping up mountains of smothered new-born infants, children slaying aged parents to obtain money wherewith to gratify the clamorous demands of raging lust-devils, men dripping with the blood of assassination receiving the plaudits of whole communities, while each species of less awful crime holds unprecedented high revelry, with accounts of which the publications of the day are burdened to a degree which, though scarcely the half is told, makes one heart-sick to read. Although constant familiarity with deeds of blood, robbery, outrage, treachery and shame has stolen much of public sensitiveness, ever and anon some act is committed so intensely diabolical that for a time all others are overshadowed, and men vainly searching records of the past for a parallel, stand aghast with horror, and anxiously inquire of each other, "What next?"

Turning from this frightful scene of diabolism to the arena of politics, little more fortunate are we. Men clothed in robes of judicial authority wink at and otherwise encourage all this infamy, and prostitute the high and sacred powers and privileges of office to the basest purposes; public interests are neglected and human rights ruthlessly trampled upon to satisfy greed of official patronage, power and emoluments; in short, an amazing degree of corruption is manifest almost everywhere. If we look over the nations of the earth, the same display of tumult and commotion is beheld. All not engaged in actual war cry, "peace," while with unparalleled assiduity they strive to perfect arrangements for deadly conflict. Do you say that wonderful revelations of human wickedness and strife, and terrible disturbances of the elements are common to all countries and times? Be it so. It is not to the mere present existence of these astounding manifestations that we direct attention, but to the appalling extent to which they exist. That is not common to all countries and times. And a prominent feature of the abounding of evil is that society fondly embraces the works of iniquity, knowing them to be such, and many of them are central figures in religious organizations, retained there because they contribute freely of their ill-gotten gains.

Yes, watchful observer of passing events, see the prophetic "signs in the sun . . . and in the stars:" and in the "distress of nations with perplexity;" in the "roaring" of "the sea and the waves;" in the failing of men's hearts "for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth," and in the shaking of the "powers of heaven." Others see them, too, but being ignorant of them ask, what is the meaning of it all? Meaning! It means that "the times of the Gentiles" are nearly fulfilled, and that Jerusalem, so long "trodden down" will soon be made to smile sweetly under the happy process of restoration, and her waste places be made to rejoice. It means that the awful carnival of crime, corruption, and death, now being held, will soon be cut short by the last act of the drama of the history of the unregenerate world; that "the loftiness of man shall be bowed down, and the haughtiness of men shall be made low;" and that "the Lord alone shall be exalted." It means that the day approaches when men "shall cast" their "idols of silver, and idols of gold which they have made each one for himself to worship, to the moles and to the bats; to go into the clefts of the rocks," "for fear of the Lord and for the glory of his majesty," but that the righteous sh ll shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of the Father. It means the approach of sudden and eternal death to all evil-doers; the birth of redemption to every son and daughter of the living God. It means the soon glorious appearing of our loving, faithful Shepherd; his everlasting establishment upon the throne of David, and a dispensation of righteous judgment, justice and truth to all nations. Let, therefore, all waiting ones wait patiently, and labor diligently while they wait. Much may yet remain to be accomplished, but at the appointed time the day of consummation will come. Watching the ever brightening rays that gild the eastern horizon, lift up your heads and be glad; for, whether you wake or sleep, "your redemption draweth nigh."

THE COVENANTS:

C.—I should like to hear all you have to say on that subject.

G.—The object we had in view was to show how God led Abraham along and strengthened his faith. So that there might be no mistake in the matter God said, "Sarah, thy wife, shall bear thee a son indeed." And that is not all: "And thou shalt call his name Isaac: and I will establish my covenant with him for an everlasting covenant, and with his seed after him." After stating a number of blessings for Ishmael, God says, "But my covenant will I establish with Isaac, which Sarah shall bear unto thee at this set time in the next year." Here is the great point of Abraham's faith. He was old, his wife was old; yea, we may say the functions of her body were dead. And Abraham and his wife are asked to believe in a miracle; for nothing less could bring into action the functions of Sarah's dead body and cause her to become the mother of the boy that God had promised. Paul, in arguing this point, Rom. iv., 17 "(As it is written, I have made thee a father of many nations,) before him whom he believed, even God, who quickeneth the dead [evidently alluding to the deadness of Sarah], and calleth those things which be not as though they were. Who, against hope, believed in hope, that he might become the father of many nations." Now the point. "And being not weak in faith he considered not his own body now dead, when he was about an hundred years old, neither yet the deadness of Sarah's womb: he staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief, but was strong in faith, giving glory to God."

C.—Then you do not think the offering up of Isaac was the strongest point of Abraham's faith?

G.—No; the offering up of Isaac was but a small matter of faith after what had passed before. To me the birth of Isaac, under the circumstances, was as great a miracle as the birth of Jesus Christ by the Virgin Mary. And after God had given Abraham the boy and named him, and said he would make or establish his everlasting covenant with him, we can understand Abraham when God said unto him, "Take now thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest, and get thee into the land of Moriah, and offer him there a burnt offering upon one of the mountains which I will tell thee of." We can understand Abraham to reason after this manner: God asks me to offer up my only son Isaac; well, he is God's boy; He gave him to me by a miracle even after the deadness of our bodies; and God named the boy Isaac, so there can be no mistake about that; and it is with this boy Isaac that God said he would establish his everlasting covenant. It is through this boy that my seed is to come. Well, if I am to have a seed through Isaac, and with him God is going to establish his everlasting covenant; if I offer him up by the command of God, he is his boy, and he will take care that his promise is made good. He gave him to me in the first place, as I conceive, from the dead; and though I slay him God is able to give him back again from the dead. Thus we understand that God led Abraham along; and the very fact of God's giving him a son in the manner he did, strengthened Abraham's faith and prepared him for subsequent events.

C.—I think I fully understand your position in relation to Abraham's faith, and also of the gift of Isaac, but do not see the bearing it has upon the question of the "Future Age." I have a desire to understand your position on that question.

G.—I am in no hurry to advance my opinions on that question, and shall proceed with the question just in the manner as I find it laid down in the Bible. My object is, first, to find out what a covenant is. Second, What does it promise and convey; and third, To whom does the promise belong? and then I think we shall be able to understand the whole question as far as it is revealed unto us.

We find that this Isaac was forty years old when he took Rebecca to wife: Gen. xxv. And she was like her mother-in-law, Sarah. And Isaac Isaac intreated the Lord for his wife because she was barren; and we find here again the Lord makes his promise good. Even a barren woman cannot stand in the way of God's promise. And Rebecca had two children, Esau and Jacob; and here God reminds her of the promise he made to Abraham concerning Sarah; "and she shall be a mother of nations; kings of people shall be of her." "And the Lord said unto Rebecca, Two nations are in thee, and two manner of people shall be separated from thee." Here, at this early period of the world's history, we have a beginning of the fulfilment of the promise of God to Abraham. Ishmael became the father of twelve sons, and they became the founders of Arabia. Thus through one line Abraham became the father of a great nation; and through his grandson Esau, a great nation sprung. Then follows the nation of Israel, and through Edom and Israel the prediction to Sarah was fulfilled. "Yea, I will bless her, and she shall be a mother of nations; kings of people shall be of her." It is useless to look into the future for nations yet to arise to fill up a prophecy that has already had its ample fulfilment in Bible history.

C.—Do you suppose, then, that this was the seed that God promised Abraham should be as numerous as the sand of the sea for multitude? And are all the promises fulfilled to this seed?

G.—I see you are like all on your side of the question, very anxious to have this question of seed settled in a hurry. I should have preferred to have waited a while.

C.—It seems to me to belong right in here, and we may as well talk about it at this time.

G.—There seems to me to be two promises spoken of to Abraham. One of a multitudinous seed, and one of a special seed to whom God gave the land. Suppose we examine this question. Abraham was the father of Ishmael as well as Isaac, but God said he was to have no part in the covenant of promise: but with Isaac will I establish my covenant. But Ishmael was recognized in the other blessing of the multitude: "And as for Ishmael, I have heard thee: behold I have blessed him, and will make him fruitful, and will multiply him exceedingly; twelve princes shall he beget, and I will make him a great nation." But he can have no part in Isaac's inheritance. We find that after the death of Sarah, Abraham took a wife, Keturah, and through her were born six sons, and through them a multitude of seed; but none of them are recorded in the promise, Gen. xxv. Again we read that Isaac had two sons, Jacob and Esau, both the children of Isaac, and grandchildren of Abraham, and yet Esau has no part in the covenant of promise, although he is spoken of as of the seed of multitude. Hark what Isaac says of him: "Behold thy dwelling shall be the fatness of the earth, and of the dew of heaven from above . . . and thou shalt serve thy brother; and it shall come to pass when thou shalt have dominion, that thou shalt break his yoke from off thy neck." Gen. xxvii., 39, 40. There was a literal fulfilment of this prediction, and Esau's seed must have been multiplied exceedingly to be able to break the yoke from Jacob's seed. Yours, till we meet again.

LITERAL FULFILMENT OF PROPHECY.

WE now proceed to notice the promises and prophecies that relate to Abraham and his seed. The promises were twofold. The first related to his seed in and through Christ without regard to their paternal descent; they are heirs of immortality, eternal life. See Rom. ii., 7–11, "To them who by patient continuance in well doing, seek for glory, and honor, and immortality, eternal life; but unto them that are contentious, and do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness, indignation and wrath; tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that doeth evil, of the Jew first, and also the Gentile: but glory, honor, and peace, to every man that worketh good; to the Jew first, and also to the Gentile; for there is no respect of persons with God."

The same is also fully expressed, Heb. vi., 11–20, "And we desire that every one of you do show the same diligence to the full assurance of hope unto the end: that ye be not slothful, but followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises. For when God made promise to Abraham, because he could swear by no greater, he sware by himself, saying, Surely blessing I will bless thee, and multiplying I will multiply thee. And so, after he had patiently endured, he obtained the promise. For men verily swear by the greater: and an oath for confirmation is to them an end of all strife. Wherein God, willing more abundantly to show unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath: That by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us. Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the vail: Whither the forerunner is for us entered, even Jesus, made an high priest forever after the order of Melchisedec."

With respect to this part of the promise, embracing Abraham's spiritual seed, the Scriptures speak thus: Gen. xii., 3. "And I will bless them that bless thee, and curse them that curse thee; and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed." Also, Gen. xvii., 3–5, "And Abram fell on his face: and God talked with him saying, "As for me, behold, my covenant is with thee, and thou shalt be a father of many nations. Neither shalt thy name any more be called Abram; but thy name shall be called Abraham: for a father of many nations have I made thee." And Gen. xviii., 17, 18, "And the Lord said, Shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do: seeing that Abraham shall surely become a great and mighty nation, and all the nations of the earth shall be blessed in him?" Likewise, Gen. xxii.. 18.

This promise was renewed to Isaac, Gen. xxvi., 4, "In thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." Afterward it was confirmed unto Jacob, Gen. xxviii., 14; "In thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed." Of this seed John the Baptist, our Lord and his apostles often speak. See Matt. iii., 9; John viii., 39; Rom. ii., 28, 29; but throughout this chapter and epistle, Paul keeps up the distinction of a Jew literally. Paul's controversy was about the ground of acceptance with God as sinners; and how men are to attain unto immortality, eternal life. This he assures us is by faith, and not because we had pious ancestors. He shows that all have sinned; and Abraham himself was only justified by faith. That it was under that general promise of grace, expressed by "the promise that he should be heir of the world:" and that his seed who are partakers of that promise, are such by faith, and not by natural descent. The same point the apostle takes up in Galatians. If we will have acceptance with God as sinners, and be partakers of immortality, eternal life, which is alone in Jesus Christ, we must have like faith with Abraham; nothing else will at all avail us; for, "God has given unto us eternal life, and this life is in his Son," and nowhere else; out of Christ we must perish, even though we were from the loins of Abraham himself. But all this does not at all touch the question, whether there is not still a promise to the literal seed of Jacob to have a literal fulfilment in another matter. That point will be considered as we pursue the subject.

HOME CIRCLE AND TEMPERANCE ORACLE.—Under the sanction of many of the leading temperance men of the West, the Chicago home circle, now entering its eighth volume, espouses the cause of Temperance with an ability peculiarly its own. A lofty temperance paper has long been needed in the West, and this is the right one in the right place. Being long established as a literary journal the temperance people will hail it with delight. Subscriptions $1. a year November and December numbers free to those who remit at once. Sample copy with terms 10 cents. Address S. M. Kennedy, Editor, 194 Clark st., Chicago.

"THE LITTLE CORPORAL," published at Chicago, Ill., by Alfred L. Sewell, for Dec., is received. It is greatly enlarged and improved, and bids fair to be one of the most interesting Juvenile Magazines of these days. It is now a quarto of sixteen pages, with an illustrated cover, at $1 a year, or ten cents single number. We think it must interest the Little Folks.

Poetry.

THE PRESENT AND THE FUTURE.

BY GEO. T. COLLINS.

In fancy, see with me, what may be seen
In many a land, in pleasing, sad reality;
A house upon a sunny slope;
Above, the sky of June, and all around
The fleecy clouds fleck the far-off horizon.
A house with broad verandah and green pendant vines
With rooms all richly furnished
With soft divans and yielding carpets
From costliest looms of Persia;
Pictures that reproduce the scenes of other lands,
Fruits of mellow rind and luscious taste,
And wine that maketh the heart glad;
Couches of rich luxuriance, o'erhung
With royal purple, and apparel
Of costly texture, and dyed with many a hue
Of India's looms.
Spices of rich purfume burden the air
And pamper every appetite.
Around are flowers in gay parterres,
Trees that have seen the centuries go by
And seem but in their youth;
Rich flowering shrubs of India, and roses
Of all hues and odors, are scattered
Promiscuously around.
Here shoots a sparkling fountain,
And there, soft murmuring o'er its pebbly bed
Runs a pure rivulet, till at last
It falls with many a plash
Into a lake, calm as the sky above it.
Around its sandy beach, are woods and bowers
And birds of lovely note
And variagated plumage.
Beyond, the land rises in rolling swells
Until in the blue distance, the scene
Is lost in many a pine-clad hill.
Amid this scene of wealth and beauty,
Low sounds of woe are heard,
Saddening the morning air:
Strong men with sober faces
And whispered words of greeting,
Women with tears and stifled sobs,
And children with blanched faces
And great wondering eyes, mingle around:
Anon comes forth a hearse
With sable plumes, bearing to the dark grave
The friend and father, followed in long procession
By the wife and mother and children, of various age,
Sobbing with bleeding hearts;
Friends by blood and deep affection, fall in
And move with slow and muffled tread away.
The scene is now all gloom and sadness;
Its beauties noted not; its joys unsought,
And grief, ill-omened, shadows every bower.
And why all this?
Why should this home of joy and pleasure
Be clouded o'er with gloom?
The answer comes from oft-recurring scenes,
In tones of dread and horror, Death reigns;
Death reigns triumphant o'er the human race,
And all of every age and clime, must bow
To his stern mandate,
Nor tears, nor virtue, nor tender youth,
Nor hoary age, nor woman in her loveliness
May 'scape the fell destroyer.
All, all must bow and give their all, their life.
Then turn we to a fairer, lovelier scene.
Behold a city set upon a hill;
Jerusalem rebuilt: Jesus returned to earth
And times of restitution long foretold
By all the holy prophets, present now
In their full blaze of light and glory;
The curse removed, and earth from sea to sea,
Through all her wide and trackless deserts
And on ten thousand hills
Blooming and lovely as the Paradise of God.
For he has turned the rivers far away
And box and myrtle-tree now spread
Their stately arms where desert sands did blow.
The lion and the lamb together meet
In kindly greeting.
Man builds a home to dwell in
With no fear of dispossession;
Roses of Sharon hedge it round
And vines, bending with purple grapes,
Offer their lucious fruit to lips
Glowing with bright immortal youth;
Grand old trees o'ershadow his dear home
From whence he gazes on a scene of beauty
Wide as the world, and lasting as the throne of heaven.
Those waters, vainly sought through everglades
Of Florida, to give eternal youth,
Are bursting here through many a shady dell.
Gay birds of glorious plumage fill the air,
Or 'mid the matchless flowers of life's fair tree
Carol their matin song,
While mountain-top to mountain-top sounds forth
A shout of praise that circles round the earth.
A home of light, and joy, and an eternal excellency
Has Jerusalem become.
And year by year do countless throngs
Go up to worship the King, the Lord of Hosts,
And keep the feast of tabernacles.
Now does Etheopia stretch forth her hands to God,
And dwellers in the distant isles shout forth his praise.
In every land, in every clime,
By ocean shore and on the mountain top
The peans loud, of men immortal made,
Come swelling up, like the voice of many waters.
Through all this vast dominion
No wrong is felt or suffered.
Now is the prayer of David answered
And the whole earth is full of glory.
No sickness blights a loved one,
No sorrow starts a tear,
And death, in the long roll of slow revolving centuries
Has been forgotten.
The dark abodes of sheol are closed up
And a seal placed on their portals.
In labor, love, and praise, we launch our happy barks
Upon this boundless sea of bliss
And float forever down its endless years,
At home with God.

CHATEAUGAY, N. Y., Oct. 23, 1868.

Children's Department.

TWO WAYS OF TELLING AN UNTRUTH.

THE children were out on the lawn, having a nice game of croquet, and Miss Alston, their new governess, sat at the library window with a book in her hand; but her glance wandered from it constantly to the merry group who were playing below. It had only been a few days since she had come to take charge of this flock of motherless little ones, and her chief thought at present was to become acquainted with the character of each one of her pupils, to learn each special disposition, and find out the chief excellence and the principal fault of each, that she might understand how best to train them for their career in life, and especially for the service of the Master whom she herself delighted to honor.

She watched them closely, therefore, without seeming to do so, at their work and at their play; and it was in such unguarded hours as this present that she often made discoveries which gave her useful hints as to the management of all these different temperaments.

So now, although interested in her book, the sound of the gay voices without did not fall unnoticed on her ear, and she often lifted her eyes to let them rest upon one or another bright young face, all eager with the excitement of the pretty game, and flushed with the glow of healthful exercise.

Presently a pause occurred in the sport; the merry click of the balls was stopped, and there was a touch of anger in the childish tones. "My ball certainly did touch yours; it rolled back afterward. I have a right to croquet you, Harry, and I am going to do it; so please stand aside," said one quick and decided voice. And the answer came promptly and positively:

"O, Margie, it didn't. I was watching them both, and I could have seen and heard them if they had touched. I would not tell a wrong story just for a chance to get ahead in a game."

"Neither would I," rejoined his sister, indignantly; "I'd scorn to do such a thing. And you ought to know me better than to accuse me of it. I am sure Miss Alston would say it was very unkind and very ungentlemanly."

"Well, I suppose I didn't just mean that you would tell a lie," said Harry, a little ashamed. "I hope no sister of mine would disgrace herself so; but you certainly are mistaken about the ball, and it is so provoking in you to insist that you are not."

"Very well; I think it is you who are mistaken," said Margie; "but I will give it up rather than quarrel over it, and spoil every body's fun. Go on; it is your turn next, Louie."

Miss Alston had listened quietly, waiting to see if it would be necessary for her to interpose; but she was glad to find that Margie had been sensible enough to yield rather than dispute about a point which could not be definitely settled; and gladder still to find that her pupils had that noble scorn of falsehood which she considered the very corner-stone of a dignified character. If she had no deception to fear, her work would be comparatively easy, she thought, and returned to her book with an unspoken prayer that God would help her to train aright these young souls which he had committed for a time to her care.

Miss Alston had more faith than some teachers have in the potency of praise as an incentive, and she never lost an opportunity of bestowing a word of commendation where it was deserved. The two girls, Margie and Louie, had just begun the study of music, and Miss Alston was anxious that they should progress as rapidly as possible. She was pleased, therefore, the next day, when she heard the tum-tum of the first exercises going on after school hours, and felt still more convinced that Margie was going to prove in every way a satisfactory pupil. She was sure it was Margie, for she heard Louie's voice talking to the little ones in the nursery; and when, an hour or so afterward, she met Margie on the staircase, the kind teacher touched her lips lightly to her cheek, and said smiling, "That is a reward for being so industrious, and practiisng out of school-hours."

The little girl started and colored, and seemed as if she was going to speak; but after a moment she only stammered, "Thank you," and hurried up stairs. "Modest, too—the dear little thing!" thought her teacher, and felt more than ever disposed to love and trust Margie.

When Louie was taking her lesson the next morning she made rather sad work of the crotchets and quavers, and Miss Alston said gravely, "I am afraid, Louie, you are not so diligent or so anxious to improve as your sister. Margie practised a whole hour over her regular time yesterday."

"Why, Miss Alston, when? Do you mean just before tea? Why, that wasn't Margie you heard, it was Nannie Lee. She has no piano yet, and papa said she might practise on ours. He is going to speak to you about it."

Miss Alston felt a pang of disappointment, almost indignation. "And, Margie," she said, "you knew that when you let me praise you for your industry. I thought I heard you say the other day that you would scorn to tell an untruth."

"And so I would; I never tell lies," said Margie.

"Was not that the same? Did you not deceive me, and accept praise from me which you did not deserve? What is the difference between a falsehood acted and one spoken? Do you think God sees any difference?" Miss Alston looked very grave and sad, and Margie could stand it no longer. She burst into tears and sobbed out, "O, Miss Alston, don't look that way, please. I can't bear it. I know it was very wrong to deceive you, and very mean to take praise which I had not earned. But I did not think it was quite as bad as telling a lie. I see now it is, and indeed I will never do it again if you will only promise to trust me."

Miss Alston could not resist the pleading of one so truly penitent as Margie seemed to be. She drew the weeping girl to her side, and talked to her of the importance of truthfulness in act as well as word, and told her how God hates a lie, that none of us are free from the temptation to waver at times from the exact truth, and how by God's grace and help alone we are enabled to resist it. And begging her to seek this help constantly in humble prayer, she promised once more to place entire confidence in her pupil until she should forfeit it again. Let us hope that she never did. But are all my young readers sure that they are untruthful in act as well as in word?—American Messenger.

PARADISE.

Selected for the HERALD OF LIFE by W. S. O., Hartford, Conn.

The Greek word given for it is, sometimes paradeisos, and sometimes kepos, each defined garden. Paradeisos, like the Heb. stn, and the Latin spiritus, is used without being translated; written paradise: i. e., wherever the word paradise is found in the Douay of the Old Testament, or in the Rheims and E. V., of the New Testament; it is the Greek word paradeisos untranslated. . . . . [So that the Gr. paradeisos and kepos mean the same, they being each given for the Heb. gn; and paradeisos used in the Latin version, and the Latin word hortus mean the same; and the Douay words paradise and garden mean the same.]

For the same Heb. word gn in the Old Testament, the Gr. gives its word paradeisos sixteen times and its word kepos twenty-two times. In all but three of the sixteen places where the Gr. gives paradeisos, the Latin gives paradeisos, and the Douay, paradise. In these three places the Latin gives hortus: in two of the three the Douay gives garden: in the other, orchard. The meaning of the Greek word paradeisos (said to be of Persian origin) is clearly established.

In Rom vi., 3, we have, Gr., whether ignorant are ye that as many of us as are baptized into Christ Jesus, into that death of him are baptized? [i. e., that death from which there will be a resuscitation, living again, anastasis, a standing up again; resurrection is the word generally used in the E. V.] And in Rom. vi., 4., Gr., We are buried therefore with him by means of that baptism into that death: in order that as was awakened, or, raised up, Christ ek from among, dead . . . . so also, etc. Observe, reader, that We in Rom. vi. 4, does not mean everybody. And so, when we is used in the Epistles it does not mean all—every one; but the brethren to whom the Epistles are addressed. And in Rom. vi. 5, Gr., For if sumphutoi, born with, produced with, we have, or may have, been, or become, in the likeness of that death of him; alla kai, assuredly, also, tes anastaseos, of the standing up again—resurrection—we shall be: Lat., For if planted together we be in (the) likeness of (the) death of him, simul, together, or in company, et, also of (the) resurrection we shall be: Ital., For if we may have been ingrafted with Christ to the conformity of his death, we shall be also (in the likeness) of (his) resurrection: E. V., the same [This is an example of the liberties which orthodoxy takes with the Word of God, for the purpose of sustaining its theory that all the dead will be raised.] And in Rom. vi., 8; Gr. But if we die with Christ, we believe that also we shall live again with him. And in Col. ii., 12; Being buried with him en, though, by means of, the baptism [of baptism]; en, through, ho, which, sunegerthete, ye may, or shall, be awakened with, dia, by means of, the faith of the energy of that God who having awakened him ek, from among, the dead. And in 2 Tim ii., 11; Faithful that logos, word; For if we die with, kai, also we shall live again with.

All these expressions, "baptized into Christ;" "into that death are baptized;" "buried with him;" "die with him;" are equivalent to "in garden with him" in Luke xxiii., 43.

Much has been written, and various opinions given in reference to the E. V. word paradise. In Presbyterian orthodoxy it is made equivalent to the orthodox heaven. In Episcopal orthodoxy, as expounded by Hobart and the bishops he cites in his support, paradise is the same as Episcopacy's hell, i. e., its common receptacle of its departed souls—spirits, ghosts; "Dissertation" pp. 89, 104. But at page 89, Hobart says: "but with different mansions adapted to the qualities of its inhabitants." This he could have got nowhere but from Pagan mythology; for the Bible tells us that all go to one place, the grave. Milton and Whately and Hobart all agree that paradise (to use the E. V. word) does not mean the orthodox heaven. Milton, in reference to the words of Christ to the thief on the cross, says, p. 378, it appears to him "that the penitent thief was united to the other saints." And he having before told us that the whole man dies, this can mean only, that he went to such a grave as others saints had gone to.

At the time the words of Jesus to the thief were spoken, all were in ignorance that he would be raised again as he was raised; even his disciples. His words, therefore, would be received by all in the sense in which persons in such ignorance would receive them, namely, as meaning burial, the plain and natural sense to the Jews; their custom being to bury in gardens. As indicating burial, the expression was perfectly natural and plain; and no other sense could be ascribed to it. It was not till after he was raised from the dead that the full meaning of Christ when he used the words could be perceived, namely, that to be in garden with him, i. e., to be buried with him, was, to be laid in a grave from which there would be a resurrection.

When the saying was made, it was, as to its full meaning, one of the many expressions of our Lord which were enigmas even to his disciples. In Matt. xxvi., 12, Jesus says, Gr. . . . . pres to entaphiasai me, epoises en, in respect to, or, for, the to prepare me for burial she hath done. ["Burial" being equivalent to "in garden" in Luke xxiii., 43.]

Nothing but the fact that the Heb. has been so little attended to furnishes any explanation to me, why it is that I have never seen the obvious meaning given to these words of the Christ; or even heard of its being given.

We may add that if the doctrine be true that all men are to have a like burial, and all are to be raised to life again from the dead, there is no significance or meaning to the words of Jesus addressed to the thief on the cross, "in garden with me;" but with the idea (evidently the Scriptural idea) that none but believers are to have a resurrection, there is a peculiar force and beauty in the expression.

Let all who can, procure Judge Halsted's book. It is a mine of wealth for all honest searchers after truth. W. S. O.

GO FORWARD.

BY REV. DANIEL MARCH, D. D.

THE command to "go forward" is the Christian watch-word of duty and safety in all ages. It is only because some have faith and fortitude to advance in the face of difficulties, dangers, and uncertainties that the life of the world does not stagnate, and every good cause die. To stand still when the voice of God's providence cries, Go forward, quenches the light of hope in the heart and opens every avenue of the soul for the incoming of the powers of darkness. Sometimes it does a man good to be brought into such a strait that he must choose one of two courses immediately and forever—either an absolute and abject submission to the enemies of his soul, or a bold and open declaration of himself as a servant of God, a follower of Jesus Christ. In the days of persecution, the threat of immediate martyrdom has induced some to stand up for Jesus, when they might have lived and died without making the choice, had they supposed they could have a long and peaceful lifetime to choose it in.

It may be that these lines will be read by some one who, at the moment of reading, is ready to say with a sad heart, "The way of duty never seemed so hard and dark to me as now." Yet even to such an one would I say, in God's name, Go forward! Do your duty at whatever cost. Obey the divine command with a ready mind and cheerful heart. The sea of troubles will open before you and show you a safe path through. The trials and hinderances which you now fear will all vanish before the first firm and resolute step in the right path. This may be the very hour when you are to decide once and forever whether you will follow Christ and be saved, or hesitate and falter until you are swallowed up by the waves of worldliness and temptation.

If the Hebrews had not advanced—weary, terrified, afflicted as they were—when Moses gave the word to go forward, we have no reason to suppose that the waters would have divided, or that they would have escaped a return to worse bondage than they had ever suffered before in Egypt. And the difficulties that hinder the discharge of duty, the clouds that darken the path of faith, do not disappear before the halting and the doubting, just because they stand still and refuse to go forward when commanded to do so in the name of the Lord.

Go forward is the watchword of progress for the world and of salvation for the soul. Obedience to that command makes all the difference between success and failure, triumph and defeat, salvation and perdition. It climbs the dangerous steep, bridges the mighty stream, opens fountains in the desert, makes the wilderness blossom as the rose. It discovers and tames the most terrible forces in nature and puts them into iron harness to work for man. It lifts the cloud of ignorance from the human mind, scares away the horrid spectres of fear and superstition, stretches the iron nerve for the electric thrill of thought to pass with lightning speed over the mountains and across the continents, and under the ocean and all around the globe. All the generations that have gone before us send back the cry, along all their ranks, from century to century, Go forward! The uncounted millions that are soon to fill our places are pressing on from behind with the same cry. From every source, from every age and from every creature comes the repeated and earnest cry, "Go forward! press toward the mark; forgetting the things behind, reach forth to those before. Do your duty now, for the time is short, and opportunities once lost may never return. When the price to be secured by an immediate advance in the face of difficulties is eternal salvation, it is impossible to assign a justifying reason for a moment's delay."—Am. Presb.

FROM J. W. WHITING.

BRISTOL, CONN., Nov. 29, 1868.

BR. STORRS: As there is a great deal said in these days of those who believe that there is No life out of Christ; and as a few in this place have seen this last crowning truth, and with others of like precious faith are charged with error, and a bad spirit, and are causing divisions, I thought it would be a satisfaction to some to know the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth. When the meeting of which the HERALD kindly published a notice was under contemplation some of the leading members of the Advent church were consulted upon the propriety of occupying the hall which is hired by the year, by the church, it was refused unless the church as a body withdrew, because they could not and would not be identified with a people who were preaching such an erroneous doctrine as no resurrection to a mortal life. And thus the hall was obtained and the meeting was held according to the appointment, and the Second Advent church in Bristol did not give their influence nor support, as a church, although some did attend and furnish material aid. But a meeting was appointed on Sunday at a private house, while the hall was well filled and a meeting enjoyed by most, if not all present, feeling that we had much of the Spirit of God to help preach as well as hear the word. For further proof see Sister Louisa J. Beach's letter in the HERALD of Nov. 25th. After that meeting our brethren and sisters felt as if they wanted to hear more upon this last crowning truth; and an invitation was given to Br. Chas. C. Barker to come and preach the word of life to us; and as there was only a prayer meeting at the hall it was solicited for the occasion, but was refused, and thus we were compelled to seek another place; which we did, and the few who gathered "heard the word with gladness and singleness of heart, praising God," not "having favor with all the people."

I have thus written because we, as a people, are subject to so many misrepresentations by those who are going from glace to place claiming to be preachers of the gospel, and are misrepresenting our faith as well as action. I pray God they may be led into truth.

"WHO ATE ROGER WILLIAMS?"

THIS is a question asked in Steele's "Fourteen Weeks in Chemistry," which gives these curious facts:

The truth that animal matter passes from the animal back to the vegetable, and from the vegetable to the animal kingdom again, received a curious illustration not long since. For the purpose of erecting a suitable monument in memory of Roger Williams, the founder of Rhode Island, his private burying ground was searched for the graves of himself and wife. It was found that everything had passed into oblivion. The shape of the coffins could only be traced by a black line of carbonaceous matter. The rusting hinges and nails, and a round wooden knot, alone remained in one grave; while a single lock of braided hair was found in the other. Near the grave stood an apple tree. This had sent down two main roots into the very presence of the coffined dead. The larger root pushing its way to the precise spot occupied by the skull of Roger Williams, had made a turn as if passing around it, and followed the direction of the backbone to the hips. Here it divided into two branches, sending one along each leg to the heels, when both turned upward to the toes. One of these roots formed a slight crook at the knee, which made the whole bear a striking resemblance to the human form. There were the graves, but their occupants had disappeared; the bones even had vanished. There stood the thief, the guilty apple tree—caught in the very act of robbery. The spoliation was complete. The organic matter, the flesh, the bones of Roger Williams had passed into an apple tree. The elements had been absorbed by the roots, transmuted into woody fibre, which could now be burned as fuel, or carved into ornaments, and bloomed into fragrant blossoms, which delighted the eye of the passer by, and scattered the sweetest perfume of spring; more than that—had been converted into luscious fruit, which, from year to year, had been gathered and eaten. How pertinent, then, is the question, "Who ate Roger Williams?"

SINGULAR PRESERVATION.—The London Herald tells this singular and touching story: Not many years since, certain miners, working far underground, came upon the body of a poor fellow who had perished in the suffocating pit forty years before. Some chemical agent to which the body had been subjected—an agent prepared in the laboratory of nature—had effectually arrested the progress of decay. They brought it up to the surface, and for awhile, till it crumbled away through exposure to the atmosphere, it lay there the image of a fine sturdy young man. No convulsion had passed over the face in death—the features were tranquil; the hair was black as jet. No one recognized the face—a generation had grown up since the day on which the miner went down his shaft for the last time. But a tottering old woman, who had hurried from her cottage at hearing the news, came up, and she knew again the face which, through all these years, she had never quite forgotten. The poor miner was to have been her husband on the day after that on which he died. They were rough people, of course, who were looking on; a liberal education and refined feelings are not deemed essential to the man whose work is to get up coal, or even tin; but there were no dry eyes there when the grey-headed old pilgrim cast herself upon the youthful corpse, and poured into its deaf ear many words of endearment unused for forty years. It was a touching contrast; the one so old, the other so young. They had both been young those long years ago; but time had gone on with the living and stood still with the dead.

"HAVE you ever read the 'Ancient Mariner?'" asked Rev. Mr. Spurgeon, one day of his congregation. "I dare say you thought it one of the strangest imaginations ever put together, especially that part where the old mariner represents the corpses of all the dead men rising up to manage the ship—dead men pulling the ropes, a dead man steering, dead men spreading the sails. I thought what a strange idea that was. But do you not know that I have lived to see that day? I have seen it done! I have gone into churches and I have seen a dead man in the pulpit, a dead man as deacon, and a dead man handing the plate, and dead men sitting to hear."

SIX SERMONS on the Inquiry. Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the LIFE-GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. BY GEO. STORRS. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the true teachings of the BIBLE is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.

No. 1. EARTH, NOT HEAVEN, is to be the inheritance of the saints. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS. Price 5 cents.

No. 4. THE SOUL SAVED OR LOST. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS. Price 5 cents.

No. 5. MORAL DEPRAVITY; by GEO. STORRS. Price 5 cents.

No. 7. DOOM OF THE UNGODLY: OR THE WICKED DEAD REMAIN ETERNALLY UNDER DEATH'S DOMINION. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS. Price 5 cents.

No. 8. THE WAGES OF SIN; by a Presbyterian Clergyman. Price, 5 cents.

No. 10. LETTERS TO A CLERGYMAN; or Life only through Christ not a heresy; by Dr. J. K. FINLEY, Pittsburg, Pa. Price 5 cents.

The foregoing tracts are 16 pages octavo. They will be sold at $3 per 100, or, fifty cents per dozen, free of postage.

No. 9. THE ESSENTIAL BAPTISM; by the EDITOR of the Bible Examiner, 32 pages. Price 7 cents.

The following are 12mo Tracts, of 24 pages each

MAN'S NATURE AND DESTINY; or the Animal Man and the Spiritual Man. A Sermon by GEO STORRS. Price 5 cents.

THE ATONEMENT, by GEO. STORRS, and THE GOSPEL HOPE, by the same; both works now printed in one Tract. Price 5 cents.

Unless attention is paid to all these matters confusion and delay are inevitable.

MAN'S NATURE AND CONSTITUTION.

BY DR. J. K. FINLEY.

[From the Niles Republican.]

MAJOR DUNCAN—Dear Sir: The subject of our present theme is the nature and constitution of man, as revealed to us in the Bible. It is our intention to enter upon the investigation, not from idle curiosity but because we believe it to be the first and most important step toward a proper understanding of all those great questions which pertain to man's best interests, both here and hereafter; we desire, also to avoid as much as possible a controversal spirit in our search after truth; for it is truth for its own sake, not victory over those who differ from us, that ought to actuate us. It will be conceded that it is of the first importance to acquaint ourselves with the nature and constitution of man; for the slightest reflection will convince any one, that God having created a being toward whom he intends to sustain important relations, would treat that being according to the nature bestowed upon him, and not in opposition to it.

The truly good and great Dr. Watts says, when about to inquire after the truths taught in the Bible, "I would never make my own former opinions the standard of truth and the rule by which to determine my future judgment. My work is to lay the Bible before me, to consult that sacred and infallible guide, and to square and adjust all my sentiments by that certain and infallible Rule." I shall endeavor to follow his example,

It would strike any person as being necessarily a very simple thing, and one as far removed as possible from complexity and mystification, to tell us what we are made of, and what are our constitutional peculiarities; and accordingly we will find the inspired record very plain and very explicit. For the purpose of enabling us to understand more satisfactorily the account of man's creation, let us first look at the account given of the creation of the inferior animals.

In the 1st chapter of Genesis, 20th verse, we read: "And God said let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath en-phsh chayah;" our translation says that hath life, in the margin, "soul."

In the 21st verse: "And God created great whales and every "en-phsh chayah;" our translation says "living creatures," without any marginal reference.

In the 24th verse: "And God said let the earth bring forth the en-phsh chayah;" our translation says "living creature after his kind," cattle and creeping things and beasts of the earth," without marginal reference.

In the 30th verse we read: "And to every beast of the earth, and to every fowl of the air, and to everything that creepeth upon the earth wherein there is en-phsh chayah." Our translation says "wherein there is life." Refer to the margin, however, and we find "Hebrew, 'Living Soul.'"

We come now to 7th verse of the 2d chapter: "And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became en-phsh chayah;" our translation says a "living soul." This is the whole account, and there is no other part of the Bible that says anything more on the subject. Can any person frame a good reason why the same Hebrew words, in the same connection, should be translated "Life" in two instances, "Living Creature" in two others, "and "Living Soul" in the fifth? I am sure I cannot, unless it was the object of the translators to prevent the common English reader from seeing that all the animals, birds, reptiles and creeping things, are living souls as well as man; and that he, according to the divine record, is no more a soul than they are. Now if we examine the meaning of these words we shall find the reason why they are all called living souls.

The word en-phsh, translated soul, in the account of man's creation, comes from the verb "Nesme," signifying to breathe. Man, then, is a soul—an en-phsh—because he lives by breathing; he became a living soul or creature, to live by breathing the vital air, and as all other creatures live in the same way, by the same process, they are all called living Souls or Creatures. Man's superiority to the other breathing tribes consists, not in his being a soul, but in the magnitude of his powers; in other words, in the higher position he occupies in the scale of existence, as an intellectual, moral and responsible agent.

It we examine the account a little more carefully, we find it stated that the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground. The record calls him man as soon as formed, before life was imparted to him; when the process of breathing was established he became a living soul. Let me ask the reader: What was it became a living soul? Was is not the inanimate organism man, made of dust? Is there the slightest intimation given that any spiritual entity was put into him, or that anything was done except to cause him to breathe? And what occurs when he ceases to breathe? Does he not become an inanimate soul, and return to the dust out of which he was originally taken? Does death consist in the separation of soul and body, as Orthodoxy affirms? The Bible says: "That which befalleth the sons of man befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them; as the one dieth so dieth the other; yea, they all have one breath." Do beasts die by separating the soul from the body?

We have now examined the scriptural account of man's constitution and nature, and find that according to it the man is a soul, not has a soul, but the man is a unit, formed from the dust of the ground. Our examination might rest here, was it not that an almost universal belief exists that somehow a spiritual entity was added to him, called the soul, and that this fanciful entity, of which we have not the slightest account in the Bible, is inherently immortal from its very nature, and is capable of living when separated from the body, and enjoying a vastly greater degree of happiness or suffering than while united to the body. This is the orthodox belief; and is the foundation upon which rests the whole superstructure of rewards and punishments, to be bestowed or inflicted upon our race after this life is over; in other words the eternal destiny of man.

The general belief of this dual nature of man is based upon the application to him of the expression "living soul" in the account of his creation. This however is so untenable that it is getting to be considered insufficient to establish so important a doctrine, it being evident that the same expression is applied to all other creatures, birds, reptiles, etc., and would necessarily prove that they also had immortal souls, which is more than the most of them are willing to admit. There are some, and perhaps more than is generally supposed, who, rather than give up this point, do contend that all the inferior creatures that have life, have immortal souls, as well as man. is only about four years ago that, in conversation with a Presbyterian Minister, a Doctor of Divinity, and who had been for many years a professor of dead languages in one of the most prominent Colleges in Pennsylvania, when I affirmed that he could not find a single passage in the Bible that taught the immortality of the soul, or that man had such an entity as orthodoxy calls soul, he referred me to the 7th verse of 2d Genesis. I replied, by asking him if he did not know that the term living soul was applied to all the animals birds, creeping things, etc. After hesitating a few moments he admitted the fact. I then said: Doctor, common sense will satisfy any one that if that expression teaches that man has an immortal soul, it teaches beyond a question that all these inferior creatures have immortal souls also. He instantly replied: Well they have; they all have spiritual natures. The Doctor's reply was certainly a consistent deduction from the premises. Whether it consisted with the Bible and good common sense, others can judge as well I can.

But it is said that God breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and the same expression is not used in recording the creation of the inferior creatures. We might reasonably expect that the account of man's creation would be more particular in its details, than that of the other creatures, inasmuch as he was of a far higher order, and stood at the head of all created beings on earth. But if we refer to the account given of the flood, in the 7th chapter, 15th verse, we find the following: "And they went in unto Noah into the ark, two and two of all flesh, wherein is the 'breath of life."' And in the 21st and 22d verses: "And all flesh died that moved upon the earth, both of fowl and of cattle, and of beast, and of every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth, and every man, all in whose nostrils was the breath of life, of all that was on the dry land died." Here we find the expression, "in whose nostrils was the breath of life," applied to all flesh indiscriminately. So far from this expression indicating any superiority in man, we find the Prophet Isaiah uses it to show his weakness and inferiority. "Cease ye from man whose breath is in his nostrils, for wherein is he to be accounted of."

The fact that the believers in the soul entity and its immortal nature, resort to such weak and puerile arguments, is itself evidence of the weakness of their position. Some of these points will receive further attention when we come to treat specially on the immortality of the soul.

THE promise of God to Abraham that his seed in a certain line, viz., through Isaac and Jacob, should possess a certain land, was the second part of the covenant, and related to his literal seed, which was not Christ alone. This promise runs thus: Gen. xii., 1, 5, 7, "Now the Lord had said unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house unto a land that I will show thee. And Abram took Sarai his wife, and Lot, his brother's son, and all their substance that they had gathered, and the souls that they had gotten in Haran: and they went forth to go into the land of Canaan; and into the land of Canaan they came. And the Lord appeared unto Abram, and said, Unto thy seed will I give this land: and there builded he an altar unto the Lord, who appeared unto him." And Gen. xv., 7, "And he said unto him, I am the Lord, that brought thee out of Ur, of the Chaldees, to give thee this land to inherit it." From this promise, without further explanation, Abraham would conclude that he, personally, was to inherit that land: God, therefore, in what follows, gives him to understand that it is not so much himself, that he designed in the promise, as his posterity. "And he said unto Abraham, Know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs, [their land, then, was not the whole earth,] and shall serve them; and they shall afflict them four hundred years; [that seed, then, was not Christ;] and that nation whom they shall serve, will I judge; and afterward shall they come out with great substance. And thou [Abraham] shall go to thy fathers in peace; thou shalt be buried in good old age." [Thus he has shown that his literal posterity were to possess that land.] "In that same day the Lord made a covenant with Abram, saying, Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates." Gen. xv., 18. Here the bounds of the land are specified, and it is not the "the world," or "habitable globe," but a particular part of it. At this time Abraham had no child as the second verse of that chapter shows. Let the reader now consult the following, and see if Abraham had not as much reason for thinking that God must have intended his spiritual seed as any have at this day, to apply the promises made to Judah and Israel to the spiritual seed. Gen. xv., 2–6, and xvii., 15–21, and xviii., 9–14. Compare these with Rom. iv., 18–22, and Heb. xi., 11, 12. Notwithstanding all the seeming improbabilities of a literal seed, we see that both Abraham and Sarah expected, and actually received such a seed.

After this child was born, to a spiritualizer, it would seem after all, there is to be only a spiritual seed. Abraham is directed to go and offer up his only son Isaac, for a burnt offering. See Gen. xxii., 1–12. Did he now say, "I am to have only a spiritual seed?" No: though he had ten thousand times more reason for doing so than any man has to make "Judah and Israel" mean Christians. What did he do? See Heb. xi., 17–19. His faith went forward accounting that nothing was "too hard for God," and that God sooner raise Isaac from the dead, than his promise fail of a literal fulfilment.

Let us look at further improbabilities that the promise of the possession of the literal land of Canaan would ever be fulfilled. See the prophecy, Gen. xv., 13, "And he said unto Abraham, Know of a surety, that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs, and shall serve them; and they shall afflict them four hundred years." Surely, that is a dark cloud. But, perhaps "that is only to be understood spiritually." Is it so? No. By a wonderful chain of events Abraham's posterity, through Isaac and Jacob are brought into Egypt. See Gen. xxxvii. to xlvii. Still, such is the high standing of Joseph in that country, it seems improbable that there will be a literal fulfilment of the prophecy that they should be "afflicted," in Egypt. But not one word of God is to fail of literal accomplishment. See Exodus i., 6–14, "And Joseph died and all his brethren, and all that generation. And the children of Israel were fruitful, and increased abundantly, and multiplied, and waxed exceeding mighty: and the land was filled with them. Now there arose up a new king over Egypt, which knew not Joseph. And he said unto his people, Behold the people of the children of Israel are more and mightier than we. Come on, let us deal wisely with them, lest they multiply; and it came to pass that when there falleth out any war, they join also unto our enemies, and fight against us, and so get them up out of the land. Therefore they did set over them taskmasters, to afflict them with their burdens. And they built for Pharaoh treasure-cities, Pithon and Raamses. But the more they afflicted them, the more they multiplied and grew. And they were grieved because of the children of Israel. And the Egyptians made the children of Israel to serve with rigor. And they made their lives bitter with hard bondage, in mortar, brick, and in all manner of service in the field: all their service wherein they made them serve was with rigor." Also, Ex. ii., 23–25, "And it came to pass in process of time that the king of Egypt died and the children of Israel sighed by reason of the bondage and they cried; and their cry came up unto God, by reason of the bondage. And God heard their groaning, and God remembered his covenant with Abraham, with Isaac, and with Jacob. And God looked upon the children of Israel, and God had respect unto them."

This bondage and affliction continued a long time. Will the promise of the land of Canaan fail? Are they only to look for a spiritual fulfilment? Is it so? Unbelief would doubtless suggest that was the case. How does faith act? We may see its workings in several examples. See first, Jacob's testimony to Joseph, when about to die in Egypt; Gen. xlviii. 1–4, "And Jacob said unto Joseph, God Almighty appeared unto me at Luz in the land of Canaan, and blessed me, and said unto me, Behold, I will make thee fruitful, and multiply thee, and I will make of thee a multitude of people; and will give this land to thy seed after thee for an everlasting possession." And, also, verse 21, "And Israel said unto Joseph, behold I die; but God shall be with you, and bring you again unto the land of your fathers." Here is no staggering at a literal fulfilment. Next look at Joseph's faith, when he was about to die, Gen. l., 24, 25, "And Joseph said unto his brethren, I die: and God will surely visit you, and bring you out of this land, unto the land which he sware to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob. And Joseph took an oath of the children of Israel, saying, God will surely visit you, and ye shall carry up my bones from hence. Here is strong faith of a literal accomplishment of the promise of God. Next look at the faith of the mother of Moses. Compare Ex. ii., 1–4, with Heb. xi., 23. Then see the account we have of Moses himself, Acts vii., 22–25, "And Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and was mighty in words and in deeds. And when he was full forty years old, it came into his heart to visit his brethren the children of Israel. And seeing one of them suffer wrong he defended him, and avenged him that was oppressed, and smote the Egyptian: for he supposed his brethren would have understood how that God by his hand would deliver them: but they understood not." Also, Heb. xi. 24–29. "By faith Moses, when he was come to years, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter; choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt; for he had respect unto the recompense of the reward. By faith he forsook Egypt, not fearing the wrath of the king: for he endured as seeing him who is invisible. Through faith he kept the passover, and the sprinkling of blood, lest he that destroyed the first-born should touch them. By faith they passed through the Red Sea as by dry land; which the Egyptians essaying to do were drowned."

Moses, though heir to the throne of Egypt, understood by the promise made to Abraham, Gen. xv., 14, that the time had nearly arrived that God would "judge that nation," which had afflicted his people; and consequently, if he accepted the throne of Egypt, he could "enjoy" that "pleasure of sin" only "for a" short "season." Hence he chose, because he had faith that Israel was about to be delivered, to suffer affliction with the people of God, who were so soon to have a permanent settlement in the land of Canaan, while Egypt was to be devastated.

How great were the obstacles in the way of a literal deliverance. While unbelief murmurs and complains, faith triumphs over all. They have now passed the Red Sea; are there yet obstacles before them? Yes. There is the wilderness to pass—food to be supplied—clothing, etc. Nor is that all: Jordan is to be crossed, and mighty nations to be conquered. These were difficulties of no small magnitude. Before unbelief they were insurmountable; but faith travels on without staggering. Unbelief brings ruin—faith honors God and receives the promises. Faith sees a literal land, the subject of promise. Look at the testimony of Moses, Deut. i., 6–8, "The Lord our God spake unto us in Horeb, saying, Ye have dwelt long enough in this mount: turn you and take your journey, and go to the mount of the Amorites, and unto all the places nigh thereunto in the plain, in the hills, and in the vale, and in the south, and by the seaside, to the land of the Canaanites, and unto Lebanon, unto the great river, the river Euphrates. Behold, I have set the land before you: go in and possess the land which the Lord sware unto your fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, to give unto them, and to their seed after them."

They approach Jordan, and Moses desired to go over to "see"—what? a "spiritual land!" Let us see. Deut. iii., 25–28, "I pray thee let me go over and see the good land that is beyond Jordan, that goodly mountain, and Lebanon. But the Lord was wroth with me for your sakes, and would not hear me: and the Lord said unto me, Let it suffice thee; speak no more unto me of this matter. Get thee up unto the top of Pisgah, and lift up thine eyes westward, and northward, and southward, and eastward, and behold it with thine eyes; for thou shalt not go over this Jordan. But charge Joshua, and encourage him, and strengthen him; for he shall go over before this people, and he shall cause them to inherit the land which thou shalt see." All looks literal yet.

Are they to have a literal passing over Jordan? See Joshua, third chapter, throughout. Jordan passed, there stands Jericho—how is that to be taken? Surround it seven days, and blow the rams' horns. Is that spiritual or literal? How improbable that the walls of Jericho are to fall before the sounding of rams' horns! No matter how unbelief may view a subject, faith only desires to know what God has said, then it moves, however improbable or impossible unbelief may suggest the thing to be. "Now the just shall live by faith." That is the great principle of the Scriptures. Not by feelings, or by fancy: these change and vary continually; and the person who lives upon them is the constant sport of circumstances. But faith, having for its object the word and promises of God, when matured, is stable as the word itself.

Did the walls of Jericho fall? See Joshua vi. Truly all is literal yet. Then follow the wars which wind up by the literal seed of Jacob being put in possession of the land. Joshua xviii., 8–10, "And the men arose, and went away: and Joshua charged them that went to describe the land, saying, Go and walk through the land, and describe it, and come again to me, that I may here cast lots for you before the Lord in Shiloh. And the men went, and passed through the land, and described it by cities into seven parts in a book, and came again to Joshua, to the host at Shiloh. And Joshua cast lots for them in Shiloh before the Lord; and there Joshua divided the land unto the children of Israel, according to their divisions." See Joshua xxi., 43–45. "And the Lord gave unto Israel all the land which he sware to give unto their fathers: and they possessed it, and dwelt therein. And the Lord gave them rest round about, according to all that he sware unto their fathers; and there stood not a man of all their enemies before them: the Lord delivered all their enemies into their hand. There failed not aught of any good thing which the Lord had spoken unto the house of Israel: all came to pass."

Here the whole matter is settled. The land was not the new earth, nor the whole earth for all the land promised in the oath to their fathers they possessed and dwelt in, when established by Joshua in the land of Canaan. All is literal; and not one thing which God had spoken failed of accomplishment.

While we thus insist on these points, let it not be supposed that we do not firmly maintain that Abraham and all the saints that sleep in Jesus, as also the living saints, at the coming of Christ, will be made immortal and reign with Christ on the earth: we believe that, because we believe in the literal interpretation of prophecy; and this point is as clearly affirmed in prophecy as that the literal seed of Jacob should ever possess the land of Canaan and dwell therein; or, as that the remnant of that literal seed shall "again" be brought into that land, "from the four corners of the earth." Unbelief in any of these particulars is only an apology for hidden infidelity; that is, a secret thought in the heart that because we cannot see how these things can be literally fulfilled or accomplished, therefore God cannot or will not bring them to pass. This was the sin of those "whose carcasses fell in the wilderness." Let us fear lest we "fall after the same example of unbelief." God means what he says. Dare believe that, and act out that faith.

GOD SEEN IN HIS WORKS.

"For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse." Rom., i., 20

THE doctrine of the text seems to be this: There is enough that can be learned of God in the works of creation, even if men had no written revelation, to place them beyond excuse if they walk in disobedience and fail of an endless life. Paul says that the Godhead may be clearly understood by the things that are made. He does not of course mean the popular idea of the Godhead. For there is nothing in all the works that come from the creative hand of God that shows the Godhead to be a union of three persons in one. This, then, cannot be Paul's idea of the Godhead. And indeed, how any one can believe that it takes three eternal Gods to make one eternal God, to me is just as inexplicable as that a never dying soul can forever die. If we see the matter rightly, the Godhead is a union of attributes, or is made up of those peculiar characteristics that make a God. These can be seen in the works of creation, and so clearly seen, that all, whether they have the Bible or not, who walk in rebellion against the government of God, are entirely inexcusable, and consequently do so at the peril of a future life. This view entirely precludes any necessity of preaching the gospel to heathen nations after Christ comes, because they have not heard it before he comes. And let me say here, that when you prove to me that it is necessary to send the gospel to those who shall be alive on the earth when Christ comes because they have not heard it before, I am inevitably driven, as a logical sequence, to the conclusion that all who have died in the past without hearing the gospel, must have the same opportunity to hear it in the ages to come, For God is no respecter of persons.

The question may arise, if there is sufficient in the works of God in his creations to save, what need is there of the gospel? I answer, as the gospel is the greater light, more will be saved through its divine power than through the influence of the lesser light. But is there not an inequality here? I answer, No. There is no salvation in the bare letter of the gospel even. The gospel, to do us any good, must be written on the heart by God's Holy Spirit. When thus written, it possesses a sanctifying, saving power. It is not the amount of truth a man may have in his theological system that brings him into a saved condition, but it is receiving truth, be it in quantity little or much, through the vitalizing power of the eternal Spirit. How often have I witnessed religious controversy between two individuals, the one so thoroughly posted on all questions of dogmatic theology as to be able to drive his adversary into utter confusion, when at the same time there is vastly more of the spirit of the prize ring manifested in his manner of proceeding than of the meek and lowly Jesus. I have frequently, in my own heart, said, give me the chances of the unsophisticated, ignorant man, who in his unstudied simplicity has received what of truth he knows in its divine power through the Spirit of the living God, and therefore by it been made an experimental Christian. His prospects for an endless life I consider worth infinitely more than those of a mere theological pugilist, with all his intellectual knowledge of the things of truth. There is such a thing as suffering our intellectuality to eat out our vitality. And this seems to be the present condition of the larger portion of our people. This condition of things must be changed or we are all lost in death together. We should not lay aside an iota of our intelligence, but we should take on board a vast increase of spirituality.

The text at the head of this article was very forcibly impressed on my mind last spring, a few months before I had visited our much esteemed friends in Pawling, Dutchess Co., N. Y. At that time the earth was enshrouded in the cold icy mantle of a Northern winter. The ground was covered deep with a symbolic death robe of white, the trees were stripped of their beautiful foliage, and not a green thing appeared. Looking out upon those forest trees one would suppose that their bare limbs would never bloom in life again. And throughout all its extent no difference was discernible between the many trees that made up that forest wild. Every tree looked equally bare of life. Each one, as much as the other, gave no promise in its present look that it would ever again, in its puttings forth make the old earth glad. But O, how vast the change of a few weeks. Now those trees that a short time since towered majestic in their nakedness, like dead giants along the mountain sides, stand robed in deepest, loveliest green, to cheer the heart and please the eye with their lofty beauty. But all are not alike now. No; Some of them have no coronet of verdant green; no show of resuscitated life. With them there has come no change The same dreary barrenness that a few weeks ago hung over all, and made the heart contemplatively sad, is on them still. Why is it? We saw no difference last winter. Ah, I have it. There was a difference then. Those trees that look so lovely now, though they looked so then, were not dead. They were asleep. It only needed the genial rays of a summer's sun to send reviving life through all their limbs. But the others? they WERE DEAD. No matter how warm the rays of the clear sunlight may break and shimmer among their branches, and with their life invigorating touch feel among the fibres of their roots, no life comes back to them. What a fit emblem of the results of the great resurrection morn.

When that morn shall break, and the Son of righteousness shall arise, with healing in his wings, all the sleeping ones, those in whom is the germ of a future life, will rise renewed in eternal youthfulness and vigor. But those that are dead, dead in the absolute sense of the word, dead because they have no part in the life of Christ, will no more come forth to a future life than the dead and dry old oak on the mountain's top can be warmed into new life by the cheering rays of a vernal sun. Amen. S. W. BISHOP.

CHILDREN A BLESSING.

I REMEMBER a great man coming into my house at Waltham, and seeing my children standing in the order of their age and stature, said: "These are they that make rich men poor." But he straightway received this answer: "Nay, my lord, these are they that make a poor man rich; for there is not one of these whom we could part with for all your wealth." It is easy to observe, for the most part, that none are so gripple and hardfisted as the childless; whereas those who, for the maintenance of large families, are inured to frequent disbursements, find such experience of Divine Providence in the faithful management of their affairs, as that they lay out with more cheerfulness what they receive. And wherein their care must be abated when God takes it from them to himself, their faith gives them ease in casting their burden upon him, who hath more right to it, since our children are more his than our own. He that feedeth the young ravens, can he fail the best of his creatures when they cry to Him?—Bishop Hall.

THE IMMORTALITY OF THE SOUL.

THE doctrine of "the immortality of the soul" is taught in the Bible. It does not teach that souls are naturally immortal, but rather that they are mortal. "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." "Fear Him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell." Immortal souls cannot die or be destroyed, for that which is immortal is deathless and indestructible. The common theology of the day perverts the teachings of the word of God upon this point, and wrests from the Lord Jesus Christ his great prerogative, thereby degrading him from the lofty position in which the Father has placed him.

The Bible teaches how souls may become immortal. Christ is "the way, the truth, and the life." "In him was life." "I am the living bread which came down from heaven. If any man eat of this bread he shall LIVE FOREVER." In order to live forever, we must be made immortal; and to be made immortal, we must eat that bread which came down down from heaven. It is Christ's prerogative to give immortality to those who partake of his body and blood, for "except ye eat the flesh and drink the blood of the Son of man, ye have no life in you." Christ's office is not to make men's "houses," "caskets," "lumps of clay," "prisons," etc. immortal: it is to make MEN themselves immortal.

By looking carefully through the Bible, the words rendered soul and spirit are found 1,640 times, and in not a single instance can we find these terms preceded or followed by the adjectives "immortal," "deathless," "never dying," or by any others of like import. This is a fact of no small importance, which it would be well for every Christian to know. The masses are ignorant of it, and are persuaded that the Bible is full of such phrases as "the immortal soul," "the never dying soul;" "the deathless spirit;" etc., etc.

The Scriptures tell us that Christ "hath abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel." He does not teach men that they ARE immortal, but how they may BECOME immortal." God's law condemns the entire human race to death eternal, and if Christ had not died and RISEN again, then not only the dead who did not believe on Christ, but them "also which are fallen asleep in Christ are PERISHED." Christ's gospel is the good news of "life from the dead" through him, and he promises to raise all who believe in him, at the last day. "They which are accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead . . . neither can they die any more, and are the children of God being the children of the resurrection."

"To them who by a patient continuance in well doing seek for glory, and honor, and IMMORTALITY, eternal life. More anon, from your affectionate brother who has a "promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come," "through Jesus Christ our Lord."

HERALD OF LIFE Office.

CAMPTON, IOWA, Nov. 29, 1868.

BR. STORRS: I am very much interested in Br. Grim's Dialogues. It has set me to studying a good deal. I have been elected superintendent of a Union Sunday school this winter. But orthodoxy, so called, is mainly taught; for all the teachers are of that class. I have never paid anything to these orthodox preachers or their papers; but I have generally attended their meetings; yet almost always felt it was time lost. What ought I to do? I am almost persuaded that Br. Grim is right, but am not certain that his course would be the best, under all circumstances. For instance: I desire that my children should attend Sunday school in order to learn to sing. I should like to hear from others on this to me very important subject.

A brother has written to me about this country, desiring to come here to live. I wish others might conclude to come to Iowa. I have been praying for help. I think Iowa is a good place for a poor man; better than the older States. It is easier to clear up a prairie farm than a timber one. The only objection against Iowa is that it is cold; but it is no more so than New York.

One thing more. A friend of mine whom I had persuaded to take the HERALD OF LIFE for a while did not renew his subscription, and assigned as a reason that "he feared it might injure his mind so as to cause insanity." He is a plain, quiet man, a Methodist, and I should think his mind had hitherto been absorbed mainly with the things of this life. He was candid about the matter. I have no doubt his mind was agitated on religious subjects as it never was before; but I can hardly believe that reading and striving to live as taught in the HERALD will ever make any one crazy. I have sometimes felt that it it has kept me from going insane. Many a time it has soothed my agitated mind. As my friend's case is something new, perhaps you may have some reply to it.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—As your friend has not gone crazy under the old theology of eternal torments (provided he is really sane) you need not fear that his brain will collapse by thinking of or reading about "Life only in Christ." SAURIN wondered that his own mind remained sane with his view of eternal torture; and he was not surprised that many did become insane under the belief of that doctrine. No such result follows our faith.

THE EDITOR.

NEW YORK, Dec. 13, 1868.

THIS day completes seventy-two years of the life of GEORGE STORRS. Born 1796; gave his heart to God, in Christ, 1814; commenced his public work as a minister of the gospel, 1823 left all sects in religion, 1840; being satisfied that sectarianism was hostile to the development of God's truth in the heart, crippling research by established creeds, which virtually prevent advance in knowledge except in a sectarian line. At the same time he became fully settled that the theological idea of inherent immortality was without foundation in the word of God, and merely of human invention. From that time he has steadily refused to connect himself with any human organization claiming to be a church, being fully satisfied there is only one true church, and to add to that is the prerogative of God alone; and those who are truly members of it, have been "By one Spirit baptized into one body;" which is "the body of Christ," 1 Cor. xii., 13, 27. To this body God did at first add members; for, "the Lord added to the church daily," etc. Acts ii., 47. "And believers were the more added to the Lord, multitudes both of men and women." Acts v., 14. "And much people was added to the Lord." Acts xi, 24.

When sectarian churches are organized, God's order is reversed, and partisans add to to their respective organizations such as believe as they do; and if by chance any get into their body who advance beyond their faith or creed, they are excluded, unless they consent to put their light "under a bushel," or are so treated as to compel them to leave.

With such human arrangements GEO. STORRS has, for the last twenty-eight years refused to co-operate. He has stood upon the ground that he is a member and a minister in the church of Christ, not by any rites, ceremonies or other inventions of men, but by his reception, through God's grace, of the truth, and by the Spirit of God given unto him in Jesus Christ.

Though he has taken this position for himself, he extends fellowship to all who mani fest the spirit of Christ; but none on the mere profession of religion, if the Spirit of Christ is lacking. It is not a perfect agreement in everything that constitutes the harmony of true Christians; but the spirit of Christ ruling in each heart, and suppressing all desires to lord it over God's heritage; seeking not our own, but things that are Jesus Christ's.

The mind of the subject of these remarks has not stood still, but has advanced to the position that both future and eternal life are the gift of God, communicated only to such as become partakers of the divine nature; or, are "begotten again by the word of truth," and "by the sanctification of the Spirit," under whatever dispensation the Providence of God has placed them; and that it is not the amount of truth that has been made known to them, but the reception they have given the truth which God has manifested to them or placed within their reach. If that is heartily received and acted on, God accepts them as truly as if they had possessed the largest amount of the most favored of the race. The seed of truth is one everywhere and in all places; that seed taken into the heart is the seed of eternal life, whether it be great or small.

From 1843 to 1863, the subject of these remarks, with some interruption, issued a monthly magazine called the Bible Examiner. In 1863 the HERALD OF LIFE was commenced, and he became its Editor, which position he has filled to the present time.

Though he has passed through trials, some exceedingly severe, especially the death of his only son near two years since, yet he he has found, under all circumstances, the grace of God sufficient for him; and he desires to give glory to his Redeemer and Lord for that mercy which has brought him to this day, with peace of mind, and in bodily health unimpaired, except that he cannot endure as much continuous labor as in the more youthful days of his pilgrimage.

To his friends and brethren he feels under deep obligation for their support in matters temporal and spiritual; they have helped him much by their counsels and prayers. He believes those prayers have had much to do with the continuance of his life to this advanced period; and especially in such a state of excellent health, which was never better than this day. All his father's family (eight in number) have gone down to the grave between the ages of twenty and forty-five, except one brother, who died at the age of 77. How much longer the Lord designs to continue the life and labors of His servant, is a matter which does not concern him: but he trusts to spend whatever time is granted him in labor to scatter the light of "Life only in Christ" among his fellow men, and to show them that "GOD IS LOVE," and not that revengeful being which the theology of many centuries has represented Him to be; though it has been done by many "ignorantly, in unbelief." May that prove an excuse before our blessed and loving God.

ONE NUMBER MORE.

THE next number of the HERALD OF LIFE completes the first quarter of this volume. We presume all those who have taken the benefit of our offer to wait till the first of January for their subscription money will now secure the first numbers in the next month by a speedy remittance. By not doing so you may lose a part of the volume, as we cannot think of printing more papers than we have actual subscribers. And while sending your own subscription see if you cannot send at least one new subscriber for the remainder of the volume.

THE AGES TO COME.

"When you prove to me that it is necessary to send the gospel to those who shall be alive on the earth when Christ comes, because they have not heard it before, I am inevitably driven, as a logical sequence, to the conclusion that all who have died in the past without hearing the gospel must have the same opportunity to hear it in the ages to come; for God is no respecter of persons."—Br. Bishop's article on the outside of this paper.

BR. Bishop's "conclusion" is correct from his premises. If any one maintains that the gospel is to be preached to any left in the earth, after Christ comes, from a necessity of the case, then, to such, there is no escape from the "conclusion" of Br. Bishop. There may be those who hold to the necessity he speaks of, but we have no acquaintance with them, and do not recollect that we ever heard of such a class. If there is, we fully indorse the "conclusion" in the above extract.

Our position is, If the gospel is to be preached to any left on the earth, after Christ comes, it will be done of grace, or the free gift of God's mercy, and not because it is "necessary," or from necessity; that is, from any claim they, or any other human being has, or can lay God under obligation to do it, or make it "necessary" that he should send the gospel to them.

The question, therefore, is not, "Is it necessary?" but, Is there reason from the statements of prophecy and promises that the gospel will be proclaimed to those "left of the nations" after Christ comes?

By this form of the question we are "inevitably driven, as a "logical sequence, to the conclusion" that the good news of God's mercy to the "left of the nations" is to be proclaimed, or we must abandon the rational literalism of the Bible, for the mystical or fanciful construction of a multitude of Scriptural declarations on the subject.

The idea that God may not or must not give to one nation or people more or greater privileges or advantages than he does to all, is disapproved by the whole history of the world from the days of Abraham to the present hour, and is subversive of the established truth that God distributes his favors according to his own free will or pleasure; giving to some five, to others two, while a third has but one talent bestowed on him. In the distribution of his favors, God is a Sovereign; and is not restrained by any supposed or imaginary law from giving vastly more privileges to one nation or people, or to one age than another. Here is where the true sovereignty of God is manifested. But in judgment God is no respecter of persons. In this respect, what the Bible saith is our guide, "The Father, without respect of persons, judgeth according to every man's works." 1 Pet. i., 17, and parallel passages.

If it is contended that what God does for one nation or people he must do for all; or what he does for one age of the world he must do for all ages of the world, then it follows "as a logical sequence," that all people, nations, and previous ages, including the living and dead, must have the Bible put into their hands, because we have it, and they must be taught to read it because we are, etc.

In the twelth, thirteenth, and fourteenth centuries of the Christian era, it was death for a man to read the Bible in his own language. Suppose they had been told it was God's purpose, five or six centuries later, to have that Bible translated into every man's own language, with the privilege of reading it when he pleased, and putting his own construction upon it. That would have been an astounding announcement. But would they have been justified in saying, If that is so, then we are inevitably driven, as a logical sequence, to the conclusion that all who have died, and ourselves, also, must have the same privilege, for "God is no respecter of persons."

Grace, or favor, is free in its course, but the responsibility is only according to the opportunities individuals have for improvement; and the reward is not given according to the number of talents given, but according to the improvement made of them, no matter in what nation or age the individual has lived; for, "Of a truth, I perceive that God is no respecter of persons: but in every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted of him." Acts x., 34, 35.

Here is where God is no respecter of persons: He makes no man responsible for that which he never had and could not obtain. He knoweth who, among all nations, and in all ages, have acted up to the light or means they have had, and marks them for his own, when he shall make up his jewels: and though they have never seen or heard of the written word of God, yet he has "not left them without a witness," which they have given them "in themselves." Though their light may be dim, God is not unmindful of their struggles to conform to it, and he knoweth if they had the light we have they would improve it, and so he counts it to them for righteousness, through Jesus, though as yet they have never heard that name by the hearing of the outward ear.

Let the next age, then, exceed this a thousand times more than this has exceeded any previous one, if God wills it so. "Shall thine eye be evil because God is good?" Far be it from us. Let "God do what he will with his own." He will do us "no harm." Our business is to improve what we have, and do it now while our day lasts. If God has revealed a brighter and more glorious age or ages in the future, we have no cause to complain or find fault, for he has granted us the glorious privilege of being actors in making up the glories of those ages, if we will. It rests with us to say whether we will have part in the blessed "restitution of all things." If God is pleased to employ his immortal saints in carrying the glad tidings to the "left of the nations," after Christ comes, we for one, shall esteem it a blessed work; one which seems to us to be the most glorious of all work, to preach this purified gospel, which had been so deeply corrupted, and so awfully perverted as to make the blessed God appear more to be abhorred than the fancied devil of theology, because he is the Creator of countless millions to be eternally tormented, as the corrupted gospel affirms; while the theological devil cannot create, if he would, any one to such a destiny. When the gospel is purified from all the corruptions and blasphemies which arise from the doctrine of inherent immortality—that pool of pagan and papal miasma—what glory will shine forth on its beautiful face. With what delight then will the friends of Jesus go forth with the light of life. Truly, "Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father;" and on their glorious mission will they go like the lightnings Ezekiel saw in vision, chapter i., 4–14. Who among life believers would not rejoice to find it so? It is our firm persuasion that we shall find it so; and it is a cause of joy to our heart, however others may view it.

AN INQUIRY ON REV. XXI.

Is the New Jerusalem a literal city, or is it a symbol of something else? If so, of what, and where?

TRUTH SEEKER.

OUR opinion, with present light, is that the New Jerusalem, Rev. xxi., is the opposite of the "Great city Babylon," chapters xvi. to xix. If Babylon the Great is a symbol, in this Book, of a corrupt church, that has ruled and corrupted the earth, and which is to be destroyed in the judgments brought to view in those chapters—and if that Great city, Babylon, is also spoken of as a harlot woman, not a lawful wife—is it not likely that the harmony of symbols would require the true wife, the real Bride, the Lamb's wife, the true and glorified church, now to rule and bless the earth, to be also symbolized by a glorious city? And what more appropriate symbol could have been employed than that of Rev. xxi., which is also expressly called by the angel, who showed it to John, "The Bride, the Lamb's wife?" verse 9. One great city had been destroyed, chap. xviii., and is to "be found no more at all." At that destruction there is great rejoicing, chap. xix., 1–8; and in that rejoicing it is expressly said—"The marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready," etc. When these things were shown John, he fell at the feet of the angel, to worship him, but was forbidden; verse 10. Then follows an interruption in the regular narrative, which is not resumed till chap. xxi., 9. In chapter xix. John heard it said the Lamb's wife hath made herself ready; but as yet he had not seen her: his attention was called off to other subjects till chap. xxi. Here, it seems, the same angel as before [compare chap. xvii., 1, with xxi., 9], calls his attention to an exhibition of "the bride, the Lamb's wife," and exhibits her in contrast with Babylon, the corrupt woman, that had been destroyed. The symbol, then, "that great city, the holy Jerusalem," would be the most appropriate to exhibit the glory of the coming age, under the government of a "holy" church, glorified, with her head, as contrasting with the corrupt church that had been removed from earth and destroyed.

In further confirmation that chap. xix., 1–10 is immediately connected with this exhibition, chap. xxi., 9, on to xxii., 9, is the fact, that John is, at the last-mentioned verse, represented as doing the same thing that he did chap. xix., 10, viz., falling at the feet of the angel to worship him. It is not likely these were two different acts in John, but one and the same, though twice recorded. To suppose he had done this a second time, after having been forbidden, is to suppose that he attempted wilfully to sin. He might have done it once in mistake of the character of his instructor; but to do it a second time could have no plea of error, but must have been a deliberate act of attempted idolatry.

We come to this conclusion—the New Jerusalem, that holy city, is just what the angel declares it to be—"The Bride, the Lamb's wife"—the immortalized, glorified saints, who having been previously raised from the dead, or changed, if alive at the return of Christ, had been caught up to meet their Lord in the air, and now perfectly organized to enter upon the government of the "left of the nations," descend from heaven, and are presented to John's mind by one of the most glorious symbols imaginable. Into its composition nothing shall in any wise "enter that defileth, or worketh abomination, or a lie; but they which are written in the Lamb's Book of Life." verse 27.

One word more must now suffice. If our view is correct, this city will take its place on earth at the opening of the next age; and will not at all interfere with the Jerusalem to be rebuilt. All is harmony. The nations left on earth will walk in this "light of the world," this "city set upon a hill that cannot be hid." Then shall the angels' song, Luke ii., 14, be realized—"Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace and good will to men;" then shall there be, indeed, "Good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people;" then shall the oath of God to Moses have its accomplishment—"As truly as I live, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord."

THE SOURCE OF COMFORT.

THE well-known missionary, Campbell, for many years after his conversion had neither peace nor joy in believing. His faith was rather subjective than objective. Doubts, fears, and actual backslidings had often shaken his hope and driven him almost to despair, even at the time he was regarded by other Christians as a pattern. At last, as he said in a letter to the venerable John Newton, "The cloud which covered the mercy-seat fled away, and Jesus appeared as he is! My eyes were no longer turned inward, but outward. The gospel was the glass in which I beheld him. I now stand upon a shore of comparative rest. When in search of comfort I resort to the testimony of God; this is the field which contains the pearl of great price. Frames and feelings are, like other created comforts, passing away. What an unutterable source of consolation is it that the foundation of our faith and hope is immutably the same, the sacrifice of Jesus as acceptable to the Father as ever it was! Formerly the major part of my thoughts centred either upon the darkness I felt or the light I enjoyed. Now they are mainly directed to Jesus, what he had done, suffered, and promised."

AS THEN, SO NOW.—Suppose a person deeply perplexed about the state of his soul, continually fluctuating between hope and fear, and overwhelmed with grief, were to repeatedly utter this wish: "O that I certainly knew that I should be able to persevere." He might be answered thus: "And what wouldst thou do, if this certain knowledge were bestowed upon thee? Do now that which thou wouldst then do, and rest secure of thy perseverance."

Instead of indulging anxious inquiries into the future condition of our souls, we should apply ourselves wholly to know what was "the good and acceptable will of God," as the only principle and perfection of every good work.—Thomas aKempis.

"AGITATE, AGITATE."

Q.—What can we do with our minds always agitated?

Ans.—You can keep sober, and speak truth, and be just, and charitable, and godly. You can do all that God requires you to do. You have no need to neglect your duty because discussions are going on about doctrines. My mind has been investigating, seeking after truth, discussing subjects, changing error for truth, and darkness for light, for more than twenty years; yet I have never found it necessary to neglect my duty on that account. I have still kept practising the light I had, though my mind was in the dark, or in doubt on many other subjects. And why should not you do the same.

Q.—We want to have everything settled, and then—

Ans.—And I fear you want to be settled yourselves as well. I fear you want to have an easy, quiet, self-indulgent life. I fear you want to come to meetings to be pleased, excited, comforted, and to neglect the improvement of your minds in knowledge, and the exercise of your powers in spreading truth and righteousness. What many people seem to want is, liberty to fall asleep like the ten virgins. And this cannot be allowed at present. If people choose to have anything to do with us, they must expect to be kept awake, or to have very unquiet sleep.

Q.—But what talk you are continually raising about yourselves, by going on as you do. People would let you alone, I believe, if they knew where you intended to stop.

Ans.—Perhaps so, but we have no intention to stop at all. And if the world will not give over abusing us, till we can tell them where we intend to stop, they must just keep at it. We are not concerned about the world's abuse. If the world will not become Christian, we had rather it should abuse and hate us, than love and praise us. Our business is to do right, and to leave the world to take its course.

A LOVER OF TRUTH.

THE MORTAL RESURRECTION.

A DIALOGUE.

A.—Happy to meet you this evening, my brother; anything new?

B.—I am always glad to see you. As far as news is concerned, probably you are as well posted as myself. About the newest thing to me, however, is, that some of our brethren declare that the righteous dead will come from their graves as they went down into them—that is, mortal.

A.—Little behind the times, I see. Why, bless your heart, that doctrine isn't new: it is several years old. I've held that view more than three years.

B.—How is it that you have kept your light hidden all that time?

A.—Well, I will tell you. You know that this bothering non-resurrection view came out a number of years ago, and I came within one of getting into it all over. I got into it up to my neck, you see. There's our friend H.—he got into it over knee deep: M. got buried to his hips; and hundreds of others got into it more or less, but didn't get their heads under. You see we all believed that the wages of sin is death, and that the righteous would come up immortal. Of course, we couldn't help seeing that if all that was so, the world was judged before the resurrection, and the wicked needn't come up: for it would be foolish to judge immortal saints—just as foolish as it would be to send them to heaven at death, and then to judge them at the last day. This mortal resurrection for the saints has taken all the non-resurrection out of me, or rather it has taken me out of that; and my brethren are coming right over. They'll all be there before long.

B.—How is it, brother, that you and others, yes, many others, have opposed the non-resurrection view so strongly, and sometimes, in some instances, so bitterly, in the past? If so many of you come so near embracing it, why have you been so severe with those who embraced it fully.

A.—Well, I confess, come to look at it, it doesn't seem just right. You see when we held that the righteous would come up immortal, the non-resurrectionists would corner us awfully, and we didn't like to own up. We did get a little mad sometimes. Now and then we'd drive them into a sharp corner, but take it all in all, they had rather the best of it. But we are all right now. They can't do anything with us now. Everybody comes up from the grave mortal.

B.—Rather sorry kind of a confession. Strange it is that you were not a little more tender-hearted before adopting the new view. Well, let us hear some of your reasons for receiving the new doctrine. You of course can give a reason of the expectation that you have. I am quite curious to hear your strong points, and you will favor me much by producing them.

A.—I guess we'd better take the 15th of Corinthians. That seems to settle the thing.

B.—I agree with you there.

A.—May be you do; but we don't agree as how it's settled. You think it's one way, and I, another. Paul says "it is raised in incorruption." You think that that means coming out of the grave, and if it does, then you've got me. But it doesn't mean that. It means that they come from the dead mortal, and after they get up, they are changed to immortality, then they are raised up into the air to meet the Lord. That's the way of it, you see.

B.—I understand what you say, but I do not understand the apostle to declare any such thing.

A.—How are you going to get over it?

B.—I do not have "to get over it," as you inquire; I merely accept the apostle's teachings upon the point, which differ materially from yours.

A.—Let's hear how you take him.

B.—The phrases "It is raised in incorruption;" "It is raised in glory;" "It is raised in power;" "It is raised a spiritual body;"—were given in answer to two questions—

"How are the dead raised up?" and, "With what body do they come?" Some members of the Corinthian church had discarded the doctrine of the resurrection, and Paul answers their questions after having reasoned analogically, as above. The difficulty in their minds was not about the manner of saints going up into the heavens after their resurrection, but in regard to their coming out of the grave. If they had been puzzled in the way that your theory would intimate, their questions would have been, How are the dead raised up? and, with what body do they go up? But I must stop here. We will see each other again soon: then I will give you my views more fully.

A.—I'll be there. Good night.

THE COVENANTS:

G.—At our last we were speaking of Abraham's seed and traced it down to Jacob and Esau's descendants, but more particular in the line of Esau, to show that Abraham had a multitudinous seed who had no part in the promises spoken of in Isaac.

C.—From your conversation, then, I infer that you believe Abraham had two seeds, one to whom the promises were made, and the other were to enjoy blessings of a national character, not of the special promise made to the special seed.

G.—If you will permit me, I will give an extract or two from "Our Israelitish Origin," (page 58) which expresses my views exactly; and as he is one on your side you can have no objection.

C.—I have no objection to anything that will throw light on the subject.

G.—He says, "There may be some dispute as to what is meant by the seed of Abraham here spoken of, Gen. xii., 7. Is it an individual, or many? Is it an adopted or a natural posterity? It means One. This is plainly declared, Gal. iii., 16. 'Now to Abraham and to his seed were the promises made. He saith not, and to seeds, as of many: but as of one; and to thy seed which is Christ.' (Then to whom was the land promised?) It was Christ, then, to whom the land was promised. He is the Head, and only in him can the inheritance be enjoyed; none can come into the possession except as being viewed in him. 'Thou art worthy,' sing the four living creatures, and twice twelve elders, Rev. v., 8, 9. He only is worthy to claim the inheritance; having truly acted the part of a kinsman Redeemer; but he does not retain the possession to himself alone, the sole inhabitant of the land. No, although it is to One that the land is given, yet many come into the enjoyment of it through that One. And, accordingly, the song concludes thus, 'Thou hast made us unto our God, kings and priests; and we shall reign on the earth.' By this seed, therefore, is meant One, Christ, to whom the land is absolutely given, and in whose right a multitudinous seed come into the enjoyment of it."

Here we would be willing to rest the whole question, if Mr. Wilson did not spoil the whole by another paragraph, which we will give. "The question then comes to be, whether this multitudinous seed, viewed in the one seed, Christ, is the natural posterity of Abraham, or merely an adopted family, not the natural descendants of Abraham? The circumstances of Abraham at the time of receiving the promise, seemed to offer nothing but an adopted heir. The doubt, however, is resolved for him, Gen. xv. He had been complaining that not a son of his own, but that merely one born in his house was to be his heir. The Lord answers, 'This shall not be thine heir,' etc. Here the Lord distinguishes between a natural seed and merely an adopted seed, and at the same time speaks of the natural as being undoubtedly that which was spoken of. . . . He looked forward to the promised inheritance through the right of the One promised seed, through whom alone either he or any of his numerous progeny could come into the promised possession; and he stood accepted in Him, whose day he saw afar off, and seeing which, he rejoiced." Again Mr. Wilson says, "Now the question is, Was this numerous posterity with whom the Lord was to be always, and who would ultimately be given possession of the land, was it to come of Ishmael?"

We answer: that is not the question at all; and we think, like most of the writers on this question, Mr. Wilson loses sight of his own argument. He first proves the promise of the land was made to one seed, Christ; and even Abraham could only inherit through him. And then heturns back to ask the question, whether God intended Abraham's natural or adopted seed? If you can prove, and I think Paul has done that for us, that Christ is the One seed spoken of, one thing to my mind is clear, and I think settles the question in that direction.

C.—I have read "Our Israelitish Origin," but at the time the passages you have quoted did not strike me in the manner they do now; and he does seem to argue very strong for Paul's one seed, Christ; and then leaves that question as settled and goes on to prove the blessing is to Abraham's natural seed in the flesh. I certainly do not understand his mode of reasoning. But you say the question is settled in that direction. What do I understand you to mean?

G.—It is simply this: If the land was given to the One seed, Christ, and he now becomes the head, the natural seed there ends; for Christ had no natural seed. And if the title was invested in Christ, it must have ceased when Christ died; for he left no heirs in the flesh. But thanks be unto our covenant-keeping God, we are not left in such an emergency; for the promise was an everlasting one; and the seed to whom the promise was made must be of the order of an endless life to enjoy an everlasting possession of the land. And God brought him back again from the dead to enjoy his inheritance; and it seems to me this was Paul's idea of the promise when he said, "For the hope of the resurrection of the dead I am judged." It was a hope with Paul: "But this I acknowledge to thee . . . . so worship I the God of our fathers, believing all things which are written in the law and the prophets; having a hope toward God, which these themselves also look for (expect) that there will be a resurrection of the dead." It seems that the prominence of Israel's hope was a resurrection of the dead: "Concerning the resurrection of the dead I am judged by you this day." "According to the strictest sect of our religion, I lived a Pharisee. And now I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made by God to the fathers; unto which (hope) our twelve tribes earnestly serving day and night hope to attain; concerning which hope, O king, I am accused of the Jews. Why is it judged incredible with you that God should raise the dead?"

Now it seems to me that Paul associated Israel's hope of the promise God made to the fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, with the resurrection of the dead. It also seems to me that Jesus taught the same thing in Luke xx., when he said, "Now that the dead are raised, even Moses showed at the bush, when he calls the Lord the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, for he is not a God of the dead but of the living; for all live to him." All who? Why those to whom God has covenanted to give the land for an everlasting possession.

C.—But do you suppose the twelve tribes in Paul's day were earnestly serving God, hoping to come to a resurrection of the dead?

G.—I suppose Paul meant just what he said; but he tells us in Rom. x., 1, just what he meant. "Brethren, my heart's desire and prayer to God for Israel is, that they may be saved. For I bear them record that they have a zeal of God, (earnestly serving him day and night), but not according to knowledge. For they, being ignorant of God's righteousness, and going about (day and night) to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God. For Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth." And may our heavenly Father assist us all to see it.

REFLECTIONS ON A SICK COUCH.

A FEW days since while lying racked with almost unbearable pain, the thought occurred to me how could I bear even this forever? And how incomparably small is this to the mighty surge of infinite agony that is supposed, by our orthodox friends to roll eternally over damned souls in hell. It occurred to me again, that if I had a most bitter enemy it would aggravate my sufferings most intensely, to have that enemy stand and laugh me to scorn on account of my misery, and mock at my deep suffering. And still he would only be a man, and one, too, from whom I could expect no good, either in act or wish. But these same orthodox friends tell us that when the unshrived souls of the damned in hell shall send up their deepest wails of woe, they shall not only be held in perpetual derision by horned and cloven footed immortal devils, but an infinitely mighty God from his burning throne of fire shall look down on their eternally increasing pangs in torture, and mock them in their inconceivable suffering, and hold an everlasting jubilee over their matchless misery. And as much as God is higher than angels, men, or devils, so much more potent to increase their sufferings in the dismal den of woe, will be the laughing mockery of an all-powerful Jehovah. Our minds draw back in horror from such a picture, and we wonder not that so few among earth's sons and daughters can be persuaded to love and serve such a God as this.

S. W. BISHOP.

"ABIDE WITH US."

AFTER the death of Jesus, the disciples were for a time sunk in the deepest despondency. That He who had called the dead to life, subdued at a word the most obstinate diseases, and so commanded the winds and the waves that they obeyed him—that he should die, and die such a death, was to them appallingly mysterious. They had heard the bitter taunt, "He saved others, himself he cannot save;" and now it really seemed as if such was the fact. All was dark, mysterious and dreadful: and who can conceive the desolation of heart which they suffered!

In this condition, two of them had occasion to go to Emmaus, a village some eight miles distant from Jerusalem. As they walked along, they conversed earnestly about the awful events which had just transpired; and the more they talked, the more they were perplexed. At length they were joined by a stranger, who kindly inquired, "What manner of communications are these that ye have one to another, as ye walk, and are sad?" Cleopas seemed to be surprised at the question, and supposed that their new acquaintance must certainly be a stranger in Jerusalem, or he would have known all about the death of their Great Master. In the simplicity of their natures they supposed that what filled their hearts must of course have occupied the thoughts of all others.

In the fulness of his heart Cleopas gave to the stranger a comprehensive account of the character and death of Jesus of Nazareth, "a prophet mighty in word and in deed," and alluded, in impressive terms, to their crushed hope of the redemption of Israel.

So far the stranger heard him with attention and sympathy, and then, to their astonishment and delight, he told them more of Jesus than they ever knew. His words of wisdom, and knowledge, and love, caused their hearts to burn within them, while he opened to them the Scriptures. Their perplexity was gone; their sorrow was turned into joy; all seemed bright again.

Still the wondrous, the eloquent, the good stranger remains unknown. That it was Jesus himself seems never to have entered their minds; but already they begin to love him with something like the fervor with which they had loved their Lord and Master. They could not bear to part with him; so when they reached the end of their journey, they uttered the earnest entreaty, "Abide with us, for it is toward evening, and the day is far spent." He readily consented, and at their evening repast "he took bread and blessed it, and brake, and gave it to them." Then were their eyes opened, and they knew him; and although he instantly vanished out of their sight, he left behind him such joy in the hearts of these good men, that, without a moment's delay, they hastened back to Jerusalem to carry the joyful news to the other disciples, that "the Lord is risen indeed."

In this transaction we see a beautiful example of not only the love of Christ, but the love of the brethren. With child-like confidence the disciples made known to the benevolent stranger the cause of their own sorrow; and when he entered into their feelings, and cleared up their doubts and perplexities, they loved him only as Christ's disciples can love. Whoever the stranger might be, they soon discovered that he was like Christ, and was his friend; and hence they gave the kind invitation, "Abide with us."

It was really a prayer, though they knew it not. Jesus accepted it as done to himself, for indeed it was done for his sake.

Jesus has since ascended to his Father and our Father, to his God and our God, but he has left ample provision for the comfort and joy of all who truly believe. Still may we with perfect confidence say to him, as did the disciples of old, "Abide with us," for he has said, "Lo, I am with you always." And again, "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." And again, "He shall give you another Comforter, that shall abide with you forever."

"Abide with us." We cannot say this to Jesus in sincerity and in truth unless we love him; and if we do really love him, there is no petition which we may offer with greater confidence. Hear what he has said: "If a man love me he will keep my words; and my Father will love him, and will come unto him, and we will make our abode with him." Can anything be more explicit? The very thing that the two disciples asked, is here emphatically promised. But hear him again: "Behold I stand at the door and knock; if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and sup with him, and he with me." With what entire propriety and perfect confidence, therefore, may we adopt the language of the disciples, and say, "Abide with us."

Joseph, when he made himself known to his brethren, who had so deeply injured him, said, "Come near to me, I pray you." The language expressed fervent affection. So does Jesus desire his brethren to come near to him, whose love as far excels that of Joseph as the infinite excels the finite.

Jesus loved John with a peculiar affection, and why? Because John's love to him was more like that of a little child than any of the otherss—closer, more simple, more confiding —more of that perfect love which casteth out fear. That is the love we shall have in the kingdom; but John, and many others of John's spirit have shown us that it is attainable on earth. Let us ponder deeply the import of the words as addressed to Christ, and then let us adopt them as our ever fresh and ever potent prayer. Like a key they will open our hearts to Him who promises to come in and sup with us, and make his abode with us. —Selected.

FROM ABRAHAM PENNELL.

HONEOYE, N. Y., Dec. 2, 1868.

BR. STORS: It is now going on one year since I have had the reading of your paper, and in all this time I have not been in the least frightened by the astounding "heresies" that it advocates. I have found nothing in it that I have not believed for years; and when I say this, I do not wish to be understood as saying I have derived no advantage from its perusal. It has very much helped to make things clearer that were already clear. I did not know there were so many that believed as I did. One of God's prophets once thought he was alone; but his error was corrected when he was told that "seven thousand had been reserved, who had not bowed the knee to Baal." I wonder why he did not persist in his imaginary and fanciful notion, when he was told his mistake. Was he not more tractable than modern prophets? who will not be corrected or convinced of their errors by the word of God, or the persuasion of the lovers of truth; eager to bow the knee to the great Moloch of natural immortality, eternal hell torments, with the addition of an eternal tormenting devil, and other kindred delusions.

Those Ephesians were no exception to the race, who collected in the streets and cried at the top of their lungs, "Great is the goddess Diana of the Ephesians;" for, they had that never-to-be-disputed argument that, "all the world were the worshippers" of it.

No man at the present time would be entitled to much honor for having found that the Ephesians were laboring under a great mistake.

How long before the Ephesian error was entirely corrected, we cannot say. How long it will take to correct the theological errors of the present day, the future alone must disclose.

Certain it is, that some of them are being exposed; and the day will come when they will be looked upon as we now look upon the Ephesians. All who have made this discovery now rejoice, and thank God for being delivered from a burden, under which many good people have groaned and died. But we do not take any honor to ourselves for having made any great discovery. Rather are we deeply humbled that we so long believed, and were led by fallible men, instead of the plain, truthful teaching of a kind and loving God, who formerly spoke by his prophets, but in these last days by his Son; and never has He told us by the prophets or his Son, that we have an immortal soul to save, or eternal torments to shun, or a tormenting devil to fear; but, on the contrary, has told us that we are mortal; that the soul that sins shall die; that he that hath not the Son shall not see life.

I did not intend to write an article for publication: my pen has rambled over a sheet of paper, and I have not told you that I cannot do without the HERALD, nor can I forbear saying that I think you are doing a greater work that Nehemiah in building up the walls of Jerusalem, though yours is tearing down, somewhat, at the time of building up. May God give you strength to work till Jesus comes.

Inclosed find three dollars for another volume of the HERALD. Yours in hope of life at the appearing of Jesus.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—Br. Pennell's reference to the work of Nehemiah, in building up the walls of Jerusalem, reminds us that, at times that servant of God was almost discouraged. He was beset by professed friends who tried to persuade him to cease from the work; and when not successful in that way, they ridiculed his work, saying, "That which they build, if a fox go up, he shall even break down their stone wall." At other times it was the complaint of some that, "The strength of the bearers of burdens is decayed, and there is much rubbish; so that we are not able to build the wall." Truly we have found much rubbish, and have had to do a good deal of "tearing down," which is not a pleasant work, and makes often much dust; and our adversaries, on every side, and some of them inside, have kept up constant plottings to draw us aside from, or hinder us in our work, so that we have been compelled to hold a sword in one hand and build with the other, as Nehemiah and his workmen did; and we say, as he did, "Think upon me, my God, for good," etc. And God has thought upon us for good, and caused the work to go on in spite of all opposition from friends or foes, inside or out of our camp. To Him be all the glory and praise now and forever.

FROM EMELINE WOOD.

ALBANY, N. Y., Dec. 7, 1868.

BR. STORRS: I have been from home assisting a family, the mother of which met with an injury which disabled her.

I went on Saturday and part of the Sabbath to assist her with her cares and family; so that I could not go out with the Campaign Documents on the Sabbath as usual. I have only a few left, and as our dear brethren and sisters are so kind as to furnish means for more, I shall be very thankful for more for distribution. We love to go, and our dear Father in heaven blesses us much in our labor that we feel to go on, and the blessed Jesus is with us. The first Sabbath we went out we found our Father directed our steps away off on the very edge of a great hollow; and as I went along, I thought, What can we do here? But we saw a little girl, and asked if there were any children there that would like to go to Sabbath School? She said, yes, up stairs. So we went up and found a family just moved from Troy, and they had five children, and were glad to see us, and said they wanted to have their children in the S. School; and their father said, he had made up his mind to serve the Lord, and they were glad of the tracts; and we expect to hold prayer meeting there next Sabbath, if the Lord will. A Br. has promised to join us for an hour. We have had no repulses, as yet; the Lord goes before us and opens the way; and if we could only go often I do think that they would be glad to get the tracts, and hear us talk on the Life views. They seem to understand them. They love to hear us talk. I do wish you could hear sister Earl: how plain she makes it; but it sets them thinking, and I hope searching; that is the only way to get those blessed truths; and how they come up to the mind as we talk. My faith is increasing that those Documents will do great good in Albany; and after the first of January I can go out more than now; as I do not have time, only Sunday afternoons. My heart gives glory to our God for all His goodness to us in making us instruments in going about as our dear Saviour did when here upon earth. We love this blessed cause, and I pray that it may be the means of saving the purchase of that blood that was spilt on Calvary for them and us who are partakers of his sufferings; then we will partake of his glory. I often think how weary He must have been, ofttimes; and how he must have pitied poor fallen man in all afflictions: how his heart must have been moved at the pool of Siloam to see their helplessness and their eagerness to reach the troubled water to be healed of their diseases, and how they must have rejoiced at his presence to heal; and then to hear Him say, "Thy sins are all forgiven;" and when I think of redeeming love to redeem us from our sins with His most precious blood, I am lost in wonder at the thought of his dying for me; and now I want to love souls so as to do all I can to win them to Christ. I feel to pity those who will not believe in him and his precious word, which maketh wise to salvation.

I pray that Jesus may enrich those dear ones that are so kind as to help us so nobly. It is said, "They that water shall be watered again." May God give them double.

THOMAS W. VAUGHN, in Western Michigan, writes: I am on the shores of Lake Michigan, wandering through the giant forests of this northern region, where the lumberman's axe first breaks the echoes through the mountain gorge, while felling the stately pine, and moving them down the streams to be converted into material to build the poor man's cabin or the rich man's palace; and as I contemplate the scenes around me, as I travel from camp to camp, and from port to port, surrounded by at least 10,000 of these hardy sons of the forest and the mill, whose thoughts seldom extend beyond a few commonplace ideas connected with their present circle of enjoyments and aims, deprived as they are of the bread of life, and living "without God and without hope." How can I do otherwise than speak kindly to these children of toil and point them to higher aspirations and aims to be obtained by seeking the society of Him who came to "preach good tidings to the meek." I wish my funds would allow it; I would scatter our tracts where they would be read with much more interest than where other reading matter is so easily obtained.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We have sent you some forty copies of the HERALD OF LIFE and a quantity of tracts to scatter; and will send more soon as we have the means to do it, which we trust will be soon. Let us know soon if what we have sent reach you.

JOHN H. FENTON, Newark, N. J., sends $10, and writes: I am glad that our paper is yet published; and I shall endeavor always to contribute to its support as our heavenly Father gives us the means. I feel to do all I can for the spread of the truth as advocated by you in the HERALD OF LIFE, viz., Life only for those whose life is hid with Christ in God; and that at the resurrection of all His saints. May the Lord bless the efforts being put forth by the Life and Advent Union in the cause of truth.

SAMUEL MORGAN, New Rutland, Ills., writes: I feel to thank God for such a paper as the HERALD OF LIFE, which contains such a glorious truth as "Life only in Christ." Brethren and Sisters, let us be faithful in the discharge of those duties which rest upon us. I am about to remove from this place, and expect to go where the people know but little about the plan of redemption and the coming kingdom. I have many papers, pamphlets, and tracts, published at the HERALD office; and by the Lord's help I will circulate them where I go. I desire an interest in all your prayers. Yours in hope of eternal life.

E. D. HUTCHINSON, Corinna, Me., writes: I am unable to find language to express my gratitude to you and the brethren, and more especially to God, for sending such a glorious organ as the HERALD OF LIFE through which to communicate the word of God to the world in its true light. It came, too, in the right time, and in the right place to combat spiritism, that most blasphemous of all isms that ever disgraced God's beautiful earth. That old lie of the serpent, in my judgment, has been and will be the means of destroying thousands of precious lives, unless the Lord's mercy rise above their sins of ignorance.

E. D. HITCHCOCK, Springfield, Mass., writes: I have seen the HERALD OF LIFE and wish to become a subscriber, as I think the paper advocates the truth of the Bible, part of which I have just embraced through the labors of Br. Burbank; that concerning the non-resurrection of the ungodly. I felt, as many do, that he was in error; but the sweet spirit he manifested while presenting the subject led me to listen with an unprejudiced mind. I feel like praising the Lord that He inclined my ear to hear and my heart to receive this great and glorious truth; and I gladly welcome trials, persecutions, and if need be the loss of friendship, if I can be instrumental in causing one sinner to believe in the God of love and not seek him through fear, but because He "so loved the world that He gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life." This text seems so beautiful to me now; it is so like our Father. May God bless you, and aid you in spreading this great light, is the prayer of your unworthy sister in Christ.

HE that dies a martyr, proves that he was not a knave, but by no means that he was not a fool; since the most absurb doctrines are not without such evidence as martyrdom can produce. A martyrdom, therefore, by the mere act of suffering, can prove nothing but his own faith. If, as was the case of the primitive Christian martyrs, it should clearly appear that the sufferer could not have been himself deceived, then, indeed, the evidence rises high, because the act of martyrdom absolves him from the charge of wilfully deceiving others.

VARIOUS NOTICES.

THE NEW ECLECTIC MAGAZINE is published by TURNBULL & MURDOCH, 54 Lexington st., Baltimore, Md. Terms, $4 per annum.

Vol. IV., No. 1, January, 1869, is received. It is a monthly octavo of 128 pages; very neatly executed, and seems to be attractive. It is made up mainly from other magazines, intending to "embody the best features of them all."

"ONCE A MONTH." This is the name of a new magazine, 16mo., of 96 pages, double columns. In its size it is a novelty for a large monthly. Published by T. S. ARTHUR & SONS, 809 and 811 Chestnut street, Philadelphia. Terms, $2 a year.

Vol. I, No. 1, for January, 1869, is received. It is pleasing in its appearance and seems filled with interesting reading. We must confess our inability to speak definitely of any of the magazines sent us, because of lack of time to examine them.

OBITUARY.

FELL ASLEEP IN JESUS, Nov. 30th, SARAH, the beloved wife of Br. HENRY F. JOHNSON, of the City of New York.

Sister Johnson suffered much and long; but in her patience she possessed her soul. Hers was a meek and quiet spirit; not demonstrative or excitable in her manner, but calmness and kindness marked all her ways. Often, in years gone by, have we been a partaker of her Christian hospitality, which always made us feel at home at her habitation. She calmly fell asleep in Jesus in the presence of her sorrowful husband and three daughters, all of whom sadly feel her loss and the desolation of their home by her absence. We spoke at her funeral to many who probably never heard the Life views before. May her death be life to her friends and loved ones. EDITOR.

Poetry.

The Old Mother and her Daughters.

BY ELD. J. PARRY.

A FAMILY of great renown,
Decked in the regal red,
Born on the seven hills of Rome;
Still on the old homestead.

The head of this ancient household,
Gray, and stricken in years,
Once in her prime and glory, called
Kings and princes her peers.

Her glory is now on the wane,
And tottering to its fall;
Her fears and dangers are great,
Her hope and comfort small.

The old lady has seen her day,
The morn was fair and bright,
The shadows of evening portray
A dark and stormy night.

By the signs of the times we know
Her race is nearly run;
The blood of the saints on her skirts
Calls on their Lord to come.

The foundation on which she stands,
And all her daughters, too,
In the day of trial must fail,
If God's word still be true.

"The soul is immortal," they say,
"How can it ever die?"
"The soul that sinneth it shall die,"
Makes this vain boast a lie.

Both reason and Scripture agree
That mortal man must die,
And without revival from the dead,
In death's cold arms must lie.

This comes to the critical point:
Whom shall we now believe?
The sure word of the true God, or
The serpent's tempting Eve?

If we go with the multitude,
The serpent gains the day;
But few, we are told, will be found
Treading the narrow way.

Protestant, papal, and pagan,
In one, are all these three,
However else they may differ.
In this they all agree.

"The immortal soul is the man;"
The universal creed
Of saint, sinner, savage and sage;
All the world are agreed.

From this prolific parent spring,
Spread wide beneath the sun,
All poisonous weeds, and deadly fruits
That have the world o'errun.

All pagan gods and goddesses,
Worshipped on heathen land;
From north to south, from east to west,
On this foundation stand.

Purgatory, and prayers to saints,
And never ending woe,
To millions of our fallen race,
On this rank soil will grow.

Going to heaven or hell at death,
Before the judgment day,
That contradicts the sacred word,
And leads men far astray.

Witchcraft, both ancient and modern,
Full of deceit and guile,
From Endor's witch to Cora Hatch,
Its thousands still beguile.

The soothing, universal pill,
That many prize so high,
All these bring grist from the old mill,
"Ye shall not surely die."

Embrace this truth, "Eternal life
Only in Christ is found,"
And all these God-dishonoring creeds
Fall prostrate to the ground.

This simple truth, like David's sling,
Will lay the Gathite low,
And all his nomerous progeny,
Nor need another blow.

Come, little band of faithful ones,
Your light no longer hide,
But let the truth of "CHRIST OUR LIFE,"
Be scattered far and wide.

Minding.

"CHARLIE, come in, I want you," said a sweet womanly voice to a little boy who was playing marbles on the sidewalk in front of a nice brick house.

Now Charlie was very busy, and in the midst of a delightful game. He was as happy as could be. To quit his play then was like quitting the table when half through dinner. Would he obey. We looked with interest to see what he would do. What would you have done?

Charlie replied, "yes, mother," and picking up his marbles, started off with a smiling face and a bounding step up the side yard, and in at the end door of the house. A fine boy, that, I thought, as I looked after him. I wonder who he is? What a beautiful thing it must be to have a little boy or girl that will mind at once, and with a happy, loving heart! I wondered what would become of that boy, and wished to see more of him and learn his history.

I used to walk past that house every week, and always thought of that blue-eyed, light-haired boy. The thought of him made me happy. I saw a great many naughty children. Once I spent two or three days in trying to find a naughty boy who ran away from his home and overwhelmed his parents with grief; and when I found him some one had stolen his coat and hat, and bundle of clothes, and all the money he had. Once I chased after a truant boy and girl for several hours, and at last, late at night, found them in the woods, wet through, cold, and almost frightened to death. They had disobeyed their mother, and gone to play instead of going to school, and both of them were sick for several weeks in consequence of their folly and exposure. A boy that minds—he is a jewel.

I had been in business a year or two, and in that time had had several boys; but it was next to impossible to find one that would mind. At last I was quite out of patience, and I determined that I would have no one who could not bring the best recommendation, and stand the closest test. Several applied for the place, but no one suited us. At last came a blue-eyed, flaxen-haired youth of twelve years, with a bright, honest face. There was something engaging in his aspect. Had I seen him before? "What is your name?"

"Charlie Warren, sir. I live in Franklin street. My father is a carpenter, but is lame now, and cannot work, and I have got mother's consent to go into a store, if I can find a place."

It was the very Charlie whom I had seen playing at marbles. I remembered the circumstance, and knew that he would mind. I did not need a recommendation for him, but gave him the place, and twice as much pay as I had proposed to give.

Charlie came to work on Monday morning. It seemed hard for him, the first week of work, but he behaved like a man. The boys in the next store came in and made his acquaintance. One morning I heard two of them trying to persuade Charlie to go off with them down on the wharves in the forenoon and see a boat race that was to come off. "No," said Charlie, "mother told me to mind my business, and I am paid for staying here, and don't think it right to go off without my employer's knowing it."

That was a brave word, and I thought more of Charlie than ever.

That was ten years ago. He has been with me ever since, and proved to be the best clerk I ever had. Yesterday we put up a new sign, and on it, in large gilt letters, was Charlie's full name. The store is his own. He is now a prosperous, promising young man, and if he lives, will be a rich, honored man. And all this because one bright morning he minded his mother when she called him. From such little things do great results come. Always mind, and it will be always well with you.—Ladies' Repository.

To Br. Cadwell.

I WAS surprised at your remarks on the "Living Soul" tract. You seem to think it "confounds God with his works." Now nothing is more foreign from the author of that tract than the doctrine of Pantheism, "which identifies the universe, or nature, with God." And on looking over the tract carefully, I find no expression savoring Pantheism more than our faith in the Omnipresence of God. His presence in all things, and in all places, does not make all things and places any part God himself.

You think you cannot be mistaken while it is asserted,

"All are but parts of one stupendous whole,
Whose body nature is, and God the soul,"

But how the doctrine of Pantheism is found in these few lines is a mystery to me. The lines are a quotation from Pope, who did not believe in Pantheism, but taught us to "look through nature up to nature's God;" making nature one thing and God another.

And all the objectional couplet affirms is, that the BODY, consisting of many parts, is one great whole, and God is the soul of it. This is no more than saying, that the omnipresence of God fills all the parts of one stupendous whole; or in other words, fills all nature. There is, however, a little poetic coloring in the expression.

"Whose body nature is, and God the soul."

If we take the word soul in the popular sense of an immortal soul in man, the expression would be very objectionable indeed. But I presume that not one reader in a thousand would take that meaning of the word, especially in poetry. The two lines borrowed from Pope are in exact harmony with the 'Living Soul" tract: in which matter is represented under many different forms, all of which are endowed with a certain something which is called Life, for the want of a better term. The subject is a very sublime one, and the little tract is far from doing it justice. The habits, qualities, faculties and attributes of animals, vegetables and minerals, are truly mysterious and wonderful; and many a pious man has said that, "God is in all his works," and that, without being suspected of Pantheism; though by a bolder figure of speech than Pope used in the two lines borrowed from him in the tract. It is a short and simple way of expressing a fact, though not philosophically correct. I once, at a camp-meeting, convinced an Atheist of the existence of a God. I took a single blossom from the field, and showed him its organs, its stamens, pistils, ovary, etc., and finally got him to acknowledge their uses and design. I then asked him, Who made it? He looked very thoughtful awhile, and then said, "Nature made it." Very well, said I; then nature had a design to accomplished, and wisdom to carry it out, and looking forward to next year provided means to ripen seed for another crop of the same kind. He admitted it: as no rational man could doubt it. I then said if what he called nature, could look ahead one year she might ten years or ten thousand: and if she foresaw what would be next year she might foresee what would be in any future time, and reveal it to men. He readily admitted it; but said, I did not know that she did. I then referred him to prophecies and made him admit that they were fulfilled. I saw him but once afterward during the meeting. He had given up the battle, but said he could do very well with the rest of the preachers: but you, said he, "are a hard case."

Now would it be wrong to say, I showed him a God in that flower? It would be but a figurative expression. No, Br. Cadwell, whatever faults you may find in that tract, depend on it, its author does not "confound God with his works." The Creator and his works are separate and distinct from each other. We look through his word and his works to gain a knowledge of his existence, his wisdom and goodness.

Z. CAMPBELL.

ASHTABULA, O., Dec., 1868.

Stability a Vital Element of Christianity.

THERE is evidently implanted in man an inherent desire to place his hopes and invest his interests in that which possesses stability. Especially do the prudent and thoughtful instinctively shrink from that which betrays frailty and fickleness, and lay hold on those things which bear indications of firmness and strength.

The expressions of the good of all ages combine to illustrate the confidence and reverence that the changeless nature of the Deity inspires in man; and we may well imagine that without this characteristic, though omnipotent and omniscient, he would fail to command man's adoration.

As we listen to Abraham of old from the grove of Beersheba, he calls "on the name of the Lord, the everlasting God." The grand chorus in the Song of Moses, after recounting the wonderful dealings of God, closes with the utterance, "The Lord shall reign forever and ever," thus expressing the profoundest confidence in God's eternity, and his everlasting dominion in the world and the church. And as he is about to die, as if to reassure the children of Israel, Moses, who had talked with God as it were face to face, cries out, "There is none like unto the God of Jeshurun." . . . . "The eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms."

The inspiration to adoration awakened by the eternity of God, and the changelessness of his being, is sublimely expressed by the Psalmist as he contrasts the frailty of man with the duration of God: "Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting, thou art God." "I said, O my God, take me not away in the midst of my days; thy years are throughout all generations; of old hast thou laid the foundations of the earth; and the heavens are the work of thy hands. They shall perish, but thou shalt endure; yea, all of them shall wax old like a garment; as a vesture shalt thou change them and they shall be changed. But thou art the same, and thy years shall have no end.

So, likewise, do the Scriptural representations of God, addressing himself to man, frequently point to the divine recognition of this element in man's nature, in the often repeated assurances that God is changeless and eternal.

When Moses had been commanded of God to go unto Pharaoh and bring forth the children of Israel, he asks of God, "Behold, when I come unto the children of Israel, and shall say unto them, The God of your Fathers hath sent me unto you; and they shall say to me, What is his name? what shall I say unto them?" . . . . "God said unto Moses, I am that I am. And he said, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I am hath sent me unto you"—thus declaring to Moses and to the children of Israel that he was eternal and changeless; "He who is and who will be what he is." Again, when God would reassure him, he says, "I am the Lord! And I appeared unto Abraham, and unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, by the name of God Almighty, but by the name of Jehovah was I not known unto them"—plainly informing Moses that he was God All-sufficient.

While man is thus assured of the immutability of the being and purposes of the Deity, he also seeks for like elements in the character of his fellows, though he may not expect to find them in like perfection in finite beings; and no fact is more manifest than that a fixedness of purpose and life, and an unmistakable stability of character, is essential to an individual growth in grace, and to any real influence for good in the church and world as a disciple of Christ. The New Testament teachings ever point in this direction.

Regarding the office of the Saviour relative to the law and the prophets, he says: "For verily I say unto you, till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled." The fundamental idea of the church of Christ involves stability. Jesus says to Peter, "But whom say ye that I am?" Peter answered, "Thou art Christ, the Son of the living God." Then Jesus announced the fact that should inspire in every man the profoundest confidence in the Christian church, "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church. And the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." And most clearly does the Saviour set forth the relationship of his true followers to the church, himself, and to God, when he says, "I am the true vine and my Father is the husbandman." . . . . "Abide in me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself except it abide in the vine, no more can ye except ye abide in me." "I am the vine, ye are the branches." . . . . "If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered." Paul, in writing to the Colossians, carries out the same idea of the relation of the disciple to the Master, when he exhorts, "As ye have therefore received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk ye in him." "Rooted and built up in him, stablished in the faith."

As did Isaiah of old, so must the disciple of to-day set his "face like a flint" if he will make advancement in the Christian life; nor can he further the cause of truth unless he practice the apostolic injunction, "Be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord." Such living has a reflex action on the character that exemplifies it, while it bears a weighty testimony to both the good man and the unregenerate, of the vital power of Christianity. The moral power and grandeur of such living is best illustrated by those words of the apostle, which for eighteen centuries have thrilled so many human souls when he says, "I have fought the good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith." "Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness which the Lord the righteous judge shall give me at the last day." Nor can other than such as he claim the crown, for only "He that endureth to the end shall be saved." "These are they which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the lamb." These in life are "like the tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season," and whose experience is like that of Job, though a thousand trials surround him, when he said, "I know that my Redeemer liveth."

But in every phase of life there are found those in whom the element of instability seems to predominate, some of whom would evidently seek to form a Christian character; but their course is almost certainly disastrous to themselves and the progress of true religion. On the mountain or in the valley; basking in faith's brightest sunlight or groping in the blackness of darkness and doubt, singing songs of rejoicing or bitterly murmuring at the dealings of Providence, are the vacillating experiences of such minds. Truly it is said of them, they "have no root in themselves;" and most fitly are they portrayed in the parable of the sower and the seed. Nor can there be hope for such till they shall learn to draw constant nourishment from Christ, the living vine, who will impart to them the nutriment that alone can form a real Christian character.

The duty of the church is to inspire in the minds of men a sense of the power and stability of Christianity. To them alone the work is left on earth. "Ye are the light of the world," are the words of Jesus. The church, then, is the representative of Christ and his religion to men. From this fearful and yet glorious responsibility it cannot be released. Men, angels, the redeemed, and the Father and the Son wait to witness the earnestness and fidelity with which she will perform her work.—Zion's Herald.

"Almost Home."

O HOW sweet these words sound to my poor heart; how glad I am that this world is not my home. O how oft, amid trials and temptations, I sigh for home where the glory is for all, and all are glad. Bless and praise the Lord that Jesus has promised to come again and receive us to himself, that where he is we may be also. How this blessed thought comforts my lonely heart. I long for the day when immortal youth shall bloom; and bright shall beam each eye, when we shall meet the loved of earth and never part again. Many now lie sleeping in the dust; but soon they will come forth clothed with immortality; neither can they die any more; for they will be equal unto the angels. O truly this is a blessed hope; it bears us up while passing through this wilderness of woe. Then, dear pilgrims, let us take courage a new, and victory will soon be ours. A few more losses and crosses; a few more trials and temptations; a few more scoffs and frowns from the ungodly, and we will go home. All the storms will soon be over, and in glory we will reign. Glory to God, I feel I am willing to suffer here, if I can have a home when Jesus comes to claim his own. Yes, storms may howl and clouds may gather; all must work for good to me. Let us watch and pray, and the battle ne'er give o'er. We can well afford to suffer a little while here, for our sufferings are not to be compared with the glory that is to be revealed when Jesus comes.

Weary pilgrims, cheer thee up, then,
Press thee on a little while:
Soon the pearly gates will open
Then you will meet a Father's smile.

There thy rest will be eternal;
Weariness will never come,
And thy days will be supernal
For with Christ thou wilt be at home.

Dear sinners, do you not want a home in the kingdom? Then fly, O fly to the Saviour before the door of hope and mercy is forever closed. Jesus loves you; he wants you to be saved. Delay not another moment; salvation is free for you and me. O prepare to meet thy God.

Delay not, delay not, O sinner, to come,
For mercy still lingers and calls you to-day;
Her voice is not heard in the vail of the tomb,
Her message unheeded will soon pass away.

The Struggles of Life.

[The following communication was sent us, accompanied by this note:

"Hoping some good and no harm may come from this narration. With the respects of DAVID P. HOLTON, 154 West 54th St., N. Y. To the Editor."]

THE FRESHETS.

HEAVY strokes of the axe had subdued forest acres, and the growing wheat gave promise of sustenance to the industrious couple and their four little children.

The father had erected a saw mill, cloth dressing and other structures.

The freshet came, the mill dams were swept away, the wheat, nearly ripe for harvest, was prostrated and blasted.

New structures were laboriously, yet hopefully made to appear, and the lumber interest added to the fields for cultivation.

It was the second freshet, a few years later, that was followed by the greatest financial difficulties in the family——; and O! how our heart did beat, how our tears did flow, as, for debt, the constable drove away the laboring oxen—most of the boards and other lumber having been swept away by the rapidly rising floods.

The emergency was great—not, however, leading to despair. The elder son, bordering upon manhood, and then anxious to accompany his young associates from New England to the distant Ohio, yielded his preference to the needs of his parents. Vigorously, manfully, and benevolently, did he come to the rescue.

Hardships and exposures had brought the mother to a state of great suffering, under rheumatism, entirely disabling her for walking and the ordinary duties of the household. Then it was the two daughters assumed the domestic duties; while the younger son, a lad of eleven years, volunteered to labor with a creditor, thus to cancel one of the small debts.

Prosperity crowned the united effort. The elder son, Erastus A. Holton, became a highly respected citizen of his native town, and rejoiced in the ample and honorable provision he was enabled to secure for his parents during their declining years, near to whose grave now repose the mortal remains of that dutiful son, at Westminster, Vt.

Miriam Holton, the younger sister, past twenty years of age, commenced attending the Academy at Limerick, Me., where she qualified herself to become a teacher.

Subsequently having taught in Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts and Connecticut, she went to New York City; where for many years, with her younger brother who had preceded her, she successfully conducted a Boarding and Day School for young ladies.

By theory and example she strove to create in her pupils industrious habits and a just sense of the compound values of labor judiscioly applied, and a profound respect for laborers, in whatever field of God's Providence they may be employed beneficially toward the well being of His creatures. She strove to create in her pupils that independence, that individuality of character and purpose which would enable them (not as craving sycophants,) to move onward for the good of humanity.

She did not count the passing trials of life as hindrances to true progress. She practically remembered the fearful freshets above named, as being the occasions of positive good.

Miriam Holton Brown died at Le Claire, Scott County, Iowa, Nov. 8, 1865; and her remains are buried on the Prairies west of the Mississippi.

Her school having been the first in New York city in which Physiology and Hygiene were introduced as prominent branches of study, she did, by her last will and testament, bequeath over sixteen thousand dollars to her executors, to be devoted to the diffusion of knowledge and information of and upon the said subjects or branches of study.

Fancy Run Wild.

THE APPROACHING CHANGE IN THE EARTH'S INCLINATION.

PERMIT a further reference to this deeply interesting subject. It is right to speak with caution, for on such a subject mere assertions would not go for much. Yet if I am not very wrongfully impressed, this tremendous change is impending, and the huge globe on which we are so quietly and firmly located, is about to swing around through several thousand miles of space, taking altogether a new angle of inclination. Certainly the earth is not to be obliterated from space, for "it abideth forever." But we may reasonably conclude that it will be situated with reference to the sun so that in the millennial age there will be a beautiful equableness of temperature, and an exemption from those elemental agitations and derangements to which it is now subject. (Of course this is not spoken with reference to the new Jerusalem, the city of the saints since God will be the glory of it.)

In this stupendous movement, the earth would naturally in the first instance pass beyond the fixed position it is designed to assume, and then receding, pass through a series of oscillations back and forth until it should reach the ultimate poise prepared for it. Can we realize the sensations which a tenant of the globe in this series of extraordinary movements would experience? What a feeling of awful insecurity, of gliding, of sinking, of ruin about to engulf all things, would reasonably be expected to overwhelm the voyager in this fearful plunge? What a rushing and roaring of the atmosphere, kindling into flame? Let me just quote in this connection from the thirty-fourth chapter of Isaiah, and let the reader diligently ponder the prophetic picture in the light of the catastrophe involved is this critical motion of our "mundane sphere." I omit very much: "Behold, the Lord maketh the earth empty and maketh it waste, and turneth it upside down, and scattereth abroad the inhabitants thereof. Therefore the inhabitants of the earth are burned, and few men left. Fear, and the pit, and the snare are upon thee, O inhabitants of the earth. The earth is utterly broken down, the earth is clean dissolved, the earth is moved exceedingly. The earth shall reel to and fro like a drunkard, and shall be removed like a cottage, and the transgression thereof shall be heavy upon it, and it shall fall and not rise again." That is, it will undergo this sudden rotation with a kind of plunge, and never resume its original position. C. COLEGROVE.—Voice of the West.

ON all books and pamphlets sent by mail, the postage has to be pre-paid.

SIX SERMONS on the Inquiry. Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. BY GEO. STORRS. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—" the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the true teachings of the BIBLE is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an in valuable help to understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.

No. 1. EARTH, NOT HEAVEN, is to be the inheritance of the saints. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS. Price 5 cents.

No. 4. THE SOUL SAVED OR LOST. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS. Price 5 cents.

No. 5. MORAL DEPRAVITY; by GEO. STORRS. Price 5 cents.

No. 7. DOOM OF THE UNGODLY: OR THE WICKED DEAD REMAIN ETERNALLY UNDER DEATH'S DOMINION. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS. Price 5 cents.

No. 8. THE WAGES OF SIN; by a Presbyterian Clergyman. Price, 5 cents.

No. 10. LETTERS TO A CLERGYMAN; or Life only through Christ not a heresy; by Dr. J. K. FINLEY, Pittsburg, Pa. Price 5 cents.

The foregoing tracts are 16 pages octavo. They will be sold at $3 per 100, or, fifty cents per dozen, free of postage.

No. 9. THE ESSENTIAL BAPTISM; by the EDITOR of the Bible Examiner, 32 pages. Price 7 cents.

The following are 12mo Tracts, of 24 pages each

MAN'S NATURE AND DESTINY; or the Animal Man and the Spiritual Man. A Sermon by GEO STORRS. Price 5 cents.

THE ATONEMENT, by GEO. STORRS, and THE GOSPEL HOPE, by the same; both works now printed in one Tract. Price 5 cents.

TERMS OF THE HERALD OF LIFE

Two Dollars a Year; or, 48 numbers; One Dollar for six months; or, 24 numbers; invariably in advance. When served by Carrier in New York City, 20 cents additional.

The Postage on the HERALD OF LIFE, prepaid quarterly or yearly at the office where it is received, is 20 cents a year, to any part of the United States. The postage to Canada and the British Provinces is also 20 cents a year, and must be prepaid in New York; for such papers, therefore, the price will be $2 20 a year, or $1 10 for six months.

We can not undertake to prepay postage upon newspapers, except where the law obliges us to do so; that is, anywhere out of the United States.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ALL LETTERS relating to the HERALD OF LIFE, whether on business or other matter, must invariably be addressed:

GEO. STORRS, Box 4,658, New York.

ALL NAMES of persons sent us, should be written plain, so that we shall not have to guess them out. Also in ordering, the name of the POST OFFICE, COUNTY AND STATE must be given, and written plainly; and if a CHANGE is called for, state the Office to which the paper has previously been sent. Unless attention is paid to all these matters confusion and delay are inevitable.

MAN'S NATURE AND CONSTITUTION.

BY DR. J. K. FINLEY.

THE folly of basing the doctrine of a spiritual entity, as a part of man's constitution, upon the word soul, is evident from the fact that the same word, en-phsh, is translated forty-two different ways, or has that many different meanings in the Bible. Truly, when we consider the tremendous consequences that are drawn from this doctrine, the foundation is ridiculously small; it is like attempting to build a pyramid on its apex instead of its base.

Another of these weak assumptions, in proof of a spiritual entity, for they do not deserve the name of arguments, is the expression "breath of life," or as the Hebrew has it breath of lives, "chayim," being in the plural number. Orthodoxy contends that this implies animal or temporal life, spiritual life and immortal life. It is all that will be necessary now to show the groundlessness of this assumption, to let the reader know that the same form of expression is used with reference to all the lower tribes of animals—15th verse, chapter vii., already referred to. "And they went in unto Noah into the Ark, two and two of all flesh wherein is the breath of life, "chayim." The phrase undoubtedly means that man, who was created after the other animals, breathed the same breath or vital air that sustained all other lives. But the assumption chiefly relied upon is one derived from the expression used by God in the soliloquy, or self communing, found in the 26th verse of chapter i. "And God said, let us make man in our image, after our likeness, and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth." It is said because God is a Spirit, therefore it shows that man must be a spirit, and that the expression, our image and likeness, teach this. The fact that God, in his account of the formation or creation of man, tells us expressly that man, not a part of him, not his body as distinguished from something else, but man was "formed of the dust of the ground," should be a sufficient refutation of the assumption. Professor Bush, professor of Hebrew in the New York University, and who was regarded as one of the best Hebrew scholars in the world, in his notes on Genesis, says: "It does not appear that these two words, image and likeness, materially differ in import from each other. They are probably used together merely for the purpose of making the expression more emphatic." That the "image of God" implies a likeness to him in moral attributes is plainly intimated in the words of the apostle, Col. iii., 10, when he exhorts Christians "to put off the old man with with his deeds, and to put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him." But there can be as little doubt that the phrase in this connection denotes primarily the possession of dominion and authority. This is evinced by the words of the ensuing clause, "let them have dominion," which is to be regarded as explanatory of the term "image." So the apostle, 1 Cor. xi., 7, denominates the man the image and glory of God, especially as being "the head of the woman," or having pre-eminence over her. The expression implies that man was appointed by the Creator, to sustain toward inferior animals a relation strikingly similar to that in which he himself stands toward man, and hence that man upon earth represents or bears the image of God in nearly the same sense in which the governor of a province is said to represent, or bear the image of his sovereign.

Prof. Bush's notes on the Old Testament are regarded by the leaders of orthodoxists as fully equal to any, and superior to most others. Prof. B. admits that the account of man's creation does not teach the fact of his possessing a spiritual nature, and in addition says, "Indeed it may be remarked that the Scriptures generally afford much less 'explicit evidence' of the existence of a sentient immaterial principle in man, capable of living and acting separate from the body, than is usually supposed." If he had said they never give any explicit evidence, he would have been fully sustained by the truth.

We have now examined the account of man's creation, and find that it gives no support whatever to the commonly-received notion that he is a being composed of two distinct natures, one material and the other immaterial, but that he is a unit formed from the dust of the ground.

We are told that if the body has no spiritual nature, is don't seem possible to be converted; that it is the soul that feels, thinks and understands, and that it is this part of the man that is converted; that, if without this entity, he cannot be brought to appreciate or be influenced by moral considerations. Now, I would ask, do not the inferior animals give undeniable evidence of mental emotion and affection? The horse, dog, elephant and other animals, display affection, memory, gratitude for kindness, and in some instance a degree of ratiocination, capability of being taught many things, and even a sense of responsibility to their masters. Now these are mental phenomena, such as theologians say proceed in man from the operations of the soul.

We see, then, that the brains of these, and perhaps, to some extent, of all animals, do evolve thought; and if God can cause the inferior animals to produce this result, without calling in the aid of a speculative nondescript entity called the soul, who will presume to affirm that he cannot produce similar results by the more perfect organization of man's brain? Will any person professing to believe in the God of the Bible dare to say that man cannot be so constituted as to go beyond their powers in this respect so far as to be conscious of moral obligations and responsibilities, without the aid of a fancied immaterial entity being superadded? Especially as we have no account of such an entity entering into his constitution. To all such objectors we would say: "Do ye not therefore err, because ye know not the Scriptures, neither the power of God?" To my mind it is much more absurd to expect thought and emotion, or mentalization in any form, from an immaterial something, if we can call it something, than from a material organization.

I have spoken of the soul as a nondescript, and so far as the Bible is concerned, the expression is correct. But our Orthodox friends, who would be wise above what is written, have tried to get up a description of their own, seeing that the Bible does not furnish them with one. One of the leading Presbyterian papers published in Philadelphia, says: "The soul has no parts: it is uncompounded and indivisible; having by its very immateriality a natural power of perpetual duration, it cannot perish." Verily, the learned editor who wrote this description, and it is the description of metaphysicians generally, might fearlessly assert that it could not perish; he might with equal propriety affirm that nothing could not perish; and, indeed, his definition of a soul is about as good a definition of nothing as can be devised. How much wiser it is for us, creatures of very limited powers, to believe the unqualified declaration of him who made man and knows what was in him—"Dust thou art."

In my next I shall take up the question, "Does the Bible teach that any part of man is inherently immortal?"

Yours Truly, J. K. FINLEY.

MATERIALISM.

THOSE theologians who take fright at materialism, and affect to be wiser than their Maker, may be profited by the following extract from Dr. Chalmers, on the "new heaven and new earth"—"according to God's promise.'

There is a limit to the revelations of the Bible about futurity, and it were a mental or spiritual trespass to go beyond it. The reserve which it maintains in its informations we also ought to maintain in our inquiries—satisfied to know little on every subject, where it has communicated little, and feeling our way into regions which are at present unseen, no further than the light of Scripture will carry us.

But while we attempt not to be "wise above that which is written," we should attempt, and that most studiously, to be wise up to that which is written. The disclosures are very few and very partial, which are given to us of that bright and beautiful economy, which is to survive the ruins of our present one. But still there are such disclosures—and on the principle of the things that are revealed belonging to us, we have a right to walk up and down, for the purpose of observation, over the whole actual extent of them. What is made known of the details of immortality, is but small in the amount, nor are we furnished with the materials of anything like a graphical or picturesque exhibition of its abodes of blessedness. But still somewhat is made known, and which, too, may be addressed to a higher principle than curiosity, being, like every other Scripture, "profitable both for doctrine and for instruction in righteousness."

In the text before us there are two leading points of information, which we should like successively to remark upon. The first is, that in the new economy, which is to be reared for the accommodation of the blessed, there will be materialism, not merely new heavens, but also a new earth. The second is, that as distinguished from the present, which is an abode of rebellion, it will be an abode of righteousness.

1. We know historically that earth, that a solid material earth, may form the dwelling of sinless creatures, in full converse and friendship with the Being who made them—instead of a place of exile for outcasts, it may have a broad avenue of communication with the spiritual world, for the descent of ethereal beings from on high—that, like the member of an extended family, it may share in the regard and attention of the other members, and along with them be gladdened by the presence of him who is the Father of them all. To inquire how this can be, were to attempt a wisdom beyond Scripture; but to assert that this has been, and therefore may be, is to keep most strictly and modestly within the limits of the record. For, we there read that God framed an apparatus of materialism, which, on his own surveying, he pronounced to be all very good, and the leading features of which may still be recognized among the things and the substances that are around us—and that he created man with the bodily organs and senses that we now wear—and placed him under the very canopy that is over our heads—and spread around him a scenery, perhaps lovelier in its tints, and more smiling and serene in the whole aspect of it, but certainly made up, in the main, of the same objects that still compose the prospect of our visible contemplation—and there, working with his hands in a garden, and with trees on every side of him, and even with animals sporting at his feet, was this inhabitant of earth, in the midst of all those earthly and familiar accompaniments, in full possession of the best immunities of a citizen of heaven—sharing in the delight of angels, and while he gazed on the very beauties which we ourselves gaze upon, rejoicing in them most as the tokens of a present and presiding Deity. It were venturing on the region of conjecture to affirm, whether, if Adam had not fallen, the earth that we now tread would have been the everlasting abode of him and his posterity. But certain it is, that man, at the first, had for his place this world, and at the same time, for his privilege, an unclouded fellowship with God, and, for his prospect, an immortality which death was neither to intercept nor put an end to. He was terrestrial in respect of condition, and yet celestial in respect both of character and enjoyment. His eye looked outwardly on a landscape of earth, while his heart breathed upwardly in the love of heaven. And though he trod the solid platform of our world, and was compassed about with its horizon, still was he within the circle of God's favored creation, and took his place among the freemen and the denizens of the great spiritual commonwealth.

This may serve to rectify an imagination of which we think that all must be conscious—as if the grossness of materialism was only for those who had degenerated into the grossness of sin; and that when a spiritualizing process had purged away all our corruption, then, by the stepping-stones of a death and a resurrection, we shall be borne away to some ethereal region, where sense, and body, and all in the shape either of audible sound or of tangible substance, were unknown. And hence that strangeness of impression which is felt by you, should the supposition be offered, that, in the place of eternal blessedness, there will be ground to walk upon, or scenes of luxuriance to delight the corporeal senses, or the kindly intercourse of friends talking familiarly, and by articulate converse together, or in short, anything that has the least resemblance to a local territory, filled with various accommodations, and peopled over its whole extent by creatures formed like ourselves—having bodies such as we now wear, and faculties of perception and thought, and mutual communication such as we now exercise. The common imagination that we have of paradise on the other side of death, is that of a lofty aerial region, where the inmates float in ether, or are mysteriously suspended upon nothing—where all the warm and sensible accompaniments which give such an expression of strength, and life, and coloring, to our present habitation, are attenuated into a sort of spiritual element, that is meagre, and imperceptible, and utterly uninviting to the eye of mortals here below—where every vestige of materialism is done away, and nothing left but certain unearthly scenes that have no powers of allurement, and certain unearthly ecstasies with which it is impossible to sympathize. The holders of this imagination forget all the while that there is really no essential connection between materialism and sin—that the world which we inhabit had all the amplitude and solidity of its present materialism before sin entered into it—that God, so far on that account from looking slightly upon it, after it had received the last touch of his creating hand, reviewed the earth, and the waters, and the firmament, and all the green herbage, with the living creatures, and the man whom he had raised in dominion over them, and he saw everything he had made, and behold it was all very good. They forget that on the birth of materialism, when it stood out in the freshness of those glories which the great Architect of nature had impressed upon it, that then "the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy." They forget the appeals that are made everywhere in the Bible to this material workmanship, and how, from the face of these visible heavens, and the garniture of this earth that we tread upon, the greatness and the goodness of God are reflected on the view of his worshippers.

A SHORT SERMON.

BY D. J. E. TO LIZZIE G.

"What is man?" Heb. ii., 6.

THIS is an important question, the right understanding of which is necessary that we may know the true relation which now exists between man and his CREATOR, and that we may realize the importance of the incarnation and death of our Saviour Jesus Christ.

For nearly six thousand years that man has lived upon the earth, he has attempted to prove himself to be much more than he really is. Not more than what he may be; not more than what an all-wise CREATOR designed that he should attain to, as the result of a life of obedience to the laws and requirements of his Maker. In searching for an answer to our text, we have nothing to do with the writings of pagan or heathen philosophers; we care nothing about what any man, however good or great he may have been, has said or left on record, whose writings are not found in the sacred volume. "To the law and to the testimony, if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them." We therefore come to the unerring word of God, given in language that we can understand, and so plain, "That a wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err therein."

"And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul." In this plain and simple account of the creation of the first man, we discover that he was of the same material from which all the other animals were made, namely, from, or of the earth; that the same breath was given him which was common to all the animal creation; that when this vitalizing breath came into the organized clay, this form of man became a living soul.

Behold the man! placed over all the animate creation; the whole earth given him for his dominion; with a capacity for developing a mind and character unlimited in its expansion and excellence. I say, capacity for developing a character; for Adam had none to begin with; he was a mere infant with a man's stature. The first thing he must learn is obedience, that he may continue in harmony with his Maker. Therefore a law was given him with a penalty attached to it, which he must suffer should he violate that law. We find that Adam was placed under the least restriction that it was possible to make. Without some restriction it was impossible for him to develop a character and test his obedience to God. "Of every tree thou mayest freely eat; but of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it; for in the day that thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die;" or, "in dying thou shalt die."

As simple as was the prohibition, our first parents did not stand the test, but yielded to to the persuasions of a serpent, and partook of the forbidden fruit.

The law now being broken there was a knowledge of sin; and when the Lord was calling him to an account, Adam and Eve hid themselves for very shame for what they had done; and then they gave the foolish excuse that it was because they were naked. They had now come under the condemnation of the law, which was death; which was sooner or later to overtake them. They must be driven from the garden, for therein stood the tree of life, the partaking of which would render them immortal in sin. They must go abroad on the earth, now cursed for their sakes, that they might be subjected to a severe training, that through patience in suffering, through death and a resurrection from the dead, they might be fitted for a higher life.

The broken law demanded the life of Adam, and the record goes on to say, "That all the days that Adam lived were nine hundred and thirty years; and he died." It was the very man Adam that God had made 930 years before, from the dust of the ground, that died; his breath went forth, and he returned back to his original dust; "For dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return."

But how shall Adam live again? The law has taken his life, and death holds him in his strong embrace. Thanks be unto God, a Saviour was then promised who should ransom him from the power of the grave, and give him life again; eternal life.

At the appointed time the "seed" (Christ) appears; but suddenly he is cut off from the land of the living, and is laid away in the grave. Why did he die? He was not subject to the law of sin and death, for he had not broken any law; therefore it could have no claim on him. But he willingly died for man. He went down into the grave, not to remain but to triumph over it; and now holds the keys of death and the grave.

On that bright morning when my Beloved shall appear, He will unlock the prison doors of his saints, sleeping and they will come forth shouting:

"Where is thy sting, O death,
And where thy victory, boasting grave?"

"Behold, I come quickly. Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus."

"DEFINITE TIME."

THE HERALD OF LIFE of Dec. 9th, contained an editorial from which we cut the following:

> However, the above statement of Adam's age is just about as sensible as many attempts to find out the difinite time of an event of which the Saviour has said, "Take ye heed, watch and pray: for ye know not when the time is." Prophetic events show us when it "is near." That is all the authority we have for knowing its approach.

If this presents the actual teaching of the Scriptures, it is very important and very different from what we suppose the Bible teaches.

In several late numbers of this paper, a Mr. White has attempted to prove that the "year-day theory" is untrue. His arguments were so futile and so glaringly inconsistent, we suppose the well-read Bible readers of the HERALD OF LIFE detected his errors, and let them pass.

We think the doctrine taught in the extract we have quoted, is almost as pernicious; and coming from the powerful pen of the Editor, whose words and writings deservedly command respect, we think they deserve criticism. One word on "the year-day theory." If there is any prophet that commands profound respect and admiration, it is the prophet Daniel. Nearly all of the good, the great, and learned divines and preachers, who have written and spoken on religion and religious subjects, have agreed that the visions of Daniel commenced about the time when he lived and reach to the resurrection of the dead. So we believe; but if Mr. White is correct, and the 2,300, 1,290, 1,260, and 1,335 days are to be interpreted as literal days, the whole book is a bundle of absurdities, and better never have been written; for in that case it has only been a great puzzle to entrap the most godly minded men that have ever lived. We repeat it, if the periods of time spoken of in Daniel do not reach to the resurrection and the second advent, then there is no resurrection or second advent taught in the Bible; and Unitarianism and spiritualists are correct, and these events are in the past, or are to be interpreted as spiritual manifestations only.

In answer to the editorial, we cannot conceive, if prophecies are not to be understood as to time, why Daniel, who was so persistent determined, and anxious to know "how long it was to the end of these wonders," should have been informed, told in numbers, put in figures that it was to be so many years from certain events.

Again we ask, if those numbers and figures were not to be understood, why were they recorded? If they are revelations they will be understood. If not, then, they are only riddles without answers, and make fools of intelligent, honest inquirers after truth. This cannot be; for the Saviour instructed us, and said, When you read what the prophet Daniel says, "Whoso readeth let him understand." And we are told in the short chapter (Daniel xii.,) which contains four periods in figures, that "the wise shall understand."

It is more than probable, judging from the Scriptural language, that neither the Apostles nor the Saviour then knew the "time;" for it is said, "No man knoweth the day nor the hour," etc. But this does not prove or deny that no man will ever know the time. All men of intelligence know the time of the French Revolution; and although it is in the past, and every event has been recorded, yet no man can say he knows the day or the hour of that tremendous revolution.

Time, as marked by exact numbers of years, measuring long periods, is certainly correct. We may not have the precise date, or know the day or the hour; but time or numbers of years, as recorded by the great prophet Daniel, is true, and will yet be understood. Our Advent brethren fix the date of the French Revolution 1793. But they could with as much propriety fix it the year before, when it really commenced; or in 1794, when Robespierre was executed; or in 1795, when Bonaparte conquered the revolution or rebellion, and restored peace.

But the objector says, the Adventists have made mistakes, and miscalculations. Yes, and there have been mistakes made at first, and during long periods of time, while important discoveries were in progress; mistakes in philosophy, science and religion.

It requires study, faith, and time to unravel the most beautiful and wonderful science of prophecy. But like all great truths, the more studied, the more glorious and perfect they appear. A good book to read about these times is Faber on the Prophecies. Although he wrote sixty years ago, he describes the times in which we live as vividly and as truly as if writing last year. FAITH IN MAN AND CHRIST.

SIMPLE illustrations of the method by which faith may be exercised, are often effective in relieving a troubled sinner from doubts and fears. The following incident shows how readily men trust in the word of their fellow-men, and how much more reason they have to trust the word of God:

It was a time of spiritual awakening in a small manufacturing town. The foreman in a department of one of the factories became anxious about his soul. He was directed to Christ as the sinner's only refuge, by many, and by his own master among the rest; but it seemed to be without result. At last his master thought of reaching his mind, and bringing him to see the sincerity of God in the gospel, by writing a note, asking him to come to see him at six o'clock, after he left "the work."

He came promptly, with the letter in his hand. When ushered into his room, his master inquired:

"Do you wish to see me, James?"

James was confounded; and, holding up the note requesting him to come, said:

"The letter! the letter!"

"Oh!" said his master, "I see—you believed that I wanted to see you; and when I sent you the message, you came at once."

"Surely, sir! surely, sir!" replied James.

"Well, see, here is another letter sending for you by one equally in earnest," said his master, holding up a slip of paper with some texts of Scripture written on it.

James took the paper and began to read slowly:

"Come—unto—me—all—ye—that—labor," etc. His lips quivered; his eyes filled with tears; and like to choke with emotion, he thrust his hand into his jacket pocket, grasping his large red handkerchief, with which he covered his face; and there he stood for a few moments, not knowing what to do. At length he inquired:

"Am I just to believe that in the same way I believed your letter?"

"Just in the same way," rejoined the master. "If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater."

This expedient was owned of God in setting James at liberty. He was a happy believer that very night and has continued to go on his way rejoicing in God his Saviour, to point others to Calvary, and walk in the narrow way.

Reader, if anxious about your salvation, be persuaded to believe God, when he speaks to you in his word, in the same way you would credit the word of honorable man, and you will obtain peace through the precious blood of Christ. "He cannot deny himself."—Christian Treasury.

SILVER AND GOLD.

"SILVER and gold have I none," said Peter to the cripple at the beautiful gate of the temple; "but such as I have give I thee." The hopeless man extended his long, thin hand for a penny; but instead received a perfect cure.

Silver and gold are good in their places, but there is something better. They secure to us the comforts and luxuries of life; take away the fear of want and dependence; afford means of culture and refinement; and are an instrument in blessing and saving mankind.

Life is better than silver and gold. "All that a man hath will he give for his life." Money, watches, jewelry, are nothing worth when the steamer is sinking, or the flames pursue a man.

Health is better than silver and gold. Disease is bribed with heavy sums. The best skill of the nations, and the climates of the world, are tried at any expense.

An unbroken family is better than silver and gold. Often a man would deed away all his property to save the life of a beloved wife or child, while that life is fading away with a rapidity which his wealth cannot stay.

Innocence and peace of mind are better than silver and gold. Many a man, after some great sin, would buy back at heavy cost his former state; but sin and Satan laugh at his hoard of gold. They have got his virtue and peace, and will not sell at any price.

Salvation is better than silver and gold. It is the costliest thing in the universe, but is not for sale. Every drop of Christ's blood is worth more than a globe of gold. Many a man thinks he is willing to give half he is worth to save his soul; but salvation cannot be bought. A man with a room full of gold may perish, and another be saved who does not leave two coins to close his eyelids.

There will be no use for silver and gold in heaven. We read of streets of gold, and crowns of gold, of golden censers and golden vials, but of no coin to purchase the various and tempting forms of bliss. Friends put no pockets in the shroud, and the white robes of the redeemed will need none, for there is no money wanted to secure admission to the choicest scenes in the heavenly city.

Let the man who has silver and gold turn a portion of it into comfort to the poor, and spiritual life to the lost, and it will be invested where death cannot part him from it, nor the fires of the last day melt it.

Let the man who has no silver and gold, if he is a Christian, rejoice that he has something better; and if not a Christian, let him at once secure for nothing, what will make him a rich man for time and eternity.—The Advance. D. E. S.

FROM ELD. A. GUTHRIE.

TRUMANSBURG, N. Y., Dec. 11, 1868.

BR. STORRS: I find that after we have distributed the "Campaign Documents" some get interested and they need a more thorough reading to bring them out from under the mystical teaching of the present day theological dogmas. Your work, LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST, is the educator they need.

Then with the blessed Bible as a constant study, and Judge HALSTED'S "Theology of the Bible," as a help to correct the errors in our translations, we get a foundation for faith in Christ that cannot be shaken. Paul says, in Eph. i., 13, "In whom ye also trusted, after that ye heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation (or, good news of life), in whom, also, after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that holy Spirit of promise." Then it is in hope of this eternal life which God, that cannot lie, hath promised. Now, if we believe not the record that God gave of his Son, we make God a liar every day; and how any man can believe that God will be under any obligation to raise to life by his Spirit (for this is the only future life-imparting power revealed), all this wicked, ungodly, lying host, when no good can grow out of such resurrection either to themselves or any one else, I cannot comprehend. Yours for the truth.

FROM BENJAMIN MELLOR.

ROCKDALE MILLS, PA., Dec. 5, 1868.

BR. STORRS: A few days ago it fell to my lot to have a little parley with the preachers of the M. E. Church, who gave us a call at the house of my son-in-law, with whom I am residing; and, after himself and horse had been kindly entertained, he began to speak of a book he had for sale, which he seemed to think was a most excellent work; the title was "MAN ALL IMMORTAL." You may guess that title was quite sufficient to move the spirit in me, and I felt as if I must speak: so I quietly asked his opinion of 1 Corinth. xv., 44; and also verse 20, in which the doctrine of Life only in Christ is evidently taught. But instead of giving his opinion on these texts he asked, if I did not believe the wicked would be raised to life? No: I replied; the Scriptures say they "shall remain in the congregation of the dead." He said, he did not remember where that text occurred. I offered to find it, but he would not wait. To make short work of it, he said, it was all a new-fangled bubble. I told him to read Psalms xxxvii., and xlix., and see if the "bubble" was not as old as the Psalmist. But it appears they are very well satisfied with an old heathen "bubble," and prefer it rather than Scripture truth. But we know, brother, that we are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone; and whosoever buildeth thereon shall not be ashamed or confounded. O my brother, how cheering is the thought that the time is so near when we shall see Him as He is, and be transformed into His image. Amen: Come Lord Jesus, come quickly.

FROM J. S. POTTER.

SHELBURNE, NOVA SCOTIA, Dec. 3, 1868.

BR. STORRS: I left Boston, Mass., Friday, four o'clock P. M., Nov. 27th. Arrived in Shelburne, Sunday, 29th, at 6 P. M., had a good passage; found Br. Swainsburg and family well met with a good reception; attended meeting in the evening; took part in the same.

Spoke some on "life and immortality;" had a refreshing time. Monday I rested; Tuesday, visited several families with Br. S. Spoke in the evening on the "Second birth;" text John i., 11–13, showing that it was just as impossible for a man to be born from the dead, and enter a future life, without first being begotten, as it would be for a man to be born into this life without being begotten. This view of the subject is understood by Br. Swainsburg and received by the church.

Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 2d, Br. S. and I travelled five miles to a neighboring village, called Birch Town; had meeting in the evening at a private house; about forty out, half white and half colored; it did me good to hear them sing. O, I thought of the ransomed of the Lord from every nation, kindred, tongue and people returning unto Zion with songs and everlasting joy. I read 1 Corth. xv. spoke some from verses 21, 22, showing that, on account of the nature we inherited from the first Adam, we die, and if we are in Christ we shall all be made alive, and that this Scripture applied to the church, and not to the whole human family. I also showed that the Apostle in his masterly argument has given us the true nature of the resurrection of the dead; and without a resurrection there would be no future life; and that "the dead shall be raised incorruptible," etc. Br. S. followed at some length, and others spoke; had a good meeting. Br. Swainsburg has done a good work in this place for the last eighteen months; also, in Shelburne and other places along this shore. May the Lord bless and sustain him in the work, and that he may come fully into the light of "No life out of Christ," is my prayer. I expect to remain here over Sunday and then go east about forty miles. May the Lord be with you all. Remember me, and also my family at home in your prayers. Yours, in hope of life.

To know that we can smile on Death will surely make us happy in life. Get the matter of death and eternity right, and this life is robbed of all its darkness and terrors.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

NO PAPER NEXT WEEK.

THE present number closes the first quarter of the present volume. We shall not issue a paper next week; the second quarter will commence with January 6, 1869. Let those who have not yet remitted pay for this volume be careful to do so by Jan. 1st, as our books must then be regulated, and we must know who are, and who are not paying subscribers. We cannot go on the credit system. It might increase our subscription list; but it would not help us to meet the expenses of issuing the paper; and we have no idea of publishing on credit; all our bills have to be paid weekly. Let none who have taken the benefit of our offer to wait for advance pay till the first of January disappoint us now. We presume you will not. Send, if possible, also, new subscribers for the remainder of the volume, which can be had for $1 50, and so many of the back quarter as we can supply, and a set of the "Campaign Documents," if requested.

"DEFINIUE TIME:" RESPONSE TO TOWNSEND.

BY THE EDITOR.

[See outside.]

OUR old friend Dr. Townsend will excuse us for attaching the whole of his name to his communication, instead of leaving his signature "T." as he wrote it. We have another correspondent who has "T." for his final.

As to the position of J. S. White on the year-day theory, it was quite needless for our friend Townsend to have introduced it in a "criticism" on our words; for we have given no signs of indorsing his or any other man's theory on the reckoning of the prophetic numbers of Daniel. We once, several years ago, expressed the opinion that a part of those periods, viz., in Dan. xii., might be literal days, and belong to a short period at the close of this dispensation. But as to any positive faith in that matter, we have had none for twenty years past, and have not now; and all our friend "T." has said on that matter does not touch the extract with which he had to do at the outset.

We do not now believe, and we have not believed for the past twenty-four years, that any of the prophetic periods in Daniel were given to inform us of the exact time of the second advent of Christ; especially if the year-day theory is applied to them all. We have so often given our reasons for dissenting from that view that we feel a reluctance to repeat them. We have seen abundance of labor expended to overcome our reasons, but we have yet to see an argument that shakes, in the least, our position.

Our argument is founded on the words of Christ, wherein he speaks of the event of his coming again, and He says: "But of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father. Take ye heed, watch and pray: for ye know not when the time is." Mark xiii., 32, 33. Now if the time of that advent is revealed in the prophetic numbers of Daniel, some angel or the Son revealed it. Peter tells us that the "prophets searched what, or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow." 1 Pet. i., 11. Here is a fact; time was a subject of prophecy, and it was the spirit of Christ that gave the time. If then, the time of the second advent was one of the points to which any of those prophetic periods reached, or the exact period of that event, then Christ did know it; and all attempts to evade this conclusion are unavailing, and of no force. The argument stands thus:

If the definite time of the second advent is revealed in the prophetic numbers of Daniel, "the spirit of Christ" revealed it.

If that is the case, then Christ, the Son of God, knew when that time was:

But He declares that no man or angel knew the time, "neither the Son:"

Therefore, the time of the second advent is not a matter revealed in Daniel's prophecy: and all attempts to find it there are fruitless, and no mark of wisdom.

To say, therefore, "If the periods of time spoken of in Daniel do not reach to the resurrection and second advent, then there is no resurrection or second advent taught in the Bible," we think is a hasty conclusion, and our friend will not insist on it after a "second thought." The conclusion is too hazardous and jeopardizes the Bible itself. Such positive assertions will do more to make "Unitarians and Spiritualists" than our friend is aware of. It is the very food that produces doubt of the authenticity of the Bible. Men profess they are "the wise" who "shall understand;" and they assume that the definite time of the advent and resurrection is revealed in prophetic numbers in Daniel; and that those numbers "the wise shall understand" so as to fix exactly the year, if not the day and hour of the second advent and resurrection. They have taxed their ingenuity to the utmost for thirty years past to find that time, and every effort has proved a failure, till they have passed all reasonable bounds to which they could stretch those periods, and still insist that they are the wise who are yet to find the definite time of the second advent. If such a course is characteristic of wisdom, we are at a loss to know what folly would be.

We have never said or intimated but what the prophetic periods were given to be understood in relation to the events to which they relate. But we deny that the second advent is one of the events to be fixed as the exact termination of any one of those periods. That some of those periods bring us into the vicinity of the second advent and resurrection, we have believed for near thirty years past, and still believe; and thus they are among the signs of the times which Jesus bid us to observe as evidence that He "is nigh even at the door." Further than this we dare not go, lest we may be chargeable with professing more knowledge than Jesus allowed to such as should see the signs of his near coming, and told them [not merely somebody 1,800 years ago], "Watch and pray, for ye know not when the time is." We have nothing to retract in the extract our friend "T." has made the subject of criticism.

"ADVENTISM:" THE MASK OFF AT LAST.

AFTER a long time the author of "Adventism" has thrown off the mask. It was impossible to hide the fact that he ignored the two resurrections, generally held by Advent believers, though the attempt was made to conceal it in Adventism. The author of that work, after months of silence to the charge of a simultaneous and mortal resurrection of both saints and sinners, has finally come out in the Voice of the West with a programme of his "resurrection and judgment." He opens thus:

> Jehovah is represented, in metaphorical phraseology, as keeping a "book of remembrance" for the saints, and also a book "out" of which the wicked are hereafter to be "judged," or a book of remembrance against the sinner: but these books of remembrance are not to be opened to disclose the result of divine investigation of human character and conduct till the time arrives for the entombed dead to "come forth:" then the judgment will follow, so far as the passing and the execution of sentence is concerned.

Thus he starts out with an assumption that there is a book of remembrance for the wicked; but it is an invention to cover the nakedness of his theory. JEHOVAH saith of them that think upon his name, who fear him and speak often one to another, that "a book of remembrance was written," etc, Mal. iii. 16. But where is Adventism's "book of remembrance" for the wicked? The Psalmist deplores the idea of being like the wicked in death, and prays against it, lest he be "like the slain that lie in the grave, whom Thou rememberest no more." Psa. lxxxviii., 5. No "book of remembrance" for them. Job also deplored the idea of dying like the wicked, and said of them, "Drought and heat consume the snow waters; so doth the grave those which have sinned . . . . he shall be no more remembered." Job xxiv., 19, 20. Job pleads with God, "O that thou wouldst hide me in the grave . . . that thou wouldst appoint me a set time and remember me." Job xiv., 13.

Thus we have at least two witnesses that the wicked dead are "remembered no more," and two saints deploring the idea of dying as the wicked die, because they wished to be remembered, so as not to be consumed in the grave. For the dead to be remembered is to live again. But the wicked dead are not to be remembered. The author of Adventism goes on to say:

> The preparatory work of investigation, which is simply the infallible recognition of good and evil, reduced to our capacity of comprehension, under the metaphor of book keeping, is closed up with the end of each person's pilgrimage: all is known to God at that time; or, in other words, all is then registered in the book of sacred remembrance—the mind of God; but not till the book of remembrance for the saint and the book of remembrance against the sinner shall be opened, will the judgment decision be made in favor of the saint or against the sinner; and the execution of that decision cannot precede the opening of the books, from which the decision is made known: "The dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books: . . . death and hades delivered up the dead that were in them, and they were judged." Rev. xx., 12, 13.

Thus he admits that each person, saint and sinner, is, in fact, judged at "the end of each person's pilgrimage: all is then known to God at that time." Then God has judged what disposition to make of "each person at that time;" that is, there is no change to be made in the state to which each one is appointed as his final destiny. Not, indeed, till the resurrection, will the "decision be made" known "in favor of the saint, or against the sinner:" it is the resurrection itself that makes it known. Jesus saith of those who believe on him, "I will raise him up at the last day:" and equally positive is the declaration, "he that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him." Yet our author says, all, saints and sinners, shall see life, and see it at the same time. Can any man doubt which to believe? Our author proceeds as follows:

> God's word presents the resurrection of the dead as a prerequisite to judgment, when the term is used in the simple sense of coming to life again; but connected with the resurrection of the righteous, there is something more than merely coming to life brought to view: we have what might be styled two stages in the resurrection of the righteous, or a resurrection proper, and an appendage, sometimes included in the term resurrection; it being inseparably interwoven with the resurrection of the just, namely: the coming to life and the change; and though the two are in close proximity, the waking up must precede the "change"—the reorganization and waking up being the first stage, and the change being the second stage: for "this mortal must put on immortality:" and non-entity could not put it on.

The apostle Paul says, Christ "shall judge the quick [the living], and the dead at his appearing and kingdom." 2 Tim. iv., 1. But he nowhere speaks of any dead ones being made alive for judgment. No writer has said more of the coming of Christ and the resurrection than Paul, yet he never once speaks of the dead being made alive in order to be judged, or "as a prerequisite to judgment." As this apostle "kept back nothing that was profitable" to his hearers (Acts xx., 20), we may be sure he knew nothing of the dead being made alive, or "coming to life," to be judged. It is an invention of would-be apostles of these last days.

But we have, by this new invention, "two stages in the resurrection of the righteous;" first, the "coming to life;" after that the "change to immortality." Who shall say, after this, "there is nothing new under the sun?" Paul saith, "The dead are raised incorruptible." No, saith Adventism, "they (the saints), first come to life again," then after being judged "they put on immortality." Our author should have said, there are three stages in his resurrection theory; (1), they come to life, (2), are judged, (3), are made immortal; and all this done "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye." Pretty short work, truly; it will not give the subjects time to do much thinking. What an important transaction it must be; almost a farce—a mere pretence of a judgment.

But if the wicked dead are made alive, or "come to life," at the same time, and are disposed of as suddenly, here is a second farce; all done "in the twinkling of an eye." Think of it. They are all in the grave. "In a moment" they come to life, are judged, and are dead again! All "in the twinkling of an eye." Is that not almost equal to no resurrection at all? Why, they won't have time to know they are alive before they are dead again. Can our author escape this conclusion? Will he say the process will take up more time with the wicked than the righteous? How can that be? Can either class be rewarded till both are judged? That is impossible on any principle. The reward of the saints is the condemnation of sinners. The sudden judgment and execution is confessed by our author thus:

> The two stages are sufficiently distinct to constitute the waking up a prerequisite to judgment, and the change the result of judgment; for God can judge every saint in a moment of time as well as in a million of centuries, just as well as to hear and answer thousands of prayers in the some instant throughout the vast world; and this Scriptural fact obviates the necessity of supposing, on one hand, that the saints are to spend another short mortal pilgrimage after their resurrection, before the judgment, and invalidates the unscriptural supposition, on the other hand, that the judgment comes before the dead are "delivered up" to be "judged."

Thus our author makes short work with the saints to "obviate the necessity of supposing the saints are to spend another short pilgrimage in mortality," etc. We are glad he hurries them through; for if his position is correct, the time of his three stages is a "nonentity;" and we are of the opinion that impartial minds will see that his whole theory may justly be denominated a nonentity; a baseless fabrication.

Our author speaks of "coming to life;" then "judged;" then the righteous "put on immortality;" and all this is the resurrection. He says:

> The waking up is not the change, but immediately precedes it; and yet the change is so connected with their resurrection, that it may be regarded as an appendage, or a second stage in this great work; so it can be said with propriety, "It is raised in glory;" "It is raised a spiritual body;" "Raised incorruptible;" these statements having reference to the work in its completed stage, including both the waking up and the change.

Here is the beauty of "Adventism" in a nutshell. Look at it. The "coming to life is not the change, but [the change] immediately precedes it." He throws his judgment "to the moles and the bats," where it belongs; for he is so hurried to get all done "in the twinkling of an eye," that he makes no account of the judgment, not even to mention it, it is such a worthless affair; for, "the change" must be arrived at in a hurry, therefore it "immediately precedes the waking up." Thus his imaginary judgment is thrown out! How else could it "be said with propriety, 'It is raised incorruptible?'" etc. The theory destroys itself, and has all the marks of heresy; and yet it is the doctrine of the work called "Adventism," advertised and commended in the Voice of the West, and widely circulated under its influence. We are glad the mask is off. Let no man hereafter be deceived. The author of that work says explicitly,

> "Adventism—What is it? teaches no sentiment counter to this" which the sets forth in the article under consideration.

We say again, we rejoice the mask is off. If any one chooses to commend and circulate such a system of confusion let them do it with their eyes open. We clear our skirts of all participation in such "Adventism." Our motto is, "LIFE FUTURE IS ONLY IN CHRIST." And "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you." John vi., 53. And, "The man that wandereth out of the way of understanding shall remain in the congregation of the dead." Prov. xxi., 16. He "shall not see life." John iii., 36.

"THE DEVIL DID IT."

WE cut the following from Zion's Herald:

> Seldom has murder assumed a more horrid form than in the deed at Charlestown, Mass., last Friday. An industrious and well behaved Irishman, named Cronin, was stooping over a sausage meat-trough shovelling the meat into a tub, when his wife's brother Renne, came up behind him, and with the sharp cleaver with which they cut up their hogs, cut off his head. It fell on his chest hanging only by a little of the skin. The deed was caused by malice. Renne had been brought over from Ireland only a few months ago by money advanced by Cronin through the influence of his wife, Renne's sister. He had refused to pay back the money advanced. This had caused division of feeling, and Cronin had trusteed his wages. This roused the murderous hate of Renne, and he took this awful means of revenge. Murder by slow poison, by the bullet and the knife, even by the beating in of the head with a stone, as was done by Andrews, have a less atrocious look than this individual guillotine. It shows how terribly and completely evil can possess the soul of man. Will some of those who deny the existence and potency of a personal spirit of evil, who tempts and can control the heart he wins, explain how human nature can develop such perfection of crime?

Supposing your personal spirit-devil to exist, will you "explain how" an angelic "nature"—supposing it once was good—can develop such "perfection" in wickedness as you think him to possess? Do you not see the answer to this question will answer your own? You now virtually make your devil the grand agent in the horrid deed in Charlestown. Now, good Br. Herald, do tell us your opinion how there came to be such "a personal spirit of evil" as you speak of? Is he self-existent, or did God create him holy? and if so, who tempted him, and caused him to develop such a devilish nature? If you will solve these questions we pledge ourself to answer yours; or rather, you will answer your own. Now please give us light.

While you are on the subject, will you tell us who keeps this wicked tempter alive, and suffers him to go about tempting poor, unsuspecting, feeble men; and to do it so secretly that the victim seldom suspects his presence. Paul saith, "The love of money is the root of all evil," 1 Tim. vi., 10. Will our Br. Herald tell us if money is really the personal devil? If so, we fear too many church members worship the devil; for they seem to love money quite as much as the outsiders. We suppose this personal spirit-devil fills all rum barrels; and if men will drink him till he sets their brain on fire, and they chop off the head of a fellow being, must it not be the devil that did it? That seems to be the devil going about now-a-days. We are glad Massachusetts shows a disposition to kill that devil—he is a spirit-devil, truly. So you see Br., we are coming along into the faith of some devils of that sort. May Massachusetts have the honor of killing that spirit-devil, so that he shall not set another man to cut off his neighbor's head.

GOOD AND BAD.

THE following is the first part of an article we find in the Christian Journal, published by the "American Tract Society." We fully approve of nearly all this extract; being for the most part excellent advice, and administering a proper rebuke to professed Christians who do not make themselves familiar, not only with the texts they quote, but with the context and parallel testimony in the Bible. So far, we call the remarks good. We regret to say the last paragraph is entirely out of harmony with the rules the previous paragraphs had so well laid out, and therefore we denominate it bad. We shall make our remarks on that paragraph at its close. The whole is as follows:

"THUS SAITH THE LORD."

> Christian worker, do not be reluctant to quote Scripture; that is, if you can quote it correctly; and, if not, it is worth your while to commit it to memory, so that you can quote it correctly.
>
> We have often noticed that errorists of a certain class are exceedingly well equipped with passages from the Bible. Destitute of learning themselves, they acquire great influence over the ignorant by representing that, while all the learning is with their opponents, the "Thus saith the Lord" is on their own side. They will pour out text after text—giving chapter and verse, sometimes—and evince great familiarity with those portions of the Bible which favor their views.
>
> Let us learn from them, if we have not already learned the lesson in a better school. That better school is the school of Christ, who, when the tempter came to him, did not reply by general statements of truth and duty, but once and again and again said, "It is written," and told what was written.
>
> Perhaps we are mistaken; but it seems to us that the practice of proving truth by offering the "Thus saith the Lord" of Scripture is growing more and more uncommon, especially in prayer-meetings and private religious conversation. There is an increasing disposition to distrust proof-texts, and to substitute therefor the general tenor of Scripture or the dictates of conscience or of sanctified common sense. Now this may be very convenient for those who are recently converted, and are anxious to assume the office of teachers without delaying to study the Bible; but the cause of truth will suffer from it.
>
> Pray, how is one to know the general tenor of Scripture unless he is familiar with its particular statements? Undoubtedly a great deal of quoted Scripture is not applicable; but the true remedy is to quote only that which is applicable. Undoubtedly a passage loses much by being quoted alone: then let us have more, not less. This will require study; but it will reward study. We protest against any onslaught upon proof-texts: it is the outcry of idleness. Let us have with the text the context and parallel texts, and everything that will throw light upon it; but let us have the text. A genuine proof-text is an arrow of the Almighty.
>
> If a Universalist wishes to talk with you, do not put him off with general assertions about justice and a future life: give him the "Thus saith the Lord." "These shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal" (Matt. xxv., 46). If he wants the connection of thought, give it to him by quoting a previous verse, which shows when these things shall take place: "When the Son of man shall come in his glory and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory, and before him shall be gathered all nations." He might not have patience to hear the whole account of the judgment-scene; but you can quote enough to remind him that the great test is, whether men are the servants and friends of Christ as shown by their treatment of Christ's followers. "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren ye have done it unto me."
>
> If he objects that "everlasting" sometimes has a lower sense, and means what may come to an end, you can show him that it does not have that lower sense here; for, if it does, then the "life eternal" of the righteous means that which may come to an end. If you are acquainted with the original, you can add that the word for "everlasting" and "eternal" is the same in this passage. After taking reasonable pains to answer objections, press the text home upon his faith and conscience, and be sure that the Lord will honor his word.
> Perhaps you will meet an Annihilationist next; and he is a Universalist so far as this, that he believes that all who live in the future world will be saved. You may give him the same text, "These shall go away into everlasting punishment." He will reply that the annihilation which he believes is everlasting. Do not be dismayed by his enthusiastic efforts to show that "everlasting" does not mean everlasting, but irrevocable, or something else. Hold quietly to your text and let it rankle in his unwilling mind. The punishment itself—not the results of it in an unconscious non-existence—is everlasting. Punishment is a positive thing, capable of lasting a longer or shorter period. The original word means a positive infliction. "Thus saith the Lord," the infliction shall never end. Those who reject Christ shall never cease to be the worse for it; and their sorrows and woes will be, not a mere misfortune, but an unending punishment. They shall go away into (not nothingness, but) everlasting punishment.

If the author of the foregoing remarks wrote the last paragraph ignorantly, that may be his excuse; if wilfully, he is responsible for his perversion of the views he attempts to oppose. We know of no intelligent believer among us who disputes the fact that the punishment of the wicked is eternal; just as truly so as the reward of the righteous. It is true, we believe "all who live in the future world will be" heirs of eternal life; "neither can they die any more; and are the children of God, being children of the resurrection." Luke xx., 35, 36. That is a "Thus saith the Lord" for our scrupulous friend.

Now exclusion from "life in the future world" is a punishment; and an eternal exclusion from life in the world to come is eternal punishment; and the more "quietly" you "hold to your text" the less it will "rankle" in our mind, however it may disturb your own. Where is your parallel text to sustain your assumption of "positive" and "unending sorrows and woes," which "shall never cease?" Were you so blinded by your traditions, that you did not know how to look out "proof-texts?" Did you not know that the record saith, "The wages of sin is death?" Rom. vi., 33, and many parallel passages. Did you not know that we have an inspired commentary on your text (Matt. xxv., 46) "these shall go away into everlasting punishment?" Paul calls attention to the same event, and the same coming of the Lord Jesus, and says of those who "obey not the gospel," etc., "who shall be punished with everlasting destruction," etc. Is not that "everlasting punishment?" Will you pretend that means everlasting life or preservation in "sorrows and woes?" Never did Paul utter such a sentiment as that you attribute to Matt. xxv., 46. It is a baseless assumption on your part. The contrast in that text, is not of happiness and misery, or of bliss and woe. It is of life and its opposite. The antithesis is perfect; and is clearly of life and death. "The righteous into life eternal." Of the wicked it is said, "These shall go away into eternal punishment"—kolasin—cutting off. Cutting off from what? Clearly, from life: "everlasting destruction;" "shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on them." John iii., 36. "Shall remain in the congregation of the dead." Prov. xxi., 16. "The enemies of the Lord shall be as the fat of lambs; they shall consume; into smoke shall they consume away." Psa. xxxvii. 20. "The Lord preserveth all them that love him: but all the wicked will he destroy." Psa. cxlv., 20.

The author of the foregoing extract will not probably relish this "general tenor of the Scripture;" but we cannot help that. He may "let it rankle in his unwilling mind," if he will. It is like an "arrow which is sharp in the hearts of the King's enemies:" "It is written:" and we have told you "what was written;" and when you have digested thus much, we have in store a few hundred more testimonies of inspired men, who "spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost;" while, alas for you, you have not one witness, from Genesis to Revelation that ever utters such language as, "immortal soul—deathless spirit—always dying, but never dead—eternal torments," and the like. No, your phraseology in that direction is wholly human—it is the invention of men, and has come down to you a mere tradition of ignorant men, destitute of the truth, who had turned aside after fables.

Tract Fund and Campaign Documents.

To avoid confusion, we have merged the above objects in one. We publish both classes from the same fund. The enterprise of sending out the Campaign Documents has gone on with great success; and still the cry comes for more. From every quarter we hear of their doing good service. Will our friends bear this object in mind and let there be no lack of funds to continue this work. Send all the aid you can; and send for so many of the Campaign Documents as you can use, with as much cash as possible, that we may push the business with earnestness and efficiency. Br. F. H. Burbank is now taking the labor of sending out these works, by attending to the orders, etc., off our hands, leaving us more at liberty to give ourself wholly to our editorial work. The Tract and Campaign Document business ought to be greatly extended; and Br. Burbank will do that work, at this office, if the friends will supply the means. Let every one do what they can and there will be no lack.

Literal Fulfilment of Prophecy.

We have shown the promise to Abraham was twofold, etc. We have also shown that the promise to the literal seed of a certain land was fulfilled to them, as seen in Joshua xxi., 43. We shall now call attention to the threatenings against them in case of disobedience.

Lev. xxvi., 27–29. "And if ye will not for all this hearken unto me, but walk not contrary unto me: then I will walk contrary unto you also in fury: and I, even I, will chastise you seven times for your sins. And ye shall eat the flesh of your sons, and the flesh of your daughters shall ye eat." This was literally fulfilled at the destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians. See Lam. iv., 9, 10. "They that be slain with the sword are better than they that be slain with hunger: for these pine away, stricken through for want of the fruits of the field. The hands of the pitiful women have sodden their own children: they were their meat in the destruction of the daughter of my people." So also was it when Jerusalem was destroyed by the Romans, as appears by Josephus.

Lev. xxvi., 32, 33. "And I will bring the land into desolation: and your enemies which dwell therein shall be astonished at it. And I will scatter you among the heathen, and will draw out a sword after you: and your land shall be desolate, and your cities waste." Will it be denied, that this prophecy has been fulfilled to the letter? Has not their land been made a "desolation" and their "cities waste?" Dr. Hawes says there are four hundred and sixty-six ruined cities in the desolate and fruitful land beyond Jordan.

Deut. xxviii., 25, 63–66. "The Lord shall cause thee to be smitten before thine enemies: thou shalt go out one way against them, and flee seven ways before them: and shalt be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth. And it shall come to pass, that as the Lord rejoiced over you to do you good, and to multiply you; so the Lord will rejoice over you to destroy you, and to bring you to nought; and ye shall be plucked from off the land whither thou goest to possess it. And the Lord shall scatter thee among all people, from the one end of the earth even unto the other; and there thou shalt serve other gods, which neither thou nor thy fathers have known, even wood and stone. And among these nations shalt thou find no ease, neither shall the sole of thy foot have rest: but the Lord shall give thee there a trembling heart, and failing of eyes, and sorrow of mind: and thy life shall hang in a doubt before thee; and thou shalt fear day and night, and shalt have none assurance of thy life." Here is a prophecy published fourteen hundred years before the birth of Christ, yet so exact has been its fulfilment that the page of history could not more accurately state the fate and condition of the posterity of Jacob: and it stands as an impregnable bulwark against all the attacks of infidelity; and a monument of the truth and inspiration of the Bible that no human effort can demolish: a monument, also, against all the spiritualizers of the prophecies, and of the truth of the literal interpretation.

Before we proceed further we will notice the division of Israel into two nations, as this is an important point in understanding many of the prophecies of the Old Testament. See 1 Kings, chapters xi. and xii. The reader is desired to turn and read those chapters before he proceeds. Here we see, that for the wickedness of Solomon God threatened to rend ten tribes from his house in his son's days. This threat was fulfilled in the very commencement of the reign of Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, and ten of the twelve tribes went with Jeroboam the son of Nebat. Thus were the posterity of Jacob divided into two nations; one called Judah, and the other Israel. From that time they were never again united in one nation, but had continued wars with each other. After this Judah is seldom called Israel in the Old Testament. And Israel, or the ten tribes, are never called Jews in the Bible: that name is applicable only to the nation called Judah, either in the Old or New Testaments. We consider these facts important to be borne in mind as they will help us much in understanding the Scriptures, and in determining what prophecies have been fulfilled, and which remain to be fulfilled.

The latter part of the 12th and the 13th chapter, 1 Kings, give us an account of Jeroboam's and Israel's sin. Then comes the threatening to remove Israel, chap. xiv., 15, 16. "For the Lord shall smite Israel, as a reed is shaken in the water, and He shall root up Israel out of this good land, which he gave to their fathers, and shall scatter them beyond the river, because they have made their groves, provoking the Lord to anger. And he shall give Israel up because of the sins of Jeroboam, who did sin, and who made Israel to sin."

Let us now look at the fulfilment of this prophecy concerning Israel. See 2 Kings xvii., 5, 6. "Then the king of Assyria came up throughout all the land, and went up to Samaria, and besieged it three years. In the ninth year of Hoshea, the king of Assyria took Samaria, and carried Israel away into Assyria, and placed them in Halah and in Habor by the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes." Then after enumerating their sins it is added, verses 18–24, "Therefore the Lord was very angry with Israel, and removed them out of his sight: there was none left but the tribe of Judah only. Also Judah kept not the commandments of the Lord their God, but walked in the statutes of Israel which they made. And the Lord rejected all the seed of Israel, and afflicted them, and delivered them into the hand of the spoilers, until he had cast them out of his sight. For he rent Israel from the house of David; and they made Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, king: and Jeroboam drove Israel from following the Lord, and made them sin a great sin. For the children of Israel walked in all the sins of Jeroboam which he did; they departed not from them; until the Lord removed Israel out of his sight, as he had said by all his servants the prophets. So was Israel carried away out of their own land to Assyria unto this day. And the king of Assyria brought men from Babylon, and from Cuthah, and from Ava, and from Hamath, and from Sepharvaim, and placed them in the cities of Samaria instead of the children of Israel: and they possessed Samaria, and dwelt in the cities thereof." Here let it be observed, the nation of Israel are said to be "removed out of his sight—cast out," etc; which expressions denote an ejection from the land of Canaan; a land concerning which Moses speaks thus, Deut. xi., 12, "A land which the Lord thy God careth for: the eyes of the Lord thy God are always upon it, from the beginning of the year even unto the end of the year." To be cast out of his sight, then, is to be removed from that land. That, as we have seen, was done by the king of Assyria, as the Lord said. This captivity of the nation of Israel took place about 720 years before Christ: and more than one hundred years before the nation of Judah went into its final captivity in Babylon. Let it be kept in mind that the nation of Israel, or the ten tribes, never returned from their captivity in Assyria; so that, if we find any prophecy of their return from captivity, it has either utterly failed, or there is yet to be a fulfilment of it in the future. It may here be objected, however, that no such future return of Israel can take place, because the ten tribes are lost. We answer—They may have been hidden from Christendom, but they are not lost. The developments of the few past years show that Israel, or the ten tribes, are as really in being and a distinct people, as Joseph was alive and prospering though Jacob thought him dead. Let it be recollected that they went far off into Assyria beyond Babylon: and the fact that they did not return when Judah, or the Jews, returned from the captivity in Babylon, shows that they must have been far removed from the scene of Judah's captivity.

The Mortal Resurrection.

B.—Quite well, I thank you. I presume that both of us feel like searching the Scriptures at this time, that we may know whether the new doctrine that you are now advocating is revealed there. Last evening we took up a verse in the first epistle to the Corinthians, "It is sown a natural body: it is raised a spiritual body." I made the statement then, that if your theory was correct, the questions, of which this verse consutitutes a portion of the answer, would have been, "How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they go up?" What have you to say about the matter.

A.—Well, I've been digging into this thing for the last twenty-four hours. I just see where you run aground. There are two questions: first, "How are the dead raised up?" second: "With what body do they come?" If you put these questions t'other way it'll straighten the whole thing. The first question then would be, "With what body do they come?"—the second, "How are the dead raised up?" The first is about the coming out of the grave; and the second about being raised up after they have come up from their graves. There you have it, just as straight as a gun. You can't overthrow it.

B.—I am afraid that your gun barrel is not straight. I have heard of a man who kept a crooked gun, and when asked "Why?" he replied, "It is handy when I want to fire round a corner." My brother, I do not question your sincerity, but to me it seems that the way in which you have transposed those questions makes crooked work of the subject. It may do for you to fire away by when you are in a corner, but it is not meeting the question.

A.—Tell us what you think about it. Show me that I am firing round a corner, and I'll throw away the gun, and will try another weapon. I have more'n that text.

B.—Let me ask you a few questions first. What does the term RESURRECTION mean?

A.—I'm told that it means rising. I suppose it's so.

B.—That is right. The term itself simply means rising. Now what does "the resurrection of the dead" mean?

A.—I—I—I, well—well, I suppose it means the—a—a—a—the rising of the dead. Fact, I begin to see that you have got me once more. Still, I guess I'm right in my new view.

B.—Do not make guesses in that way. When you are guessing your way into a subject, you will find that you will be left in the dark eventually. In order to decide the matter before us, we need to know who asked those questions, and why they were thus asked.

A.—Let's hear. I'm ready.

B.—It appears that some members of the Corinthian church had been led to reject the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, while at the same time they believed that Christ had been raised up. Paul preached to them that Christ "rose again the third day," and says, "so ye believed. Now, if Christ be preached that he rose from the dead, how say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead. But if there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen; and if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain. . . . Yes, and we are found false witnesses of God; because we have testified of God that he raised up Christ: whom he raised not up, if so be that the dead rise not. For if the dead rise not, then is Christ not raised: and if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain," etc.

Can you not see at once that the terms ROSE, RISE, RISEN, RAISED, refer in these sentences to the resurrection? If your new doctrine is true, if you would have a harmony of ideas, you must state that Christ went to heaven on "the third day:" for, that was the day on which "he rose again." My next question is, Do you believe that in a single instance prior to the 35th verse that those four terms, or any one of them, has reference to going up into the air?

A.—May be they do.

B.—Then "if Christ be not raised," means, if Christ has not gone into the air, "your faith is vain."

A.—Hold on! I guess I'm wrong this time. I admit that in all those texts where the words rise, rose, risen, and raised, are put, that it means the resurrection, or the rising from the dead, and not the rising into the air. I see now that it couldn't mean that.

B.—I am pleased to hear your confession.

A.—Well, that don't make it out that I'm wrong about the 35th verse.

B.—The time is at hand when you are to yield up your new interpretation of that verse.

A.—If you can show me that I'm wrong, I'll cave in.

B.—I desire to see the error cave in, and I think that we have dug so large a hole under its foundations that it is soon to be demolished.

Bear in mind, my brother, that the whole matter in the chapter thus far has had no reference to saints going up into the air, but rather to the resurrection or the rising of the DEAD. The questions now come in, "How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they COME?" These Corinthians were not discussing how living saints would be raised into the air, but how the dead saints are to be raised from the dead, and with what body they come. The Corinthians might say, "We admit that Jesus was raised, but how, and with what kind of a body, will the dead who have gone to dust be raised?" Do you not perceive that the two questions which Paul answers, have reference solely to the matter upon which he had just been declaring.

A.—I'm beat this time, anyhow. Funny thing in me that I didn't see that before this. Well, I believe you are right.

B.—Then we are both in harmony with the apostle. But let us get a little more strength from his epistle. He tells us that that which we sow "is not quickened except it die: and that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be, but (a) bare grain, it may chance of wheat, or some other grain, but God giveth it (the grain) a body (some versions—a plant) as it hath pleased him." How beautiful the illustration. When we plant grains of wheat, we do not expect that those same grains will come to the surface of the ground in the same condition in which they were planted. No, we expect that a plant will come up, which plant will be wheat. Your new doctrine would bring all the wheat to the surface, even the identical seeds that were sown, and there go through the process of germination; which we all know to be contrary to nature, and would make the analogical argument of Paul foolishness.

As the seed in the ground needs the sunshine and the dew, even thus the sleeping saint needs the sunshine of Christ's resurrection, and the dews of his Spirit. "Awake and sing, ye that dwell in the dust, for thy dew is as the dew of herbs."

A.—That sounds kind o' good.

B.—Finally, we will look at Paul's answer: "So also is the resurrection of the dead. . . . It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body." That caves in the new doctrine. The term RAISED has reference to the coming up from the dead, or the resurrection, and not to the going up of the dead after their revival to life. The body that is raised, or has a resurrection, or is raised from the dead, is not the same kind of a body that was sown or buried. If we plant wheat, we shall raise wheat. If we plant a body we shall have a body raised. As the same kernel of wheat does not come up again, even so the same kind of a body does not come up again. So also is the resurrection. . . . It is sown a natural body: it is raised a spiritual body."

A.—Well, I cave in on that. You've got me there, but I've other passages for you. Can you meet me to-morrow evening?

B.—Yes. Farewell.

From Anastasis.

The Covenants.

C.—At our last conversation you stated that if Jesus Christ was the promised seed, the title of the land ended in Christ. I am not sure that I comprehend your meaning.

G.—I am glad you have referred to it, for I do not wish to be misunderstood, or misrepresented. And therefore I will give what I understand in the matter. Paul says, "The promise was made . . . to one, that is Christ." Now if that be to Christ as the natural seed of Abraham, and the title runs down through the blood relationship, then it ended in Christ; for He died, leaving no heirs, as he generated no children. But as I understand Paul, he taught no such doctrine. As we stated our propositions in a former article, we repeat the whole question hangs upon: First, What is a covenant? and we think this one was a will or bequest unconditional. Second, What did this will bequeath or convey? and, Third, To whom did it convey it?

We endeavored to show that it conveyed or bequeathed a certain territory or land. In Gen. xiii., 14, 15, "The Lord said to Abram, look from the place where thou art (standing) northward, southward, eastward, and westward. For all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed forever." Here then is the title of our land. It is given absolute to Abraham, and his seed (Christ.) So says Paul.

C.—But is there no promise of blessings through Christ?

G.—In the promise before us, it conveys merely the land: there are subsequent blessings added through Christ, but we are not now talking of the blessings through Christ, we are talking of the promise. And I think there can be no doubt that the promise here is the land, and that to Abraham and his seed unconditional.

C.—But does not the promise convey a kingdom? and is not Jesus to be King over all the earth.

M.—Will you allow me to ask a question in relation to this question?

G.—Certainly; that is what we have met for?

M.—As I understand God's national plan, Jesus is to be King over all the earth, and all the nations are to be subjects unto him. I should like you to reconcile the many prophecies which speak of the kingdom of God?

G.—It seems to me your question is out of place at this time; Br. C. could not wait until we reached the point of the seed of Israel, but wished us to take it up immediately and decide to whom the promises were made. And now we are to have another question forced upon us, viz., the kingdom. It seems to me, it will be more proper to waive your question until we reach the question, what is the kingdom of God?

I would prefer going on with the conversation in a straight line, and would therefore answer Br. C's question, that the promise to Abraham, in this instance, conveyed no promise of a kingdom. That was a subsequent promise; this promise was a simple one, and conveyed the title to the land. And we think it conveyed with it eternal life. Mark the words: "To thee will I give it, and to thy seed after thee, forever." Was Abram and his seed's title an everlasting one? If so, then it must convey with it an everlasting life. Paul, speaking of these worthies, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise, says, "For he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God; . . . these all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them; they hailed them, and confessed they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth: for they that say such things declare plainly that they seek a country; . . . But now they desire a better (country), that is, an heavenly: wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God: for he hath prepared for them a city." Here Paul describes the hope of Abraham, and the dead ones, who died in faith. Was the hope of Israel, then, the resurrection of the dead? and did the promises hang upon that event? Hark what the Apostle says: "But if there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen; and if Christ is not raised, your faith is vain: ye are yet in your sins; then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ (Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and the faithful ones, who died in faith of the promises) are perished;" and God's promise is a failure. But, no, thanks be unto our God, we are not left in such a dilemma. "But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first fruits of them (the faithful ones) that slept." Here then we take up the thread of our title; and in making out our brief, we run the title down from Abraham, through Isaac, Jacob, and so on, down until we come to Jesus, all clear; no dispute thus far. Jesus comes and asserts his right to the title. "Hear a parable: There was a certain householder, which planted a vineyard, and hedged it round about, and digged a winepress in it. . . . But last of all he sent his Son, saying, they will reverence him (when they see him). But when the husbandmen saw the Son, they said among themselves: This is the heir; come let us kill him, (then the title ceases,) and let us seize on his inheritance (the vineyard). And they caught him, and cast him out of the vineyard, and slew him." (Now the title is ended). After condemning themselves, "Jesus said unto them, Did ye never read in the Scriptures, the stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the head of the corner?" Matt. xxi., 33. This same parable is made use of in Isaiah v. "My well beloved hath a vineyard in a very fruitful hill. And he fenced it, ... And now, O inhabitants of Jerusalem and men of Judah, judge, I pray you, betwixt me and my vineyard. What could I have done more to my vineyard, that I have not done in it? Wherefore when I looked that it should bring forth grapes, it brought forth wild grapes? . . . For the vineyard of the Lord of hosts is the house of Israel, and the men of Judah his pleasant plant. The Psalmist speaks of this same vineyard in Psalm lxxx.

The Jews thought when they had succeeded in putting to death Jesus, they had accomplished their work, and so thought the disciples. After hanging upon the words of Jesus so long, expecting him to accomplish the establishment of the kingdom of Israel, and then seeing him put to death, they supposed the whole was ended; and in their despair they went back to their employment. "Come, I go fishing." And as two of them journeyed to Emmaus, they talked of all these things that had happened. Sometimes I think I can imagine their feelings when they said, "But we trusted that it had been he which should have redeemed Israel." O! how sad must they have felt at that moment. Their hope raised to the highest pitch, the promise of setting upon twelve thrones, judging Israel, and now the man that made us the promise, dead. And instead of being elevated to rulers, we are doomed to go back fishing. But, thank God, the title was not lost in the death of Jesus. For, says Peter, "This Jesus hath God raised from the dead, whereof we all are witnesses. Therefore being at the right hand of God exalted, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Spirit, he hath shed forth this which ye now see and hear." That is right, Peter: we are always in want of witnesses to prove a title to our property. And now although we lost for the time the title in the dead Jesus, we again take up our brief in the resurrected Jesus: and although he generated no heirs in the flesh, we thank God that he is the promised regenerator, through the Spirit, of a company to be joint heirs with him.

Dear Brethren and Sisters: Readers of the Herald of Life, the truthful, outspoken paper; may it and the beloved Editor, together with all the co-workers, live until our King comes to crown the whole, is the prayer of your unworthy brother in Christ our Life-giver. Amen. Now, I want to say to you, one and all, that I am home with some of my dear children, where I expect to winter, if the Lord will; for we begin to feel the infirmities of old age, being in our seventieth year, and not having means to travel only on foot, we are under the necessity, not choice, to lay by for the time being. The winter has set in in good earnest; the snow has mantled the old earth, and we were two hundred miles north when the flakes commenced falling, with but little means to help. But feeling confident that God was on our side, and that all things in the end will work for good, we took the cars, praying that our heavenly Father would move upon the hearts of the conductors to let me go free, and so it turned out. Praise God. Well, we feel that we have done the best we could with our small means in travelling and scattering tracts, and as a general thing we found the brethren trying to hold on to their blessed hope. One good brother said he would not part with the dear Herald for a farm. Another said he would rather part with a cow than to miss having the paper. Many talk in a similar way, but have not, as yet, met the demands of the press. Hope we shall hear from them soon. Almost the first thing we look for is the list of receipts, to see if any of them have paid. Some we have long looked for in vain; let us hear from you. It will gladden our hearts.

My post-office address will be Grafton, Ill., for the present.

Note by the Editor.—We fear most of the subscribers you speak of will miss the Herald the first of January, judging from deficiencies on the last volume. We shall be glad to find ourself mistaken.

From Ira Fancher.

"Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord." Rev. xiv. 13. "As in Adam all die, even so in Christ (or all that die in the Lord) shall be made alive." 1 Cor. xv., 22.

Now it does seem to me that this is the true condition of all the human family. As I consider life, eternal life especially, a great blessing, so those that die in the Lord, or in Christ, are blessed with life eternal. So it seems to me, all those that die in Adam really die the eternal, or second death. I know that some tell us the resurrection is a blessing conferred of God. But I have yet to learn what blessing it can be to a wicked person to be raised to life for the express purpose to be kept alive one thousand years, more or less, to die again and that without remedy. But I do believe that if the Spirit that raised up Jesus Christ dwell in us, that it will quicken these mortal bodies; or in other words, all that die in the Lord will live again, as Jesus saith in John vi., 39, 40, 44, 54. "And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up at the LAST day. And this is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life; and I will raise him up at the last day. No man can come to me except the Father which hath sent me draw him; and I will raise him up at the last day. Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life and I will raise him up at the last day." While, on the contrary, all that die in Adam will "sleep a perpetual sleep and not awake." Amen.

Obituary.

Fell asleep in Jesus, P. Hudson, only son of Philo Richardson, Rahway, N. J., on Monday, the 14th inst., aged 26 years. He suffered much from disease brought on by hardship during his service in the army, in the late war. He died in peace, in the faith of a resurrection and immortality at the coming of Christ from heaven; an event he longed for. We spoke at his funeral in his father's house, on our Life views, and the hope of the gospel; after which he was consigned to the grave to rest till He who holds the "keys" thereof shall unlock its door and call forth his saints from "the prison house:" then "shall come to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory;" and that triumphant song shall arise, "Thanks be unto God who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ." TRUST.

I CANNOT see with my short human sight,
Why God should lead this way or that for me;
I only know he saith, "child, follow me;"
But I can trust.

I know not why my path should be at times
So straightly hedged, so strangely barred before;
I only know God could keep wide the door.
But I can trust.

I find no answer, often, when beset
With questions fierce and subtle on my way,
And often have but strength to faintly pray;
And I can trust.

I often wonder, as with trembling hand
I cast the seed along the furrowed ground,
If ripened fruit for God will there be found;
But I can trust.

I cannot know why suddenly the storm
Should rage so fiercely round me in its wrath;
But this I know, God watches all my path;
But I can trust.

I may not draw aside the mystic veil
That hides the unknown future from my sight;
Nor know if for me waits the dark or light;
But I can trust.

I have no power to look across the tide,
To know, while here, the land beyond the river:
But this I know, I shall be God's forever!
So I can trust.

THE BITTER KISS.

WHO would have thought there could be such a thing between a mother and her little daughter! Yet I know there was, for a pair of coral lips told me of it this afternoon.

We were talking in the class, and Florence asked—"If we say things in joke, and then explain right off, is that really lying?" and while we were trying to make it clear to children's minds, that lies are lies, and that truth is truth, a great many incidents came from the children's lips. Daisy said she thought it was best never to "make believe," but always say what was really meant; Florence was somewhat unsettled in her mind, desired me to think it over a little, and answer next Sunday; and then it was that Mary told me about "the bitter kiss."

"I was a little bit of a girl," she said, "and mamma had told me not to touch a jar of mincemeat, which she had on the table ready to make pies. Suddenly, some one called her to the hall door, and the minute I heard her talking I just put my hand right into the jar and helped myself—then I jumped down and ran into the play-room, and stayed a long time; I could not go back to mamma, even though she had promised to make me a little pie. I washed my hands and face, and was sure nobody could find it out. I did not remember that God saw me! When mamma took me in her lap at night and stooped down to undress me, she started back, and her face was very red. She did not say anything then, but she told me afterward she saw a bit of mince-meat clinging to my apron. She hoped it was an accident, and did wish to say anything until she knew certainly; so she went on repeating our night's verses, until she seemed to be thinking of the mince-meat again; then she asked if I had touched it in play, and I said right off, No, ma'am, Mamy didn't take any; but my face felt so hot I had to take mamma's fan; then she looked very sober, and stopped talking for a minute, when somebody called her and she went out. So I crept into bed, not daring to ask her to kiss me, and feeling as if I could not go to sleep without it; presently she came back and stooping over me, raised my lips to hers. In a moment I should have had one of her sweet kisses, but her eyes filled with tears, and her face grew very white as she exclaimed, 'My child has surely told a lie! Oh Mamy, your breath tells the story. That was a bitter kiss my little daughter was going to give her mother. Oh, my child, my child!' Then she kneeled down by my little bed, and called me to her; and she put her arms round me, and asked the Saviour to forgive me, and every now and then she had to stop, the tears came so fast. I shall never forget that time or 'the bitter kiss' I was going to give my mother. I have never told a lie since. I think it's best always to tell the truth. I feel about it just as Daisy does, and I guess Florence will, too, when she thinks about it."

Then we talked it over a little, how that Mary's first sin, stealing the mincemeat, led to the second sin, denying it; and so it was best to be truthful, and always avoid the first step that is wrong. Then the children learned this verse: "Lying lips are an abomination to the Lord, but they that deal truly are his delight;" and Florence made up her mind that she should not need "time to think it over," but could decide now that it was always best to "deal truly."—The National Baptist.

THE ECHO.

STEPHEN had never heard anything of the echo, and accordingly one day when he was out in the meadow, he cried out "Hurrah, hurrah!" Immediately in the nearest woods, he heard a voice sound out, "Hurrah, hurrah!" He was astonished. At last he shouted, "Where are you?" The voice cried, "Where are you?" He answered back, "You are a foolish boy!" "Foolish boy!" echoed back from the woods.

Now little Stephen became very angry, and still harder he began to shout nicknames into the wood, all of which were echoed very faithfully back again. Then he ran into the wood, and sought all through it for the supposed boy, but he could find nobody. Stephen ran home and complained to his mother how a bad boy had concealed himself in the wood and had called him names.

The mother answered, "This time, my dear little boy, you have betrayed yourself, for it is yourself whom you accused as the 'bad boy;' you have heard nothing but your own words, for as you have often before seen your face in the water, so now you have heard your voice in the wood. Had you spoken in friendly words, then, my little Stephen, friendly words would have echoed back to you again."

So it is always; what we suppose wrong in the conduct of another is mostly only the echo of our own. If we treat every one kindly we will be treated kindly; but if we are rude and uncivil, we are entitled to expect no better in return.

FROM H. YOUNG.

PITTSFIELD, N. H., Dec. 13, 1868.

BR. STORRS: Though we have little time, or means, or ability, yet as duty urges, we must write now, and send pay for the HERALD one year; and we must tell you that the cause of delay is not a want of interest in the truths spoken in said, paper but every dollar we could command, save a little farm we call our home, has been taken from us the past eighteen months, some twelve hundred dollars. But we say not this to complain. We have no regrets in the matter; but are able to resign all to him who gave, "with a spirit firm and free," and trust we shall still have a little to bestow to advance the truth, which to us is more precious then all beside, and which will stay with us, unless we "sell" it; and we never will; nor will we ever cease to speak or write it, though "conferences" may try to prevent us. O may life believers never run themselves up into conferences, and follow human leaders, and so no longer explore the vast fields of truth which are open, and still shall open before them; but rather let our watchword be, "Go Forward," as good brother March has so well said.

We were helping our neighbor the other day do a piece of work, and in conversation he said to us, "There is one text I do not understand, and no one has yet explained it to my mind:" and he repeated John xi., 26. "And whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die." We said to him, you should read the preceding verse with this, as they are separated only by a colon mark, which reads, "I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live."

We came home, and wrote the following, which is the substance of what we said to him as an explanation of said texts; and we have no other object in copying it here for the HERALD, than that the glorious truth which the Saviour spake to Martha may be clearly seen by others, and so they be consoled as was this sister under the loss of her dear brother.

JOHN xi., 26, CONSIDERED.

Christ being "the resurrection and the life," all who believe in him, and so are in him and he in them, have a life which is eternal, unending; i. e., when such die they are not reckoned dead—are not dead in the sense in which the unbeliever is; for, said the Saviour, he that believeth in me though he were dead yet shall he live, and because he shall live, his death is not reckoned death: and so it is said of him who is alive and is a believer in Christ, he shall never die; for if the state one is in when dead, who believes in Christ, is not properly called death, because he shall live again, then surely it is but proper to say of the living believer, when he shall go into said state, "he is not dead;" hence the propriety of the language, "he that liveth and believeth in me shall never die."

We must not fail here to notice the contrast between the believer and the unbeliever. All that is here so truly and so gloriously said of those who believe in Christ, can never be said of such who do not believe in him; for what says the negative of this language? He that believeth not in me, if he die, shall not live; and he that liveth and believeth not in me shall die.

So we understand this consoling language of the blessed Saviour to Martha to mean just this: the condition your brother is now in, is no calamity because it shall not prevent his eternal life: neither shall it be a calamity to you when you, too, shall pass into the same state which your brother is now in, because you are both believers in me who am the resurrection and the life. The condition of believers is the same, whether in life or in death.

O blessed truth, how consoling! We have loved ones whose graves are separated by thousands of miles of land and ocean; yet this truth gives us consolation.

"Asleep in Jesus—time nor space
Affects this precious hiding place,
On India's plains or Lapland's snows
Such sleeper's find the same repose."

O, such "sleepers," such "repose."

O, the glorious morn when these shall awake.

We wish here to express our very high appreciation of the doctrine so ably presented in the "Response to Samuel Mason," in the HERALD of Oct. 14th; as, also, in the HERALD of Nov. 11th, in answer to the questions "Is the reign of Christ a spiritual or a temporal one? and is it in the future or the past?" and, also, the series of articles, "Literal Fulfilment of Prophecy," where the same truth is so clearly seen. Let no reader fail to interest himself in these glorious truths of the literal fulfilment of prophecy, which declares that Christ shall reign literally on the throne of his father David, and that, "of the increase of his kingdom and peace, there shall be no end." Now will such truths swallow up all interest in present worldly governments, and make us feel we are not citizens here, but pilgrims and strangers till this glorious Prince shall reign.

THOUGHTS ON 1 PETER iv., 6, 17, 18.

BY B. MATTHIAS.

Verse 6th.—"For this cause was the gospel preached also to them that are dead that they might be judged according to men in the flesh; but live according to God in the spirit." Verse 17th.—for the time is come when judgment must begin at the house of God; and if it first begin at us, what shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel of God?" Verse 18th.—"And if the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and sinners appear?"

1. The explanation of these texts.
11. The doctrine of the same.

1. The explanation. The judgment upon the house of God first, has been, is supposed to be a rule in God's government, to bring the prelude of all calamities and distresses upon his friends, on his own house; and then the full measure upon the wicked. The 18th verse is made to teach that the righteous have hard work to be saved in the final. Thus departing from the subject of the 17th verse, abruptly introducing another, making the salvation of the saints an uncertain business; an extremely hazardous thing—doubtful and uncertain; "scarcely saved." The regular accepted order of teachers exhort their people to holiness and zeal by assuring them that their salvation is a most uncertain thing: "Saved by the skin of their teeth." This teaching is very unlike what Peter teaches in any other place. He says, "For so an entrance shall be administered unto you abundantly, into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ."

THE EXPLANATION.

These texts have no allusion to the salvation in the kingdom of the saints, either in the sectarian or in the Bible sense; but do allude to their deliverance from persecution. "For the time is come," etc. Peter was present when the Lord said to his disciples, "Then shall they deliver you up to be afflicted, and shall kill you, and ye shall be hated of all nations for my name's sake," Matth. xxiv., 9. "But before all these, they shall lay their hands upon you, and persecute you, delivering you up to the synagogues, and into prison." Luke xxi., 12. "Behold I send you forth as sheep among wolves." And this, "when you are old they will lead you where you would not" be. Notice Rev. xi., "Measure the temple of God (Peter's House of God) and the altar, and them that worship therein."

Without attempting a specific explanation of these terms, temple, outer worshippers, accepting of the familiar interpretation, that the "House of God" is meant. The same is the Holy City that the Gentiles should tread underfoot forty and two months. "But the court without measure not." Their judgment is to come after the house of God has had its trial, almost to extinction. According to Daniel "They shall wear out the saints of the Most High." Then comes this pertinent text, "When the Lord hath performed his whole work upon Mount Zion and on Jerusalem I will punish the fruit of the stout heart of the king of Assyria." Isa. x., 12.

"If it first begin at us," the disciples of Jesus. This judgment began with their beginning. First, their own nation made war upon them; second, the Gentiles, all nations of them, third; those of their own name and profession, the bitterest of all enemies. "The contention of brothers is like the bars of a castle," says the proverb.

This is the prescribed measure, beginning in, or about the year 533–4, and ending in the famous French revolution in 1793–'4; and the longer period in 1823. Such was the overwhelming flood, upon the "House of God" in this tribulation, that the wisdom and compassion of God commuted the judgment to about a thousand years. ("Except those days should be shortened no flesh shall be saved." They were shortened for the elect sake.) "They lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years." In spite of force and power, of Dragon and beasts, of proscription and confiscation, banishments and deaths, they maintained the field; they overcame by the blood of the Lamb. For Jesus' sake, they loved not their lives unto death, and by his power fought it out, until deliverance came. They were strong, and did exploits, and instructed many, yet they fell." Dan. xi. "But when they shall fall, they shall be holpen with a little help." If God is so hard on his own "House," how will it go with the synagogue of Satan? Where shall the ungodly and sinner appear? The Lord had said of his house, "I will not make a full end of thee, but will punish thee in measure." In the midst of destructions spare the righteous seed. His words are, "Thus saith the Lord, as the new wine is found in the cluster; and one saith destroy it not; for a blessing is in it; so will I do for my servant's sake, that I may not destroy them all." I will bring forth a seed out of Jacob, and out of Judah an inheritor of my mountains, and mine elect shall inherit it." Isa. lxv., 8, 9, and on.

The blood of the elect, like that of Abel, had cried from under the altar, "O Lord, how long wilt thou not judge and avenge our blood upon them that dwell upon the earth." In the prophecy of Daniel we read, and the time came when judgment was given to the saints. The Ancient of days came at this appointed time, at the end of the 1,260 years, in courtly pageant; "The judgment was sat, and the books were opened." The little horn and beast were judged and given to the burning flames. The whole site of country where the saints had suffered was overrun by fire and sword; and is still flaming, and will to the extinction of their bloody houses. "The beast was slain, and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flames." Dr. Coke says, that 1,800 town were burned in the wars of Bonaparte. All this, because of the insolence and cruelty of papacy.

"They shall take away his dominion, to consume and destroy it unto the end." Papacy, Romanism, is most signally undergoing its doom, at the left hand. It is cast into the lake of fire; is suffering the pain of the "second death," and will, ere long, with Protestant adherents, disappear, like a "mill-stone cast into the sea, to be found no more at all." "Her sins have reached unto heaven." She has made all nations drunk, and corrupted the whole world, and made it as loathsome to God as were the antediluvians. Alas! all drunk from her vile cup of abominations, says the prophet. "No place clean." From the Pope to the lowest order of priestly dignataries, stupidly drunk. In all soberness; who that has the healthy use of their reason, can insist upon the dogmas of the sects? the "ungodly and the sinner," make up the aggregate of offenders; are culprits to-day before the throne of Him, "before whom the heavens and earth shall flee away." So much for the explanation.

[To be concluded.]

TWO RESURRECTIONS BY H. MUNGER.

THERE was published in the Crisis, Nov. 18th, an article purporting to be part of a sermon delivered by the above preacher in New York, by request. Text: Psalms lxxiii., 20.

This part of a sermon is a polemic curiosity. His statements are curious; one of which is that David did not see much gain in Christianity, if the wicked could "die easy, and that's all."

"But to bring David out straight, God let him go into the sanctuary and see the end of the wicked after they are waked out of their sleep. They must live again that God may despise their image. This cleared David from the non-resurrection doctrine and it will others."

Stupendous! Here is another paragraph. If any body can penetrate its logic and argument they are welcome to all the benefit of it.

"Now if Christ died for the Adamic transgression, he paid that debt. What did the broken law claim of Christ to satisfy the demand against Adam? Was it to be eternally dead, as some say? If so, Christ is dead yet, if he ever died, and has not risen, and the dead in Christ have perished; so says Paul. 1 Cor. v., 12–23. Here are two orders, and two classes. Just as true as Christ died because of sin, just so true saint and sinner must die that same death, and just so true saint and sinner must come up the Adamic life again, by virtue of the second Adam and be judged for the deeds done in the body. The wicked that died in their sins will then die for their sins, as the Scriptures say, after they are judged and sentenced to "the second death." They must have a second life, to fulfil the Scriptures.

But the text of his choice is unsuited to his sermon, and it is simply in mistaking the "waking" of the Lord for the waking up of the wicked.

Here is the reading. "As a dream when one awaketh; so, O Lord, when thou awakest Thou shalt despise their image." Take the connection, verses 18, 19. "Surely Thou didst set them in slippery places: Thou castedst them down into destruction. How are they brought into desolation, as in a moment; they are utterly consumed with terrors." that is the end David saw when he went into the sanctuary, and was satisfied with the slow, but sure pay of a godly life, which award is eternal life. He finds motive enough to holiness; not in the revival and protracted torments of the wicked, but in their sudden swift destruction, "as in a moment." This is inflicted when God "wakes" up; not when He should awake these destroyed, consumed sinners.

Br. M.'s sermon reminds me of a sermon preached by Benjamin Abbot, one of the early preachers of the Methodist order. He took for his text, "I knew thee that thou wast an austere man." He read it, "I knew that thou wast an Oyster man;" and made a good thing of it. He showed what was true of this class of men. They do sow, and strow, and gather; and sometimes, the less scrupulous will encroach upon others ground. It is also significant to the preacher's interpretation, that the oysters so strown are called plants, etc. Somebody told the preacher afterward, that the man was "austere," and not an Oyster man. He replied, "Never mind, brother, there were six souls converted."

A few more sermons like H. M.'s would, I should think, help to build what they intend to pull down. Such a mistake!

I do not desire to make the Br. feel uncomfortable; but such an ado; all upon nothing!

B. MATTHIAS.

THE INFLUENCE OF WEATHER UPON THE PUBLIC HEALTH.

BR. BALLARD, in his recent Report on the Health of Islington, England, for 1868, arrives at the following conclusions upon this subject.

1. That an increase of atmospheric temperature is normally associated with an increase of general sickness.

2. That a decrease of atmospheric temperature is normally associated with a diminution of general sickness.

3. That, for the most part, the increase or decrease of sickness is proportional in amount to the extent to which the atmospheric temperature rises or falls.

4. That it is an error to suppose (as is popularly held) that sudden changes in temperature are (as a rule) damaging to public health. A sudden change from cold to hot weather is indeed very damaging; but a sudden change from hot to cold is one of the most favorable circumstances that can occur, when sickness is regarded broadly as respects a large population.

5. That, remarkably enough, these influences are most marked in the directions I have mentioned, in the colder seasons of the year, and more certain in winter than in summer.

6. That rises and falls of temperature are more certain and effectual in their special operation upon public health, when at the same time the daily range of temperature is lessened, than they are when the daily range is at the same time increased; rises of temperature increasing sickness more certainly and markedly, and falls of temperature decreasing it more certainly and markedly.

7. That a fall of rain lessens sickness generally, sometimes immediately, sometimes after a short interval, and that, as a rule, the reduction of general sickness is greater when the fall of rain is heavy than when it is light.

8. That drought, on the other hand, tends to augment general sickness.

9. That wet weather in the summer season operates more certainly in improving public health than it does in the winter season.—Am. Presb.

A WIFE'S INFLUENCE.

A CHRISTIAN woman gave her hand to the man on whom she had already placed her tenderest affection. He possessed almost every grace, but was destitute of the grace of God. By spending the early part of his life in a foreign land, and associating with those who had the reputation of gentlemen, he had imbibed the fashionable habit in that place of using God's name in vain in common conversation. His new and much-loved wife sought to reclaim him. She knew the only way to his heart. She took advantage of his love for her to win him to Christ, and she effectually succeeded.

One day as she was standing before him, in company with a few friends who were listening to his conversation, in order to give additional interest, as he supposed, to what he was relating, he added the name of Christ. He looked at his wife and saw her in tears. He was confused. She raised her hand and gently pressed his chin. "O!" said she, "if you knew how much I love that dear name you would never again pain my heart by trifling with it."

His heart was touched. He was unable to proceed. He asked her forgiveness and soon left the room. In this way he was saved from ruin, and is now an eminent example of piety.

LIVING TO CHRIST.

BRETHREN, let us aim, as St. Paul did, to live to Christ. How bright the halo that surrounds the memory of those who have done so. Trace them in thought throughout past ages. The early Christians, amid constant persecution from Jew and Gentile; the saints of the middle ages, whose light shining in darkness, of whom the world was not worthy; the great Reformers who were not afraid to lift up their testimony against prevailing errors and corruptions, and boldly to come forth from the great apostacy; and the Christian philanthropists of latter times, men whose love to Christ has constrained them to devote themselves to His service in various ways, who have been the means of reviving the work of true religion at home, and who have gone forth to proclaim the gospel abroad, and sought to undo the heavy burdens which still existed in lands enjoying Christian light and liberty; how dear to us is the memory of men like these. How sacred are their names, How bright the examples they have left us: and why? They lived to Christ; they loved and honored and served Him, and accounted all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of his name.—Niven's Plain Sermons.

LOOKING AHEAD.—We once fell in with a business man, and he was a person of wide experience, too, who said that, whatever might happen to him, he always looked sixty days ahead, rather than sixty days behind. This was sensible, and there was profound philosophy in it. For the habit of looking on the dark side of matters soon begets a despondent feeling in the heart, and disinclines a man to make any exertion at all. To look forward to better days, however, and to a turn of fortune for better time, is naturally calculated to inspire one with enthusiasm, to stimulate one with the new wine of hope. It makes all imaginable difference whether a man desponds or hopes. Hence, when a blast of trouble comes, the true way is to turn your back upon it, to refuse to have anything to do with it, to forswear all connection with its threats or promises. Look ahead, and look up! what is gone is gone, and there is no help for it. Work for better fortunes, and the bad will desert you in absolute disgust at your unimpressibility.

THE Wisconsin Farmer says: "We notice in our exchanges numerous recipes for making shoe leather water proof, most of them compounds involving considerable trouble in the preparation and more or less expense, and none of them half as good as the simple article castor oil, which can be bought at the drug store for twenty-five or fifty cents a pint, according to your locality. Apply it to the boot when dry, and soak it by the fire till the leather is saturated. Treat the soles in the same way, being careful to dry it well so that they will not grease the carpets. We once treated a pair of calf boots in this way, and a few days after we walked five miles in saturated snow and water from six to ten inches deep at every step, and came out with feet perfectly dry. Castor oil will keep the leather soft, pliable, and black though not glossy, and quite impervious to water."

THE full assurance of faith, always attended with the full assurance of hope, never fails to be productive of perfect love, even the love that casteth out fear.—Rev. Joseph Benton.

SIX SERMONS on the Inquiry. Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the LIFE-GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. BY GEO. STORRS. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—" the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the true teachings of the BIBLE is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.
